Mr. Quentin Davies: Does my right hon. Friend agree that during the past 12 years this country has gained tremendous advantages through substantial reductions in income tax levels? Does he further agree that to increase income tax rates again, even for those on moderate levels of earnings, such as classroom teachers in London, would be a retrograde step and a major blow to the aspirations of millions of people and to economic output?

The Prime Minister: I certainly would agree with my hon. Friend about that. It applies also to national insurance contributions, because what matters is the net disposable income that people have left in their pockets to spend. People will have noticed the Opposition's plans in that regard.

Mr. Kinnock: Will the Prime Minister take this opportunity publicly to oppose a two-tier system in hospitals, such as Watford general hospital, where the patients of non budget-holding general practitioners must wait longer and take second place, regardless of their clinical need?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman is wrong. Operations are done on the basis of clinical need. There will be no reductions in existing operations in Watford. Instead, as a result of our reforms, some people will get operations faster than otherwise they would have done. I should have thought that the right hon. Gentleman would welcome that.

Mr. Kinnock: The Prime Minister has just confirmed the existence of a two-tier service. Does he realise that a two-tier system such as he supports is, as the British Medical Association says, "unethical"? Does he recognise that even in its existence it is a violation of the basic principle of the national health service that treatment must be determined according to clinical need, not contracts or commercial decisions? Is not it obvious from what he says and allows that although we believe in a national health service on the basis of need, the Prime Minister believes in one according to deals?

The Prime Minister: None of that remotely follows. Clearly, the right hon. Gentleman did not listen to my first answer. Operations are done on the basis of clinical need. I shall repeat that in case he did not fully hear it first time: operations are done on the basis of clinical need. What we are seeking and attaining are a more efficient system and more efficient use of the large resources in the NHS. The right hon. Gentleman's plans would take money away from the NHS as a result of many of his spiteful proposals. He has made it clear that he will provide no extra funding. We need no lectures on health care from him.

Mr. Kinnock: The Prime Minister not only misrepresents me, he misrepresents what is going on—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Kinnock: The Prime Minister misrepresents what is going on now. Will he take this opportunity to say that there are no cases that he will allow in which the patients of non budget-holding GPs will be allowed to take second place to the patients of budget-holding GPs who have made contractual arrangements with hospitals to gain preference for their patients?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman should read what I have said twice already: that operations are done on the basis of clinical need.

Mr. Alexander: Does my right hon. Friend recollect his past criticism of the unsatisfactory nature of the laws on Sunday trading? In the light of recent events, does he agree that it might now be appropriate to bring our laws in England and Wales into line with those of Scotland, where the commitment to the Sabbath and keeping Sunday special goes hand in hand with sensible Sunday trading laws?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend will know, a number of cases are being considered by the courts. Some may go to appeal. However, my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Home Office is consulting interested parties to see whether a consensus can be found on Sunday trading law that would be acceptable both to them and to the House, which has repeatedly expressed a view on the matter. I believe that that is the right way ahead on a matter of conscience such as this. Experience in Scotland suggests that a suitable consensus is possible. I hope that we can find one south of the border.

Q2. Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 7 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Lady to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Ms. Ruddock: Does the Prime Minister know that last year in Lewisham there were only 320 employment training places when there were 10,000 unemployed people? Can he tell me, therefore, why today, when unemployment has increased by a third, to over 14,000, the number of employment training places is to be cut by a third? What faith does he expect the British people to put in his commitment to a fairer society?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Lady will know, the United Kingdom is the only country in Europe to guarantee a training place to everyone under the age of 18 who is not already in full-time education or employment. Spending on training is £2·7 billion this year. That is two and a half times more than was spent by the previous Labour Government.

Q3. Mr. Speller: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 7 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Speller: Will my right hon. Friend assure me that he will fight for the interests of the small family farm in Britain at the common agricultural policy discussions that are to come and also by providing assistance for such items as expertise in marketing and help for farmers' incomes, which have fallen to an unacceptable level?

The Prime Minister: I can certainly give my hon. Friend the assurance that he seeks. We will defend the interests of all farmers, including small family farmers, in the forthcoming Community discussions. The House knows that, as currently framed, the Commission's plans for CAP reform would discriminate against United Kingdom farmers, largely because our average farm size is greater than that in other member states. We have given considerable help to small farmers recently, in particular by increasing milk quotas and by means of the hill livestock compensatory allowance. We shall continue to help.

Q4. Mr. Hain: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 7 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hain: Will the Prime Minister take this opportunity to repudiate the views of the Conservative candidate in the Monmouth by-election who yesterday advocated the opting out of not just the Royal Gwent hospital but the Nevill Hall hospital as well?

The Prime Minister: Opting out—that is to say, putting control in the hands of local people within the national health service—is the right way to produce better management and local choice. I note that the hon. Gentleman does not favour local choice, just as his hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) made clear in terms of education yesterday.

Q5. Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 7 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Wilshire: Given the Government's desire to extend choice in education further, and given the public's desire to see the highest possible standards of education everywhere, will my right hon. Friend find time today to look for ways to extend further choice in education?

The Prime Minister: We are very pleased to see extended choice in education. The new grant-maintained schools, city technology colleges and open enrolment have provided considerable extra choice. I hope that parents will take advantage of it. It is clear that the Opposition do not like choice. Grant-maintained schools, CTCs, the assisted places scheme, charitable status for private schools and the existing A-levels would all go and, with the Opposition's tax plans, most of the teachers would go as well.

Q6. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 7 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Having clearly misled Parliament last week——

Mr. Speaker: Order. No hon. Member misleads Parliament. The hon. Member knows that and he must rephrase his question.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Having misrepresented to Parliament last week the attitude of the British Medical Association and Britain's doctors as to GP contracts, why did the Prime Minister seek to cover up his mistakes by doctoring Hansard? Is that not true and does not the Prime Minister owe someone an apology?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman is wrong, and Mr. Speaker will make a statement about that matter at 3.30 pm. In advance of that statement, let me say this to the hon. Gentleman. Like every hon. Member, he knows that it is normal practice, when a Minister uses a quote, for the precise words and their source to be provided by Hansard. In this case, the name of the correct source was put into the record, but I am entirely happy for the original words to be reinstated. The magazine from which I quoted was GP Magazine but similar sentiments to those that I quoted, endorsing the reforms, have been expressed in the British Medical Journal, published by the BMA—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let us hear the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister: I quote from a recent editorial in the British Medical Journal, which said:

"The reforms may not address all the problems of the NHS, but they do improve our capacity to specify the quality of services and to price improvements."

The point that I was making is entirely justified. If any apology is required, it is from the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham).

Q7. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 7 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Arnold: Did my right hon. Friend have the opportunity, over the weekend, to reflect on the damage that would be done to our representative democracy by a system of proportional representation? This system would deprive people of their solely responsible local representative to satisfy the Liberals, the statisticians and the pundits who enjoy smoke-filled rooms.

The Prime Minister: I am not in favour of either smoke-filled rooms or proportional representation. I share my hon. Friend's view that it leaves minority parties determining Government policy and striking bargains for their support. That is not democracy, it is horse trading, and I will have no part in it.

Q9. Mr. Paice: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 7 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Paice: Will my right hon. Friend take time today to reflect on the fact that we, by reducing the top rate of tax to 40 per cent. from 83 per cent., have increased the proportion of total yield of income tax paid by the highest 10 per cent. of taxpayers from 20 to 30 per cent? Is not this because many of the most wealthy people are now staying in this country and bringing their money back, so that we get 40 per cent. of something, whereas the Opposition would get 59 per cent. of nothing?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is entirely right about that. The evidence as to the amount of tax collected with lower rates is clear for all to see. It is equally clear that, under the Labour party's proposals, 14 out of 15 taxpayers would not be better off, as the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) said a year ago. The figure is now one in eight. When the shadow Chancellor gets at the figures they change daily, and when we have finished costing Labour's programme they will change again.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The Prime Minister will be aware that, in relation to his policy on local government finance, only after huge public protest and widespread cuts in services did he decide that he had better review the policy inherited from his predecessor and then to ditch it. Does he agree that his policy on the opting out of hospitals was equally widely opposed and that it is now clear that it, too, will result in widespread cuts in services? For the sake of consistency of principle, will the Prime Minister carry out a wholesale review and then ditch the policy?

The Prime Minister: No. I do not share the hon. Gentleman's views, and I do not believe that his analysis is remotely correct. [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman must wait and see how it turns out. He will find that he is wrong. For many years we have had to ensure that the national health service uses its resources to the most efficient extent. At last the present Government have had the courage to introduce a system that will ensure that the money is used to best effect for patients. I believe that, for the national health service, that is the right way to proceed and the one which will produce the maximum amount of good patient care. That is what we propose to do.

Official Report

3.31 pm

Mr. Speaker: I have considered the complaint made on Friday last by the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) that the Official Report incorrectly reported part of an answer by the Prime Minister given by him on the previous day. The Prime Minister is reported, when referring to the British Medical Association, as having quoted from the GP Magazine. I have checked the transcript, which shows that what the Prime Minister said was:

"and, only last year, it opposed the GP contracts, yet, in its own magazine, it now says . . ."

It is the normal practice for a Minister's staff to check Hansard, and during this process a sub-editor was given by a member of the Prime Minister's staff the name of the magazine quoted by the Prime Minister. The sub-editor thought that this was the British Medical Association's own magazine and accepted the suggested change. By including the name of the magazine, however, the Official Report inadvertently changed the sense of the Prime Minister's reply. The Editor of Hansard has expressed to me his regret that this should have happened, and a correction will be printed in today's Official Report.

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): I am grateful for your statement, Mr. Speaker. Of course we accept in good faith the explanation given by the Editor of Hansard. I am quite sure that everybody is clear that no blame attaches to the Editor or his staff for what occurred. However, the fact remains that, although the Prime Minister's staff do not read the court circular, and apparently do not read the British Medical Journal—[HON. MEMBERS: "Cheap."] It is certainly not as cheap as fiddling the record in Hansard. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. It would be helpful to the whole House, in terms of lowering the temperature, if the hon. Gentleman were to rephrase his last comment.

Dr. Cunningham: What emerges from your inquiry, Mr. Speaker, is that a member of the Prime Minister's staff persuaded a Hansard sub-editor to change the record. [Interruption.] That is what happened. The sub-editor was persuaded to change the record in a way that was inaccurate in that it changed the sense of what the Prime Minister had said. Would it not have been better if a correction had been issued from No. 10 Downing street and apologies offered both to the House and to the British Medical Association?

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think that anything further arises on that. [Interruption.] Order. I have made my statement and cannot say more than that.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. Member is always so supportive of the Chair, I will take a helpful comment from him.

Mr. Ewing: I am grateful to you, Mr. Speaker, for pointing out that I am always helpful to the Chair. It is precisely in that vein that I want to put my point of order. We are not dealing here with a trivial matter, and the last thing that I want to see is the Editor of Hansard, to whom no blame attaches, or even a member of the Prime Minister's staff, being incriminated. I want to know whether this was discussed with the Prime Minister and whether the change was made on his authority.

Bangladesh (Cyclone Disaster)

3.37 pm

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): I beg to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely, "the Bangladesh cyclone disaster." [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is very important that I hear this application.

Mr. Shore: The whole House was appalled by the news last week that 50,000 men, women and children had perished in the cyclone that swept over the coastal areas and the low-lying islands of the bay of Bengal. Alas, that early estimate of the dead has already been proved to be wrong. More than 125,000 casualties are now reported and there are serious estimates that the total could rise to over 200,000 before the count is over. But even that is not the end of it. Villages throughout the coastal areas are still cut off, most of them without food or drinking water, and the first reports of cholera are coming in—[Interruption.]

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I do not need a point of order. I am listening to the application that is being made to me. [Interruption.] Order. It is very unseemly to have these comments. I ask the House please to settle down and let me hear this application.

Mr. Shore: The first reports of cholera are now coming in, and a further still more awful disaster is in the making. Clearly this is a specific and important matter which needs the most urgent consideration. In the very short term there is a great need for food and medicines and, just as important, the means of delivering them. What appear to be most required are helicopters and inflatable power boats.

The Government could tell the House very little last Thursday. I do not blame them for that; telephone contact with Bangladesh is largely dependent upon satellite communications, and the principal facility in the Chittagong area was damaged by the cyclone and is still out of action. Nevertheless, we have a much clearer picture now than we had last Thursday and it should be possible, in a debate, for the Government to give an informed account of the actions they have taken so far, what is now in train, and what further assistance they propose to give.

This is also the time to consider what this country and other donors can do in the period ahead to assist the Government of Bangladesh to carry through an enhanced programme for building cyclone shelters and strengthening coastal defences against, certainly, future cyclone attacks.

Bangladesh is one of the poorest countries in the world. Apart from loss of human lives, present estimates of the cost of this disaster in terms of cattle, crops and infrastructure are well over $1,000 million. Bangladesh is a member of the Commonwealth. Our ties with that country and its people over the past three decades have been strengthened by the substantial number of people of Bangladeshi origin who have settled here and are now among our fellow citizens.

These are strong reasons for an emergency debate, and I hope, Mr. Speaker, that you will grant one.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Gentleman asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely, "the Bangladesh cyclone disaster."

As the House knows, I have to announce my decision without giving reasons. I listened with care and deep concern to what the right hon. Gentleman said. As he knows, I have to decide whether this application comes within the Standing Order, and, if so, whether a debate should be given priority over the business already set down for today or for tomorrow.

I listened with care to what the right hon. Gentleman said. I do not in any way underestimate its importance, but I have to say that in this case the matter raised does not meet the criteria of the Standing Order. I cannot therefore submit his application to the House.

Sir Hugh Rossi (Hornsey and Wood Green): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wish to refer back to the statement that you made——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have already dealt with that.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I very much regret that you were unable to accept the application of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore). I regret also the rowdy atmosphere in which initially the application had to be made.

The Prime Minister, the Minister for Overseas Development and the Chief Secretary to the Secretary were all present. We understand the plight of the people of Bangladesh which has touched the hearts and, I am glad to say, the hands of the British people who are giving generously and who are concerned at the fact that our Government are being seen as one of the meanest of the richest nations in the world.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not make allegations which I cannot answer. He is raising a point of order.

Mr. Madden: If the Minister for Overseas Development, the Prime Minister or the Foreign Secretary were to intimate to you, Mr. Speaker, a wish to make a statement at 7 o'clock this evening, would you facilitate such a statement, bearing in mind the great concern of many Bangladeshis who are British citizens and who are worried about the fate of their relatives and friends?

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Let me deal with one thing at a time. I in no way underestimate the matter. Like the hon. Member, I also have constituents who have relatives in Bangladesh. We had a long run on it on a private notice question on Thursday. Every hon. Member who is present was called to put a question. I am sure that there will be other opportunities. I have to take into account all kinds of other criteria in making my decision. The House knows that.

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Leader of the House is here and is listening to the exchanges. I understand your reasons, Mr. Speaker, for not granting an emergency debate, regrettable though that decision is. Given the scale of the tragedy, surely we can prevail upon the Leader of the House to say that he will find an early opportunity for a debate, or discuss through the usual channels the rearrangement of business so that the House may have an opportunity to debate the tragedy and Britain's contribution towards reparation.

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John MacGregor): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. It may be helpful to the House if I say that clearly we would wish to do that and to keep the House fully informed. Communication is obviously a problem in the area, but I can give the assurance that we wish to keep the House fully informed.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that anything further on that can be raised with me. The Leader of the House, on behalf of the Government, has stated that he will bear the matter in mind. What point of order can arise for me out of that?

Points of Order

Mr. Alistair Darling (Edinburgh, Central): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Secretary of State for Scotland has been briefing the press all morning about the fact that he intends to cap the expenditure of Lothian regional council, a step that may cost hundreds of jobs and will almost certainly put an end to the concessionary bus pass scheme enjoyed by pensioners.

In the past, Mr. Speaker, you have criticised Ministers who have chosen to make statements outside the House rather than to elected Members. Have you received a request for a statement to be made which at the very least would allow us to ask the Secretary of State why poll tax payers in Westminster get a blanket subsidy of £1,000 a head while in Lothian we get £453 a head? The whole thing seems to have the stench of electioneering. The purpose seems to be to save the skin of the Secretary of State for Scotland, who would otherwise face a very unhappy party conference in Perth tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a matter for me. I am sure that what has been said will have been heard.

Sir Hugh Rossi (Hornsey and Wood Green): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. If I may, I should like to revert to the statement that you made earlier about Hansard. It was quite clear from your statement that the name of a book or a magazine was added to the Hansard report by a member of the Prime Minister's office, who had not referred to the Prime Minister and had assumed that that was the magazine to which the Prime Minister had referred. You also made it clear that the Editor of Hansard admitted that in making that alteration his staff had altered the sense of the answer——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I did not say that.

Sir Hugh Rossi: The hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) accused the Prime Minister of fiddling the report——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not sure that this is terribly helpful. I asked the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) to withdraw his remark, and he did so.

Sir Hugh Rossi: The point is that the hon. Member for Copeland made that statement in the full hearing of the House, which asked him to withdraw. He steadfastly ignored that request. My question to you, Mr. Speaker, is whether it is appropriate that the hon. Gentleman should withdraw, and will you invite him to do so?

Mr. Speaker: I asked the hon. Member for Copeland to rephrase his remark, and I thought that he had done so —[HON. MEMBERS: "No."] I am quite certain that the hon. Gentleman would not wish to accuse anyone, least of all the Prime Minister, of fiddling. If he would like to make that clear, we can get on—[HON. MEMBERS: "Withdraw."] Order. I ask hon. Members to restrain themselves; this is very bad behaviour. I shall repeat what I have just said to the hon. Member for Copeland—[Interruption.] Order. In the exchanges, which were somewhat excited, and amid a great deal of noise, I asked the hon. Member for Copeland to withdraw the charge that the Prime Minister had fiddled Hansard. I thought that he had done so. So that it can be absolutely clear, I ask the hon. Gentleman to do so now.

Dr. Cunningham: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I did not accuse the Prime Minister of fiddling Hansard—[HON. MEMBERS: "You did."] We must get this absolutely clear. I was making it clear that what had happened was that a member of the Prime Minister's No. 10 staff had secured a change in the record, which changed the sense. Conservative Members started to shout comments at me, including "Cheap", to which I replied, "Not half as cheap as fiddling the record." That is what I said, and I stand by that statement.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that we had better leave the matter there.

Mr. Bruce Grocott (The Wrekin): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I hope that this will be a helpful point of order. To avoid the problem occurring again, and as we already have an electronic Hansard—as it is called these days—should not a simple play-back facility be installed in the Hansard office? If a member of the Prime Minister's staff or anyone else then said to the Hansard staff, "We did not mean to say what we actually said"—the right hon. Gentleman is rapidly becoming the Dan Quayle of British politics—would not the simple answer be, as in the case of a disputed penalty, to have an action replay to decide who is right?

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) rose——

Mr. Speaker: No.

Mr. Skinner: You need a linesman to help you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not need that sort of help.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am on my feet. I am perfectly able to deal with these matters.

It has been consistently ruled by my predecessors that tape recordings are not a check on the Official Report. The Official Report is a full report which,

"though not strictly verbatim, is substantially the verbatim report, with repetitions and redundancies omitted and with obvious mistakes corrected, but which on the other hand leaves out nothing that adds to the meaning of the speech or illustrates the argument."

Reference to that will be found in "Erskine May" on page 211.

The change made on Thursday does not fall within the category of acceptable correction. On the other hand, if Hansard was not able to correct our grammar and omit our verbal mistakes, it would, on many occasions, make pretty incomprehensible reading.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): Would you, Mr. Speaker, agree with me —[HON. MEMBERS: "No."]

Mr. Speaker: Not on a point of order that I have not heard.

Mr. Dickens: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Hansard has a difficult job. There cannot be an hon. Member in the House who has not had his or her speech tidied up because it was rather ambiguous. That is why we are all sent notes after our speeches and sometimes after our questions. In doing its work, Hansard often has to interpret ambiguous statements so as to make sensible reading for those who follow us. By all this stupidity this afternoon, are we not placing Hansard itself in a stupid position?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has stated in rather more detailed language the point that I was seeking to make.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Further to your decision on the application made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) for an emergency debate on the situation in Bangladesh, I realise that it is not acceptable to challenge the reasons behind your decision that the Finance Bill, today and tomorrow, must take precedence over such a debate, but may I say, in the presence of the Leader of the House, that, were reports in this morning's tabloid press to prove accurate and the Leader of the House does intend to announce the early rise of the House on 19 July, two weeks earlier than usual, many people would not understand how your office could be given the impression that Government business was of such urgency that that important debate could not be arranged?

Mr. Speaker: I have not heard that happy piece of news, but the hon. Gentleman will have heard what the Leader of the House said about the matter.

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, which arises from the Order Paper rather than from the Official Report. I think, Mr. Speaker, that you accept some responsibility for the Order Paper.

Question 260, tabled in the name of the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker), who clearly does not represent a Lothian constituency, facilitates an announcement by the Secretary of State which will amount to a savage attack on services provided by Lothian regional council. May we be protected from such behaviour? Is not the Secretary of State prepared to come here and make a statement?

Mr. Speaker: I am responsible for the Order Paper. I look carefully at questions, and provided that they are in order they can be tabled, and that question was perfectly in order.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): Further to your statement, Mr. Speaker, and the response of the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), it is clear that he used the word "fiddling" and, sitting where we were on the Conservative Benches, it was abundantly evident that the hon. Gentleman's remarks were pointed directly at my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister; there can be no doubt about that. Taken out of context and read simply in Hansard, his words can mean all kinds of things, but at the time they were directed directly at my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. Is the hon. Gentleman going to withdraw them?

Mr. Speaker: We have all heard what the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) subsequently said. The point was drawn to my attention by the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi). I have dealt with that.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Although you have ruled on the application by the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore), as the Leader of the House is present in the Chamber, may I point out that, although we shall be considering the Finance Bill today and tomorrow, the Bill to be considered on Thursday is of lesser importance. I wonder whether the Leader of the House can find a way of facilitating a debate on Bangladesh on Thursday if an application for one, with the consent of all parties, is made to you tomorrow, Mr. Speaker. Would that be in order, and would you accept such an application?

Mr. Speaker: The Opposition and the minority parties have their Opposition days, although there may not be one immediately available for the hon. Member's party. Nevertheless, that question is clearly one for the usual channels to resolve, and right hon. and hon. Members heard what the Leader of the House had to say on that issue.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) rose——

Mr. Speaker: I will take one final point of order, if it is on the same subject.

Mr. Corbyn: Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is. I do not want to challenge your ruling on the application made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore), but I want to convey to Ministers—through you, Mr. Speaker—the sense of urgency that must be brought to bear on the situation in Bangladesh. Hundreds of thousands of lives are at risk. Many of them could be saved, and a cholera epidemic in Bangladesh could be prevented, if transport equipment, particularly military helicopters, were sent to the affected region from the base at Diego Garcia and from bases in the Gulf. Urgency is the key. If the Minister concerned could be persuaded to make a statement today, or, better still, if helicopters could get to the region quickly, many lives could be saved.

NORTHERN IRELAND COMMITTEE

Ordered,

That the Proposal for a draft Fair Employment (Amendment) (Northern Ireland) Order 1991 published on 28th February 1991, being a Matter relating exclusively to Northern Ireland, be referred to the Northern Ireland Committee for its consideration.—[Mr. Wood.]

Statutory Instruments, &c.

Mr. Speaker: With the leave of the House, I will put together the Questions on the two motions relating to statutory instruments.

Ordered,

That the Financial Services Act 1986 (Extension of Scope of Act) Order 1991 (S.I., 1991, No. 1104) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Financial Services Act 1986 (Delegation) (No. 2) Order 1991 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Wood.]

Sunday Trading (Video Shops) Bill

3.55 pm

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to exempt video shops from the provisions of the Shops Act 1950.

Some months ago, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister described the Shops Act 1950 as bizarre. The ban on the sale or renting of videos is a particular example of that much more general complaint. The 1950 Act was passed in a quite different era. The 1940s were a time of rationing and not of plenty, and the Shops Act 1950 was passed at a time when cinemas did not open on Sunday, professional sport never took place on Sunday, and most people did not have television—and those who did had the choice of only one channel, which broadcast for only four and a half hours.

The 1950 Act was passed at a time when no one had heard of videos, garden centres, or do-it-yourself superstores. Today, the situation has changed. In 1972, the House passed the Sunday Theatre Bill and Sunday Cinema Bill. Today, cinemas and provincial theatres can, and do, open on Sunday—and only last Sunday the Haymarket theatre opened for a performance of "Talking Heads", which repeated an earlier performance and raised money for charity.

Videos are surely part of the same entertainment industry as the theatre and cinema. Whereas television used to be broadcast for only four and a half hours on Sunday, today one can view 20 hours of BBC1 or BBC2; 24 hours of ITV; or 20 hours of Channel 4. That represents 84 hours of viewing choice on Sunday, compared with four and a half hours in 1950. Furthermore, if one is a subscriber to Sky Television, one can watch 24 hours of movies on either of two of its film channels.

Current law says that it is perfectly moral to see a film at a cinema, but wrong to watch the same film on a video at home. The law says that it is right and moral to watch television all day, but wrong to hire a video to view after church.

A further anomaly is the changing attitude to sport. As I said, in 1950 there was no professional sport on Sunday, but today the most popular games of cricket are those played in the Sunday league. It is not unknown either for the British climate to cause the Wimbledon finals to be played on Sunday.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Members of Parliament do not work on Sunday.

Mr. Marshall: Some of us work a seven-day week, even if that is not true of the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner).

The law says that it is perfectly all right to watch golf, cricket, football or tennis on Sunday, but wrong to view a sporting video. Apparently, it is perfectly moral to watch Arsenal playing at Highbury on Sunday, but wrong to watch a video of the 1966 World Cup final. What giants they were—Peters, Hurst, Charlton, Stiles and Banks—yet one cannot enjoy watching them on Sunday in one's own home. That is nonsense.

One of the ironies is that the video industry is more closely regulated than the cinema or the theatre. Under the Video Recordings Act 1984 much stronger standards apply to the video industry than apply to the cinema to take account of the fact that videos are seen in the home, not outside. Another irony is that video shops are owned by small shopkeepers who operate legally selling newspapers, so why should not they also be allowed to hire out a video? Why should not small shopkeepers be free to serve the needs of their customers? Why should not individuals in that branch of the entertainment industry be treated in the same way as the rest of the entertainment industry?

The importance of videos can be seen by the fact that more than 25,000 people are employed in the video software industry. It is the largest visual entertainment media employer, employing 50 per cent. more people than ITV and 25 times as many as British Sky Broadcasting. Sunday trade is especially important to the video industry because 28 per cent. of video rentals take place on a Sunday. If obstacles are placed in the way of this industry, the viability of some shops will be affected and some individuals will have to close shop.

There are currently 110 prosecutions pending against the video industry. In Newham, Hartlepool, Kingston-upon-Hull and Scunthorpe the social problems are so light that the local authorities are prosecuting the video industry for renting out videos. What blessed places they are that they have nothing better on which to concentrate local authority time.

The judgment of the Court of Appeal in the B and Q and Wickes cases has created uncertainty about the future of the Sunday trading law and its enforcement. It will now be more difficult to resort to injunctions to enforce the law, but it will be possible to prosecute and the maximum fine for a prosecution is £1,000. To a large firm, £1,000 is no deterrent, but to a small video shop which rents out a few videos it is an important penalty which acts as a real deterrent.

People, not legislation, make Sunday a special day. The church will not be graced by having conscripts in the pew and those churches which thrive do so because they offer a positive message. Would Charles Wesley have needed the protection of the Shops Act 1950 to get people to hear a good Wesleyan sermon? We all wish Archbishop Carey well in the future. This year we have seen a new Archbishop of Canterbury inducted and we shall shortly see a new Chief Rabbi. The new Chief Rabbi has a congregation that is not protected by trading laws, but it honours the Sabbath rather better than the followers of Archbishop Carey honour the Sabbath.

A church that relies on the protection of the law to encourage people to come to its services will do less well than the Jewish faith does, not by relying on the protection of the law but by having a positive message for those who come to shul.

A law that is frequently broken by the 60,000 shops that open every Sunday and by the 2 million people who work every Sunday, and a law that is enforced intermittently and is riddled with inconsistencies brings the rule of law into disrepute. I invite the House to face reality and to support the Bill. The need for the reform of Sunday trading is widely accepted by the Consumers Association, by the majority of retailers and by the majority of people in this country, apart from my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor). The nonsense has been confirmed by the recent Court of Appeal judgment.

One local authority has said that the law is now unenforceable. The Keep Sunday Special campaign has said that it believes in the need for compromise. The Bill offers a compromise. It deals with small traders and suggests that video shops should be put on a par with the rest of the entertainment industry. I ask the House to allow the Bill to be introduced so that the House can demonstrate that it believes in the need for compromise.

4.4 pm

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): I have a high regard for my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) and for all his good works. At the end of his speech, he said that we should face reality. I appeal to the House to face reality and to realise that it is nonsense for ourselves and for our democracy to try to pretend that we still have the power to do anything in the meantime about Sunday trading. My hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South said that, because of the recent court judgment, there was some difficulty in moving an injunction. He should consult a lawyer because the lawyers in Southend will tell him that it is not only difficult, but impossible to move an injunction at present. The law has effectively been frozen because of the decision in the B and Q case which was based solely on a decision whether our Sunday trading laws were inconsistent with the treaty of Rome.

We know that a higher court will make its judgment next week. We know that the matter will then go to the European Court. Although we may pass laws on Sunday trading and on whether video shops, greengrocers' shops or any other shop should stay open or be closed on a Sunday, we shall be told what to do by the European Court in two years' time.

It may be nonsense to try to hold up the House in the good work that it wants to do, but I appeal to my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South and to the House generally to stop pretending that we still have power that we do not have. It does not make the slightest difference whether the Bill is passed or rejected.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South kindly mentioned Southend. I drove round on Sunday and saw that, rightly or wrongly, all the video shops were open. The law is in a state of total confusion. It has been suspended because of an action that our laws are inconsistent with the treaty of Rome. I do not know whether our laws are inconsistent with the treaty. The people who will tell us are the judges in the European Court who are appointed to do so. Once they make the decision, whether we pass 1,000 laws on Sunday trading or whether the trading standards inspectors rush round, those inspectors will have no power.

I do not know what the court will do. My hon. Friend does not know what the court will do and I am sure that the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), who follows these issues closely, does not know what the court will do. The plain fact is that, irrespective of what we decide today, we shall be told what to do in two years' time. Even if the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the Liberal Democrats decide differently, that is that.

In the House of Commons, we spend a great deal of time asking for inquiries into matters and asking the Government to give more priority to certain matters when the power has gone away. A point of order was raised today about a rumour that the House will rise two weeks early simply because we can no longer do the things that we used to do. The time has come for the House of Commons to face up to the threat to our democracy, to consider the implications and to decide what we should do, instead of going on a wild goose chase and saying that we want to change a law that has been suspended because of an action relating to the European Court.

In no sense of hostility to my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South—and he is one of the most conscientious, hard-working, sincere and undoubtedly good Members of the House—I must say that I hope that he will not be taken away from reality by what he says. The reality is that our law has been suspended. The reality is that, irrespective of the views of Parliament, we shall be told what to do in two years' time. To try to pretend that matters are different is to run away from reality and from our respect for democracy. I hope that my hon. Friend will withdraw the Bill. If he does not, I hope that the House will reject it, not because we reject his ideas, but because we have to say, sadly, that his opinions are utterly irrelevant today. The European Court and not the democratic House of Commons will decide and will tell us what to do.

RATE OF CORPORATION TAX FOR 1990

4.21 pm

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 16, line 4, at end add—

'(1A) Where a company whose activities consist

(i) wholly or mainly in the manufacture of finished goods, partly finished goods or materials, and

(ii) of activities falling within such classes, groups or descriptions set out in the Standard Industrial Classification issued by the Central Statistical Office as may be prescribed by way of regulations made under this subsection so elects in writing within two years of the end of an accounting period which includes the whole or any part of the financial year 1990, subsection (1) above and subsection (2) below of this section shall not apply to that company in relation to that accounting period; and where such an election is made, then, in relation to that company for that accounting period,

(a) the rate at which corporation tax is charged for the financial year 1990 shall be 34·01 per cent. (and not 35 per cent. as provided by section 19 of the Finance Act 1990)

(b) section 24(2)(a)(i) of the Capital Allowances Act 1990 shall have effect as if the percentage specified therein were the aggregate of 25 per cent. multiplied by A and 40 per cent. multiplied by B, where B represents the fraction of the accounting period comprised within the financial year 1990 and A represents the fraction of the accounting period not so comprised (if any), and

(c) the fraction mentioned in section 13(2) of the Taxes Act 1988 for the financial year 1990 shall be taken to be a fraction of which the numerator is one thousand eight hundred and two and the denominator is eighty thousand (and not one fortieth as provided by section 20 of the Finance Act 1990).'.

The amendment proposes to raise the assistance and support that should be given to British business, especially in the context of the proposals in the Finance Bill and of the general state of the economy.

I remind the House of some of the economic indicators: 500,000 jobs have been lost in the past 12 months, and the losses are accelerating; almost 25,000 firms failed last year —an increase of almost 77 per cent.—and it is predicted that about a further 25 per cent. are likely to fail in the coming year; and since last spring, £2 billion has been slashed from investment and there has been a substantial cut—perhaps as high as £7 billion—in manufacturing output since last March.

Against the background of those alarming results for our economy, we contend that the Government should be giving priority to manufacturing industry and manufacturing investment, primarily because the tradable sector is almost overwhelmingly the sector of the economy in which we earn our living in the world, as opposed to merely exchanging goods and services within our boundaries. There are some tradable services, but Britain's trade in manufactures is the essence of the way in which it earns its living.

When the serious balance of payments deficit began to emerge, Conservative Members, especially the former Chancellor—I cannot remember how many Chancellors we have had since—the right hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Lawson), sought to suggest that the problems were of demand and of the way in which the economy was developing rather than structural problems because of our inadequacy in producing the manufactures that we wish to buy and consume.

Although that explanation enjoyed brief popularity among Ministers, they now accept that we have structural problems and that our inability as an economy to produce all the goods we need is leading to our underlying difficulties. In that context, I want to draw attention to some figures which show the trends in our trade balance.

First, there are the statistics for manufactured export volumes between 1979 and 1990 produced by the United Nations on a comparable basis across most of the developed world. I emphasise that these are results, rather than forecasts, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer has told us how much he prefers results. The results show that, of 14 countries, the United Kingdom comes 13th for the percentage change in manufactured export volumes since 1979. That is a clear sign of how far we are falling behind so many of our competitors.

It is evident from more recent figures for our manufactured trade that the value of our exports between 1979 and now, including the forecast figure for this year, has fallen by minus 8·7 per cent. Since 1979, the value of our trade has fallen by more than 2 per cent.—minus 2·4 per cent. precisely—as a percentage of our gross domestic product—a percentage of the wealth we earn.

The same picture is evident for volumes. Although our exports have risen by 59 per cent. since 1979, our imports have risen almost twice as much—by 108 per cent. World manufactured exports have risen by 87 per cent. Again, that paints a rather alarming picture of how we are doing against the increase in world trade.

Since 1979, our share of world manufactured exports has fallen by 15 per cent., if measured, as is most accurate, at constant prices. That is an alarming picture, which is confirmed by figures for the change in manufacturing trade balance since 1979, again as a percentage of our national wealth, our GDP. Of the 22 countries of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development for which figures are available, the United Kingdom comes 21st.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): If we put those figures into a longer historical context and look at our record since the second world war, would we not find that a 59 per cent. increase in export manufactures in the past 12 years was rather a good performance and that our percentage of world trade has stabilised during the past five or six years, which is a remarkable achievement compared with the continual decline of previous decades?

Mrs. Beckett: That would be a remarkable achievement if it were so, but, unfortunately, it is not. I agree that there was a period when our share of world trade reached a plateau and we all began to hope that the position would improve, but that is no longer the case. The overall picture that is emerging is of continuing decline. I accept the hon. Gentleman's point that that has happened not only under this Government, but it has continued to happen under this Government, who have continually told us that they have enjoyed a dramatic success such as was not enjoyed by previous Governments in previous decades. Yet, comparing our performance with that of our competitors, we have done poorly—although, as we must always remind the House, we had the enormous advantage of income from the North sea, which we could have used to invest and improve that very performance. That is the evidence from the trade balance of the difficulties that we are experiencing with our manufactured trade.

I should like to produce more evidence as to the scale of the problems and why it is that the Opposition believe that manufacturing should be given so high a priority. If we look at the position of our EC competitors, there is no doubt that there has been what the Prime Minister likes to call a decline in manufacturing activity in other countries as well as here. Unfortunately, however, there is equally clear evidence to show that the decline that we are experiencing is much worse than that of our competitors.

4.30 pm

The Eurostat data on production expectations show clearly that the United Kingdom has the deepest recession. When it comes to stocks of finished products, the data show that we are more or less level pegging, in bottom position, with Spain and France. Overall, the figures show clearly that we are experiencing a more severe recession than anyone else.

If we consider the OECD countries and whether there is evidence there of a more general decline, we see that there are countries where, just as in this country, output is likely to have been lower in 1990, and that it fell for much of 1990. In other countries, the picture is somewhat mixed. Output began to rise, and fell again. In terms of the severity of the recession, however, what comes through clearly is that only in Canada or Greece is there anything like the scale of recession that there is in the United Kingdom. Even there, the picture is not as gloomy as, unfortunately, it is in this country.

From the rate of growth of manufacturing output in OECD countries between 1979 and 1990, it is clear that, in percentage terms, out of all the 16 OECD countries for which figures are available, the United Kingdom came 14th. My hon. Friend the shadow Secretary of State for Trade and Industry drew the attention of the House to the most recent and alarming figures that we have produced for average output. We have considered what is likely to happen, using the Government's own forecasts, during the coming year and have looked at what that means in terms of the change in output since 1979 when this Government came to power. On average, they show that output will have risen only by a mere 6 per cent. over that period of 11 years.

If we look at the most recent figures that are available to me—those for February 1991—we see that the picture is even worse than the average figures that we quoted previously. If we take the period from May 1979 to February 1991, the total increase in manufacturing output in that period amounted to a mere 3·5 per cent. These are extremely worrying figures, at a time when we are approaching the single market in 1992. We shall face more severe challenges then than we have experienced for a substantial period.

That is the information which has been made available to the House, and it shows the scale of the difficulties that we face. It brings me to the question of what we are doing about them and what action is being taken. If we look at the only measure that can possibly begin to remedy these problems—the trend of developments with regard to investment—again we see an extremely alarming picture. The figures for business investment and total investment —figures that the Government normally like to give—have taken a nose dive in the most recent months. They fell by a greater amount than we have seen since the great depression of the 1930s. If we compare the figures for the first half of 1990 to the first half of this year, we see that a decline in investment is predicted of perhaps as much as 12 per cent. Again there is no question but that that is very much the overall pattern.

The figures for investment as a proportion of gross domestic product have fallen almost continuously. Perhaps there was a slight recovery towards the middle of the 1980s. However, they are substantially below the figures that this Government inherited in 1979, and they are very much below the pattern of what was spent on investment in this country in previous years under successive Governments.

The figures for manufacturing fixed investment at constant 1985 prices show that investment is expected to come in at a lower level than that which the Government inherited in 1979. If the most recent forecasts from the Confederation of British Industry turn out be correct—we must all hope that they will not—the figures for manufacturing fixed investment are likely to go back to the levels that we saw in the 1960s. That is no way to prepare ourselves for the challenges of the single market in 1992.

If we look at what our competitors are doing in manufacturing fixed investments, on the figures per person employed in manufacturing among the OECD 15, we see, on the most recent figures that we have, the United Kingdom coming in 14th. As those were the figures for 1988, when, by the Government's standards, there was something of an investment boom, the position now may be even worse.

Nor is that the case only for investment in manufacturing generally. Our competitors are increasing their investment in research and development, but if we look at the change in Government-funded civil research and development, we come 18th out of the OECD 19 for the period 1985-89, when, we are told, there was a boom in investment. If we look at the figures for Government-funded research and development as a percentage of gross domestic product, we see that we are 12th out of the OECD 19 and, in terms of per head of population, we are 13th out of the OECD 19.

In summary, manufacturing output is falling; manufacturing investment as a percentage of gross domestic product has fallen since 1979 by 12·7 per cent. at constant prices; manufacturing fixed investment, excluding leased assets by almost 15 per cent.; and that including leased assets by almost 14 per cent. That is an alarming picture when we consider the background to these figures and this summary.

That brings me to the prospects for recovery. The Chancellor said the other day that recovery was around the corner, but I am not sure what corner that is. It must be one that is rather a long way away. According to the Government's figures in the Red Book, the recovery will be consumer-led rather than, as one would hope, investment-led and laying the foundations for a more prosperous economy.

I am not sure how many hon. Members have seen the report in the Financial Times this morning of the most recent survey of expectations from academics, economists, study institutions and others. It shows increasing anxiety about the strength of the recovery, when it begins, and a suggestion that it might be fragile and weak at best. There are worries about the Government's reliance on growth in real incomes and consumer spending rather than in structural improvements to pull us out of recession and into recovery.

Perhaps most interesting of all—given the Government's time scale, which seems to be focusing on the general election—the economists predict that, although there will be a recovery and inflation will begin to fall, by early 1992 inflation will have begun to climb again, interest rates will have stopped falling and the trade gap will have begun to widen. That is an alarming prospect for the country and a difficult one for the Government, who are clearly trying to time the election for that period after the recovery has occurred and before the deterioration that is so widely expected becomes evident.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. David Mellor): So the hon. Lady admits that there will be a recovery.

Mrs. Beckett: We have never denied that there will be a recovery. I am astonished at the Chief Secretary, who is brighter than he is trying to pretend. Of course there will be a recovery. When the economy is absolutely flat on the floor, the situation would be desperate indeed if there were never to be a recovery. The question is when it will occur, to what extent, and—most important of all—whether it can be sustained. We have to ask ourselves whether this country is taking the necessary action to prepare itself for long-term prosperity rather than short-term recovery, which, it is predicted, will be—in the words of the Chancellor about the recession—possibly shallow and short-lived.

I should like, in this context, to draw attention to these words of the president of the CBI:

> "Investment in training, innovation, research and development, as well as in fixed capital, adds to the nation's productive capacity, enhances its efficiency and speeds up its eventual economic recovery."

The following words fit in very well with the observations of a variety of experts I have been quoting:

> "If we do not expand this capacity we will not be able to sustain renewed economic growth for very long. Once industry is back working near its full capacity, further increases in spending could not be met with higher output but would simply result in those familiar problems of rising prices, surging imports and current account deficits, which we experienced in the late 1980s."

Against that background, I am moving this amendment to enable us to raise the issue of investment allowances specifically targeted at manufacturing industry. This is in complete contrast to the underlying philosophy behind the changes that the Government are making through the Budget and the Finance Bill. The reduction in the rate of corporation tax will lead to reduced business costs across the board. No doubt that is welcome to businesses, particularly small and medium-sized businesses, but the benefit is not targeted at any group of companies or any sector of the economy. The welcome, however, is tempered by realisation of the fact that the reduction in business costs is counterbalanced by increases in business costs, such as the one resulting from the change in national insurance contributions. Then there are those matters that are not covered by the Finance Bill, such as changes in the statutory sick pay scheme and the increase in the business rate, which have added substantially to business costs, and which everyone knows are matters of considerable concern to industry and commerce.

Let me refer to what the Opposition see as the real significance of the Government's decision to concentrate on cuts in the rate of corporation tax, rather than to provide the investment allowances for which so much of industry was calling. I know that some groups, such as the Institute of Directors, are always pleading for cuts in tax rates, but the Government must be aware of the widespread view that investment allowances—particularly allowances targeted at manufacturing industry—would have been the right means of helping business. The Government must be aware of the views of the Engineering Employers' Federation, the CBI and the TUC. We all know, of course, that they ignore the TUC.

The really revealing fact is that, even when industry itself asks the Government to do something that would not reduce business costs across the board but give priority to the encouragement of investment—directly in manufacturing, and indirectly in training—the Government are not prepared to agree. The resources available to the Government are bound to be limited. In response to the call for targeted help, particularly for those sectors of industry that are the agents of recovery, the agents of growth, surely the Government ought to take account of that fact, especially when we are in the depths of such a recession, and when we have such a record of difficulties.

The decision not to reintroduce investment allowances, but instead to cut the rate of corporation tax, was not a practical one dictated by the recession, by a wish to promote investment more than anything else—in particular, to promote investment in manufacturing industry. It was an ideological decision—a decision that fits in with the overall attitude, which the Government have adopted for so many years, that, even when industry itself seeks targeted help of this kind, they should stand aloof and say that it has nothing to do with them. The Government's attitude is that they should make changes for the whole of industry, and leave the rest to individual firms. They do not care whether companies use assistance for the purpose of repairing their balance sheets, rather than for investment purposes.

That, too, is closely related to the speech that the Chancellor made last week—to the Adam Smith Institute, I think—in which he said that the Government intended to continue to pursue exactly the course that they have pursued for the past 11 or 12 years. They intend to stand aloof from industry and say, "Get on with it, and don't expect us to involve ourselves in any way. Don't expect us to make even the most indirect choices about the priorities that you should be pursuing." This is particularly interesting to me, because the decision to follow the path—advocated by the Institute of Directors—of reducing the rate of taxation and increasing taxes on expenditure ties in with the long-term approach that that institute is urging on the Government. It seeks the erosion, and, over five or 10 years, the ultimate abolition, of all taxes on companies, all taxes on capital and, indeed, all taxes on income.

Perhaps some increases in taxes on expenditure are necessary, but what is sought, as a quid pro quo for those changes, is the disappearance of what is loosely described as the welfare state, which is taken for granted by so many people in this country. The Institute of Directors has the courage to do what the Government have never had the courage to do—explicitly to explain that, as a trade-off for cuts in tax rates, leading to substantial reductions in taxes, it would like to see the Government foster increased use of private retirement insurance, private education insurance, private unemployment insurance and private health insurance—with a scheme retained and supported by the state only for the destitute, for whom, clearly, the move towards private insurance schemes as a whole cannot be sustained.

To me, it is very revealing, as well as very frightening, that the Government intend to continue along the ideological path on which they have embarked, which ties in so well with the action that is urged on them by groups such as the Institute of Directors and the No Turning Back group of Conservative Members of Parliament. This measure is a signal, like those provided by the Chancellor, that there is indeed no change in the Government's attitude to industry; no change in the role that they see for themselves; no recognition of the need for any kind of partnership with industry and commerce; no recognition —worse of all, in the face of the alarming figures indicating the real prospects for our economy—that they have a duty to plan, in the national interest, to sustain the long-term competitiveness of our economy. The Opposition have tabled this amendment because they see a very clear ideological and philosophical divide with the Government on the issue. Unfortunately, actions such as those which the Government have taken will not contribute to the long-term prosperity of the country.

Mr. Mellor: Clause 22, to which this amendment relates, is straightforward. I say "straightforward" because the density, when one comes to Finance Bills from other legislation, takes some getting used to. On this occasion, I have the advantage of starting off with something that is reasonably straightforward. I do not need a long glossary to enable me to comprehend the basic language. The other clause that I shall be dealing with tonight, clause 23, has the advantage of being even more straightforward.

It may be appropriate just to recall, before we plunge into the thicket of point and counterpoint, that subsection (1) of clause 22 reduces the corporation tax rate for the financial year 1990 from 35 per cent. to 34 per cent. and, of course, it is linked to clauses 23 and 24. Clause 23 reduces the corporation tax rate to 33 per cent. for the year 1991 and clause 24 deals with changes to the small companies' rate. The other two subsections of clause 22 deal with the taper mechanism between the level at which the small companies' rate applies and the profit levels before one arrives at the full rate of 34 per cent. It makes certain adjustments to that so that there is no great cliff edge between the small companies' rate and the main rate.

As this is one of the centrepieces of the Budget, it is appropriate that we should start with it today. A major reduction is being proposed, in this and related clauses, in the tax burden on industry. Although obviously it is the duty of Oppositions to carp and cavil—and the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) has carped and cavilled—this is a very significant step forward, because, as I shall later demonstrate, it once again gives us the keenest corporation tax rates of any of the world's major economies. That is something of which we can be proud.

As for the lyrical picture that we were painted of what life was apparently like in the 1970s—although I am bound to say that I do not remember it that way and I wonder who, in truth, does—it is worth remembering that in 1979 the main rate of corporation tax was 52 per cent. We are debating a proposal to reduce it to 34 per cent. and we hope that in a subsequent debate the House will approve its reduction to 33 per cent. Back in those balmy days of 1978-79, Labour's last full financial year, the small companies' rate was 42 per cent. Today it is 25 per cent. In those days, 12 years ago, the small companies' rate——

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Mellor: I will give way when I have finished giving the figures. I know that the right hon. Gentleman has some responsibility for these matters, so I will present him with the full picture and then happily give way.

The small companies' rate was incurred on profits of £60,000. Our proposal is that in 1991 the small companies' rate shall not apply until profits of £250,000 are attained —over four times as much in cash terms, so a very substantial increase in real terms.

The marginal relief threshold, the taper that applies up to the main level, means that we propose that this year a company shall become liable to pay the full rate of corporation tax only when its profits exceed £1·25 million. That contrasts with the threshold at which full corporation tax was paid under Labour of £100,000. It is an increase of over 1200 per cent. That is a sign of just how dramatic has been the reduction of the tax burden on industry and it is something that we should never forget.

Mr. Sheldon: Is that a fair way to make that comparison? Surely the comparison should be made with the amount that industry paid out in corporation tax. There were allowances and reliefs of a number of kinds, as I am sure the right hon. and learned Gentleman knows, and industry asks only how much it will have to pay. It is not just these headline figures that the right hon. and learned Gentleman is putting out. On that basis, industry is doing very badly at the present time and more assistance needs to be given to it.

Mr. Mellor: It is certainly true that part of the trade-off for the reduction in corporation tax was the removal of some elements of capital allowance, stock allowances and so on. I was proposing to come to that, since it is of the essence in the debate between us. But it is undoubtedly true that the burden of taxation on business has been lightened by the Government and it is the purpose of the Budget to burden industry even less. That is a principal theme of this Budget.

It is worth referring to some international comparisons to make the point. They show that our main rate of corporation tax for 1991, at 33 per cent., compares with a rate of 50 per cent. in Germany—36 per cent. on distributed profits—and over 40 per cent. in a range of other EC countries.

The comparison becomes even more interesting when one looks at the total tax burden on business as a percentage of total gross domestic product—that is, counting in taxes on corporate profits, employers' social security contributions and payroll taxes and then expressing it as a percentage of total GDP for the last year for which figures are available, which is 1988. That shows that in the United Kingdom corporate profits are 4 per cent. and total social security contributions 3·5 per cent., leading to a total burden of 7·5 per cent., expressed as a percentage of total GDP. That compares with 15 per cent. in France, 12·4 per cent. in Italy and over 9 per cent. in West Germany. So, compared to the EC average, at 7·5 per cent. we are markedly and handily below the EC average of 9·7 per cent. and below the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development average of 8·9 per cent.

If one wants a reason why Britain, far from being the investment desert that the hon. Lady has described, has become the favoured place for inward investment in the European Community, there it is. I see that the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) is amused by this, so I will give him the opportunity later to intervene. If any of my figures are wrong, I hope that he will correct me and put me out of my misery.

Thirty-nine per cent. of the inward investment in the European Community from outside the Community in the last year for which figures are available, 1989, came to Britain. France was next with just over 14 per cent. Of the inward investment available from the major non-EC manufacturing countries, no less than two thirds of United States' investment in the EC came to the United Kingdom, as did 40 per cent. of the Japanese. That is a vote of confidence in the United Kingdom and in the tax rates, and not just the tax rates on business but the tax rates on individuals, which are just as relevant.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): I am grateful to the Chief Secretary for giving way. I was not in any sense scoffing at the idea or prospect of inward investment, which is very welcome and essential. I was scoffing at the Chief Secretary's denial of the fact that we have at the moment in this country an investment desert. That is precisely what we have. Investment in industry as a whole is forecast by the Government themselves to fall by 10 per cent. in the course of this year, and investment in manufacturing industry is forecast to fall by even more. Investment in manufacturing industry is now at a lower level than when the Government came into office 12 years ago. I call that an investment desert.

Mr. Mellor: Most of the hon. Gentleman's comparisons are with the position at a historic high achieved under the very tax regime that the hon. Member for Derby, South spent most of her time attacking. The reduction in corporate taxation and the overall confidence in the United Kingdom engendered by a whole range of supply-side measures, particularly the breaking of the stranglehold of trade unions over so much of the economic activity in the country, led to a tremendous outburst of investment in this country. Between 1986 and 1989 alone investment increased by over 40 per cent. It is inevitable that there will be a falling-off from that peak, but the fact that it may fall by 10 per cent. does not seem to me to be any kind of indictment of the situation in which we find ourselves.

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli) rose——

Mr. Mellor: I will develop the argument, if I may, and then of course I will give way to the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Davies rose——

Mr. Mellor: I have told the right hon. Gentleman that I shall give way to him when I have fully answered the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury. That is the way that I have always dealt with matters in Committee and I hope that it finds favour with other hon. Members —[Interruption]—apart from the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mrs. Golding), who has a voice of dissent which should be registered.

If we take investment in manufacturing at constant 1985 prices, in 1984, when the fundamental changes in the corporation tax regime were made, it was £8·9 billion. In 1989 it rose to £12·4 billion. It is true that in 1990 it fell back to £11·9 billion. That is a reflection of the dramatic increase in recent years. There is absolutely no reason to expect that investment will not go back once confidence is restored and activity begins to turn up, as the hon. Lady conceded that it will. We know that it will.

Mr. Denzil Davies: Having had a low rate of taxation in comparison with the Germans, and having had a massive investment boom over the past three or four years, why have we such a massive deficit on trade and manufacturing goods with those very EC countries that have a higher rate of corporation tax?

Mr. Mellor: In fact, we have for the first time, in 1988 and 1989, seen an increase in Britain's share of world manufactured exports.

Mr. Davies: Answer the question.

Mr. Mellor: I am answering the question. The right hon. Gentleman does not do himself much service by barracking me from a sedentary position. I will give the explanation and, if he wants to intervene again, I will let him. He might listen to the answer because I hope that it will get near the point.

The point is that for the first time, after years and years and years of decline, Britain's share of world manufacturing exports has started to rise—by a very small amount, it is true. The fact that our manufacturing trade balance is in deficit with a number of countries is a reflection of consumer choice and the tremendous increase in wealth.

I will give the right hon. Gentleman an example. As a former Treasury Minister he will recall that the man on average wages, with a non-working wife and two dependent children, was £1 a week better off in real terms at the end of Labour's period of office than at the beginning of it. Today that same family is £72 a week better off in real terms. Obviously a great deal of that spending power is expressed in purchasing imported goods. There is no doubt about it. Everyone associated with British manufacturing is only too well aware that, although British manufacturers have improved their performance in a range of areas, not least the car industry, which under the Government has been much more of a success story than it ever was under Labour——

Mr. Denzil Davies rose——

Mr. Mellor: I will finish the point and then I shall give way. There are still areas in which, when put to the choice in a free market—it is impossible within the European Community to think in other terms, notwithstanding Labour's nostalgia for import controls and such things —many British families prefer to buy overseas goods. That is their free choice.

Mr. Davies: The right hon. Gentleman made an admission. As I understand it, he is saying that one reason why we have a massive balance of payments deficit is that the Government have cut taxation and income taxation. Is that what he is saying?

Mr. Mellor: That seems to be an argument by the right hon. Gentleman that he does not like people having more money in their pockets. That is a nonsensical position. We believe in spreading prosperity through society. Indeed, our record on that is far superior. When the right hon. Gentleman walks round his constituency and goes into people's kitchens, where he sees cookers, transistor radios and hi-fi systems, does he abuse the people for spending their money on imported goods, or does he resent the fact that today they have those goods when 12 years ago they did not? That is part and parcel of living in a society where the consumer, given resources, will make his or her choice, as is right.

The Government decided in 1984 to move to sharp reductions in the direct taxation of companies. As to the consequences, I have already pointed to the tremendous increase in investment in business which was so apparent and which will happen again, and also to the tremendous growth in jobs. Over 3 million jobs have been created in our economy since 1983.

Contrary to the industry-friendly gloss that the hon. Lady put on her proposal, what we see is really the second leg of Labour's twin attack on industry. The attack mounted today is an assault on the principle of letting industry choose what it wants to do with its own money. The idea is that a raft of incentives to invest, not yet disclosed but presumably not in things that industry would choose but in things that the Labour party would want to choose for industry, is to be preferred to allowing industry to have choice.

All the evidence of the seven years since the dramatic switch was made is that not only has investment increased, but the quality of investment has increased. I do not want that to dominate the debate. There will be plenty of other opportunities for that. It will be a most interesting debate.

On Sunday, the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) revealed the precise extent of Labour's attack on the very people who are running business—the middle managers and top management on whom our success depends. Under Labour, they would find their rate of tax increased from 40 per cent. to 59 per cent. All that would happen then would be an increase in the brain drain. We thought that we had done away with the brain drain.

The record shows that between 1975 and 1979 there was a net outflow of 68,000 professional and managerial people, whereas between 1983 and 1989 there was a net inflow of 30,000. That is part and parcel of creating a tax system which allows the decision-takers within industry, on whom a successful base depends, to keep a sensible proportion of their income. It is already being trailed in the newspapers that if people feel that they are returning to the tax rates that prevailed 10 years ago, they will again vote with their feet. Those are all reasons why the Labour party's proposals will come under increasing scruitiny.

I was anxious to focus primarily on company taxation. Now I shall deal with the amendment, which is extremely vague. The hon. Lady did not give us a crucial fact among the welter of statistics: what would be the cost of the attempt to determine for industry its investment decisions? We have had difficulty with that because much of the amendment is extremely vague. It is a classic example of the Opposition trying to have it both ways. On the one hand they are trying to hold out to those interested in the outside world that they have a precise set of remedies which mean that they will do better than we are doing, while on the other they withhold key pieces of information which allow the full implications of what they are doing to sink in. They must not think that we are not alive to that fact.

The amendment appears on one reading to be merely giving away a lot of money after deadweight investment. It appears to be willing ex post facto to subsidise certain investments that have already been made. I cannot see the point of that. Even if only new investment will be affected, even on a cautious estimate—for instance, costing the difference between the existing and the proposed reliefs for new investment only, assuming that investment continues at its present level, and not building in any increase that may take place within the period—in 1991-92 the likely enhanced cost would be about £200 million and in 1992-93 it would be a further £150 million.

Of course, the hon. Lady has not told us where that fits in with Labour's spending priorities, and what would have to give. The amendment gives a hint—a little tease—of an increase in corporation tax, which would be used to pay for it. That shows what the hon. Lady correctly described as a philosophical divide between the two parties. The Government believe in leaving industry to make decisions, based on it maximising the amount of profit that it retains in its hands for its own uses. In the long term, that will create a much more dynamic economy. I would rather trust a business man to make the decisions than the men in Whitehall. Labour is hankering back to the dirigiste approach to economic management that failed when it was last in office, and that has now been shown comprehensively to fail in those eastern European countries where it was the prevailing orthodoxy.

Mrs. Beckett: It is important to put on the record the fact that we have repeatedly said that we have no intention of increasing the rate of corporation tax. The Chief Secretary should be aware of that, but if he is not I am happy to tell him.

Mr. Mellor: What I do not understand—and perhaps the hon. Lady will explain it to me—is the meaning of the reference in the amendment to a rate of corporation tax of 34·01 per cent. That is the proposed increase in the rate of corporation tax——

Mrs. Beckett: The Chief Secretary's civil servants could have explained that to him without any difficulty. It is purely a question of the technicalities of how to draft an amendment while being in order.

Mr. Anthony Coombs (Wyre Forest): The hon. Lady does not understand her own amendment.

Mrs. Beckett: With respect to the hon. Gentleman, that was an extraordinarily silly comment. Of course we understand our amendment. We had to draft the amendment in a certain way so that it would be in order for the tabling of amendments to the Finance Bill. There is no, and never has been any, suggestion of the Labour party increasing the rate of corporation tax.

Mr. Mellor: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for her clarity. It appears that, although the amendment proposes an increase in corporation tax, under pressure the hon. Lady said that she did not really mean it and it was just an attempt to keep within order. If so, that raises the question of what will pay for the proposal. Does she agree that, even on the most cautious estimate, it will cost at least £200 million in the first year and £150 million in the second year? Has she costed the proposal?

Mrs. Beckett: It is difficult to obtain accurate costings—a point that the Chief Secretary also made. We are offering our alternative to the Government's proposals and the Chief Secretary has identified the sums involved. If we targeted that sort of money on encouraging investment in manufacturing industry, rather than simply handing out money to industry, as the Government are doing in the Bill, there would be more value for our money.

Mr. Mellor: This is just a taste of things to come. As we get closer to an election, suddenly the newspapers are interested not only in what the Government are doing, but in what the Labour party is doing. That was evident in this weekend's newspapers. We now have another classic example of the Labour party's gesture politics. It is making a gesture towards what it regards as a disaffected section of the business community—those who would hanker after the good old days of investment allowances. It is flinging a little something in their direction as a bit of a tease without being prepared to say what that amounts to.

When put on the spot, the Labour party says that its proposal will not require an increase in corporation tax—it is to be a free lunch. It will be a further subsidy to business, and someone will have to pay for it. I thought that we now had a Labour party of fiscal rectitude, with everything that is spent having to be paid for. We have not been given the costings for this proposal. Instead, we are told that it is a virtue of a detailed amendment—not a Second Reading debate or an Opposition Supply day—running to more than 20 lines not to provide any costings. Our cautious costing of £200 million, which does not assume any subsidy of pre-existing investment, is simply to be added to the dead weight of Labour's spending proposals—for which, sooner or later, people will have to pick up the tab.

The Leader of the Opposition misunderstands the fundamental basis of VAT, and we have been told that VAT is sacrosanct. We have also been told that the top rate of income tax absolutely will not go above 50 per cent. We are now told that corporation tax will not be increased. The range of choices from which the additional resources could come is now rather limited. Indeed, there is only one source—and this will not surprise anyone who admired the career of the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) when he was Chancellor—and that is income tax. The burden will fall on middle and lower-income, standard rate taxpayers. That is the uncomfortable truth that will become increasingly apparent.

5.15 pm

Labour Governments regularly start by soaking the rich. By the end of the time in office of the right hon. Member for Leeds, East, the rich had come to embrace even those poor souls who were hoping for an inflation increase in the income tax threshold to take them out of income tax, but the right hon. Gentleman was unable to afford that for large parts of his stewardship.

Mr. Chris Smith: Can the Chief Secretary explain why in 1979 the share of gross domestic product taken in tax by the Exchequer was 34 per cent., but it is now 37·5 per cent.?

Mr. Mellor: There has been a dramatic increase in a whole range of activities. Even with the urgent prioritisation that we have undertaken, there has been an increase in public expenditure. We fund our expenditure; we do not rely—[Interruption.] Labour Members do not want to hear this point because they do not like it. Under the stewardship of the right hon. Member for Leeds, East, in one year alone, at today's prices, the public sector borrowing requirement was £60 billion. I have already said, but it bears repeating, that the Labour party believes in the late President Hoover's proposition, "Blessed are the young, for they shall inherit the national debt." The Labour party would saddle future generations with costs that it is not prepared to fund properly.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury increasingly must focus on the fact that if that is what it takes for the Government to run honest public finances and the level of public expenditure that we are currently running, how on earth will the Labour party cope with the public expenditure that will be needed to fulfil its pledges? The Labour party apparently wishes to remain constant to the exchange rate mechanism, which will not allow it to run up a huge public sector borrowing requirement without threatening Britain's position within the system.

Mr. Chris Smith: I am grateful to the Chief Secretary for acknowledging that the Government have increased the tax burden on the British people. Will he also confirm that, for a family on three quarters of the average wage, the tax burden has increased from 30·9 per cent. of income in 1978-79 to 33·6 per cent. in 1991-92?

Mr. Mellor: That question does not deal with the points that will be of most relevance to such families: their income, the amount by which it has increased, and the real increase in their prosperity. I have already given the figures. The disposable income of all families, including those below the average wage, has increased sharply. If it has been necessary for the Government to take certain measures to put public finances on a level that attracts international confidence, and so allows us to maintain our position within the ERM—to which the Labour party says it is as committed as the Government—and if it has been necessary to prioritise public expenditure and so increase expenditure on key public services, such as health, by up to 50 per cent. in real terms, what are the prospects for the Labour party, with its raft of additional spending commitments, yet without any proposals on how to fund them? It will not be able to run up the public sector borrowing requirement in the way that the right hon. Member for Leeds, East took for granted. That is something on which the Opposition will need to focus because we shall return to it in due course, although at a time that is almost certainly not now.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that precisely the same people would suffer under Labour as suffered last time, the school teachers and the nurses, who suffered from massively increased taxation and national insurance contributions and who, under the Opposition's categorisation, will be known as the rich? They certainly were not rich under Labour. They are a great deal better off now.

Mr. Mellor: Indeed, and a number of such groups saw a fall in the real spending power of their incomes during that period.

Mrs. Beckett: Does the Minister think that the hon. Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman) knows that this Government put up the rate of national insurance contributions from 6 to 9 per cent.?

Mr. Mellor: We are talking about people's disposable incomes. That is the key point. When we talk to our constituents on the doorstep, we discover that they are concerned about what they can buy this year compared with five or 10 years ago. On that test, this has been one of the most spectacularly successful decades ever in Britain. I suspect that, as the election approaches and the Labour party's expenditure proposals are scrutinised with the rigour that they will be, and their tax proposals similarly, people will begin to realise that these are boons which do not necessarily translate into a new Government, unless it happens to be a Conservative Government.

The hon. Lady, as she was bound to do, has attempted to discredit the Government's record on the treatment of industry, but she knows only too well that whatever quibbles there may be from time to time in a relationship in which industry will always feel free to make its points, as we feel free to make ours, two things emerge from all that has been said by the CBI, the Institute of Directors and others. First, there is a recognition of the tremendous success of the 1980s and the fundamental and beneficial changes that were made to the United Kingdom economy then. Secondly, there is the welcome that they gave to the Budget. I have already quoted in these debates—I shall not weary the House further with them, although I could if pressed—the glowing welcome given to the Budget by every collective body representing industries, such as the CBI, the Institute of Directors, the National Federation of Self-Employed and Small Businesses and the Association of British Chambers of Commerce.

I shall just quote the president of the CBI, Sir Brian Corby, who said:

[Mr. Mellor]

"This is almost precisely the Budget that the CBI recommended—a Budget for soundly based recovery, for saving and for investment. The prospect for further reductions in interest rates, the resumption of growth and low inflation are better tonight than they were this morning. The Chancellor has listened to those who create the nation's wealth."

Obviously, in what is not a monochrome society, and I hope never will be, there will be some who will look back with nostalgia to the good old days of investment allowances and so on, but I do not think that there are all that many of those. Most people recognise that in the end a business that retains more of its profits will be better able to direct itself and to make its own decisions, which should not be distorted by Government.

So much of the debate, which inevitably, Sir Paul, as the first debate on this year's Finance Bill, you have been kind enough to allow to go a little wider than the immediate matter under discussion,comes down to the recession and its ending. It is clear from all sides that, while undoubtedly this has been a sharp and difficult period through which companies have had to go and are still having to go, a growth of optimism is now becoming apparent. It was apparent last week in the CBI's latest analysis of opinion. It is even more apparent today with the publication of the Institute of Directors' bi-monthly survey which shows optimism about the economy recovering sharply at plus 33 per cent. from minus 64 per cent. in February, directors' confidence about prospects for their own companies up to plus 37 per cent. from minus 36 per cent. in February, and 35 per cent. of respondents expecting a positive net investment in the next six months.

I appreciate that many companies still have a good way to go, but I believe that it is clear that confidence has returned and that what we are proposing in the Finance Bill will assist industry's cash flow, will assist in the building of that confidence and will assist in the measured and strong recovery of the British economy from the difficulties of the last several months. On that basis, I hope that in due course the House will not accept the Opposition's amendment but will endorse the principles of clause 22.

Mr. Sheldon: The Chief Secretary quoted with approval those who had accepted many of the arguments of the Budget and who had welcomed it. I, like many others, have in my time made the fairly obvious comment that a Budget that is cheered when the Chancellor sits down is often disliked and disapproved of by the time we reach Third Reading. Iain Macleod was one of those who made that comment.

Another comment that Iain Macleod made during the course of a Finance Bill debate was that one of the least useful arguments in discussing any amendment is to talk about its defective aspects and to pick holes in it. He pointed out frequently, and eventually silenced those who opposed the argument, of which I was not one, that it is the Government who have the resources to cost measures and to make the proper amendments if they feel convinced by the arguments. I recommend that course of action to the Chief Secretary and others on the Treasury Bench.

My hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) was right to table an amendment of this kind on one of the crucial issues of our time. It is of enormous importance that we realise the damage that has been done to manufacturing industry and come to accept the need for changes in so many aspects of the way in which Governments deal with it. There was a time when the Government scorned manufacturing industry; it was just one of many, and it was the service industries that were the industries of the future. It was only as time went on that they began to realise—it has come rather late, and it has not come wholeheartedly even now in some quarters—that the importance of manufacturing industry is that it is the base of the economy from which so many things follow.

The fact that there has been a loss of investment means that we shall find ourselves in great difficulties in getting our balance of trade right. The important thing about our balance of trade is that, if investment has been so good, why do we have a balance of trade deficit at present? Why is our balance of payments currently so weak? We are in the middle of a deep recession, and no one can underestimate its extent. Everything that is said about the future of the recession is only guess work; nobody knows. I, and I am sure many other hon. Members here, speak to a number of business men every week, and we know that there is no question but that they are suffering and that the problems are even more serious in manufacturing industry. It is right that we should press these matters upon the Government and inform them of what is really going on in the country at present.

Mr. Denzil Davies: Does my right hon. Friend agree that one reason why investment has not borne fruit in trade is that, in the main, it has been in non-tradable activities such as banking, finance, communication and property?. Investment in tradable activities—items that have been traded across the exchanges—has been very low.

Mr. Sheldon: That is absolutely right. It is a point that I would certainly wish to make myself. My hon. Friend knows my addiction to investment in plant and machinery. It is that which is the fountainhead of exports of manufactured goods. I have always wanted to encourage such investment. Investment can be a carpet in an office, making a grand office which produces nothing but which creates an impression. Britain needs to increase its manufacturing exports, but given the increase in world trade, that is not enough; imports must be considered as well. The European Community, as well as the general agreement on tariffs and trade, has played a part in increasing world trade, which I wholeheartedly welcome. However, our exports need to rise with it, and Britain is rather weak in that respect.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): The hon. Gentleman was rightly enthusing about the European Community, but I cannot go along with his view concerning protectionism. The draft treaty articles prepared with a view to achieving political union have been resolutely kept away from the Library for some time. However, a copy has been deposited in the House, and is now available. It is known as a non-paper, but in the light of the hon. Gentleman's remarks, perhaps he would care to consider the implications of that draft treaty on a single currency and on other measures that some of us might regard as rather protectionist.

5.30 pm

Mr. Sheldon: I have always been in favour of a Europe that is open and free, but I have discerned a number of restrictive aspects in the Community. I was merely referring to the increase in world trade and to Britain's need to export more manufactured goods to match it.

Whenever one talks today to industrialists, or to the executives of any type of company, a large part of the conversation always concerns credit control. People are worried stiff about firms going under, others paying late, and still others turning into bad debts. I welcome the Budget's provisions for bad debt relief, but it is only giving back money that companies should never have risked in the first place had they known that a bad debt was likely to develop. It is a useful provision, but not a cause for much satisfaction.

I know of some companies that are having to reprogramme their computers to allow not for 120 days credit—which is the normal period at the top of the range—but for 150, 180 or even 210 days, in calculating how they stand in relation to some of their slow payers. One used to pay value added tax in arrears, which produced a cash flow, but today VAT generates a negative cash flow, in most cases, if not all, which is a burden on industry that it did not used to bear to anything like the same extent.

Companies are compelled to divert a substantial portion of their resources to credit control. One can tell from recruitment advertising that credit control managers—some of whom have almost reached the status of directors—are much more important than they used to be. Much of that is due to high interest rates and inflation.

A country's balance of trade is a serious matter when it is in the middle of a recession. No one knows when, or if, recovery will come. It is all pure guesswork. President Hoover spoke about recovery being around the corner, and about "normalcy". He really believed that nonsense, but had no basis for doing so. The only basis for our faith in a recovery is our belief that the world is subject to a virtuous cycle of growth, interrupted by recession now and again. However, we cannot know when things will change, or if they will change. No one can predict whether an improvement will come in the summer, autumn or winter. Anyone who wants to try, by reading the entrails of a chicken, is welcome to do so—but all those people who speak of a recovery have no more insight than anyone else.

We used to have stock relief when inflation increased, because companies were being charged corporation tax on notional profits. They were buying their stock at a higher value, and being charged higher corporation tax accordingly. The same is happening today. If inflation is running at 10 per cent., and one is paying corporation tax of 33, 34 or 35 per cent., one is being charged 3 per cent. extra because of one's stockholding. Worse still, the biggest stockholder is manufacturing industry, which not only has stock but work in progress.

Mr. Tim Smith: My recollection is that the right hon. Gentleman was one of the Treasury Ministers who introduced stock relief in 1975 when inflation was running at 25 per cent. Company cash flow became so dire that there was no alternative, if widespread liquidations throughout industry were to be avoided. Surely getting down inflation should be the priority, because then we would not have to worry about whether or not to tax stock.

Mr. Sheldon: I could not agree more, but one must remember that the inflation of 25·9 per cent. to which the hon. Gentleman referred resulted from the boom in oil prices, which increased fivefold. In 1980, Britain had 21·9 per cent. inflation as a result of the Government's own stupid actions after they had been in office a year. That arose from the belief that VAT could be doubled but that prices would not be affected because the Government controlled the money supply. Rarely has such economic nonsense been spoken in the House than at that time, when the Government claimed that inflation at 21·9 per cent. could not happen because they would restrict pay levels by the monetary aggregate being held in check. I agree that the best thing is to reduce inflation—but where it exists, it must be dealt with and brought down in other ways.

Recovery is supposed to come from consumer confidence. What is that meant to mean? Is it meant to mean spending our way out of a recession? Are we really looking for a consumer boom? Is that the proper way to achieve recovery? I have never heard such nonsense. It is ridiculous to engineer a boom for political reasons. Real recovery can come only through investment or exports. One way of achieving that is to increase investment so that British industry can both improve its exports and compete better with imports. One should never underestimate the importance of import competition. More firms have closed as a consequence of import competition ruining their industry, and because of their failure to act, than from their failure to achieve desirable export levels.

The great economies became dominant through manufacturing industry—not through the provision of services or by devising clever ideas in the City. They are important, but they should translate industrial success into commercial success. That is their value.

One thinks of the great British economy of the 19th century, of the United States towards the end of last century and up to the start of the second world war, and of today's great economies of Germany and Japan. They were all created through manufacturing industry. Those of us who wantonly ignore that truth are failing to learn one of the most important lessons of our time.

When Britain faced great problems in the past, we tended to unite and to deal with those difficulties in a sensible way that satisfied the expectations of most people, if not all. We have failed utterly to do so on this occasion, which is what I find so bad.

Mr. Ian Stewart (Hertfordshire, North): I am glad that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chief Secretary found it difficult to understand the Opposition's aim in tabling the amendment. The hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett), who spoke to it, failed spectacularly to explain what the amendment was about or what its practical consequences would be.

The hon. Lady began by trying to paint as gloomy a picture as possible of the state of the economy and of the prospects for recovery, but the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) and she will know that the predictions of recovery are based not on crystal ball gazing but on many well-established indicators with which the right hon. Gentleman will be familiar from his time at the Treasury. Those indicators are a substantial recovery in stock market prices, a considerable fall in interest rates and an improvement in confidence reported by industrial surveys. After a lapse of time, all those indicators have traditionally and invariably led to a recovery in the underlying economy. My only suggestion to my right hon. and hon. Friends at the Treasury is that the Government might consider introducing another indicator—the urgency with which the Opposition are calling for an early election.

The fact that the Opposition are now looking forward to a recovery—the hon. Lady admitted that—has sharpened the stridency of their calls for an early election before the recovery takes place and before the benefits of the policies which the Government have followed for the past two years are evident. Their calls for an election may be maintained for the time being, but as the year progresses, and as the evidence of the economic recovery develops—as it will—it will be seen that the Opposition hope to have an opportunity to test public opinion at a time when those benefits have not yet come through.

I am baffled by the message which the amendment is meant to contain, because the amendment does not bear much relationship to the hon. Lady's speech. I was disappointed in what she said as I remember her days as an Education Minister when she used to do her homework and did not talk such nonsense. She said that the amendment, which would have a retrospective effect on capital allowances for manufacturing industry in previous financial years, was designed to promote investment in manufacturing industry. I ask her a simple question: is it the Opposition's policy to introduce a permanent extra incentive to capital investment by manufacturing industry, along the lines of that contained in subsection (2)(b) of the amendment? Is that the Labour party's intention?

Mrs. Beckett: We have made it clear that the amendment is intended to raise the issue of investment allowances. We have also made it clear for some time that we think it is especially important to target the allowances on manufacturing in the context of a recession. The allowances would not necessarily be permanent. If the right hon. Gentleman is not aware of that, he has not done his homework.

Mr. Stewart: It is strange that the hon. Lady should raise the issue of investment allowances but have no idea about Labour's policy. It is typical of the way in which the Opposition Treasury spokesmen go about their business. They made a complete nonsense of the shadow Budget. They got their sums wrong and deceived the public and the House.

Mrs. Beckett: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Stewart: I shall give way in a moment, but I shall finish my point. The Opposition's calculations are a disgraceful deception.

5.45 pm

Mrs. Beckett: The right hon. Member is untruthful as well as extremely unpleasant. He is also inaccurate. If he were to check the record, he would find that the Chief Secretary and the Chancellor conceded that our calculations were correct. This is the third occasion during a brief speech in which—[Interruption.] The Chief Secretary said that our figures for child benefit were correct if one did not feed the increase in child benefit into child support, which we did not intend to do. The Chief Secretary is again confirming that our figures were correct.

The right hon. Member for Hertfordshire, North (Mr. Stewart) has not been speaking for very long. He has been insulting and unpleasant on three occasions. I do not mind that—I expect it of him—but if he accuses me of inaccuracy, he should get his facts right.

Mr. Stewart: I shall leave my right hon. and learned Friend the Chief Secretary to deal with that, but the hon. Lady makes my point for me—I touched a raw nerve. She will have to do better. She said that she did not know whether it was Labour party policy to introduce extra subsidies for industrial investment. She wants to raise the issue but she has no policy. She said that Labour's policy was to promote industrial investment. How can a subsidy on investment that has already taken place be a policy to promote industrial investment? It is nonsense from start to finish. I am sorry to have to point that out in blunt terms, and the hon. Lady may think me discourteous, but if she tables nonsensical amendments she deserves to have them described as such.

The hon. Lady also said that we need to discriminate in favour of manufacturing industry. I wonder whether the Labour party has forgotten all the lessons that it learned 20 years ago about selective employment tax. It tried to introduce a subsidy to manufacturing investment by constructing a system of favourable taxation to companies that are described in the amendment as being the manufacturers of goods, materials and so on. It was a catastrophic disaster. It was unworkable in practice and caused endless problems between subsidiaries and parent companies and between different companies within the same group. It proved totally unworkable. The hon. Lady represents a party which pretends to be ready for Government but which is ready to go back to remedies that failed catastrophically when they were last introduced. That was under a Labour Government—one hardly needs to ask.

I readily concede that the hon. Lady was honest enough to say that there was a great difference between the approach taken by the Government and that of the Opposition to the taxation of business. She accepted that it was part of the Opposition's philosophy to subsidise what they regard as the virtuous part of the economy—those involved in manufacturing—rather than those involved in selling the manufactured goods. I have never understood how there could be a prosperous economy if we discriminated against those who ensured that products were sold but favoured those who produced the product that might or might not be saleable. It is economic nonsense, and it is sad as well as rather frustrating to learn that the Labour party is reviving an old notion which failed so comprehensively.

If the Labour party eventually decided that it had a policy, and if that policy involved a 40 per cent., or substantially higher, investment allowance for manufacturing industry, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Chief Secretary pointed out, it would mean a substantial loss of revenue which would have to be recovered elsewhere through a corporation tax system, heavier Government borrowing, or the imposition of another type of taxation—probably income tax on basic rate taxpayers.

The purpose of the Government's reforms in the 1980s was to achieve lower rates of taxation with fewer allowances against them. Although at the time there was much apprehension about the effect on investment and on the profitability of companies, the reforms were followed by a substantial increase in investment and in the profitability of companies. The Government's yield from corporation tax rose and the rates of corporation tax could be substantially reduced.

Investment decisions came to be made on the grounds of profitability and of the likely success of the investment in commercial terms rather than on their use as a tax shelter for profits that the company had made and on which it did not want to pay tax. That is what happens if there is a higher rate of tax and many allowances. Yet the hon. Member for Derby, South suggests that we should go back to a system of higher allowances. It is inherent in that system that one would have to have higher rates of taxation. If those were not higher rates of corporation tax, they would be higher rates of taxation on something else. One would bring back a range of distortions in the economy which, thankfully, we have been able to get rid of over the past few years.

On all the fundamental points, the amendment is highly unsatisfactory. It offers to produce a deadweight subsidy of investment that has taken place in the past without any incentive to investment in the future. It does so in a discriminating fashion by picking out arbitrarily certain types of company and favouring them. The Labour party says that it would not be at the expense of others. How can it not be at the expense of others? If one is favoured, someone else will have to pick up the bill. The amendment goes against a system which has been found to be satisfactory in the commercial and industrial worlds over the past few years of getting lower rates of taxation so that companies can take a sensible decision about how they use their cash flow. That is one reason why industry, after the reform of the 1980s, has invested so much more and has made better use of that investment. Investment itself has no merit unless it is properly used. We want to encourage not investment itself but the proper use of investment, which is more important. The Labour party has never been able to understand that.

Industry now needs—and companies in north Hertfordshire tell me that they need this—low inflation, lower interest rates, a stable exchange rate and low taxation. We are already on the way to far lower inflation. There has already been a substantial fall and large falls are still to come throughout the year. Interest rates are already on the way down and have further to fall. The exchange rate mechanism has given a framework of stability in the exchange rate in trading with European partners. The low levels of corporate and personal taxation have increased incentives for efficiency and have given a far better prospect of recovery than we should have had under the old tax system after which the hon. Member for Derby, South and her colleagues hanker.

I hope that the Committee will reject the amendment not only because of the dismal way in which it was moved but because of its major shortcomings of substance. It is rather disgraceful that the Labour party should table an amendment that is so unsatisfactory and so poorly explained.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): The Chief Secretary to the Treasury cannot draw a great deal of comfort, as he sought to do, from the various surveys that have appeared in recent weeks about business confidence and business prospects. He draws a different message from that drawn by some of the sponsoring bodies. The Confederation of British Industry argued not that its survey fully supported the Chancellor's confidence, but that it was too soon to talk about an early recovery. The surveys show a low level of projected investment following a recent sharp fall in investment. That is a worrying problem. The question that we must address now is whether changes in the corporation tax system can materially affect it and bring about a great improvement. If so, we must ask what kind of change. There is no advantage in denying the scale of the problem or in being unduly optimistic about the speed and scale of the recovery which we all hope to see.

Can changes in the corporation tax regime materially improve industrial investment and investment that will be useful rather than simply induced by tax changes? Clearly, the Government will want to argue that the corporation tax changes in the Budget will have precisely that effect. However, they cannot get away with saying that the changes represent a massive net reduction in the burden on business represented by taxation because they consistently ignore other factors, such as the massive increase in the uniform business rate. When added up, it is a far larger sum than that returned to business by the tax changes in the Budget. By opting to increase the uniform business rate by the largest legally permissible sum—10·9 per cent.—the Government not only put in a figure double their projected rate of inflation, but behaved in the manner for which they criticised local authorities—that is, putting the rates up by more than inflation. The Government have done that on such a scale that the increase greatly outweighs the tax changes.

The increase tends to have an especially severe impact on small business. Some of the small business organisations have been quick to point out the damaging net effect on their financial position of the Budget proposals. The Forum of Private Business has been especially critical on that point, not only because of the uniform business rate, but because of other changes including the funding of sick pay and other liabilities that are landing on business.

We are discussing three categories of change: the Government's proposals, Labour's proposals and our proposals. I listened carefully to the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) when she moved the amendment. At the end of her speech, I did not understand what Labour intended to do through the amendment. I was helped a little by the Chief Secretary's exposition and then by the hon. Lady's intervention about the technical reasons for the wording of the amendment. It was not clear from the amendment that the increases were included only for the amendment to be in order. Still less was it clear whether the reductions in corporation tax proposed by the Government would also be implemented by the Labour party. That is the crucial hole in the costings. Labour's alternative Budget included proposals for allowances instead of a reduction in the rate of corporation tax. That is part of the amendment. However, the amendment would allow both of those changes to proceed. That may also be for technical reasons. However, it did not become clear whether Labour proposed to retain the reduction in the level of corporation tax. If it does, there is another whole element of costing to find.

Mrs. Beckett: I said clearly and explicitly that we propose to retain the reduction in corporation tax that the Government are instituting. We do not propose to increase it. I had no idea that hon. Members would be so interested in the technical details of the amendment. If I had, I should certainly have explained it. We made it clear that the intention was to raise the issue of the choice that arises in the use of specific quantums of resources—between investment allowances and using such resources to cut the tax rate. I thought that I had made it plain. If I did not make it plain to the satisfaction of the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), I am pleased that he has given me the opportunity to do so now.

Mr. Beith: The hon. Lady still has not made the matter plain. She first said that she intended to keep the reduction and then that we are talking about a given quantum of tax reduction which can be used either for a reduction or for allowances. If I may put the hon. Lady's case for her, it seems that the logic of Labour's position is that it would be better to use the money for allowances than for a reduction in the total rate. The hon. Lady was quite specific in saying that she did not propose to remove the reduction that the Government are introducing, yet she still wishes to argue for allowance changes.

Mr. Mellor: I am listening with great interest to the hon. Gentleman. Tabling a 20-line amendment is a pretty bizarre way in which to raise an issue. The issue could have been raised in a debate on the clause itself.

Mr. Beith: I agree. I took the amendment to be a set of serious proposals because Labour is quite specific in other ways, with which I shall deal later. The Labour party is entitled to propose a wholly different strategy about corporation tax. However, it is still not entirely clear to me whether Labour wants both strategies at the same time, or just one. If it is both at the same time, a lot more money will need to be found from somewhere. It cannot be found through the means specified in Labour's alternative budget. From what the hon. Member for Derby, South said earlier, the figures were not accurate. Indeed, the alternative Budget assumed that £1 billion could be found from closing a loophole on overseas trusts. We estimated that about £500 million could be found from closing that loophole. The Government estimate, although admittedly on a slightly more limited change, a far lower figure, which we shall debate subsequently. The prospect of £1 billion being gained from that change has not materialised in any further discussions. The costings figures are, to put it mildly, in considerable doubt.

I argue that there should be a different strategy that is directed towards the fundamental weakness of the corporation tax system—the way in which it is affected by inflation. The strategy should not be based on allowances that are directed towards manufacturing industry. In our alternative Budget we advance the argument that corporation tax allowances should be indexed. That would begin a reform of the corporation tax system. It should be remembered that the corporate tax burden increases as inflation increases. Our proposal would move the system towards neutrality with respect to inflation and provide some further assistance for investment. I submit that it would lead to a better use of resources. I should explain for the avoidance of doubt that I am talking about using the same resources and presenting the indexing of allowances as an alternative to a straight cut in the level of corporation tax. In other words, there would be a different use of the same resources from that proposed by the Government.

I do not believe that the Government's approach leads to resources being used in the most efficient way, either for the promotion of investment or the reform of the tax system. We are talking of the expenditure of £380 million in this tax year. That is a substantial sum which would go most of the way to paying for indexed allowances. The Labour party's alternative is to increase allowances in a way that might help to increase some manufacturing investment. At 40 per cent. the allowances would be so high that it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that some unnecessary or misdirected investment would arise. I am still unconvinced that we can readily separate manufacturing from other valuable forms of industrial investment.

Is it always better to build machines rather than to provide services? Is that always a better allocation of investment resources? I am not convinced that it is. Why should someone who proposes to make an investment in inland waterways to provide a better and more environmentally friendly form of transport have that investment regarded as less suitable to attract allowances than an investment in manufacturing output?

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West): To take up the hon. Gentleman's example, it is not possible to clean out inland waterways in the absence of the appropriate machinery. The service sector often depends on the manufacturing sector.

Mr. Beith: Both sectors are interdependent. If the system is neutral as between manufacturing and services, both areas can benefit from allowances at the same level. It seems a roundabout way of encouraging inland waterways to hope that a certain form of manufacturing will develop in the United Kingdom rather than elsewhere and to tilt the allowances in that direction. Why should specialised maintenance be excluded from the benefit of investment allowances when it may be crucial to maintaining industrial competitiveness? It is said that there is a proper distinction, but that case has not been made out.

Reforming the corporation tax system so that it is not affected by inflation by indexing depreciation allowances would give some incentive to increasing investment as a long-term principle. We would build into the tax system something that would last into the future and something that would be predictable in its impact. It would not produce a very short-term high level of investment. I do not imagine that the Labour party envisaged a 40 per cent. level of allowance lasting indefinitely—I assume that it sees it as a short-term boost to investment. Perhaps it would be a longer-term boost, but it would not survive all Governments into the future. A reform of the system that would be likely to last would be a continuing and predictable guide to investment decisions for the future and one that would lead to a more suitable use of resources.

The way in which inflation affects the corporate tax system should be underlined. The tax base increases with inflation through stock depreciation. When the right hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Lawson) introduced the 1984 changes that got rid of stock relief, I think that he felt that he was in the process of driving inflation out of the system.

If he had been able to predict the rates of inflation that we have experienced since then, perhaps he would not have been so ready to get rid of stock relief at that time.

The annual writing down allowances are based on historic cost rather than current cost. Thus inflation reduces the real value of the allowances and the tax base increases with inflation. A recent paper produced by the Institute for Fiscal Studies was the result of an attempt to quantify the factors that I have outlined and others in the United Kingdom economy. It used a sample of 750 firms and estimated that if inflation remained constant at 10 per cent.—heaven forbid—from 1990 to 1993, corporate tax liabilities would be one third higher in 1993 than they would be if inflation was at zero. The effect of 10 per cent. inflation on the tax system would be to raise the cost of capital by 2 per cent. above its cost with zero inflation. The paper concludes that almost all the corporation tax bias against investment at current inflation rates results from the inflation non-neutralities in the present tax system. That is the use of horrible jargon, but there is a strong argument for getting rid of the effect of inflation on the corporation tax system.

Firms are hit extremely hard during times of high inflation. Interest rates go high and the Government squeeze the economy. It seems the least appropriate time during which to increase the corporation tax burden.

In that context, I raise another issue in the hope that the Government will give it further thought. I wonder why the Government still have not dealt with the problems of unrelieved advance corporation tax. It is still a fault in the tax system. Unrelieved advance corporation tax hits especially export-earning companies with a high proportion of overseas earnings that do not have mainstream corporation tax against which to set the advance corporation tax that they have already paid. That is another area of corporation tax reform on which the Government could engage.

The extent to which corporation tax can induce the sort of investment that we want in industry can be exaggerated. The decisions that we take on this part of the Finance Bill will not achieve a great turnround in investment. The decisions that we take could distort the pattern of investment, especially if our approach were loaded too much in a particular direction. Perhaps the most useful service that we could perform would be to make the system more neutral in respect of inflation and to ensure that it provided a predictable basis on which companies could plan for the future. They could then make investment decisions without the fear that they are dependent on incentives that might quickly be withdrawn or that they will be undermined by a pattern of taxation that is distorted by inflation.

Mr. Tim Smith: I was very interested in what the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) said about unrelieved advance corporation tax. There is a problem, and it is one that we should address. Indeed, it is a major problem for many of Britain's most successful companies that have major overseas investments. I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman is a member of the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service. As we are talking of a tax issue that has major economic implications —it is not an arcane point—it could well be taken up by the Committee at some stage. It is a complex but extremely important issue that bears serious consideration.

When I first read the amendment, I struggled to understand its implications. I thought that it might be the Labour party's contribution to tax simplification. The hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) said that the object of the exercise was merely to raise an issue. Surely she could have tabled an amendment that proposed that capital allowances should be increased from 25 per cent. to 40 per cent. for one year. We would all have understood what she meant. As has already been said, the amendment is wholly retrospective. The financial year 1990 has finished, and there can be no question of encouraging new investment. The amendment would merely produce a windfall gain for companies that have already invested.

Mrs. Beckett: This is becoming incredibly tedious. The amendment has to be retrospective for it to be in order. The clause refers only to the rate of corporation tax for the coming year. I assure the hon. Gentleman that the amendment was the simplest way that we could find of raising the issue. We wanted to ensure that it was not technically defective. If we had tabled a technically defective amendment, would Conservative Members have spent all their time saying that it was a shame that the Opposition were unable to produce anything but technically defective amendments?

Mr. Smith: I am happy to deal with the merits of the amendment; I shall leave aside the technicalities. I shall merely say that it would have been better to seek to amend the following clause, which deals with next year's corporation tax rates.

What is the most effective way of encouraging increased investment? Can we do it best by introducing increased capital allowances? I suggest that there has been some falling away from the record levels of investment that we saw in 1986, 1987 and 1988 because of a reduction in corporate profitability as a result of the recession.

Much the most important source of investment funds in the United Kingdom is retained profit, not borrowings or new equity investment and certainly not extra tax reliefs. The great thing about the 1980s was the huge increase in profitability in British industry and the ability of industry not only to distribute more and pay more to the taxman but to retain more in the company and invest more. That has been the main source of increased investment in the past few years.

The encouraging news is that it is forecast that next year and in 1993 we shall see a resurgence of profitability in British industry. Therefore, we can reasonably assume that we shall also see a resurgence of investment. Indeed, when one talks to people in business, they do not all say that they have cancelled their investment programme. They say that they have deferred their investment decisions as a result of the uncertainties brought about by the recession and the loss of business confidence.

It is not possible to continue deferring investment decisions for ever. For example, if a company has a programme of replacing its vehicles, whether company cars or its commercial fleet, it cannot defer the decision to invest for ever. It becomes more expensive in terms of repairs and maintenance to do so. Eventually, the company must make a decision to invest. Many investment decisions have been deferred. Companies are simply waiting for the restoration of confidence. When that happens, we shall undoubtedly see a resurgence of investment and profitability.

Whether the tax system can encourage a resurgence of investment is a side show. We need to have a corporation tax profit which is as close as possible to the accounting profit. That is important because otherwise there are distortions. My right hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, North (Mr. Stewart) referred to what happens when such distortions occur. I remember what happened because I had the misfortune to work in industry when we had a Labour Government from 1974 to 1979. At that time, people would work out the profit at the end of the year and calculate the tax of 52 per cent. Then they would say, "Hang on a second—if we make some more investment or bring forward some investment decisions, we can obtain 100 per cent. allowances." Decisions were not made on their merits or because it was a sensible commercial investment and the timing was right; they were made for tax reasons, and I cannot think of a worse reason for making an investment decision.

There is a distinction to be made between the quantity of investment and the quality of investment. It is not sufficient simply to seek more investment. We have already heard about what happened in eastern Europe, where many countries had record levels of investment but appallingly bad productivity and output.

It is important to have a tax system that does not encourage people to make decisions for the wrong reasons. I supported the changes made in the Budget of 1984. The Confederation of British Industry was not happy about those changes. It was a radical change from a 52 per cent. rate of corporation tax with high allowances and stock relief to a 35 per cent. rate of tax and lower allowances. The CBI was worried about what would happen. I remember the representations that were made to Back-Bench Members about those changes. However, the Treasury was right to make those changes. They were the right ones and we have seen a huge growth in investment, profitability and, until recently, the corporation tax take since the changes were made seven years ago.

In both the corporation tax and personal tax systems, we should have—and we now have—as broad as possible a tax base and as few reliefs as possible. That is the most sensible way to proceed. As I said, it is also important that the corporation tax profit should be as near as possible to the accounting profit. I say that not merely because it is neat to do it that way, but because, in accountancy terms, the object of depreciation is to amortise the cost of an asset over its useful life. That is not easy. It involves subjectivity. There is room for differences of opinion about the rights and wrongs of it.

It is not possible for the tax system to follow accounts exactly—we must have some form of arbitrary rule—but 25 per cent. on a written-down basis reflects the way in which assets are generally used. The only worry—I dare say that it is an important one—was raised by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed. It is what happens when there is inflation. As soon as there is any inflation in the system, one has a problem. It then costs considerably more in money terms to replace assets than it did to acquire them in the first place.

It is better to focus on developing tax policies which bring inflation down rather than policies which accommodate and institutionalise inflation. I should be wary of doing that. Even though there are some distortions, it is probably better to stick with the historic cost accounting approach and attempt to bring inflation down. It would not be sensible to pursue the proposal in the amendment, apparently at a cost of £200 million to the Exchequer this year. The hon. Member for Derby, South has produced no evidence that the proposal would produce the investment that the country needs, so I hope that the Committee will reject the amendment.

Mr. Denzil Davies: We have had several nit-picking speeches from Conservative Members, from the Chief Secretary to the Treasury downwards—or upwards. I had hoped that we were seeing some change of attitude in the Tory party to manufacturing industry. However, that did not come out in any of the speeches that we heard tonight.

If my hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) had tabled an amendment to give a tax subsidy, as the right hon. Member for Hertfordshire, North (Mr. Stewart) called it, or tax allowance to banks, stockbrokers or property companies, to encourage the purchase of shares by individual persons, to encourage personal equity plans, business expansion schemes or, indeed, employee share ownership schemes or to further any of the other items of fiscal engineering that the Government have undertaken, we should have heard loud guffaws of approval from the Conservative Benches. But instead the amendment seeks to encourage manufacturing industry.

The attitude of Conservative Members to the amendment confirms the deep-seated hostility to manufacturing industry in the Tory party, or at least the modern Tory party since 1974. I have observed that attitude carefully from the Opposition Benches and from the Government Benches for a long time. It came out again in the nit-picking speeches that we heard this afternoon. The hostility goes back 12 years. Some of us were on these Benches or the Benches opposite during the last 12 years and before.

In 1977, 1978 and 1979, the Labour Government sought to introduce measures to improve our manufacturing industry. Those measures were not only opposed but treated with contempt and derision by the Tory Opposition Treasury team. Yet in 1979, we had a surplus in our trade in manufactured goods. The right hon. Member for Hertfordshire, North called the years of the Labour Government the years of failure. I suggest that they were the years of success. The balance of trade is the only indicator of success for the manufacturing sector. Manufactured goods are the only tradable commodity across the exchanges.

We now have the years of failure. Last year, we had a £16 billion deficit in our manufacturing trade, despite our wonderful corporation tax system, which is supposed to be far better than that of Germany or France. Yet Germany and France managed to have a surplus in manufacturing trade, while we have managed only a deficit under the Tory Government.

I remember that, in 1979, when Lord Joseph became Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, one of the first things he did was to take away investment grants, which helped small companies in the regions. Then he whittled away at the selective employment regions, the development areas and all the assistance that has been given to the regions, mainly to manufacturing industry. Regional Britain was then, and to some extent still is, manufacturing Britain.

Across the road at Great George street, the right hon. and learned Member for Surrey, East (Sir G. Howe) was doing his bit to destroy huge chunks of British manufacturing industry. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman increased VAT to 15 per cent. Some people forget that he also introduced a massive increase in the price of gas and electricity to British industry and removed what were in effect subsidies. The subsidies should have been removed eventually over a period, but it was done all in one year.

I had a private electric arc furnace steel works in my constituency. The Tory Government of 1981 managed to wipe out most of Britain's private steel-making capacity, certainly in special steels, with 15 per cent. VAT, high interest rates, a high pound and a massive increase in the price of energy, especially gas and electricity, on which those industries were dependent. Altogether, 25 per cent. of our manufacturing base was wiped out between 1980 and 1982 by the policies of the Conservative Government, who had no interest in manufacturing industry.

Why were the Government hostile to manfacturing industry? There were three reasons: first, because the strength of the trade union movement lay in manufacturing industry, so anything that weakened it was good and if it had to be weakened, so be it; secondly, they had contempt for regional assistance because the regions were the basis of manufacturing industry; thirdly, there was the influence of what is euphemistically described as the radical right—that collection of loonies, mad economists, mad theorists and third-rate financiers we see on television from time to time—who influenced policy so much in the past 12 years. They had no interest in manufacturing industry and no concern for the balance of payments. They believed in letting the market decide everything.

The trouble is that the market in Britain will always gravitate to service industries. We are not against service industries, property development or commercial development, but because of our banking and financial system, the bias has always been to service industries. Some attempt must be made to redraw the balance to manufacturing industry.

The right hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Lawson) believed in what is called fiscal neutrality—removing all allowances and a lower rate of tax. That increased benefits to service industries, which did not have to spend money on investment, but had a deleterious effect on our manufacturing industry.

That is one reason for the decline in our balance of trade in the past four or five years, but the then Chancellor was not prepared to help manufacturing industry because it did not fit with the political aims of the Tory party. Manufacturing industry is now a small sector of our economy. The Tory hinterland—the south-east—is almost entirely dependent on "highly geared" service industries, which is a euphemism for them being up to their eyeballs in debt.

The property-owning democracy is up to its eyeballs in debt. High interest rates are damaging the hinterland of the Tory party, but apparently they are the only way of reducing inflation. In the next few years, it will be interesting to see whether the south takes the same attitude to inflation as it did in the past. It was easy to preach against inflation and to say that the only way of reducing it was a recession, which largely did not affect the south of England. I think that the Chief Secretary realises that things are changing: the recession is affecting the south of England, and the fight against inflation is creating unemployment there. I wonder whether we shall hear the same cries against inflation as we heard in the past.

It was easy to talk about wanting to reduce inflation when the recession mainly affected the regions, but now the Government are extremely worried about rising unemployment in the south-east. That is why there will be electoral difficulties in the autumn, as there are now, and at the beginning of next year if the Prime Minister does not call an election until then.

The Government have shown that they are not interested in manufacturing industry. They will find every reason not to help it, but Britain will survive only with a strong manufacturing sector. Jobs in banking and the property sector will not increase in the next five years. Where will all the good people of the south-east who have been laid off find work? They will not find it in banking, finance, retail distribution, pensions or insurance. The boom in the City in the past 10 years will not be repeated.

The Government should change their attitudes, because the only way of reducing our balance of payments and the only way in which Britain can grow, live and pay its way again is through the manufacturing sector. Perhaps the Chief Secretary should rethink, and at least start tonight with the amendment.

Mr. Michael Spicer (Worcestershire, South): I am sorry to have to disagree with the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies), for whom I have enormous admiration and respect. I remember debating the Development Land Tax Bill in 1976 with him night after night. In those days, he could at least recognise a philosophical divide when he saw one. There has been no nit-picking by Conservative Members, but there is a division on what makes proper investment work.

There is no question of Conservative Members disliking manufacturing industry. In the past 10 years, output in manufacturing industry has been rising and rising and recently reached a peak. Contrary to what the right hon. Gentleman suggested, because of the way in which we have geared incentives, manufacturing industry has been encouraged and Britain has been the recipient of vast foreign investment, notably in the automobile industry and other advanced industries. One need only drive up and down motorways to realise that manufacturing estates have been transformed in recent times.

Mrs. Beckett: The hon. Gentleman said, if I heard him correctly, that manufacturing output has been rising and rising under the Government. I am sorry to have to tell him that it fell dramatically in 1980 and did not recover from the figure that was inherited in 1979 until 1988. It increased in 1988, 1989 and 1990 but is falling again. That is not the same as saying that there has been a dramatic increase in manufacturing investment throughout that period.

Mr. Spicer: The hon. Lady will confirm that manufacturing output recently reached a peak. Of course there have been ups and downs and cycles, but under this Government it reached a peak. The issue is what makes efficient investment that creates a return, which must relate to the marketplace and not to some policy on the tax system.

The amendment is classic Labour party dogma and seems extremely muddled. The hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) tried to defend it and said that the fact that the amendment would increase corporation tax more than will the Bill is purely technical. We must accept that it is purely technical, but my right hon. and learned Friend the Chief Secretary was justified in saying that the amendment might be a taste of things to come.

6.30 pm

My problem when listening to Labour spokesmen on economic matters is that I find that what they say is utterly incredible. I do not believe what they say. I am prepared to accept and understand that they have a dogmatic position which we can oppose and debate. My problem is in assessing whether there is any meaning in what they say. Over the past few years Labour spokesmen have been extremely bad at putting their case across. Their policies do not add up—not just in the mathematical sense, but because there is no logic behind them.

There is an alternative way of looking at what the amendment would do. One can accept the point about the cost of capital and listen to what the Labour party says about it and about interest rates—interest rates are a relevant alternative way of encouraging investment, which we all accept is needed—but the Labour party's position on interest rates was originally determined in 1987-89. The Labour party talked about how the Government ran an overheated economy, yet when interest rates were low and when, in retrospect, there was a case for raising them and having a tighter monetary policy, the Labour party was pressing for lower interest rates. That must not be forgotten.

More recently, some of us have believed for some time that interest rates should be lower. The Labour party, far from recognising the relationship between exchange rate policy and interest rates, was pressing for and goading us into entry into the European exchange rate mechanism, which has been perhaps the major constraint on interest rate policy. The same people who were pressing for lower interest rates pressed for entry into the ERM, which has been a major constraint on the cost of capital—one might even argue that it has been the factor in continuing the high underlying costs of investment. Therefore, they are the least able now to argue for lower interest rates and lower costs of capital as alternatives.

Anything that the Labour party says on macro-economic policy is distinctly incredible and questionable. Nothing adds up, except when Labour Members come to the House on occasions such as this and propose the classic Labour dogmatic positions which, as my hon. Friends have said, have been debased and debunked for many years.

If one considers trade policy and the effect on our balance of payments, and if one considers investment and all those matters with which both sides of the House are concerned, one cannot ignore the cost of capital or interest rates.

What has struck me—I was saying this even when I was a Minister last September—has been the Treasury's difficulty under all Governments for many years in recognising the lags that exist. This involves not just the old analogy of the tanker taking a long time to change direction; it is much more complicated than that. The lags are complicated. It is not just a question of the lag between a change in interest rates and a change in confidence—I hope and pray that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chief Secretary is correct that confidence is now returning; there is a lag between a major change in interest rates and confidence. There is also a lag between a change in confidence and actual investment, and one between actual investment and employment. Then there is the effect of a change in employment on politics and voting intentions, which we, as politicians, cannot discount. Different people calculate that those lags stretch for long periods ahead. It has been calculated that some lags stretch two or three years ahead.

The amendment is nonsense. It is a typical Labour amendment, representative of the old-fashioned thinking in which Labour Members engage. It does not address the fundamental issue, which is the need both to reintroduce general incentives to investment and to lower the cost of capital which is vastly greater in this country than in Japan, West Germany or the United States. If we are anxious to be competitive, as we all are, my right hon. and learned Friend and his team are absolutely correct to head towards lower interest rates. I hope that the interest rate structure will be determined by the real interests of this economy and not by considerations which relate to the German economy, for example, to name but one.

Mr. Battle: We are entitled to ask the Government why they are so resistant to proposals to support the manufacturing base of our economy. Behind the generalised comments on our amendments lies a deep hostility, in some cases, even to analysing the economy into the manufacturing and service sectors and to considering what is happening within those different sectors. One hon. Member refused to acknowledge that there were any differentials between the sectors of the economy. There is a case for tilting the structure of the Budget towards supporting manufacturing industry rather than allowing it to continue to decline.

During the past 13 years the Government have practically consigned our manufacturing base to history. Not far from where I live a famous textile mill was refurbished and turned into the Armley Industrial museum. A working textile loom, industrial engineering and textile machinery can be seen there. The only experience of manufacturing that the children of the future will have will be in that industrial museum. My constituency was built on textiles, clothing and engineering, but employment in those industries and that economic base have been completely eroded.

Since the early 1980s, 2 million manufacturing jobs have been lost. That is the erosion that I am talking about. We were told that it was a slimming down to make manufacturing leaner and fitter. We even had the celebrated remark of Lord Young that the manufacturing base did not matter and the economy would boom if only more people would eat out. We know that we cannot run an economy simply on the service sector and eating out.

Even now manufacturing accounts for just over one fifth of total United Kingdom output. It is down from a third in the mid-1970s, yet the Confederation of British Industry now expects a further 300,000 jobs to be lost in manufacturing by the end of 1992. Our balance of trade depends on manufacturing. Four fifths of United Kingdom exports are factory-made goods.

There is a catch. Ian Thompson, the chief economist at the Engineering Employers Federation, claims that a large part of the increase in exports over the past few years is represented by the assembly or repackaging of imported manufactured goods, particularly in high value areas, such as advanced electronic equipment. He says:

"My contention is that the United Kingdom manufacturing sector will not be big enough to support the kind of expanding economy that we need in the 1990s."

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): If the hon. Gentleman considers what people, particularly those at Bradford university and elsewhere, were saying 15 years ago about work practices, he will realise that they projected a shrinkage in manufacturing employment and an increase in service sector employment. That has come about. That prediction is taking place alongside the improvement in productivity. It was likely to take place, and it has nothing to do with Governments. It is related to automation and other such matters.

Mr. Battle: We were also told that manufacturing job losses would be replaced by service sector jobs. However, we find that those replacement jobs are part time, temporary and even lower paid. The myth is still perpetuated, however, that low pay is the cause of unemployment in areas of highest unemployment. Each week I return from the House to my constituency and hear announcements of hundreds of redundancies in manufacturing firms there—GKN Axles in Kirkstall, Doncaster Monkbridge Steel Stockholdings, Pennine Castings and, last week, Howson Algraphy which announced 340 redundancies. That is the scale of the erosion of the manufacturing base.

People suggest that it is just the service sector in the south-east that has been affected. The fact is that the economy is being undermined everywhere, not just in the south-east. The Government's economic policies are making manufacturing in constituencies such as mine in the north practically anorexic. They are being starved to death. They are also being starved of investment by high interest rates. Furthermore, they are being starved of the training back-up that they need. Now they are being belted by the uniform business rate.

The CBI forecasts that the projected fall in manufacturing investment this year will continue. It forecasts that it will fall by a further 17 per cent., after a 5 per cent. decline last year. In his Budget statement the Chancellor said that investment would fall by 10 per cent. in 1991. Manufacturing order books are lower than they have been for 40 years. In that context, the Government ought to take seriously the plea that the manufacturing base should be supported. It should not perpetuate the shibboleth and myth of the past—that the service sector will save our economy.

Our amendment is a small measure that I hoped the Government would support. It would provide a lifeline to manufacturing industry. It would not damn it and consign it to history textbooks.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Stamford and Spalding): I find the amendment moved by the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) far more revealing of her own state of mind and that of the modern Labour party than she perhaps can have imagined when she tabled it. It enshrines, in a particularly striking and transparent way, two of the more antique economic illusions to be found in the modern world. I am aware that they were nurtured in the bosom of the British Labour party for generations after they had been abandoned elsewhere in the western world. However, I thought that in its new, reformed guise the British Labour party would have abandoned them.

The first of those illusions is the belief that, somehow, manufacturing is more virtuous than any other form of economic activity. I seem to remember that there is a passage in Marshall's "Principles of Economics" about how pervasive but mistaken is the idea that, whereas the maker of furniture performs a socially useful function, the man who markets and distributes it does not. When that book was published in 1890 I imagine that many people were victims of that apparently seductive illusion, but that book which, as you know, Sir Paul, stands at the beginning of modern economic teaching, was published 101 years ago. Therefore, it is remarkable to find that members of the Opposition Front Bench in the House of Commons today are still perpetuating that illusion. I am sure that Marshall would have been extremely surprised had he ever reflected upon the fact that that might be the case.

Some forms of economic activity are more useful than others and provide a better return on capital employed. Some may add more value. Others—at particular stages, at least—may show a greater rate of growth than others. There is no correlation between those criteria and manufacturing. My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) has already referred to a number of service industries that have a very high added value attached to them and that have enjoyed much faster growth rates than many manufacturing sectors.

It is completely wrong, for example, to suppose that software is an activity that is less inherently economically viable than the production of hardware. The two are closely related, but at various times it may be that the software produces far greater value for society. I hope, therefore, that we can lay that myth to rest for the rest of the debate on the clause and for the remainder of the Committee proceedings.

The other illusion that, apparently, is still dear to the heart of the Labour party is that investment is an end in itself—that, somehow, it is an inherently virtuous activity that should be pursued simply for its own ends. Nothing could be more destructive or more damaging to good, sound economic policy than that illusion, attractive though I know it still is to many Labour Members.

One of the most fundamental economic decisions that a society collectively takes, whether consciously or not, relates to what portion of its current output should be invested, what proportion of the harvest should be set aside as seed corn and what proportion of it should be consumed. There is no point, however, in forgoing present consumption unless the return from the investment will be worth more than the consumption that is currently forgone, otherwise the welfare of that society will not be enhanced; it will be diminished. Over time, that society will be poorer, not wealthier.

If one wants to consider an example of how it is possible to impoverish a society by forced investment—by investment that yields a negative return, a return that is less than the value of the investment—one needs only to look at the examples in eastern Europe that have come to light so dramatically over the past year or two.

6.45 pm

Mr. Hind: Does not my hon. Friend think that it is important to balance a consumer purchasing something, which maximises the investment and creates wealth, against the idea that the investment itself will benefit society? The Opposition would increase the amount of taxation that is levied upon the better off. Their argument is that investment should be increased. However, they would take away the very means of increasing investment, whether it be through savings, insurance policies or bank savings. They believe that consumers would spend more, but consumers would not have more money to spend because they would be paying more tax into the state's coffers. Their economic argument does not seem to stand up in any circumstances.

Mr. Davies: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. I have at heart in my remarks—as I am sure do all hon. Members—the interests of society and the country as a whole. If a firm is induced by tax incentives to make an investment that does not, in real resource terms, yield a positive return, it may be compensated by the tax advantage that induced the firm to make the investment in the first place; but that compensation is at the expense of society as a whole. If one takes the aggregate of the resources available to society and looks at what is done with them, one finds that a proportion of them has been lost and thrown away. They have been put into what is called an investment, but the consequence of that investment is not the same resources being available for future consumption as would have been available if the investment had not taken place. They amount to less. That must be a madhouse.

It may be that the Opposition have not thought this through thoroughly. If they adopted the policy of trying to push firms into making investments that on commercial criteria, against a neutral tax system, they would not have made, they would steadily reduce the marginal return on investment. Once the marginal return on investment became negative, which would eventually happen, society would be greatly impoverished. Therefore, I urge the Opposition to turn to any good textbook that has been written since Marshall so that the future deliberations of our Committee can be relieved of some of these antique illusions.

Mr. Mellor: The attendance in the debate has been small but the speeches made in it have been of a high quality. We have had a number of frisky contributions. I shall restrict my speech because I sense an enthusiasm in the Committee to move on to other matters.

To make up for an oversight last week, when I should have said what I say now, may I say how pleased I am to see the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) here. He was an opponent of mine at two elections, and we had our disagreements. However, I wish him all good fortune and I hope that he will enjoy his time here. It says a lot for his diligence that he is sitting through debates on the Finance Bill. I am not sure whether one would recommend it as a good way to start.

Mrs. Llin Golding (Newcastle-under-Lyme): It is a reward.

Mr. Mellor: I think that one would have demanded a recount if one had known that that was in store.

I particularly enjoyed the speech of the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), as well as those from a number of my right hon. and hon. Friends, particularly of my right hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, North (Mr. Stewart). All referred to the threadbare nature of the amendment. It is clear that everyone agrees with clause 22, which reduces corporation tax. I am not sure how convincing anyone, apart from her most devoted supporters, found the attempt by the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) to add to the clause an ill-focused return to investment allowances. The proposal was put before us without any definition of what kind of investment the allowances would be given to, or of the period for which they would be given, or whether they would be retrospective, or how far in the future they would go.

Given the sensitivity of costing and fiscal proof, it was astonishing that the hon. Lady was unable to offer—perhaps she will in winding up—any estimate of how much all this will cost. Our estimate is that it will be £200 million. Notwithstanding what the amendment says, it is apparently not her intention that this will be obtained from corporation tax. It is an interesting figure floating around. I return to the point that the number of sources for increased taxation that the Labour party is ruling out makes it likely that the poor old chap on the standard rate of income tax will have to bear the brunt of these changes. It is unfortunate, to say the least, that having taken the trouble to table a 20-line amendment, the Opposition cannot be more precise on these points. As attention increasingly focuses on what they propose to do rather than on what we have done and are proposing to do, I doubt whether the comparison will be to their advantage. We could not afford to make proposals anything like as threadbare as these.

I also find misconceived the assumption that there is something especially good about investment in manufacturing that is not so good about investment in other commercial activities. Britain must have a strong manufacturing base and nothing that I say belittles that need. Apparent in a number of the speeches from the Opposition was a hankering to go back to the days of L. S. Lowry. The idea is that, now that Britain no longer has L. S. Lowry-type landscapes, we have lost something. I wonder whether that is the forward-looking policy that we should be hearing.

I have said before, but it bears repeating, that, increasingly, as the Opposition shed some of the neo-Trotskyism of the early 1980s, we are left with sad, old glimpses of the policies of Callaghan and Wilson. There is not much evidence of the Opposition coming to terms with the modern British economy. That was particularly evident in the disparaging observations about banks made by the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies).

What are we to say about the differentials between investments? I happen to have the figures for the size of the financial services sector. I recently had an engagement with part of that sector and it has stuck in my mind. The sector is responsible for 20 per cent. of our gross domestic product and 12 per cent. of employment. It is a buoyant sector in which employment has increased by 60 per cent. since 1980. It contributes £9 billion to our invisible earnings, but it is to be regarded as a kind of second-class activity, in comparison to manufacturing, which is to be the subject of tax breaks. These have been presented to the House in nothing more than an ill-focused attempt to curry favour with one or two sectors of industry that still look back to the old days of stock allowances and investment allowances. However, most of industry, certainly as represented by its associations, has moved away from this and now recognises that, in the end, we want a competitive economy with low direct taxation rates, which leaves those who run industry free to make their decisions rather than having those decisions made for them, or distorted, by Whitehall. On that basis, I hope that the Committee will reject the amendment and, when it comes to it, endorse clause 22.

Mrs. Beckett: I can honestly say that this has been one of the most peculiar debates that it has ever been my privilege to attend. It is peculiar partly because of the extraordinary nit-picking way—my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) was right—in which the Government have approached the wording of this modest amendment. It is designed to raise the issue of the choice, which would be open to any Government, between giving help and support to industry through cuts in the rate of tax or through something like investment allowances. I made it plain from the outset that this was the purpose of the amendment, and it is extraordinary that there should be so much concern about the wording of the amendment. I have not had the privilege of serving on a Committee with the Chief Secretary, but on the Committees on which I had the privilege of serving I found that the Government, on dozens of occasions, got the drafting of the Bill wrong. Despite the criticism, the Government do not seem to be able to find any defects in the wording of the amendment, which is odd.

As for the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), I am not surprised that the Minister enjoyed his speech, but I shall scrutinise his amendments with the care that he devoted to scrutinising ours. As his amendments are nearly always defective or out of order, it was foolish of him to stray into this territory.

Mr. Mellor: I assure the hon. Lady, because I am only too well aware of the technical defects of drafting—I dare say that I shall have to confess to a few upstairs—that that was not my point. My point, and that of the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, was that I could not understand why the amendment applied only to manufacturing and not to other forms of investment and that I wanted to know who it covered and how much it would cost. These are points of substance, not technical points.

Mrs. Beckett: I am about to address these points. I was dealing first with the technical points made by the Minister and the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, among others. These are cash flow measures, not net changes from the point of view of spending over a period of years.

The Chief Secretary put his finger on the most important issue that has been raised—whether or not greater priority should be given to investment in the manufacturing sector. The Chief Secretary chided the Opposition and asked why we considered the manufacturing sector to be so important, and why we did not encourage all kinds of investment, no matter in what sector it is made. I am prepared to admit that there is more worth in investment in manufacturing industry, making goods that we can sell elsewhere to earn our living, than in a few more car parks and casinos. If the Government do not think that such investment is preferable—judging from what they have said, they plainly do not—I am delighted to get that on the record.

Mr. Quentin Davies: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Beckett: No, I do not have time.

In his opening speech, the Chief Secretary talked about how wonderful it was that corporation tax was lower in this country than in Germany, France or Italy and that the tax burden on companies was lower here than in Germany, France, Italy and other countries.

The total tax burden on companies here is lower than that in France, lower than that in Germany and lower than that in Italy. Anyone listening to the right hon. and learned Gentleman would have thought that we had a more successful record than Germany, France and Italy. Anyone would have thought that, given this wonderful incentive, companies here had invested more and that, in some way, this refuted the appalling and frightening statistics showing our decline in manufacturing output, the decline in our share of manufacturing trade and the other very considerable difficulties that we face.

In his response to an intervention from my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), the Chief Secretary talked about investment having fallen off from a historic high. For a moment I thought that he, like my hon. Friend and, indeed, myself, was referring to the levels that had been inherited from a Labour Government in 1979. If he was, clearly he realised his mistake, as he hastily began to talk, instead, about the peak of investment in 1988-89. There is no doubt that, by 1988-89, investment had returned to the levels of 1979, just as, unfortunately, investment is now going back to the levels of the 1960s. The Chief Secretary referred to an investment level of about £11 billion—I think that the reference was to last year—but he will know that the same statistics show that the level is expected to fall this year. The figure may go below £9 billion; it will certainly go below £10 billion. That is the situation with which we are seeking to cope and our amendments are intended, in a minor way, to rectify it.

From the rate of corporation tax, the Chief Secretary turned to other rates of taxation and to proposals that the shadow Chancellor discussed this weekend. I assume that his reference to a tax level of 59p in the pound related to our proposal for the very top slice of income—not the level at which the current 40p rate applies. He mentioned our proposal to lift the ceiling on national insurance contributions. This would bring our tax level, first of all, back to the level of income tax alone two to three years ago, which is very similar to that being charged in competitor countries. Despite that fact, the Chief Secretary suggested that what we propose might lead to a brain drain. He does not seem to be aware of the fact that we have a brain drain already. We are losing some of the most intelligent and well-educated people—the people whose inventions and discoveries form the basis of so much manufacturing prosperity. Thanks to cuts in the Government's support for research and development, and to their overall attitude to investment, those people are simply unable to work here. Often with the utmost reluctance, they take their brains and their ideas—together with the prosperity that can result from their patents and inventions—to competitor countries.

The Chief Secretary, once challenged, was gracious enough to acknowledge that, under the present Government, the tax burden on the average family has risen. It would have been only fair to point out that, for families on average or below-average earnings, the benefits derived from the income tax cuts have been almost exactly offset by increases in national insurance contributions. Indeed, they have been extinguished by value added tax increases—even those before the most recent one—and by the poll tax, for which the Government refuse to give us a breakdown in terms of its impact on the incomes of people on average or below-average earnings.

The Chief Secretary's remarks on those points were most interesting. He seemed to imply some deception on our part, but we have made our taxation proposals very plain, which is more than can be said for the Government. The Prime Minister—then Chancellor of the Exchequer—spoke last year to the Welsh Tories at their party conference. No doubt it was a small gathering. In that speech he attacked some of Labour's taxation proposals. For example, he said:

"They intend to meddle with mortgage interest relief"

—in other words, not to allow mortgage interest relief at the top rate of tax. As long ago as July, the Prime Minister was very upset about that. Although we had clearly told the country what we proposed, the Government attacked us. Then, of course, they put it in their own Budget. On the same occasion, the right hon. Gentleman attacked the Labour party for its intention to freeze the married couple's allowance. That, too, is in this Budget—again without notice from the Conservative party. If the Chief Secretary wants to use this occasion to give us a categorical undertaking that at no point will the Government follow through the logic of their decision to charge employers' national insurance contributions on the full range of earnings, and that they will never lift the ceiling on earnings on which employees pay national insurance contributions, I shall be happy to give way. If he is not prepared to do so, we must all recognise the likelihood that the Government will follow through the logic of their decision. Just as with the married couple's allowance, and with mortgage interest relief at 40p in the pound, they do not propose to tell the electorate in advance of their decisions. Yet they complain about our proposals.

As was identified by the Chief Secretary in his closing remarks, the main point is whether and how we should give support to industry. Should assistance be given to all by way of cuts in the rate of corporation tax, or should there be a specifically targeted incentive for manufacturing? We certainly prefer the latter. The Chief Secretary drew attention to some costings that he suggested might be possible in respect of the proposal for investment allowances. I am happy to repeat something that I made quite plain in my opening remarks. The Government were prepared to forgo quantifiable amounts of revenue by allowing cuts in tax rates. We would have used that revenue to help manufacturing industry through investment allowances. Let me quote what the Institute for Fiscal Studies has said about that choice:

"The current tax system acts as a disincentive to investment."

The CBI said that members still believe that investment in allowances for depreciation of plant and machinery is the most important priority. This is precisely the proposal that is contained in our amendment.

That brings me to what, apart from what one could almost describe as the Government's attacks on manufacturing industry, is the most extraordinary feature of the debate. The Chief Secretary rose magnificently above one of the points that I made in my earlier remarks—that this was the proposal of the CBI and others. The hon. Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer) said that this was an incredible proposal which showed the Labour party's old-fashioned thinking. The hon. Member for Stamford and Spalding (Mr. Davies) referred to it as an antique illusion. The Chief Secretary said that such a proposal was clung to by the members of a disaffected section of the business community, of whom there were not all that many. Those were fascinating remarks from Conservative Members. I propose to send copies of them to the Engineering Employers Federation, the CBI and many other representatives of manufacturing industry, all of whom, as Conservative Members know are calling for precisely those steps.

There could be no better example of the arrogance of the Government than the way in which, yet again, they claim to know what industry wants better than does industry itself. They do not listen to anyone but themselves, and they have made it plain that they never will. That is one of the reasons why they are on their way out, and in the next Budget we shall be able to introduce measures of this kind.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Question accordingly negatived.
Clause 22 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 77

NON-RESIDENT SETTLEMENTS WHERE SETTLOR HAS AN INTEREST

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Francis Maude): Clause 77 is one of several clauses which give effect to the Chancellor's statement in the Budget that we would take steps on the tax treatment of non-resident trusts, a matter which has caused some concern. The clause sets out one of the three main components of the proposals—the requirement that the settlor of a trust caught by the provisions of the Finance Bill will be required to pay capital gains tax on the gains released by the non-resident trust as they accrue.

The other components of the proposals are in other clauses which are complementary. It is a packet, each part of which complements the others. The second element is that, in future, there will be what has been described as an exit charge on a resident trust. A trust at present resident will suffer capital gains tax on capital gains which have accrued up to the time of the trust moving offshore.

The third element is that for those trusts which are not otherwise caught and on which gains are not payable at the time that they accrue capital gains tax will be payable when the capital is remitted to this country. In those cases there will be a supplementary charge, effectively an interest charge, to reflect the deferment of capital gains tax from the time when the capital gains accrued in the non-resident trust. When the capital is remitted to the beneficiary here, there will be a charge which reflects the deferment of the tax.

It is a sensible, fair package of proposals to remedy a possibility of tax avoidance. I commend the clause to the Committee.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): I thank the Financial Secretary to the Treasury for his introduction to clause 77 and to the matters that relate to it, which we will explore in more detail in Committee.

The clause and those related to it represent the fruits of the labours of the Government's working group on tax avoidance which was set up in 1988 to deal with a problem that the Government created in 1981. Last year, the Labour party drew attention to the widespread use of offshore trusts as a tax avoidance device. We put forward proposals to curtail the use of those devices, but our suggestions were rejected by the Treasury team during the passage of the Finance Bill 1990.

In Committee last year, I said:

"Other major vehicles of tax avoidance remain. Offshore trusts are still an abused vehicle for imaginative tax planning."

The then Economic Secretary, now, I guess, promoted, the right hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Ryder), replied:

"The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East identified a problem about loopholes. They have not been used and the Inland Revenue does not know of any avoidance to date."—[Official Report, Standing Committee E, 12 June 1990; c. 183 and 184.]

That is what he was required to say when representing the Government's view last year.

The position has changed substantially. Obviously it has not changed at any prompting of mine. I can only assume that it has changed at the prompting of The Sunday Times, probably a more authoritative voice with the Conservative party than mine in spite of all my efforts to the contrary. The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) shakes his head. I take that as a tremendous compliment; I am sure that it was intended as such.

Last year, on 21 October, The Sunday Times drew attention to the same issue on its front page under the headline

"Super rich in massive tax dodge".

We can see that the newspaper is owned by the same people as those who own The Sun. The Sunday Times Insight team gave specific examples, one of which I should like to summarise as an illustration of the problem.

When Mr. Richard Branson, head of the Virgin airline and entertainment empire, sold 25 per cent. of his record company, the Virgin music group, to a Japanese group, Fujisankei Communications, in 1989, more than 75 per cent. of the ultimate number of the shares had previously been transferred by Branson into five Channel islands trusts.

In spite of him being the settlor and the discretionary beneficiary of all five offshore trusts, he was able to avoid a potential tax bill of £18·4 million, 40 per cent. of the capital gain of £46 million. The money was then reinvested in Virgin companies overseas. Branson's lawyers argued that since all five trusts were controlled by Morgan Grenfell in Guernsey and Coopers and Lybrand Deloitte in the Channel islands, the capital gains had been avoided because none of the profits were Branson's, he having distanced himself sufficiently from the assets so as to avoid taxation.

Hopefully such arrangements will no longer work as tax avoidance devices when clause 77 and its allied clauses and schedules are law. It is not our intention to impede the progress of these parts of the Finance Bill, which are designed as anti-avoidance measures. However, we shall want to examine the detail in Standing Committee.

7.30 pm

I want to give some examples of the sort of scam that we want to be caught by the new legislation. At present it is possible for those with a business to sell to transfer that business into an offshore trust and, under section 126 of the Capital Gains Tax Act 1979, the trustees could sell the business without any charge to United Kingdom tax. The trustees could then reinvest the money in the original owner's business, perhaps remitting the money back to the United Kingdom in the form of a loan. That sort of tax avoidance is legal, although hard to justify morally.

Indeed, the very existence of this Bill, from the post-Thatcherite Conservative Government, suggests that the Government have given up trying morally to justify it.

The example that I have just cited parallels the Richard Branson case that was quoted in The Sunday Times. A variation on that theme would be to transfer the asset for sale into a United Kingdom trust prior to disposing of it and then to move the trust offshore. The trustees could then proceed to sell it without any charge to tax. It is clear that the real relationship rather than the contrived relationship between the trustees and the settlor is of crucial importance.

It is useful to note just who the trustees are in the Branson example. Gone are the Rossminster days, when the Keith No. 1 trust, of which Mr. Keith Tucker was the trustee, played its part in the tax avoidance schemes of his brother, Mr. Roy Tucker. Today, the trustees are such firms as Morgan Grenfell and Coopers and Lybrand Deloitte—both of which Mr. Branson trusted with his wealth in the Channel islands. According to The Sunday Times, Touche Ross promotes a complete offshore trust package for £2,000, plus an annual fee of £3,000. Offshore trusts are now part and parcel of the mainstream tax planners' armoury.

Of course, there are reasons other than that of tax avoidance for setting up an offshore trust, such as the need to preserve commercial confidentiality. However, it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that the overwhelming majority of such arrangements have been entered into solely for the purpose of tax avoidance. A further 3,000 such trusts were notified to the Inland Revenue last year, but that probably represents only a small percentage of the number that have been established.

The arrangements work well enough to avoid capital gains tax bills, as they work well enough to avoid inheritance tax. Trusts cannot die. Offshore trusts can also have income tax advantages, provided that the settlor and his spouse are not possible beneficiaries. An example would be a trust for children and grandchildren. In case anyone doubts that that works, I can tell him that, as far back as 1979, the House of Lords gave a ruling in a famous case involving the Vestey family. That case aroused a great deal of indignation.

Mr. Tim Smith: As the hon. Gentleman knows, one reason why trusts became more attractive after 1988 was that the rate of capital gains tax was increased from 30 per cent. to 40 per cent. That automatically made them more effective because more tax could be avoided. It is the Government's policy to link the top rate of income tax with the capital gains tax rate. Does the Labour party propose to raise capital gains tax to 50 per cent.?

Mr. Brown: We have no plans to increase capital gains tax. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for enabling me to make that quite clear. I know that the hon. Gentleman would not do it, but I hope that he will encourage his right hon. and hon. Friends not to misrepresent the Labour party's position. I repeat that we have no plans to increase capital gains tax.

Mr. James Arbuthnot (Wanstead and Woodford): Does that mean that the Labour party will break the link between capital gains tax and income tax?

The Temporary Chairman (Mr. David Knox): Order. That is rather wide of the clause under discussion.

Mr. Brown: I accept that, Mr. Knox, but I do not want to deny the hon. Gentleman an answer. I think that the implications of what I have said are clear. The hon. Gentleman has correctly followed the point to its logical conclusion.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): Answer the question.

Mr. Brown: I have just done so.

Clause 77 introduces the rule that, for certain categories of offshore trusts, capital gains realised by the trustees are to be treated as realised by the person who created the trust or by its beneficiaries, provided that the settlor, his spouse or any of their children or any company in any way associated with them can in any way, at any time benefit from the capital or the income of the trust. That is comprehensive. The Government have met the first of the points that we put to them in our debates last year and the year before.

I hope that in fairness, Mr. Knox, you will allow me in passing to refer, as did the Financial Secretary, to the fact that clause 71 introduces an exit charge if an existing United Kingdom trust becomes non-resident. We specifically called for that during our debates on the Finance Bill last year. The Government's adoption of our request is most welcome. I note that the Financial Secretary is gracefully accepting my thanks; roll on the Standing Committee stage, with all its long nights. Clause 71 is to be welcomed.

The second aspect of clause 77 is that it stops a settlor hiding behind an existing offshore trust by putting new assets into it that can share the favourable capital gains tax treatment that the trust already enjoys. Such a prohibition is necessary, and I am pleased that the Government have done that. However, the Government have not drawn the clause more widely to encompass offshore trusts where the beneficiaries do not include the settlor, his spouse, any of their children, or any company associated with them. I am not sure why the Government have adopted that approach, but it is something that we can explore in Standing Committee. The Financial Secretary may say that there are not many such trusts in existence. If he does, the suspicions that we have harboured about tax avoidance will be shown to have been well founded. If there is another explanation, I look forward to hearing it.

That brings me to the mystery of what we shall probably end up calling, "The Mystery of the Missing Decimal Point". The Sunday Times article referred to billions of pounds, or at least to £1 billion—[Interruption.] The Sunday Times referred to £1 billion; others have referred to substantially higher figures.

Mr. Maude: Only the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Brown: The Financial Secretary is being mischievous. It is not only me.

Mr. Maude: We are puzzled about the figure of £1 billion that has found its way into the Labour party canon as one of those pots of gold that are just lying around waiting to be raided to pay for its spending. The Sunday Times referred to a sum of up to £1 billion. I am not aware of any other estimates that show anything like that amount. The actual amount is a yield in a full year of £10 million, and also preventing indirectly a revenue loss of £100 million. Those figures are very much more modest than those suggested by the Labour party, although the proposals in the Bill are considerably more draconian than anything that the Labour party suggested last year.

Mr. Brown: The point has found its way into the Labour party canon because it is such a good shot. I am not sure how the Financial Secretary arrives at his figures for the amount that has been avoided through offshore trusts over the past decade. I should welcome a year-by-year breakdown of the estimated sums that have been forgone. The Sunday Times suggested £1 billion. The Chancellor said in his Budget speech, referring to this year alone:

"I therefore propose to introduce measures to counter this tax avoidance"— he was referring to offshore trusts—

"and to prevent a revenue loss of up to £100 million in a full year."—[Official Report, 19 March 1991; Vol. 188, c. 134.]

Assuming that the

"up to £100 million in a full year"

is par for the course, the Chancellor clearly thinks that the figure is closer to £1 billion than to £10 million—this is where the missing decimal point comes in—that is shown in the Red Book.

I must thank the Financial Secretary for writing to me about the matter, attempting to explain the difference between the £100 million to which the Chancellor dramatically referred in his Budget speech and the rather more modest £10 million that the Government's Treasury team are hoping to rake in as a result of the change. His answer is not convincing, but I understand the semantic exercise in which he is trying to indulge in justifying it. The truth of the matter is that a substantial sum of money that should have accrued to the Exchequer has been forgone with the result that the tax burden on the rest of us has been increased accordingly.

The Government need to take two further actions to convince us that they are serious about tackling unfair avoidance by the wealthy. The first is adequately to resource the Inland Revenue, particularly its specialist officers, so that more attention can be focused on these issues. When we say that, the Conservative party accuses us of planning more public expenditure on tax inspectors, as if that were a damning thing. But it is our belief—and the evidence is there to sustain it in the work of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee as well as in answers to parliamentary questions tabled by the Opposition—that a little extra investment may reap substantial rewards. Certainly we think that it would be more fruitful to explore that area than to spend the money hounding poor people on social security.

Secondly, we believe that we need to co-operate with our first world trading partners. The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) will have heard me say that before. I know that the point is controversial on the Government Benches, but we believe that we need to co-operate in a positive way with our first world trading partners steadily and collectively to block these tax avoidance devices so that at least one nation state collects tax when it would otherwise be due. It will be a long slow business, but I would rather see the British Government moving it along than kicking and screaming all the way.

Finally, I want to ask a question and then answer it. Why are we in this position in the first place? Why is clause 77 necessary? The answer goes back to the deeds of the Conservative Government—I suppose that it is still legitimate to refer to it as this Conservative Government—in 1981 when they introduced section 80 of the Finance Act. That device was the work of the noble Lord Rees who was then Chief Secretary to the Treasury and a notable expert on tax law. Before becoming a Minister he advised on tax avoidance schemes, in the notorious Rossminster affair among others. In short, he knew what he was doing. The Opposition and the national press have repeatedly drawn the Government's attention to the loophole, but it has taken 10 years and a change of leader for the Conservative party to respond. Last year, the Economic Secretary was not even allowed to acknowledge that there was a problem.

Mr. Maude: Apart from last year when there was a fleeting reference of about half a sentence in a debate on the Finance Bill, when else in the past 10 years have the Opposition drawn attention to the problem?

Mr. Brown: I have made a number of speeches on the subject of tax avoidance since I was appointed to the Opposition Treasury team in 1987 and I have specifically referred to the issue of offshore trusts. But to give credit where it is due, the issue attracted our attention when we all obtained copies of Mr. Nigel Tutt's book entitled "The History of Tax Avoidance" which has provided us with an interesting guide through the byways of some of these issues and from which we have obtained part of our agenda. The hon. Member for Beaconsfield keenly follows these matters and I see him nodding and smiling. He will recall that last year I presented the Economic Secretary with a courtesy copy of the book in order to help him in his own consideration of these matters. Instead, all he got was promotion. I do not know whether reading the book helped him or not, but I hope it did.

The Opposition's bone of contention with the Government is not that they are doing what they are now—that is acceptable to us; we have been calling for it. It is that it has taken the Government 10 years to get around to doing it and in that time £1 billion—I will not quarrel with the Financial Secretary over billion or billions—£1 billion worth of revenue has been lost to the Exchequer. It logically follows that that increases the burden placed on the shoulders of our fellow citizens.

In debates such as this it is important to remember that some of our fellow citizens are poorly remunerated. The other side of the coin is that 3,700,000 of our fellow citizens earn less than £5,500 per year. There are no offshore trusts to help them; no chance for them to avoid their share of the tax burden, most of which is given not through direct taxation but through indirect taxation. The unfairness of their position when compared with the position of wealthy people, such as Mr. Richard Branson and Lady Porter, rightly arouses indignation among Opposition Members, and I think that the Government will find that it arouses indignation among the public as well.

Mr. Tim Smith: I welcome clause 77 as long as we have the capital gains tax regime that we have. It is clearly unfair that rich people should be able to take advantage of what has been a major loophole in the law so to arrange their affairs that they can avoid altogether paying capital gains tax. It clearly has not been an option open to people with moderate amounts of capital, since the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) has just said that it cost £2,000 to set up one of these schemes and £3,000 a year to keep it going. That would obviously preclude it from being economically viable for people with moderate amounts of capital. Clearly the schemes were designed for rich people, and if we are to have a captial gains tax system everybody should pay that tax and not take advantage of a loophole.

However, on the question of the likely yield, the Committee needs to recognise that a change of this kind will fundamentally change people's behaviour. That is why I object to capital gains tax as a whole. We were talking previously about the way in which people's economic behaviour is influenced by whether or not a particular activity is taxed. There should be no doubt in the minds of hon. Members about what happens with capital gains tax. It is impossible to avoid paying tax on purchases—virtually impossible to avoid paying VAT or excise duty—and it is pretty difficult to avoid paying income tax on income, because it is paid as it arises, but when it comes to capital gains tax, one can work very hard to avoid paying it by simply avoiding making the gain and not realising an asset.

That is what happens. Whether the figure for the cumulative lost revenue is £100 million or £1,000 million, the idea that the yield to the Exchequer will be anywhere near that is ridiculous. People who were realising their assets will think two, three or four times before they do it, so the actual yield will be much lower than any so-called loss of revenue to the Exchequer. There is no doubt about that.

That is the unfortunate aspect of all this. Capital gains tax above all taxes—one of my hon. Friends made a powerful speech on that on Second Reading—distorts economic behaviour. It is self-evident that, the higher the rate, the more likely it is that the behaviour will be distorted. With the benefit of hindsight, I think that change was regrettable. I understand why it was made. The Treasury took the view that it was sensible to operate capital gains tax at the same rate as the top rate of income tax, which is now 40 per cent.

I was encouraged by the remarks of the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East, about Labour's proposals. He told my hon. Friend the Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Arbuthnot) that Labour does not feel that it is absolutely necessary to operate the same rate. It is reassuring to know that Labour does not intend to increase capital gains tax. Have I got that right?

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To avoid any doubt, I may say that we will have to live with what we believe to be a minor anomaly.

Mr. Smith: That makes the Opposition's policy clear beyond any doubt. I welcome that assurance, because any rate above 40 per cent. would be punitive, and would introduce distortion in a big way. That has already happened. There ought to be a much lower rate, or we ought to do away with capital gains tax altogether. It was introduced only as a short-term measure in 1961, and the Royal Commission that investigated its possibilities in the 1950s came out against it, for various good reasons.

Even with the change made by clause 77, the incidence of capital gains tax will still be fairly arbitrary and unfair. I will not detain the Committee with the details, because that would be to go beyond clause 77. However, although the proposed change is very welcome, we must acknowledge that the yield is likely to be very low, and that the background against which that change is being made is anyway not very satisfactory.

Mr. Beith: There seems to be general agreement among all parties that clause 77 should be included in the Bill, and I certainly welcome it. It is designed to close a loophole that has existed for a decade which has been dramatically highlighted. That loophole has been known to tax advisers and experts for a long time, and it has taken a long time for the Government to get around to doing anything about it.

It is somewhat intriguing, given the timing of this debate, that Labour previously insisted that its incentives for investment could be met from the yield induced by closing the capital gains tax loophole. We included in our alternative Budget a proposition based on the assumption that closing the loophole would yield £500 million. Labour's alternative Budget is very specific:

> "The investment expansion scheme costs would be more than covered by the revenues from closing the tax loopholes for offshore trusts, which currently cost the Government £1000 million."

The Government produced a figure of £100 million, and, as the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) pointed out, the Red Book gives a figure of only £10 million for revenue resulting directly from closing the loophole in question. There is a necessary difference between the two figures, because presumably there would be a flow of investment into instruments that do bear taxation, which would show up in public revenue. I take that to be the major factor accounting for the difference in the two estimates.

When we produced our figures, and when Labour produced theirs, neither of us had the benefit of the Government's estimate of potential yield, because they were not canvassing any intention of acting against the loophole, and so had not produced a costing. However, the yield will obviously be a lot less than £1 billion. In view of the amount of money that is believed to have been involved, I hope that the Revenue gets back more than the £100 million that the Government estimated. I shall shortly propose amendments to tighten up the measure, to help achieve that objective.

There is general acceptance that it cannot be right, even at higher rates of capital gains tax, for methods of avoidance to be available that allow people with very large resources to spend significant sums on buying their way into overseas arrangements that entirely relieve them of their liability to capital gains tax.

Mr. Maude: This has been a delightfully ecumenical debate, with everyone agreeing that clause 77 is a splendid measure to introduce into the Bill. It is slightly remarkable that the hon. Members for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) and for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) claim to have known about the abuse for some time, and have been clamouring to legislate against it year after year. They give the impression that, when the 1981 change was made, the loophole was transparently clear, and that it should have been closed then. History shows otherwise.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: I do not claim that the loophole was transparently obvious in 1981—at least, not to me. I became aware of it after reading Mr. Tutt's book in 1987—just at the time that I joined the shadow Treasury team. I may add that it is not I but the Government who are professionally advised, and who have available to them, year after year, the opinions of the Inland Revenue. When did the Revenue first draw the abuse to the attention of Ministers? I bet that it was in 1981.

Mr. Maude: The reality is that no new clause or amendment to deal with the loophole was introduced until 1990. In that year, a new clause, to which the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East, referred, was tabled but not selected. On that occasion, my right hon. Friend who is now the Patronage Secretary did not refer specifically to the loophole, because the burden of his plaint in that debate concerned dual resident companies, not non-resident trusts. He referred to it only obliquely and in passing, which did not become a serious problem until recently. However, it is now being dealt with expeditiously and thoroughly, as has been acknowledged.

I have some sympathy with my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), who made it clear that the higher the rate of tax, the more attempts there will be made to avoid it—and the more strenuous the tax authorities will need to be in preventing avoidance. That analysis is exactly correct. Members of the Oppostion Front Bench are nodding wisely and sagely, and appear to be agreeing with all that I say—but the points that I reiterate have not made much impact on the Labour party before now.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: I always smile, in my genial, good-natured way. That is not something that has been brought on by the present Financial Secretary, because I exhibited the same behaviour to the last three Financial Secretaries that it has been my pleasure to know. I will accept entirely the Financial Secretary's assurance that the Government acted as expeditiously as possible, but only if he will reveal when the risk that the 1981 change would be used for tax avoidance was first brought to the attention of the Government by their professional advisers—specifically, the Inland Revenue.

Mr. Maude: I do not intend to tell the hon. Gentleman what advice I or my predecessors were given by our official advisers—any more than the hon. Gentleman or any of his predecessors who were Ministers in previous Labour Governments would do. I am sorry to disappoint the hon. Gentleman, but, on mature reflection, I am sure that he will understand.

Mr. Brazier: He will get over it.

Mr. Maude: As my hon. Friend says, the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East, will master his disappointment.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the mystery of the decimal point. Labour's standard approach is to multiply by 10 the estimated yield from a tax change, but to divide by 10 the cost of a public expenditure commitment. In reality, the measure—the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed had it right—will prevent a tax loss to the Revenue of about £100 million. It is not possible to be precise, but it will produce a yield this financial year of about £10 million, and in a full year of £15 million. There is no great pot of gold that the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East can use to finance Labour's spendthrift policies.

Mr. Arbuthnot: Does my hon. Friend agree that, in view of the fact that the measure will stop a loophole, it will change people's behaviour and that there is no predicting the amount of revenue that can be produced? In a sense, it is a misnomer to talk about the revenue that might come from it.

Mr. Maude: My hon. Friend is entirely right. All one can do in such circumstances is to estimate to the best of one's ability on the basis of accumulated experience and the Inland Revenue what the yield might be from these changes. Behaviour will change as a result of the proposals, but the best estimate is that there will be a modest yield from transactions that will take place.

8 pm

This is one part of a three-part approach which is a considerably tougher and more extensive approach to the problem than that recommended by the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East. It will be effective. The hon. Gentleman asked why we should not spread the effect on beneficiaries more widely so that more settlements would be caught. That is the subject of a subsequent debate on amendments to be tabled by the Liberal Democrats. We can explore it then, and I shall explain on that occasion the reason for the approach that we have adopted.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 77 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedule 14

SETTLEMENTS: SETTLORS

Mr. Beith: I beg to move amendment No. 3, in page 129, line 26, leave out 'child' and insert 'descendant'.

The Temporary Chairman: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 4, in page 129, line 27, leave out 'child' and insert 'descendant'.

No. 6, in page 129, line 36, leave out 'child' and insert 'descendant'.

No. 5, in page 129, line 36, leave out 'stepchild' and insert 'step-descendant'.

No. 10, in page 133, line 10, leave out 'child' and insert "descendant'.

No. 11, in page 133, line 11, leave out 'child' and insert 'descendant'.

No. 12, in page 133, line 20, leave out 'child' and insert 'descendant'.

No. 13, in page 133, line 20, leave out 'stepchild' and insert 'step-descendant'.

Mr. Beith: The effect of this group of amendments would be to make the settlor potentially liable to tax if any descendant—not just the child—was a beneficiary. There is no obvious reason why the settlors should not be liable to tax on settlements made for the benefit of their grandchildren. The Minister referred to the possibility that a much wider limitation could be placed on overseas trusts affecting other potential beneficiaries. Perhaps he will be able to adduce particular reasons why that should not be so because of the other purpose for which trusts have traditionally been used. I do not see why a trust from which benefits for children are not tax-exempt should provide such an exemption in respect of grandchildren.

Mr. Maude: That is the point raised by the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown).

From the temperate way in which the hon. Member for Berwick upon Tweed (Mr. Beith) moved the amendment, I deduce that he accepts that it is no great point of principle. I concede that, if this were the only part of the proposal—if clause 77 stood on its own without the exit charge and without the supplementary charge on settlements that are not caught by these proposals—there would be a case for extending the net a bit wider.

However, one must recognise that settlements are made in non-resident trusts for perfectly legitimate reasons which have nothing to do with tax avoidance. The burden of the amendment is to prevent tax avoidance and to bring transactions within the charge of tax where they should properly be subject to tax. Our judgment was that it was legitimate to restrict the ambit of this charge—the charge to the settlor—to settlements of which the beneficiaries were the settlor's immediate family, drawn not all that closely, and extending, of course, to companies that the settlor's immediate family controls and to the immediate family itself.

As the hon. Gentleman knows, that is considerably wider than the corresponding definition for resident trusts, but we believe that it is necessary that it should be wider if an effective charge is to be imposed on those who settle assets abroad from which they or their family can derive benefit. The balance that we have struck is about right. It is a matter not of principle but of judgment as to where one strikes the balance. The gains of non-resident trusts where only grandchildren or remoter issue have an interest will continue to be within the existing provisions, which tax beneficiaries who receive capital payments from the trustees. They will be subject to the supplementary charge which, as I have said, is another important element in the new package and which will apply where appropriate.

In addition, we are strengthening the existing provisions to ensure that capital payments are chargeable when they are received by United Kingdom beneficiaries. We shall keep these measures under review, and we shall not hesitate to take further measures if they are thought appropriate. In the current circumstances, we have struck the correct balance.

Mr. Beith: I hope that the Minister will keep the amendments under review because it seems that he has not convinced even himself that the boundary line has been drawn in the right place. Grandchildren are among the most likely beneficiaries of someone who has made a great deal of money in his lifetime and who is looking for tax avoidance routes to keep it within the family and not pay tax in the process. It is a normal transfer from grandparent to grandchild. I shall not press the matter tonight, but I hope the Minister will keep it under review. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Beith: I beg to move amendment No. 9, in page 132, line 28, leave out 'four' and insert 'five'.

The Temporary Chairman: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 8, in page 132, line 28, leave out '(6)' and insert '(6A)'.

No. 7, in page 133, line 7, at end insert—

'(6A) The fifth condition is that a person falling within sub-paragraph (7)(a) or (b) below is a person who will or might benefit from the settlement.'.

Mr. Beith: I shall describe the effect of the amendment in detail. Under the Bill as drafted, settlors of pre-Budget settlements are in general caught only if the settlement is subsequently added to, varied or transferred out of the United Kingdom. If the settlors themselves are beneficiaries, there is a strong case for saying that they should be taxed on trusts that already exist in so far as those trusts give rise to income from now on.

The issue was raised as a result of a great deal of publicity given to some large trusts to which the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) referred. The public desire to see something done about it, and they will not be satisfied if those large trusts escape the ambit of the clause.

One must draw a careful line on retrospection. I have argued on many Finance Bills against the use of retrospection to create tax liability where one did not exist at the time. My argument now is not based on the creation of a new tax liability for income derived before the Budget. The purpose of the amendments is to deal with tax liability which will arise from now on, and of course, because of the nature of what we are discussing, they will effectively change the timing of tax payments. There are a number of precedents for going about it in this way, including the Inheritance Act 1974, which meant that discretionary trusts set up before 1974 became liable for subsequent inheritance tax.

One must ask whether people should have a permanent tax holiday merely because they were able to exploit a loophole before it was cleared up. Investors in overseas trusts would have been advised that the loophole was likely to be closed in the future. Those people often received advice from fairly sophisticated tax advisers.

There is a similar element of retrospection in schedule 15, which proposes a charge of 10 per cent. a year on the tax liability of pre-Budget settlements. The Government also accept that it might be a legitimate device to use to ensure that the income from now on of some of the settlements made before the Budget was made liable to tax.

Mr. Maude: I am keen to understand what the hon. Gentleman proposes. He talks about income from the trusts, which is a little puzzling. I can see that it would not be retrospection to say that income from a certain date should become liable for tax, and if one announced that from a date that was to be the case that could happen. A capital gain is a different matter. If a capital gain was realised today, for example, there might be a capital gain over a period right back to the rebasing in 1982.

I am not clear whether the hon. Gentleman proposes that the whole of that capital gain, going back beyond Budget day and the announcement of the proposals, should be subject to tax, or whether he proposes that it should be simply the part of the capital gain which has accrued since Budget day. If he proposes the former, that seems clearly——

The Temporary Chairman: Order. This is a very long intervention.

Mr. Maude: Perhaps I may draw to my peroration, Mr. Knox, and finish the point, which was meant to be short, although now I am afraid that I am in danger of having forgotten what it is.

Either the proposal would be retrospective if it were to bring into charge for tax all the capital gain from whenever it began to accrue, or it would simply apply to the part of the capital gain which accrued since Budget day, in which case it would impose an impossible task of valuation of all assets in all non-resident trusts on Budget day.

Mr. Beith: I sought to advance the principle—which was rightly picked up by the Minister in his pertinent if lengthy intervention—that we should not give non-resident trusts a permanent tax holiday, but that we should avoid if we can introducing further dangerous precedents of retrospection to add to those in which the Government have engaged in previous Bills and elsewhere in the Bill. The clause about building societies is an example. I am trying to draw a line at the point of the Budget itself, and to move on from there. The Minister has made the perfectly legitimate objection that valuation problems are associated with that, and he may want to deal with that later.

I hope that the Minister will address himself to the central issue, which is that my concern was based on the large sums that have already been put into non-resident trusts. Those trusts will enjoy a permanent tax holiday if the Bill is not amended along the lines that I have proposed. There is a case for an amendment which does not create a retrospective tax liability going back before the Budget but which taxes such trusts in the future, leaving those who would otherwise benefit from them the opportunity of either paying the tax or transferring the assets to some other instrument.

Mr. Maude: I will endeavour to keep my speech shorter than my intervention. I appreciate that the point made by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) is serious. His concern is that there should not be a permanent tax holiday for existing trusts. I must make two points. First, a non-resident trust already set up under previous arrangements will have to remain untouched—no further beneficiaries added to it and no further funds added to it—for it to remain not subject to the charge introduced by clause 77. If no such changes are made, such trusts do not enjoy a permanent tax holiday if at any time the capital is repatriated to the United Kingdom. At the point at which the capital is delivered to a United Kingdom resident beneficiary, it will be subject not only to ordinary capital gains tax, but to the supplementary charge that we are also introducing which is specifically defined to reflect the lost value to the Exchequer of the deferment of that capital gains tax.

It is not possible to bring existing unchanged non-resident trusts within the new charge on the settlor without either being retrospective by imposing tax on gains that may have begun to accrue some time before Budget day or imposing on the Inland Revenue a gargantuan task of valuation which I am sure that the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed accepts would be hugely difficult. It would require a valuation on 19 March, or whatever the date of the Budget, of all the assets in all resident trusts so that one knew the base from which the capital gain was being calculated. That is not a terribly practical proposition.

I do not believe that we are perpetuating a tax holiday. At the point when capital is repatriated, the gains will be subject not only to ordinary capital gains tax, but to the supplementary charge which is designed specifically for that purpose.

Mr. Beith: I am grateful to the Minister for considering the proposal. I will reflect on his point about valuation. I am touched that the Government are now worried about gargantuan valuation commitments placed on the Inland Revenue, especially when I consider the council tax, which will have precisely that effect. I will reflect on what the Minister has said and see whether either in this context or in the context of the charge at the stage of repatriation to which the Minister referred the point could be pursued later. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question proposed, That this schedule be the Fourteenth schedule to the Bill.

Mr. Arbuthnot: The Country Landowners Association, whose taxation sub-committee I have the pleasure to serve, has raised some points with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. I hesitate to raise them in detail at this stage, but I would like to run quickly through them in the hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will write to me about them afterwards. I do not ask my hon. Friend for a detailed reply at this stage.

The points raised by the Country Landowners Association mainly concern the question of what happens to a settlement that was made before 19 March 1991 which becomes subject to the regime set out in clause 77. The conditions on which a pre-19 March settlement becomes a qualifying settlement are quite complicated. They are set out in paragraph 11.

The first condition in paragraph 11(3) is:

"on or after 19th March 1991 property . . . is provided directly or indirectly for the purposes of the settlement—

(a) otherwise than by way of a bargain made at arm's length".

Certain minor activities could make the entire settlement a qualifying settlement. In certain circumstances, if one simply added a first-class postage stamp to the settlement, one could make the entire settlement a qualifying one. There is an argument to suggest that only the new property which is added to a settlement after 19 March should be treated as a qualifying settlement rather than property that existed in the settlement beforehand.

The second condition that would mean that a pre-19 March 1991 settlement became a qualifying settlement is that the trustees of the settlement become non-resident after 19 March 1991. That could cause some difficulties unless the settlor himself has power to appoint or to reappoint the trustees. If he has no such power and if he has no say over who the trustees are, yet nevertheless becomes liable for capital gains tax on the settlement, that could cause some unfairness in some cases. I hope that my hon. Friend will look at that point and will come back to me on it.

The third condition is that a pre-19 March 1991 settlement can become a qualified settlement if there is a variation of the settlement after 19 March 1991. There are circumstances in which settlements might be varied—for example, a foreign court might vary a settlement. Those are circumstances over which the settlor would have no control and which could result in unfairness.

I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to write at some stage about these matters. I did not give him any warning that I would raise them this evening.

The idea is that a settlor should pay the capital gains tax in a qualifying settlement subject to his right to reimbursement from the trust. If a pre-19 March 1991 settlement becomes a qualifying settlement and therefore gives rise to a liability, would it be possible to have a revaluation of the assets at market value at the time when the settlement enters the regime of schedule 14? That would relieve the settlor of any gains or losses on any non-qualifying period.

I apologise for boring the Committee with these detailed and technical matters. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to write at some stage, and hope that he will do so in the not-too-distant future.

Mr. Maude: The Committee will be disappointed that my hon. Friend the Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Arbuthnot) has given me a let-out by inviting me to write to him rather than entertain the Committee by responding to the important matters that he has brought to our attention which I shall consider carefully.

We have carefully framed the proposals by which the new charge will apply to existing trusts in particular circumstances to avoid any element of retrospection. If I am right, it is broadly the possible, potential retrospection, if such a concept exists, which is troubling my hon. Friend. That is that an element of retrospection could be triggered other than by the deliberate and conscious act of the settlor or the trustees.

Mr. Arbuthnot: It is partly that and partly that some settlors will have been locked into certain arrangements from which they are unable to withdraw. It is because they are locked into certain arrangements that they find themselves liable to an entirely unexpected tax liability.

Mr. Maude: I understand what my hon. Friend says. Broadly, the settlor should, I would guess, always have the power not to add funds to the trust and hence not to trigger the pre-existing trust into becoming a qualifying one. If there are circumstances that could trigger the pre-existing trust other than that, we shall need to examine them carefully.

My hon. Friend said that there could be circumstances in which the settlor might have no power over the appointment of trustees, where a non-resident trustee might be appointed and thus trigger the settlement into becoming qualifying. It would be an odd appointment. It would be an odd decision for whoever had the power to make the appointment to act in that way in the knowledge that it would bring such a trust within the new regime, if it were possible in the circumstances that my hon. Friend outlined to avoid making such an appointment.

My hon. Friend talked of the power of a foreign court to amend the terms of a trust. I cannot comment on that now. It is a matter to which I shall give careful attention.

My note of my hon. Friend's following point came to an end after I had written "valuation". I cannot remember in more detail what it was, but I shall be glad to deal with it when I have had the benefit of refreshing my memory by reading Hansard.

Question put and agreed to.

Schedule 14 agreed to.

Clause 23

CHARGE AND RATE OF CORPORATION TAX FOR 1991

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Chris Smith: The clause sets the rate of corporation tax prospectively for the financial year 1991-92. Our debate on clause 22 of an hour or so ago related to the rate of corporation tax which was being set retrospectively for 1990-91. We are glad that the Government are reverting in clause 23 to the principle of avoiding retrospection in setting the rate of corporation tax. It may be conceded that there is merit in retrospection in exceptional circumstances in terms of clause 22, but as a general principle it must be right that the rate of corporation tax should be set prospectively rather than retrospectively. It was one of the relatively few wise changes to the taxation system that the right hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Lawson) made when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Many of our arguments about clause 23 are precisely the same as those that we advanced a short while ago when considering clause 22. We welcome the relief that is given to many businesses by the reduction in the rate of corporation tax to 33 per cent. We must recognise, however, that the benefit is not felt substantially by smaller companies. We shall come on shortly to talk about the measures that the Government are proposing for small businesses. There will be no benefit whatsoever for companies which have profits of less than £200,000, so we are talking of a limited but welcome measure.

It must be recognised that the benefit that is brought by the clause is substantially outweighed in the relief that it gives by other measures contained in the Budget and the Bill. We must understand the impact on business of the rise in value added tax to 17·5 per cent. Many business commentators have noted perceptively that, while the rate of corporation tax gives businesses something, the rise in VAT takes something away from them. In current circumstances it is difficult for many manufacturers to increase the prices of their goods fully to reflect the additional 2·5 per cent.

I notice in passing that the Liberal Democrats have, perhaps temporarily, absented themselves from our company during these proceedings in Committee. I am surprised at that, given the importance of the clause that we are discussing.

The impact of the VAT change and its outweighing of the corporation tax measures has been commented upon in some surprising quarters. The National Federation of Self-Employed and Small Businesses Ltd., while giving a general welcome to the Budget, had one or two rather perceptive comments to make. The regional liaison officer for Yorkshire said:

> "The really small guy is not selling at the moment and the VAT increase will push his prices up even more."

The regional chairman for East Anglia said about the Budget:

> "It's like the curate's egg, good in parts. The Chancellor has juggled with figures and not helped the cash flow problems of small businesses."

It was precisely the changes to corporation tax in clauses 22 and 23 which were supposed to help with the cash flow problems of business. But clearly many business men and business women do not believe that that has happened.

Another commentator on the Bill, Coopers and Lybrand, said immediately after the Budget:

[Mr. Chris Smith]

"Most entrepreneurs are not going to believe current competition will allow them to increase prices immediately to this extent . . . they may well consider most of these measures"— that is most of the measures on corporation tax—

"are marginal to their cash flow problems in the face of the 2·5 per cent. increase in VAT and its consequences".

At about the same time Phillips and Drew said:

"Although the reliefs on business taxation were welcome, they amount to no more than a teaspoon with which to hold back the recessionary tide."

8.30 pm

It is clear from the comments of many observers on the Bill and the measures which were supposed to help business that, while the Government's measures are welcome to a certain extent, they will not do much to help business in a real way. The verdict of Phillips and Drew that the measures will do little to stem the tide of recession will form much of the focus of our analysis of the Bill in Committee.

On clause 22 we said that the Government would have done much better to have targeted the help that they decided to give to business in order to boost investment in manufacturing industry. Precisely the same analysis applies to clause 23. In clause 22, the Government decided to allocate £380 million worth of Exchequer moneys to the relief that they provided in last year's corporation tax rate. In clause 23 they have decided to give extra relief amounting to £830 million in a full year.

Earlier the Government asked us what the Labour party's proposals would cost. Our answer is simple. The Government are spending a substantial amount in this clause on supposed support for business in the current financial year. We would have made different choices about how to spend that money. We believe that it could have been better targeted, produced better results and assisted more with the recovery that our economy needs.

Mr. Arbuthnot: Given the choice, would the Labour party reverse this decision? Given the choice, would it take us back to the 52 per cent. rate of corporation tax which applied when the Labour party was last in power?

Mr. Smith: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman was present during our earlier debate. If he had been, he would have known precisely the answer to those questions. The answer to both questions is no. If the hon. Gentleman went on to ask how the Labour party would finance its proposals on capital allowances if we kept the rate of corporation tax envisaged in the clause, I would make one simple point to him. It is a point which Ministers and Back-Bench Conservative Members have failed to recognise about our proposals on capital allowances. We are talking about bringing forward capital allowance moneys for companies. It is money which the Exchequer would have forgone anyway in due course. We are talking about bringing the money forward into an earlier stage of the investment cycle to provide an incentive for the investment. It is not money that is forgone in the long term by the Exchequer. I hope that the hon. Gentleman understands that extremely important point.

The Opposition have recognised the absolute need to ensure that industry is encouraged to invest. At present our investment performance is sadly lacking. We have identified that as one of the cardinal problems afflicting the British economy and we believe that, welcome though the Government's measures may be to some companies, they are not enough to stimulate the investment that our country needs.

The firm of Rathbones prepared an extremely good analysis of many of the proposals in the Budget. It could hardly be said to be in the pocket of the Labour party. It made some interesting comments on the role of business taxation and the measures in the Budget, especially those which deal with corporation tax. It noted that there was a danger that small companies would face a disincentive to invest because of the way in which the thresholds and ceilings were set. On page 11 of its Budget briefing it says:

"In addition, the Chancellor has yet again ignored the calls to give specific reliefs for manufacturing industry. Presumably he feels that we are now a nation of service companies if not shopkeepers rather than manufacturers."

That was not the Labour party speaking. It was a firm commenting independently on the stance that the Government have taken in the Budget and the Finance Bill. It is not a stance that the Labour party shares. We believe that the cardinal need at present is to improve our investment performance in the manufacturing sector. Of course, we welcome the reduction in corporation tax this year to 33 per cent. But we cannot possibly agree with the Government's refusal to understand that allowances to boost investment are what our economy needs and what the Government should have considered more carefully.

Mr. Mellor: Having spent—perhaps one should say misspent—many years hacking around this place through great long Bills, many full of impenetrable verbiage, it is rather a treat to discuss a clause that states with great simplicity:

"Corporation tax shall be charged for the financial year 1991 at the rate of 33 per cent."

While others may spring to instantaneous understanding of even the densest clauses of Bills, I usually have to look to my crib. But on this occasion the imposing piece of paper headed "Board of Inland Revenue", which is usually my guide, simply says:

"This clause sets the rate of corporation tax for the financial year 1991 at 33 per cent."

Whatever other reservations may have been expressed about the Bill and, referring to an earlier debate, whatever problems of draftsmanship we may find when we go through the Bill in Committee—it is always a brave man who claims that any Bill that he has introduced is devoid of mistakes—clause 23 should at least win the prize for crispness and clarity. It makes clear what we are talking about, which is a start, even if we do not draw the same conclusions from it. Tempting though it is, I shall not repeat to the vast assemblage gathered for this purpose the comments that I made earlier. I should not wish to divert my constituent, Mr. Knox, whose rise to power is much appreciated by his Member of Parliament. I shall require him to read my earlier comments in Hansard.

Plainly, there is a philosophical difference between the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) and I. I do not necessarily think that it is the end of the world if other people do not agree—it is a perfectly reasonable thing for people to fall out about—but we believe that companies, possessed of the liquidity, can better decide what to do with the money. I gave the figures for the tremendous upsurge in investment in the 1980s, and the upsurge between 1986 and 1989 had much to do with the changes that my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaby (Mr. Lawson) made in his 1984 Budget. The move to 33 per cent. gives us, once again, the keenest corporation tax rate in the European Community and, indeed, among the G7 countries. In 1984, a sharp reduction was made and others followed suit; we have taken the lead again.

It is the role of the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury to pick holes in the argument, even though the Labour party does not criticise us for reducing corporation tax. The hon. Gentleman peddled the argument about capital allowances. I know that several substantial organisations share his view, but the arrangements already in place provide quite a substantial incentive for machinery and plant. Capital allowances for machinery and plant are 25 per cent. on a declining balance basis, which means that for tax purposes most of the cost of an asset can be written off over seven or eight years. If the average life of machinery and plant is about 17 years, as some have estimated, the ability to write it off over seven or eight years, given the current rate of corporation tax, is an attractive basis for companies to invest. I understand that others in industry who consider themselves hard pressed may be looking for another view, but I do not agree with that other view, although we listen to it with care.

The problem is that the Labour party is seeking to ride both horses at once; it wants the benefit of being able to say "Me too." We are asked to believe that a Labour Chancellor would reduce corporation tax—a pledge was given today not to increase it—and make capital allowances. That is all very well as a debating point, but it is not a substantial or convincing basis on which to look forward, as Labour alleges it is, to a period in Government. Governments must make choices; there is no such thing as a free lunch. We are all indebted to my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaby for making that one of the great clichés of our time. Capital allowances will cost a few hundred million pounds, but that must be paid for.

I am grateful for the clear way in which the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury put his argument; the trouble with clarity is that it reveals problems that a more fudged presentation does not. The hon. Gentleman, as always, was admirably clear. We do not agree on some of the conclusions that can be drawn, but we agree that this masterly, laconic drafting makes clear what we are trying to do—reduce the rate of corporation tax for the next year to 33 per cent. I hope that the Committee will endorse the clause.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 23 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 24

SMALL COMPANIES

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

8.45 pm

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John Maples): Clause 24 extends the benefit of small companies' relief from the corporation tax scheme by setting new limits that are substantially increased for the third year running. This year, the lower limit is increased from £200,000 to £250,000, and the higher limit from £1 million to £1·25 million, which represents a 150 per cent. increase in the past three years.

We have done much to help small companies by reducing tax rates. Since 1979, the small companies' tax rate has been reduced from 42 per cent. to 25 per cent., which is the same as the basic rate of income tax. Small companies have benefited from that major achievement. As a result of this year's increase, 3,000 more companies will benefit from the small companies' rate, at which the vast majority of tax-paying companies pay tax. More companies will benefit from the marginal relief, and about 30,000 companies will pay less tax as a result of the increase this year.

Mr. Chris Smith: As the Economic Secretary said, clause 24 sets the level and the parameters of the small business rates of corporation tax for 1991. It possesses less of the laconic quality of clause 23, but none the less it sets out its intentions reasonably clearly.

Clause 24 consists of three parts—it sets the rate at 25 per cent., as it has been for the past year; it sets the profits limit for the small companies rate up to £250,000; and it sets the limit for marginal relief up to £1·25 million. The latter two changes are welcome to small businesses.

We must recognise, however, that those measures provide no help to businesses below the £200,000 1990 threshold. They will be marginally helped by the carry-back provisions, which we shall discuss in Standing Committee, but the clause offers them no additional help.

The clause will bring welcome but limited help. It must be considered, however, against the background of the wider economic recession. For small businesses, that recession has been caused by two factors—the level of interest rates and the introduction of the uniform business rate. In the debate on clause 19 of last year's Finance Bill, we drew attention to the impact of high interest rates on the small business sector.

The Government took many months before listening to us. They have now reduced interest rates to a certain extent, but to far too limited an extent. It is worth remembering that, under this Government, interest rates have been above 12 per cent. since August 1988—for a longer period than the total time of all the previous Governments since the second world war put together. That is the extent of the squeeze which the Government have placed on small businesses through high interest rates.

Only the other week, I visited several small firms in Woolwich. Business man after business man in small businesses spoke to me, not about corporation tax or the thresholds and ceilings at which the small companies rate bites, but about the level of interest rates, even after the recent snail-like reductions that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been introducing. Interest rates have been their primary concern.

The other aspect that has been affecting small businesses is the introduction of the uniform business rate. It has had a differential impact in different parts on different industrial sectors and on different sizes of properties. Last year, 250,000 firms in Britain faced 100 per cent. increases in their rates bills as a direct result of the introduction of the uniform business rate.

Recently I visited some small businesses in York, especially in the retailing sector in the inner-city area. They found that the uniform business rate, together with overall interest rates, was the principal cause of the difficulties that their firms were encountering. To tinker with the level and thresholds of the small companies rate of corporation tax may help the prospects of small businesses marginally, but it will not help much. For small businesses facing a recession, clause 24 does not provide much relief. The total value of the change which the Government are introducing in clause 24 is £20 million, yet the recession is causing enormous difficulty and pain throughout the country.

It is perhaps worth looking briefly at the figures which the Building Employers Confederation issued this morning. The press release which accompanies the spring "State of Trade Enquiry" contains several interesting comments. It is worth setting this beside some of the economic hype that we have heard from the Government during the past few days. They have tried to claim that the recession has turned the corner, that the economy is about to recover, and that economic optimism is on the increase. Indeed, earlier this afternoon the Chief Secretary to the Treasury talked about economic optimism surging forward. Clearly, he had not seen the BEC figures. It is worth remembering that its members account for more than three quarters of total construction industry output.

The press release states that the BEC

"has charted a further sharp fall in output in the first quarter of 1991 compared with the fourth quarter of last year."

The main findings of its survey include:

"The steep downward trend in output continuing;

A further rise in spare capacity in the industry; . . .

A sharp fall in confidence about future workload; . . .

Further job losses anticipated."

The press release continues:

"The repair and maintenance sectors appear to have been particularly hard hit by declining demand."

It is precisely the repair and maintenance sectors of the construction industry that contain the most small businesses, as the detailed figures make clear.

Clearly, the recession has hit first companies with small numbers of employees. The percentage of firms reporting less work by size shows that, in the fourth quarter of last year, the very small firms—those with fewer than 114 employees—were suffering particularly from the recession. On average, 60 per cent. were experiencing less work than they had in the previous quarter.

Throughout this extremely interesting report from the BEC, the clear message is that business confidence is still falling, that output is still falling, that the recession is still intensifying and that it is hitting especially hard at the small companies end of that industrial sector. When the Chief Secretary tries to tell us that industry is about to flourish once again without any help from the Government, we are entitled to disbelieve him.

Earlier, I noted that the Chief Secretary claimed that the CBI survey, which came out last week, showed optimism on the increase. In his absence, I must tell him that it showed nothing of the sort. It showed optimism still on a downward trend and that fewer businesses were optimistic than were three months previously. Yes, the rate of decline in optimism may have slackened slightly, but declining it still is. It is important that the Government recognise that. It would be useful if from time to time they would acknowledge that rather than claim that a downturn in optimism is an upturn, because it is not.

The Government could have introduced a package of real measures to improve the prospects for industry, especially small companies. They could have accepted our proposals for investment allowances and introduced measures to implement a programme of training which is especially important for the small business sector. They could have removed the uniform business rate and returned to a locally determined form of business property taxation. They could have given a special boost to research and development. They could have transformed the business expansion scheme into something that benefited manufacturing industry instead of providing a tax haven for property speculators. They could have provided additional interest rate relief.

The Government did none of those things, which would have been a substantial package of measures for small businesses. What the clause contains may be worthy, but it is far too little, given the scale of the problems and the difficulties that afflict small businesses throughout the country. The Government have yet to recognise that truth.

Mr. Maples: The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) accuses this modest little part of the Finance Bill of not doing all sorts of things that it was never intended to do. It is part of a long-term programme of getting down the rates of corporation tax. While the hon. Gentleman is right to say that it will not cure the problems of the uniform business rate, or the recession, or sort out the construction industry, I think that on the whole companies would prefer to pay corporation tax at 25 per cent. rather than the 42 per cent. that they had to pay when his party was in power.

It is a measure that, to companies earning £250,000 a year, is worth £20,000. That is £20,000 more to invest in their business, either in working capital, or in plant and equipment. I should have thought that that would be welcome to them. We believe that on the whole it is better that people should pay lower rates of tax, and this is a move in that direction.

Maintenance Enforcement Bill [Lords]

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

Clause 2

ORDERS FOR PERIODICAL PAYMENT IN MAGISTRATES' COURTS: MEANS OF PAYMENT

9 pm

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. John Patten): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 4, line 1, leave out 'subsection (1)(a) above' and insert 'this section'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this, it will be convenient to consider Government amendment No. 2.

Mr. Patten: This is a minor consequential amendment to clause 2. It is required because clause 59(7A), introduced as an amendment to the Bill this evening, contains a reference to a qualifying maintenance order. Because that phrase is used in clause 59(7A), it follows that the definition of that phrase which is given in clause 59(2) needs to be applied to the whole clause, not just to clause 59(1)(a).

Amendment agreed to.

'(7A) The Secretary of State may by regulations confer on magistrates' courts, in addition to their powers under paragraphs (a) to (d) of subsection (3) above, the power (the "additional power") to order that payments under a qualifying maintenance order be made by the debtor to the creditor or the clerk of a magistrates' court (as the regulations may provide) by such method of payment as may be specified in the regulations.

(7B) Any reference in any enactment to paragraphs (a) to (d) of subsection (3) above (but not a reference to any specific paragraph of that subsection) shall be taken to include a reference to the additional power, and the reference in subsection (7C) below to the additional power shall be construed accordingly.

(7C) Regulations under subsection (7A) above may make provision for any enactment concerning, or connected with, payments under maintenance orders to apply, with or without modifications, in relation to the additional power.

(7D) The power of the Secretary of State to make regulations under subsection (7A) above shall be exercisable by statutory instrument and any such statutory instrument shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament.'.—[Mr. John Patten.]

9.1 pm

Mr. John Patten: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

This Bill has had all-party support and deserves the support of the whole House.

Oral Answers to Questions

ENVIRONMENT

Community Charge

1. Mr. Eastham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will publish a draft Bill on the replacement of the community charge; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities (Mr. Michael Portillo): The Government are currently consulting on the council tax. Our intention is to introduce legislation in good time to implement the new system for the financial year 1993-94.

Mr. Eastham: Why do the Government intend to wait two years to introduce this new legislation when it is obvious that it could be introduced in the coming year? As the Government appear to have a light legislative programme for the coming year, why are they dithering and not getting on with getting rid of the poll tax? Let us kiss it goodbye once and for all.

Mr. Portillo: I am delighted to have that welcome for the council tax. I wish that all Opposition Members had been so welcoming. Clearly the hon. Gentleman has been reading the Local Government Chronicle and he agrees with its conclusion that the council tax will do Manchester a lot of good. As for why we cannot legislate earlier, the hon. Gentleman will know, because the Opposition set it out in a document, that it is necessary to consult on the matter, to get it right and to give the House and another place time to consider it in detail.

Mr. Sims: My hon. Friend refers to the consultation paper, but his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has made it clear that he has no intention of altering the bands proposed in the document. Will he therefore take this opportunity to explain the basis of the valuation of properties to be put in the bands? I am sure that he will be aware of the concern in constituencies such as mine where it appears that, if the valuation is based on the price of properties as exhibited in the offices of local estate agents, people in quite modest properties will find themselves in the same band as those living in millionaires' row. It would be helpful if my hon. Friend could explain the basis of valuation.

Mr. Portillo: We thought carefully about the number of bands proposed and looked at a number of different options. We decided that seven bands was the right number to put forward as our firm proposal. The capital valuation will be based on capital values—that speaks for itself. A number of special factors may be involved in certain properties and that is one of the matters on which we are consulting.

My hon. Friend may not be giving enough weight to the fact that the tax is intended to collect much less than the old rating system used to do and that we have arrived at a balance where those in the most expensive properties will be asked to pay two and a half times as much as those in the least expensive properties. On the whole, people think that that is a fair apportionment of the burden.

Mr. Wigley: If it will take two years to implement such legislation, have the Government considered introducing parallel legislation, which could come into effect much sooner, to prevent those who presently receive an 80 per cent. reduction from having to pay anything at all under the present poll tax system?

Mr. Portillo: Of course, we have thought about it, but we do not propose to do that. People on income support who are expected to pay 20 per cent. of the community charge bill receive an addition to their benefit in respect of the average of those 20 per cent. bills. There has been no adjustment to the amount that they get to take account of the fact that the community charge has been reduced by £140, so a number are receiving more in their benefits than they are asked to pay in their 20 per cent. community charge. That is particularly the case in those local authorities where the charge is low.

Mr. Oppenheim: Bearing in mind that the Labour party proposes to abolish capping and spending limits if it comes to power, will my hon. Friend invite his opposite number to explain to the House how his so-called "fair rates" figures could be kept down to the quoted levels if Labour abolishes capping and competitive tendering? Are not Labour's figures a complete sham?

Mr. Portillo: Labour's figures are not worth the paper that they are written on—partly because the arithmetic is wrong but also because, as my hon. Friend said, Labour does not intend to limit in any way the amount that Labour authorities can spend. We know that those authorities spend through the roof, if they are given the opportunity to do so. We know also that Labour has opposed the transfer of part of the burden to value added tax. Again, Labour's figures are based on an entirely false assumption—on the lower burden being taken from local taxpayers. However, Labour has spoken out against the VAT increase that made that possible.

Mr. Gould: Will the Minister clear up at least part of the confusion that surrounds his proposals? Although he published figures purporting to show the council tax under a seven-band system, is it not the case that no work on such a system has been undertaken? Is it not the case also that district valuers were asked to provide estimates on the basis of a 14-band system and that the decision was then taken to lop off the top six bands? Why was that done? Does not that decision completely invalidate the Government's figures and show that the unfair and familiar principle underlying the poll tax has been retained? I refer to the principle that the rich should be protected from paying their full whack, while an unfair burden falls on the rest of us.

Mr. Portillo: We got rid of the unfair principle underlying the old rating system, to which the hon. Gentleman wants to return, whereby the occupants of more expensive properties—even if they had modest incomes—were expected to pay limitless sums towards local government. The hon. Gentleman also wants sole occupants to pay as much as multiple-occupancy households. That was a major unfairness under the rates system, and we are not prepared to return to it.

The hon. Gentleman has been barking up the wrong tree for some time. We devised a system that appeals to the British public as being fair, because it dispenses with the extremes of the rating system. We prefer to base a system on 1991 values, whereas the hon. Gentleman wants to use 1973 values.

Council Tax

2. Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what will be the consequences of the distribution of Government grant of the council tax proposals; and if there will be any significant alteration in so far as it relates to Southend-on-Sea.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Robert Key): Grant will be distributed so as to enable authorities to finance spending at a standard level, by levying standard taxable amounts determined by the Secretary of State. Authorities will be compensated for differences in their expenditure needs and for any variations in their taxable capacity. No major changes are proposed to the current system of standard spending assessments.

Mr. Taylor: Is my hon. Friend aware that there was public rejoicing in Southend-on-Sea this year, after years of battling to get rid of the terrible safety net, which forced the people of Southend-on-Sea to subsidise other councils? Is he further aware that my right hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Channon) and I and all the people of Southend-on-Sea would be very unhappy if that wretched safety net were reintroduced? Is there any truth in the unique revelation appearing in The Scotsman that Jacques Delors could stop local government reforms by virtue of his latest directive?

Mr. Key: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for the opportunity to congratulate the electors of Southend-on-Sea on their sensible decision in last Thursday's council elections. Transitional help will continue to be available for households, and we have no proposals to reintroduce area protection grant. My hon. Friend may have been referring to the transfer of undertakings directives, which place a new employer into the shoes of the old employer in respect of dismissals and other aspects of an employee's terms and conditions of employment. If that is the case, those directives apply both to the private and public sector and would have no special effect on local authorities.

Mr. Channon: Is my hon. Friend aware that the proposed council tax arrangements set out in recent consultative documents would mean that, in future, nine out of 10 households in Southend-on-Sea are likely to pay even less than they do now? It is already a low figure because Southend-on-Sea is a prudent local authority. Does my hon. Friend share my belief that that is why the Conservatives enjoyed such excellent results in the local elections and why the Liberals were routed?

Mr. Key: I well recall my happy visit to Southend-on-Sea not long ago. My right hon. Friend is right to point out that, had the council tax been up and running this year, a couple living in a house of average value in Southend-on-Sea would have paid £276, as opposed to a community charge of £416.

Mr. Dalyell rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will call the hon. Member, but I remind him that we are discussing Southend-on-Sea, not Linlithgow-on-Sea.

Mr. Dalyell: Up the road from Southend-on-Sea is Heveningham hall. Does the Minister know who owns it? As it is the subject of a grant—the word "grant" appears in the original question—can the Minister assure the House that it is not owned by the Iraqi Government?

Mr. Key: The hon. Gentleman will know that there has been substantial correspondence on that issue. I shall look into the question and write to the hon. Gentleman.

3. Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about the proposed council tax.

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Michael Heseltine): The Government's council tax proposal has been widely welcomed by hon. Members and by those involved in local government. I look forward to receiving detailed responses to the consultation exercise now under way.

Mr. Burns: Will my right hon. Friend forgive me if I gently chide him for that reply? The reason is that my right hon. Friend seems not to have included in the representations that he received the thousands of voters in Chelmsford who voted against the Liberal Democrats and voted a Conservative council into Chelmsford, overturning the Liberal Democrat council because they support and like the council tax that my right hon. Friend proposes.

Mr. Heseltine: Having given my hon. Friend's question due consideration, I certainly forgive him.

Mr. McCartney: Would the Secretary of State like to make a further visit to Wigan to explain to electors why the rate of council tax to be levied there is double the rate that will be levied in the Conservative borough of Trafford? In Wigan we will have the highest rate levy of all 10 districts in Greater Manchester. When people in boroughs such as Wigan will have to pay twice as much in council tax as those in a borough such as Trafford, does not that show that something is seriously wrong with the calculations?

Mr. Heseltine: I do not think that I need to go to Wigan to explain the consequences of having a Labour authority in Wigan and a Conservative one in Trafford.

Mr. Norris: There is no doubt that in my constituency of high-valued properties, the overwhelming majority of constituents will most certainly pay far less under the new council tax than they were paying under the old rating system and that the tax is warmly welcomed in that regard. I suggest that there is one point on which I would invite my right hon. Friend to keep his options open—the question of an additional band at the bottom of the scale, at around £20,000, to take account in my constituency of those who live in mobile homes and other low-cost accommodation, who are often the least fortunate. I suggest that there should be an additional band at the top of the scale at about £250,000, because at present those who live in areas such as mine on the fringes of London frequently find that a value of £160,000 on their property does not mean that they are especially rich.

Mr. Heseltine: Of course, I understand my hon. Friend's point. It has been made by other people. One must consider the banding arrangements in the context of the sums of money that separate one band from another. It is the Government's view that, having considered the various permutations, the seven-band arrangement with which we have come forward is appropriate.

Mr. Gould: As the Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities could not answer the question about the six missing bands, perhaps the Secretary of State could try to clear up another matter of confusion. What will be the basis of valuation? Will it be capital valuation, without any conditions—as the Secretary of State said—or will other factors be taken into account, as the Minister of State said on Radio 4, or does confusion continue to reign?

Mr. Heseltine: The only confusion is in the mind of the hon. Gentleman because every time that we answer the question he asks it all over again. The fact is that we have come forward with seven bands. We made it absolutely clear, both in advance of our announcement and subsequently, that we considered a number of other options, but we came to the view that the seven-band option was the most appropriate. That remains the position. As for the broad issue of the valuation process, we also explained that. Whereas the Opposition are in favour of capital values, rental values and building and repair costs as a basis for valuation—whatever that may mean—we believe in capital values, and we are consulting on that basis.

Mr. Gould: So the Minister of State is wrong.

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend the Minister is not wrong. If people wish to suggest to us specific areas where capital values need modification, we shall consider them. Local government may well produce examples that need specific examination. As we are designing a tax for local authorities to administer and collect, the appropriate way forward is by consultation and not by imposition.

Council Services

4. Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which councils have privatised the most services.

Mr. Heseltine: My Department does not collect this information. There has been a substantial shift of work to private contractors as a result of the compulsory competitive tendering legislation. In addition, a number of local authorities have gone further, on a voluntary basis, in using private contractors to provide services on their behalf.

Mr. Evans: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it was Conservative local authorities that led the way on competitive tendering? Westminster, Wandsworth and Southend-on-Sea have provided better services. Is not it true that those authorities had the lowest community charge? Was not it the Labour party that was dragged screaming into the 20th century when it refused to accept the privatisation of services? Lambeth is one example, with its high community charge and rotten services. Does my right hon. Friend intend to extend competitive tendering to other services?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend is correct. The journey to competitive tendering began in 1980 and continued throughout the 1980s. It is also true that the benefits to the local community—higher quality of service at a lower cost—are to be seen significantly in Wandsworth and Westminster. It is a matter of conjecture whether the Labour party has actually got to the 20th century, kicking and screaming or not.

Mr. Skinner: Despite the hoo-ha about the privatisation of services, is the Secretary of State aware that last Thursday the electors of Britain spoke about that matter and all the other Tory policies? In Bolsover the last four Tories, and the last Liberal Democrat as well, were swept aside. Of the 92 clubs in the Football League, only three are in areas where the local authority is controlled by the Tories. The red flag is flying over Blackpool, Brighton, Plymouth and other seaside resorts.

Mr. Heseltine: The only overwhelming conclusion to be drawn from last Thursday's elections is that the Labour party would not have secured enough votes to form a Government if there had been a general election.

Mr. Squire: I shall revert, if sadly, to the original question. Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Labour party's commitment to abolish compulsory tendering at the insistence of the National and Local Government Officers Association and the National Union of Public Employees is a bad deal for consumers and users all over the country and gives the lie to any suggestion that it has forgotten its bad old ways of union-controlled party policies?

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend is right. That is just one more example of why, if the Labour party ever achieved power, it would give us worse services at a higher cost.

Local Government

5. Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if it is his intention to create additional parish or town councils outside London; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: Under current legislation we may consider whether to create additional parish and town councils outside London in the light of recommendations from the Local Government Boundary Commission. In the context of the proposals in our recent consultation document on the structure of local government in England, the Government believe that there may be a case for considering whether to enhance the role of parish councils, especially if a new unitary authority were to cover a wide area.

Mr. Barron: Has the Minister considered receiving direct representations from parishioners about parish councils? In Maltby, South Yorkshire, where I live, the district council consistently votes against our having a parish council, although many people in the parish believe that we should have one.

Mr. Key: I believe that 90 per cent. of the hon. Gentleman's constituency has parishes. In our consultation paper, we specifically invite representations, and we shall be glad to receive them from his constituents.

Mrs. Peacock: While my hon. Friend listens to representations on parish councils, will he also listen to representations from my constituents about splitting the metropolitan authority of Kirklees, which provides lousy, inefficient and costly services?

Mr. Key: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving me the opportunity to say that it is clear that Labour-controlled authorities have a worse record than Conservative-controlled authorities. However, we do not now intend to alter the structure of the existing unitary authorities.

Mr. Bellotti: I am sure that the Minister will wish to join me and other hon. Members in congratulating all those victors in town and parish elections last Thursday, including the 17 in Polegate town council, in my constituency, all of whom are Liberal Democrats. Will he assure the House that the current consultations will not affect the delay which may occur in the transfer of responsibilities for community care to local authorities, which the Government's programme shows is aimed for April 1993? Will he further assure the House that the finance to enable local authorities to plan for that transfer will be re-examined?

Mr. Key: I am glad to reassure the hon. Gentleman that the community care programme is proceeding on time However, I have to commiserate with him on his party's dismal performance in my constituency, where the independents are now the largest opposition, as opposed to the Liberal Democrats.

Sir Dudley Smith: Is my hon. Friend aware that until my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State came to office there were rumours that parish councils and town councils might be abolished? What he has said today is very welcome indeed, because there is a general feeling throughout the country that town councils provide an essential element in local government in that they are local.

Mr. Key: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Although it is true that parish and town councils have comparatively small environmental powers, we recognise that loyalty to parish and town councils is extremely strong and we wish to ensure that their voices are heard properly.

Mr. O'Brien: The Minister's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) did not answer the question. Will the hon. Gentleman explain what the Government plan to do or what recommendations they will make to redress the mismatch between parish and town councils, particularly in the metropolitan districts? As the survey carried out by Aston university and the consultative documents do not address the real problem in metropolitan districts, will the Government take action to ensure that it will be resolved?

Mr. Key: I assure the hon. Gentleman that before taking action we shall consult properly. That is precisely why we invited consultation. I was glad that the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) agreed that that was a sensible way forward. Of course, there are difficulties with parish and town councils. In addition, only about 50 per cent. of the country is parished. There are problems and that is why we are consulting on them.

Mr. Burt: Will my hon. Friend assure us that he does not intend to create any unnecessary and expensive regional bodies which cut right across the public desire to have decisions taken locally, in contrast with Labour party's policy which would bring back those regional bodies? Does he share the concern of my constituents who last week voted Conservative in a 17 per cent. swing from Labour to Conservative and thus backed and supported the Government's policy to say no to unnecessary regional bodies?

Mr. Key: Yes, I can give my hon. Friend that assurance. We have no plans to introduce regional government. Of course, my hon. Friend is absolutely right. The number of votes cast in the north-west show a remarkable improvement in support for the Conservative party.

London Docklands Development Corporation

6. Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to receive the next annual report of the London Docklands development corporation.

Mr. Portillo: I look forward to receiving the annual report from London Docklands in July.

Mr. Spearing: Does the Minister agree that the last annual report of the LDDC shows much more concern for the needs of developers than for those of local people? Is he aware that most of the £1·8 billion allocated to rail transport has been used to benefit developers and that the LDDC is not supporting the London borough of Newham's petition for a proper interchange between three new railways at Canning Town? Would it not be a pity if the design defects of underground stations built in the west end at the beginning of the century were replicated in the east end at the end of the century?

Mr. Portillo: I do not want to get drawn into the detail of the station, but the LDDC is a development corporation and it has not supplanted the local authorities, which retain their responsibilities. The LDDC has done a tremendous amount of work with local authorities and other bodies on projects which benefit the community. It has spent about £100 million over the past three years on community projects. It will spend about £87 million over the next three years on community projects and it has made agreements with boroughs such as the London borough of Newham on the construction of houses and a series of projects on education and training which will benefit local people. That is an extremely fine record.

Mr. Summerson: The LDDC has a good record of making use of vacant derelict land. Does my hon. Friend agree that other authorities should follow the example set by the LDDC and use their vacant derelict land, thus reducing the pressure to develop green field sites?

Mr. Portillo: Indeed. The London Docklands development corporation has already reclaimed 600 hectares of derelict land—that sounds like quite a lot to me—and has a remarkable record. I wish that other local authorities would follow the LDDC's lead. We set up that corporation precisely for the purpose of bringing about regeneration and it is succeeding extremely well.

"This Common Inheritance"

7. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many of the objectives listed in the White Paper "This Common Inheritance", have so far been achieved; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister for the Environment and Countryside (Mr. David Trippier): In the seven months since the publication of "This Common Inheritance", we have made substantial progress on some 100 of the commitments and proposals that it contained. Many of these were set out in my announcement on 26 March this year. The Government remain committed to the integration of environmental concerns into the whole range of their activities, both in the United Kingdom and internationally. Colleagues in charge of Departments throughout Whitehall are working constructively to press home the White Paper initiatives and to keep up the impetus for progress in the future.

Mr. Kirkwood: Will the Minister confirm that one of the main aims of the White Paper was to set statutory water quality objectives? Is he aware that that commitment was first made in 1987 when the National Rivers Authority was set up? It was repeated when the Water Bill was enacted and has now been restated in the White Paper. Despite that, statutory water quality objectives have yet to be set. As we discuss the matter this afternoon, raw sewage and industrial effluent are being discharged into our water courses and rivers. Is not it scandalous that it has taken the Government all this time to set out those objectives?

Mr. Trippier: I totally reject all that the hon. Gentleman has said. His references to legislation omitted the Environmental Protection Act 1990, which also set out water quality objectives. Such objectives are set by the National Rivers Authority in compliance with European directives, which we must implement. As I have stated repeatedly on the Floor of the House, by 1997 we shall be the first member state of the European Community to achieve 100 per cent. compliance with the bathing water quality directives. That is incredible progress.

Mr. Forman: Was not one of the most important objectives of that excellent White Paper that those sectors of British industry involved in pollution abatement and control should expand as quickly as possible, particularly into the export market? What progress has been made in that direction with the encouragement of the Government?

Mr. Trippier: Enormous progress is being made, particularly in water consultancy. As my hon. Friend suggests in his question, there is an enormous amount of business to be secured for British industry in work abroad, not least in central and eastern Europe. A new technology scheme has been introduced by my Department in conjunction with the Department of Trade and Industry and that is proving enormously successful. However, we still need more British companies to come forward to explain what they can do to share their expertise and technology with other countries who need it.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: Is not the real problem that the White Paper lacks any real objective, timetable or overall strategy? If we are to tackle the environmental crisis that we are facing, is not it about time that the Government started to give a lead? Does the Minister realise that it is no use the Secretary of State making the kind of statement that he made yesterday about regulating for higher standards or telling industry to be more aware and concerned about the environment when the Government are putting the interests of electricity shareholders before the interests of the environment?

Mr. Trippier: I should point out to the hon. Lady that, prior to the reversal in fortunes for the Conservative Government which we all know took place about a few months ago, there were two principal areas in which the Government led the Labour party. One was defence—not surprisingly—and the other was the environment. That should make the hon. Lady hang her head in shame. There is a stark contrast between this Government's record and that of the last Labour Government, who did next to nothing. We have introduced the Water Act 1989, which has been widely welcomed, and the Environmental Protection Act 1990 to give us the toughest regulatory regime in Europe. We introduced a White Paper setting out our programme for the next 10 years. The Labour party is absolutely nowhere on that issue: we have taken the high ground.

Waste Recycling

8. Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress he has made in encouraging the recycling of waste materials.

Mr. Trippier: The Environmental Protection Act 1990 requires all waste collection authorities to prepare recycling plans. We shall be issuing guidance tomorrow on how to draw up those plans for consultation. We shall also announce details of the distribution of £12 million of supplementary credit approvals to enable local authorities to invest in recycling. That will add significantly to measures already in place to encourage recycling.

Details will be placed in the Library.

Mr. Amos: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that encouraging reply, but will he have further discussions with local councils to set up schemes, in particular for the individual household waste collection of newspapers, glass bottles and tin cans, which would not only be good for the environment, but would help solve the growing litter problem? Will he join me in congratulating two schools in my constituency, Hexham middle school and Corbridge middle school, on the excellent work that they have done in increasing public awareness about the matter?

Mr. Trippier: With regard to my hon. Friend's latter question, I am happy to congratulate the schools to which he referred and I hope that he will convey those congratulations to them at the earliest opportunity.

With regard to my hon. Friend's first question, we have already been a partner in an experiment that has been running in Sheffield, which is now well known as "recycling city", and that experience has been replicated elsewhere. The scheme has been successful in that there have been doorstep collections and waste has been split up so that it can be recycled. Activity in this area will be stimulated by the new recycling credits scheme that we hope to announce within the next two months.

Mr. Tony Banks: Since we are talking about waste material, how many tonnes of paper were used and how many trees were sacrificed through the scrapping of all the poll tax forms because of Government changes? As it looks as though there is still a great deal of confusion surrounding the council tax, will the Minister recommend to local authorities that they print the new council tax forms on recycled paper or, perhaps, rice paper so that it is more palatable for Ministers when they have to eat their own words?

Mr. Trippier: I assure the hon. Gentleman that the new council tax proposals will use less paper than the community charge proposals.

Mr. Mans: Does my hon. Friend agree that, contrary to the comments of the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor), my hon. Friend's remarks show that the Government's recycling policy has clear objectives? Will he go further and ensure that recycling takes place in Government Departments other than his own and in the House of Commons?

Mr. Trippier: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving me the opportunity to say that all Government Departments should set an example and follow that given by the Department of the Environment. I understand that the Services Committee of the House has introduced an option whereby Members of Parliament can choose whether to use recycled paper, so I hope that the vast majority of, if not all, Members of Parliament will take the option of using recycled paper.

Rented Properties (Rural Areas)

9. Mr. Ashton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any new proposals to provide additional properties for rent in rural areas.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Yeo): We have taken a variety of measures over the last three years to boost the supply of low-cost housing in rural areas. We have substantially increased public resources through the Housing Corporation for new investment by housing associations, raising the target for the development of new subsidised housing under their special rural programme to 2,250 a year by 1993-94. We recently announced an extra £50 million of credit approvals for rural local authorities for a new programme of low-cost housing and we have amended planning guidance to permit development of low-cost housing for local needs on small sites not otherwise designated for housing.

Mr. Ashton: Is the Minister aware that his variety of reasons sounds like waffle? All that he can manage is the provision of 2,000 extra houses in rural areas, despite the fact that thousands have been sold to council tenants and councils have been prevented by him from replacing them. There is now a massive shortage of council rented tenancies for manual workers, particularly people who work in such places as farm factories or local garages. This is turning the countryside into dormitory suburbs for yuppies. Manual workers, including the lower working class, just cannot afford to pay the prices that houses are fetching. Previously, when tenants died, houses became available. When will the Minister ensure that large numbers of council houses are built in villages so that people may have decent places to live?

Mr. Yeo: As we are within 14 months of a general election, it is most timely that the House has been reminded of the Labour party's underlying hostility to the Government's policy on the sale of council houses. From what the hon. Gentleman has said, it is clear that his mind is still set in the ways of the 1940s. He sees local authorities as the monopoly providers of accommodation for renting. We wholly reject that solution. We are determined to see a substantial increase in the private rented sector and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will persuade his colleagues to support us in that important objective. We are also providing the Housing Corporation with substantially increased resources—rising from just over £1 billion last year to well over £2 billion a year in three years' time—to expand very substantially the provision, through housing associations, of subsidised accommodation for renting. I am glad to be able to say, that, in the hon. Gentleman's constituency alone, the Housing Corporation is spending £1·3 million in the current year on the provision of another 40 units.

Mr. Gill: Although the additional £50 million in the current year is most welcome, I hope that my hon. Friend can assure the House that there will be similar provision in future years so that local authorities and others engaged in the provision of affordable housing in rural areas may have an ongoing programme. It is extremely difficult to generate programmes at very short notice.

Mr. Yeo: I share my hon. Friend's concern about the need to provide an adequate supply of affordable housing in rural areas. We are pleased with the results so far of the £50 million credit approvals that we have provided for the current year. Obviously we shall keep an eye on the situation. We are determined to ensure that all rural areas will get a fair share, whether through local authority credit approvals or through the Housing Corporation. As I said, the corporation is building up its programme. Over the next three years, including the current year, housing associations will build more than 6,000 units in very small villages.

Mr. Battle: How will local authorities in rural areas that have no housing—all their houses having been sold off—fulfil their statutory obligation, under the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977, to house the homeless? How can that obligation possibly be fulfilled when there are no council houses?

Mr. Yeo: A number of schemes are available to local authorities. I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to the end of my original answer, where I referred to the fact that local authorities may now introduce schemes in respect of land not otherwise designated for housing, in which case the land component in the total cost of a house is almost entirely eliminated. In many areas, landowners are coming forward with offers of land and it is up to the local authorities to respond.

Mr. Walden: Does my hon. Friend agree that houses for renting or for sale should not be constructed at the expense of the environment? In the light of yesterday's published estimates of future aggregate demand, will he look urgently at the possibility of encouraging substitutes? If what is going on is allowed to continue, constituencies like mine will look like a lawn after the moles have been at it.

Mr. Yeo: I know of my hon. Friend's close interest in this subject and I am glad to be able to tell him that I entirely share his concern that the proportion of recycled and secondary aggregates that are used in all forms of construction should be substantially increased.

Mr. Soley: Bluster is not going to get the Minister anywhere. Can he confirm that the Association of District Councils, which is Conservative controlled, has consistently told the Government that selling council houses without replacing them—the Labour party's view is that they should be replaced—is leading to a catastrophic shortage of rented accommodation in rural and urban areas? Why does he think that Conservative councils in rural areas have got it so badly wrong and he has got it right?

Mr. Yeo: The House must have listened carefully and in vain for any hint in the hon. Gentleman's question that he supports the policy of selling council houses. It is perfectly open to housing authorities in rural areas to meet needs in the ways that I have outlined; by co-operating with the housing association movement; by taking advantage of our off-site plan policy so that low-cost housing can be provided at prices that are affordable both for sale and for rent; and through the judicious granting of planning permissions to the private sector, which is also ready and willing to help meet the need.

Council Tax

10. Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment by how much the council tax would be reduced if Greenwich received the same amount per head for social services and for other services as (a) Wandsworth and (b) Lewisham.

Mr. Portillo: Neither Lewisham's nor Wandsworth's standard spending assessment would be appropriate for Greenwich, as each has different social and demographic characteristics. Greenwich could reduce its bills under the council tax by reducing its spending, which exceeds standard spending assessment by a larger percentage than any other inner London borough.

Mr. Bottomley: Does my hon. Friend accept that it is Greenwich council's fault that it lost £2 million on its direct labour organisation and that it is the only council in the country which has met the capping criteria every single year, but that it is not the council's fault that the expenditure needs assessment works against its interests? Will my hon. Friend or his officials meet officers from Greenwich, with me, to discuss some of the implications of what is outside Greenwich's control?

Mr. Portillo: I do not believe that the standard spending assessment works against Greenwich's interest. I remind my hon. Friend that, for example, Greenwich receives much more for education than does either Wandsworth or Lewisham. However, I am willing to discuss with my hon. Friend and representatives of the council the standard spending assessment. If I receive an invitation from him or from the council I shall be happy to join them in a meeting.

Farm Shops

11. Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any plans to make farm shops liable to uniform business rate.

Mr. Key: Farm shops are, and have always been, liable to non-domestic rates.

Mrs. Gorman: Even though my constituents and those of my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) gave overwhelming support last week to the Government's new policies on local taxation, with an 8 per cent. swing to the Conservatives wiping out a long-standing majority for Labour on Basildon council, thus reducing it from the Arsenal to the Accrington Stanley——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Could we relate this to farm shops?

Mrs. Gorman —nevertheless the greengrocers of my constituency are concerned that while they pay the uniform business rate, farm shops do not. Unless my farmers, who are extremely versatile, have taken to growing bananas, pineapples, oranges and kiwi fruit, there is a case for an even playing field to be created for those who sell vegetables all over the country.

Mr. Key: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving me the opportunity to congratulate her electors on a sensible decision last Thursday. My hon. Friend is absolutely right; we wish to see the market operating on, perhaps, a level turnip field. Of course, farmers pay rates not only on farm shops but on agricultural buildings used for the storage of fruit and vegetables grown elsewhere, or for the storage of intervention board surplus grain or skimmed milk. Where produce is sold at the farm gate, the local Inland Revenue valuation officer may make an assessment for rates. A permanent stall situated at the entrance to a farm, used on a regular basis for the sale of farm produce, might be regarded as rateable.

Mr. Corbett: Will the Minister confirm that under the proposals for the council tax there are no plans to exempt farm shops from paying some form of rates? Will he also acknowledge that in scores of small businesses families who live above the shop and at the moment pay the poll tax upstairs and the uniform business rate downstairs would be exceptionally angry if there was any hint of exemption for farm shops?

Mr. Key: I reassure the hon. Gentleman that there are no plans to alter the rating of agricultural premises. We looked at the non-domestic rating system in the first part of our review of local government structure and finance and decided to retain the principle of the uniform business rate. That does not mean that we are wedded to every detail of the existing business rating system. We are certainly prepared to listen to those who wish to suggest improvements, but we do not envisage any major changes.

Mr. Lord: Is my hon. Friend aware of the immense pressures on farm shops and on all village shops for a series of reasons? Is he further aware that often the people who depend most on those shops are the elderly and those without transport who cannot travel to supermarkets to get goods at cheaper prices? When looking at these matters, will he do all that he can to ensure that we do not pile any more burdens on small shops in rural areas?

Mr. Key: Yes, of course, I shall be delighted to ensure that we give due consideration to important sources of community focus in rural areas. My hon. Friend will acknowledge that it was the revaluation process that many small businesses, and village shops in particular, found difficult rather than the tax itself. If the reform had not been introduced, the small business community would be carrying a burden in excess of £1 billion extra under the old rating system.

Environmental Assessments

12. Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he next plans to meet his European Community counterparts to discuss proposals for the environmental assessment of policies, plans and programmes.

Mr. Trippier: The European Commission has not yet formally adopted proposals to require environmental assessment of policies, plans and programmes, but it is a matter which I expect to discuss in due course with my counterparts from other member states.

Ms. Quin: Would not the draft proposals allow environmental considerations to be built in at every stage of the planning process and much more fully than they are at present? For that reason, will the Government put their weight behind the proposals and ensure that progress is made on them as quickly as possible?

Mr. Trippier: I could not possibly put my weight behind the proposals as currently constituted by the Commission because they are, in truth, half-baked.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: Too tough.

Mr. Trippier: The hon. Lady intervenes to say "too tough". Rather than any commitment in any Labour party document, I can at least see one in the Government's White Paper in September which stated:

"The United Kingdom is committed to a more systematic approach within Government, to the appraisal of environmental costs and benefits before decisions are taken."

The proposals suggested by the European Commission are in a mess and the vast majority of the member states accept that. I hope that they will be tidied up so that we can achieve our objectives, which I am sure that the hon. Lady shares.

Dr. Hampson: My hon. Friend has led a number of construction industry export drives. Before he joins European Ministers, will he talk to the Treasury about the export credits guarantee policy that it pursues and which has put our construction industry at a disadvantage compared with the European industry, to the point that it now seems that the British trade centre in Moscow will be built by the French and the British airport terminal in Moscow by the Italians?

Mr. Trippier: I shall certainly be happy to raise the matter with my Treasury colleagues.

Mr. Win Griffiths: Given the Minister's commitment when answering question 7 and again in mouthing platitudes from his White Paper, why cannot he now say that he will endorse the principle of environmental assessment of planning and structure development at the local planning stage so that consideration of environmental matters is built into the system and so that we do not deal with them on an ad hoc basis and often far too late? The Minister should put his commitment where his words are supposed to be.

Mr. Trippier: The hon. Gentleman's knowledge of such matters, as I discovered again in Committee this morning, shows an alarming gap; perhaps he suffers from delusions of adequacy. He has again revealed that he is unaware that the Government have already accepted the principle of environmental impact assessment. It is there in black and white in the White Paper. We intend to deliver and we are concerned about the detail which would have to come from the European Commission.

Miss Emma Nicholson: Although I welcome the Government's commitment to a cleaner environment and especially the White Paper, will the Minister confirm that he will do all that he can to ensure a level playing field in Europe? He will be aware of the 1 million mythical olive trees that the common agricultural policy set-aside scheme supports. Can he assure us that there will not be 1 million mythical rivers for which Europe gives clean water grants from money taken out of our pockets? We obey the rules, but Europe often does not.

Mr. Trippier: My hon. Friend has a very good point, but I should put it in a very different way. On environmental matters covering Europe, we play cricket, but I am pretty sure that others play rugby. Experience teaches me that the position will improve and that there will be a more level playing field after the introduction of the European Environmental Agency. Then we can make fair comparisons, carefully analyse the statistics put to the agency and compare like with like. At the moment, I am not satisfied that we are doing so.

Mr. Simon Hughes: In the light of the incident off the north Norfolk coast last Friday, will the Minister put on the agenda at the next Council meeting the environmental assessment of the transport by sea of hazardous chemicals? Is he aware that the loss overboard of the ethyl acrylate containers revealed two major defects? First, there is a lack of security in the transport of potentially lethal cargoes which could have a damaging effect on the marine environment. Secondly, once overboard, there was no labelling on the containers, which added to the risk to both marine life and the people trying to find the containers in the difficult waters off that coast.

Mr. Trippier: One point that the hon. Gentleman mentioned worries me—that the containers were not labelled. However, my understanding of the incident is somewhat at odds with what the hon. Gentleman has expressed to the press and in a letter to the Department of the Environment. Immediate action was taken last Friday. It was confirmed at 3.40 pm that the araldite hardener was no danger to the marine environment and that the other chemicals were only marginally toxic. Neither the hon. Gentleman nor I wishes to mislead the House or indulge in any form of scaremongering which could put the fear of God into many people when it is not necessary. The chemicals were properly stowed in a well-found ship, but the tanks broke adrift in bad weather. That can happen and it has happened. So far, according to my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Transport and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, the matter has been dealt with satisfactorily. I shall look into the precise point that the hon. Gentleman makes about labelling and write to him.

Mr. Favell: As a north-west Member, my hon. Friend may have read in the local press that the Department of Transport has been reported to the European Commission for failing to obtain an environmental assessment of the impact of the A6 bypass. He will certainly have had experience of driving up and down that miserable road and the traffic conditions on it. When he meets his counterparts in Europe will he tell them that the people of Stockport are well capable of assessing the environmental impact of the bypass and that the European Commission should mind its own bloody business?

Mr. Trippier: I shall have a careful look at that, but my hon. Friend will forgive me if I do not use such colourful language.

New Houses

13. Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many new houses for sale he expects will be completed during 1991-92.

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Sir George Young): The Government do not make forecasts of completions by private housebuilders.

Mr. Campbell: Is the Minister aware that Blyth Valley borough council in my constituency has accrued £23 million over 10 years through the sale of council houses? Is he further aware that with that money it could have built at least 1,000 houses, but it has built only 290 houses during the whole period? When will the Government start building council houses for the needy and homeless?

Sir George Young: I hope that the hon. Gentleman recognises that that is £23 million which his local council would not have had if he had listened to Opposition Members. There would have been no right-to-buy receipts to have a debate about. Thanks to the sale of council houses, we have sustained a far higher level of capital expenditure on public sector housing than would have been the case. For the future we look to housing associations, not local authorities, to build affordable homes for rent.

Mr. John Greenway: Does my hon. Friend agree that the increase in the number of people in Britain who own their homes is one of the greatest achievements of the Government in the past 10 years? Does he further agree that the key to ensuring an adequate supply of new homes in future which people will want to buy and want to rent is to continue the policy of requiring local authorities to put in place statutory local plans which define where the houses shall be built? The release of adequate land is central to the supply of new houses.

Sir George Young: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Our planning policies are designed to ensure that there is a five-year supply of land to meet housing needs throughout the country. Through regional guidance and monitoring of the structure of the district plans, it is our aim to ensure that land is available to meet the housing needs of local people.

Mr. George Howarth: In view of the obvious gaps in the information that is being fed to the Minister about the number of starts in homes for sale, I shall help him. I do not know whether he is aware that, earlier this week, the Building Employers Confederation conducted a state-of-trade inquiry into that subject. Its conclusion was—[HON. MEMBERS: "Question."] I am coming to the question. Its conclusion was this:

"We are pleased to see the very slight improvement in the private house building sector. Any real recovery in the housing market still seems to be a very long way off and will depend crucially on further cuts in interest rates and mortgages"—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Paraphrase, please. Do not quote.

Mr. Howarth: There is no increase. What is the Minister going to do about that?

Sir George Young: With house prices stable, with earnings rising between 5 and 10 per cent., and with interest rates falling, the prospects for house buyers and house builders are excellent.

Mr. Dickens: What is the point in building more and more council houses when, at the moment, half a million council houses stand empty? We were talking earlier about recycling. If local government recycled council houses more quickly when they stand empty for weeks and sometimes months, there would be no problem with the homeless in this country.

Sir George Young: I am sure that my hon. Friend's words will have been heard throughout the country. The 10 worst local authorities for voids are either Labour or Liberal Democrat controlled.

Bangladesh (Aid)

3.30 pm

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): The cyclone which struck Bangladesh on the night of 29 to 30 April was one of the most serious disasters in the region's history. Eye witness accounts have underlined the scale of the tragedy. The whole House shares in our grief and sympathy for the Bangladeshi people.

Precise assessments have been hindered by the severe damage to communications caused by the cyclone, and by continuing bad weather. Neither international donors nor the Bangladesh Government waited for information before starting relief operations. On 30 April we authorised our high commissioner in Dhaka to spend up to £250,000 on immediate relief needs. This formed part of the £2·5 million initial contribution announced in the House on 2 May by my hon. Friend the Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale (Mr. Lennox-Boyd). On 3 May I announced a further £2 million, bringing our total support for immediate disaster relief to £4·5 million.

A major relief effort is now well under way. Fifteen bilateral donors have offered assistance as well as some international organisations. The British response is one of the first and the largest. The physical difficulties involved are massive. Severe damage extends over an area the size of that part of England south of a line drawn between London and Bristol. Much of it still remains under water. Up to 15 million people have been affected.

The port of Chittagong and its equipment have been severely damaged. Rough seas continue to limit access to the islands, which are hardest hit.

The international relief effort must be co-ordinated and duplication avoided wherever possible. At the request of the Government of Bangladesh the United Nations Development Programme is acting as co-ordinator of the relief programmes of the international donor community. To assist in this task we are meeting the costs of two United Nations disaster relief staff.

British experience with previous disasters in Bangladesh, like the major floods of 1987 and 1988, is that non-governmental organisations, working with the support of the Government of Bangladesh, can operate very effectively providing relief. In the immediate aftermath of the cyclone, the priority has been to move stocks of food, clothing, medicines and shelter already in the country to the disaster zone, and to ensure adequate supplies of clean drinking water.

Of the £3·3 million of bilateral assistance announced last week, some £2·5 million is already being spent through a number of British NGOs and international agencies on food, shelter, clothing and medicines. A further £50,000 has been allocated for urgent medical supplies and water purification tablets, recommended by our medical adviser based in Dhaka. Staff from our irrigation project have already gone to assist local and British NGOs, who, together with UNICEF, are working to secure cleaner water in the affected areas. Our aid vehicles have also been made avilable to transport urgently needed supplies.

We have established an emergency office in Chittagong that is providing on-the-spot assessments. This will promote co-ordination with other agencies and Government officials. It is staffed by a highly experienced British aid official who undertook similar work during the 1988 floods.

Some hon. Members have asked why we have not sent boats and helicopters. Our high commissioner in Dhaka is in constant touch with the Bangladesh authorities and other donors. He advises us daily on the most effective uses to which our money can be put, taking into account what is being provided by others. We have just heard that large numbers of boats, including at least 100 collapsible boats provided by Japan following the 1988 floods, are available in Bangladesh. Ten Royal National Lifeboat Institution boats which were donated by Britain in 1988 are being used by the Bangladesh Red Crescent. The high commissioner does not recommend provision of further boats from the United Kingdom. Six Bangladesh Navy ships are engaged in getting supplies to offshore islands. Relief goods are also being transported to Chittagong by rail.

Helicopters clearly have an important part to play as long as large areas remain inaccessible to surface transport. In the first instance this need can most effectively be met by countries within the region. India and Pakistan have already provided some helicopters, and I hope that other neighbouring countries may do likewise.

We are playing a full part in addressing Bangladesh's immediate relief needs as they become known. The co-ordination machinery is in place in Dhaka to try to ensure that all efforts are used to maximum effect and with the minimum duplication. I met the high commissioner of Bangladesh in London yesterday to discuss priorities.

I am pleased to announce that we are making available a further £2 million. This brings our total emergency commitment to date to £6·5 million. The £2 million will cover requests from NGOs for further priority relief supplies and the cost of sending the Royal Fleet Auxiliary ship, Fort Grange, equipped with medical facilities and disaster relief stores and two Sea King helicopters to assist with relief operations.

In the longer term, we have to accept that it will never be possible to protect Bangladesh totally against floods and cyclones, but certain things can be done to mitigate the effects of such natural disasters. The international community is already helping Bangladesh to develop its flood action plan, which includes further measures for cyclone protection. Other rehabilitation and construction needs will be considered once the immediate relief requirements have been met.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): With such a terrible death toll in Bangladesh, where tens of thousands of lives have been lost and millions of people are without homes, how can the Minister expect us to believe that that is an adequate response to their plight? Welcome as it is, an extra £2 million brings the total to just £6·5 million for what the Minister herself called

"one of the most serious disasters in the region's history."

Ten days after the tragedy, people in Bangladesh are asking, "Where is the help? Why doesn't it come?" They need water, food, medicines and shovels to bury the dead. They need to rebuild their homes and telecommunications system. They need money for cattle, tools and seeds for planting the next harvest. Delivering those is a massive logistical task. It cannot be left to charities. It must be done by Governments, so why has a military operation not been set up?

Is it not the case that the Minister's Department is virtually paralysed because the value of the aid budget is still 12 per cent. less in real terms than it was in 1979? Why has the Minister consistently failed to get more money from the Treasury? Does the right hon. Lady recall that, when a cyclone swept 1 million lives away in Bangladesh in 1970, a British amphibious squadron was there in just over a week, and the Minister was there in under a week, like the present French Minister?

Two years ago, when Hurricane Hugo hit Monserrat, HMS Alacrity served as a centre of communications. Surely there must be a frigate that could do the same in Bangladesh now from the Gulf—or is it that, because of the high rates charged by the Ministry of Defence for the use of planes, the cost of military operations will decimate the aid budget in a matter of days unless the ODA gets new money? Is that why the Minister wasted 10 valuable days before sending two Sea King helicopters? Why were only two sent, when the high commission says that at least 30 are needed?

The German Defence Ministry recognises the training value of using the military in civilian disasters, and the military training budget bears much of the cost while the aid budget bears only a fraction. Why cannot we do the same? Is it not true that the ODA's disaster unit is totally overwhelmed? Why is the disaster unit tucked away as part of the information unit? Why did the Foreign Office set up a round-the-clock Gulf crisis unit on 2 August with 50 staff, while the ODA's disaster unit has just six officials? Excellent though they are, those six officials are struggling to co-ordinate aid to victims of famine, cyclone and Iraqi persecution.

The Minister stressed the importance of international co-ordination, and said that the United Nations Development Programme is co-ordinating the relief effort in Bangladesh. Can she tell us why the United Kingdom's contribution to the UNDP has been cut by 52 per cent. in real terms since 1979? Bangladesh is one of our largest recipients of bilateral aid. Why has disaster preparedness not played a larger part in our long-term aid? Can the Minister assure us that British aid will be provided for reconstruction over the coming months and for cyclone shelters over the coming years?

Finally, will the Minister recognise that there will be more terrible and unnecessary deaths from cyclones and other disasters unless rich countries such as ours care enough about the poorest people in the world to match the killer winds and waves of Bengal with a hugh global effort to fight poverty and deprivation?

Mrs. Chalker: The extra £2 million that I have announced makes Britain the largest single national donor. I will consider further assistance for immediate relief or, to pick up the hon. Lady's last point, for longer-term rehabilitation as it is needed. In that respect work, has already started.

The hon. Lady asked many questions. The help has been in action since Tuesday of last week. The fact that all the detail has not been available even to me has a great deal to do with the awful problems of communication. It is perfectly true that France and Switzerland have been helping with internal communications, but those are by no means all restored. I received a telegram literally after I walked into the Chamber informing me that the problem of reaching the Bangladeshi people is caused not so much by transport difficulties as by the very poor weather.

The hon. Lady may not know that a tornado struck north of Dhaka last night and has obviously stretched resources there. When we were in contact with the high commission this morning, I made available a further £100,000 for the immediate needs of the people affected by that tornado.

The hon. Lady went on about the delivery of assistance within Bangladesh. A donor cannot expect to go into a country and act at variance with the Government of that country. One must act through the Government and the non-governmental organisations, and that is exactly what we are doing.

The hon. Lady mentioned a possible ministerial visit. Willing as I am to go, I do not think that that is immediately appropriate. I am thinking carefully about it, but I am anxious not to tie up necessary helicopter transport. Sadly, that is what happened last week when, I am told, three out of four relief helicopters were involved in ferrying visitors around rather than doing their relief job. I will go once the immediate crisis is over, provided that I can do something truly productive.

Rehabilitation and reconstruction are already part of the Bangladeshi flood action plan on which Britain has been engaged for a considerable time. We shall look at the disaster preparedness in such regions, particularly in Bangladesh, with the international agencies, as we started to do last year.

Sir Timothy Raison (Aylesbury): I thank my right hon. Friend for the help that she has given in meeting this ghastly tragedy and for the assurance that she will consider making further contributions, which look as though they will inevitably be needed. Is the system of stockpiling that already exists to deal with the recurring crises in Bangladesh adequate? If not, will she assure us that that will be a high priority in future help?

Mrs. Chalker: I thank my right hon. Friend for his comments. Stockpiling of tents, sheeting and blankets must take place in the countries and regions involved. It is not sufficient simply to stockpile in this country as we have done, which has helped us to deal with the three simultaneous crises that we now face as a donor country. It is not sensible to stockpile food which could not be used within a reasonable period because food may not remain suitable for human consumption during that time. But I am told that adequate food is available in Bangladesh and we have made money available to the non-governmental agencies to enable them to buy food in Bangladesh for the people affected by the awful cyclone.

Sir David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): The cash and personnel help that the Government are giving is, of course, extremely welcome, but the right hon. Lady will know that six days ago in the House hon. Members from both sides raised the question of the supply of inflatable boats and helicopters. The right hon. Lady has just described the area affected as being equivalent in size to the south of England below the London-Bristol line, including 15 million people. In those circumstances, are not 10 rubber boats and three helicopters pitifully inadequate in comparison with the actual need?

Has the right hon. Lady approached our American allies, who have a large amphibious force in the Gulf which is no longer required there and which could be made available in the bay of Bengal?

[Sir David Steel]

Finally, did I understand the right hon. Lady to say that the Ministry of Defence has sent her Department a bill for the use of RFA Fort Grange? If so, will she send it back?

Mrs. Chalker: I am well aware of the right hon. Gentleman's efforts to keep the needs of the Bangladeshi people in the forefront of the news. We are not just talking about 10 boats; 100 boats are already there from our previous donation. We knew that they were there, but they had to be found by the Bangladeshi people before they could be used. It was far quicker to do that than to send 100 new boats, which would have had to be acquired.

We have said that we will consider further needs, so the right hon. Gentleman need not be in any doubt about our intention to obtain not only a daily report but a many-times-daily report from the people who are there and who can judge far better than I or any other hon. Member what can best be done to help the people most effectively and quickly. I am in touch with other Governments about their plans, and I shall remain so to see what can be delivered quickly to the area. It is important to ensure that the Bangladeshi Government get the help that they can best use, as was done last week.

Sir Richard Luce (Shoreham): I warmly congratulate my right hon. Friend on her prompt action, which is an example to many other Governments. Does she agree that this latest tragedy reinforces the urgent need for some permanent international machinery which can stand ready to advise vulnerable Governments and nations on how to deal speedily and urgently with catastrophes of this kind? Will my right hon. Friend take a lead on that?

Mrs. Chalker: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend. After my visit to Jordan, when we faced the crisis of Asian refugees from then occupied Kuwait and other parts of the region, I started to put work in hand to examine this issue of the international response. The United Nations disaster relief organisation has always been ready to get into situations which these days seem far beyond its capacity. That is why I am discussing with fellow members of the Community and with international organisations how a better immediate international response could be provided. Work has already begun, and I hope that, before too long, other countries will follow our lead in making the same level of response.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): I thank the right hon. Lady for her swift response to the desire on both sides of the House for a statement today. The House will understand the great logistical difficulties involved in getting help to the remote and damaged areas of Bangladesh, and the problems caused by the breakdown of telecommunications between Bangladesh and this country.

What the Minister has already said makes it clear how crucial is the supply of helicopters. The collapsible boats would be fine in ordinary circumstances, but apparently the bay of Bengal has been so rough that people have not been able to use boats. In fact, many boats were sunk during the cyclone, so helicopters are the only way to bring assistance to the people who have been so badly affected. However, there are only nine helicopters in Bangladesh at the moment—four of its own, three from India, two from Pakistan, and two from Britain. I am delighted that we have sent those helicopters—they will play a crucial role—but could we not bring ourselves to make a bigger effort to secure the means to get supplies to the people most in need of them?

Lastly, the House and the country most want to know whether, in reacting to that great and continuing disaster, the Government are clearly committed to sustaining a suitable and adequate response. We should like to hear not only that the right hon. Lady will take action, but that she has the backing of the Chief Secretary to the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer in meeting the further demands that will certainly be made by the people of that terribly damaged area.

Mrs. Chalker: The right hon. Member is absolutely right to draw great attention to the enormous waves and continuing bad weather conditions in the area, and to the fact that boats there could not operate. We were sorry to note the sinking in the bay of Bengal of a trawler, which I believe was carrying representatives of the non-governmental organisation CARE. We have to consider what is feasible, out there on the water. At the moment, that means making some deliveries by boat and some by helicopter. However, I have been informed that weather conditions have been such that not even helicopters could fly safely into the affected areas.

It is far better to wait—although that is very painful for the people on the ground—than to lose a helicopter, its pilot, and all the medicines aboard. That is why the operation is taking time. I understand hon. Members' frustration that things seem to be taking so long, and I share that feeling, but I must ensure that we continue to be able to look after the equipment that we and other nations supply.

I have been in touch with our chargé in Bangkok to support the request by the Bangladeshi Government to the Thai army for the loan of its helicopters. Those helicopters are nearby in flying terms, and are suitable for operating in the adverse weather conditions that so often exist in that part of the world.

The right hon. Gentleman asked about the support of my right hon. Friends. I assure him that I have the fullest support of the Prime Minister, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury and of all the other members of the Cabinet.

Several Hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure that the whole House is pleased that there is a statement on this important matter today. Will hon. Members ask brief question so that, hopefully, I may call every hon. Member who wishes to put a question?

Mr. Rupert Allason (Torbay): Given the apparent disagreement among the NGOs, is there not a danger of wasteful duplication? Does my right hon. Friend agree that, in future, more aid should be channelled through the United Nations disaster relief organisation?

Mrs. Chalker: I do not find from my discussions with the non-governmental agencies that they are disagreeing; they are working together extremely well. The United Nations disaster relief organisation simply is not large enough to handle the enormous amount being handled both by British and local NGOs in Bangladesh. We have every reason to be thoroughly proud of what British NGOs and people on the ground are doing.

Ms. Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): The Minister will be aware that hundreds of thousands of British citizens have relatives who may have died, been injured or made homeless in this terrible disaster. Could she share with the House what is being done to get information to that community? Is there a helpline that they can ring? Is her Department in touch with their organisations? As she can imagine, today there must be thousands of people, especially in the east end of London, wondering, and wanting information, about their loved ones.

Mrs. Chalker: I am very well aware of that problem. Although I do not have the same size community with roots in Bangladesh in my constituency as the hon. Lady has in hers, I have many connections and friends in the same worried state as I understand her constituents must be in. As I have already outlined, our difficulty is with the telephone lines and the failure to communicate, or even to have registers of where people are. Sadly, the identification of many people who have died is not an easy process. As soon as the Government of Bangladesh can give us information, I know that they will do so, but at the moment it is very difficult. I could not envisage setting up a hot line, because the information that could come in simply might not be accurate in the confusion that still exists in Bangladesh.

Dr. John Blackburn (Dudley, West): Would my right hon. Friend pay a warm and generous tribute to the large Bangladeshi community in this country for the aid that they are going to give, and would she support them in their efforts? Secondly

Mr. Speaker: Single questions, please.

Dr. Blackburn: Well, finally, would my right hon. Friend give special attention in the long term to the importance of restoring Chittagong, which is Bangladesh's only sea port, to bring in aid and support?

Mrs. Chalker: The answer to both my hon. Friend's questions is yes.

Mr. Ernie Ross (Dundee, West): What is the Minister doing in the longer term to deal with the problem of poverty which exists in that country—poverty which is accentuated when natural disasters hit Bangladesh? For instance, when this is all over, the clearing up will start. Farmers who have lost all their crops will have to buy in seed again. What efforts is the Minister making, with the Bangladeshi Government, to ensure that those same farmers do not put themselves further into debt by having to purchase the seed that will be required?

Mrs. Chalker: Quite apart from this current disaster we have a £50 million-a-year aid programme with the Bangladeshi people, much of which is delivered through local non-governmental organisations, which are active with the farmers and have helped to set up credit unions and so on. All that will continue. Our immediate efforts must be directed towards the relief of those poor people, on tiny scraps of land, who have very little to eat and have no cover. However, I fully agree with the hon. Gentleman that, in the long term, the supply of seed for planting is important and we shall continue to support the Bangladeshi people in the way that we have done, which helps to alleviate poverty.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on her prompt, careful and caring reaction to this disaster in Bangladesh. Would she convey to those people in the ODA, the emergency relief organisations and the NGOs the thanks of this House and of all those who are suffering for their hard work over many long hours in response to this disaster? Could she make representations to the Bangladeshi Government that, in the rehabilitation process, people are moved away from the low-lying islands and offshore areas to higher ground?

Mrs. Chalker: I thank my hon. Friend for his tribute to the British NGOs, and especially to the ODA disaster relief unit, which comprises nine, not six, officials and which also has the help of many support staff, senior officials in the Department, the Ministry of Defence and the diplomatic wing officials in the work that we are now doing.

I am well aware that the rehabilitation needs will be very great. However, I do not like programmes of forcible movement unless adequate conditions can be provided. People have to be persuaded to go. I am certain that we shall discuss the relocation of people with the Government of Bangladesh, but it is much too early to say exactly how it could be achieved.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): The right hon. Lady has rightly placed emphasis on the need for international co-operation and co-ordination in this matter. In that context, what overtures have been made to, and what response received from, the American authorities about the possibility of using the substantial American presence in Diego Garcia, which could be a centre from which aid could come? Will she also tell us when she anticipates that the Fort Grange will reach Bangladesh?

Mrs. Chalker: I hope that the Fort Grange will be in Bangladesh next week, preparing the helicopters as it sails into those waters.

The question of international co-operation—including co-operation with the United States of America and any other country that has bases and likely equipment in the area—is under discussion and being pursued. Therefore, I cannot give the hon. Lady an answer.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): Does my right hon. Friend see any risk of an epidemic of cholera in the coming weeks? If so, what is the position with the provision of supplies of cholera vaccine?

Mrs. Chalker: Indeed, cholera vaccine is one of the specific recommendations from the British medical aid adviser in Dhaka. A large quantity of septrin will be sent to Bangladesh, because that drug is not readily available there. We shall also send the other urgently required medical supplies forthwith.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Has the Minister had cause to reflect on the energy and efficiency with which the British Government mobilised for war in the Gulf, and compared it with their response to the disaster in Bangladesh, which has been so dilatory and gravely disappointing? Why has more money not been made available more quickly? Why have not helicopters, amphibious craft and other equipment been redeployed from the Gulf to Bangladesh? Does the Minister understand that, so far, the Government's performance leaves many in this country and in Bangladesh thinking that they are suffering not so much from aid fatigue as from aid paralysis?

Mrs. Chalker: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman was listening to the careful answer that I tried to give his right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) about the weather conditions. In recent days, they have made the use of craft already in Bangladesh impossible. The vehicles to get the goods to the people are available in Bangladesh, but the weather conditions have made the task difficult.

The hon. Gentleman brings totally non-comparable factors into his argument. We are not in a war, as we have recently been, but we are dealing with one of the most severe of natural disasters, to which all countries of the world need to respond. That is why all the partners in the flood action plans, and all the partners in the UN agencies, should be seeking to contribute as much as Britain. If they had all done their bit, the people of Bangladesh would already be in a far better state.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): Is it not rather sad that such a great tragedy should be the subject of party political claptrap? Is my right hon. Friend aware that she was extremely sensible not to waste resources by swanning off on a personal public relations exercise? She should be congratulated on that.

My right hon. Friend told us that Britain's contribution was the largest. What efforts are being made in the EC to persuade some of our partners to step up their contributions, given that they are so good at sermonising on the subject?

Mrs. Chalker: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his realism. Our German partners have contributed DM 15 million of assistance. Our Danish partners——

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): That is more than us.

Mrs. Chalker: No, it is not more than us. The hon. Gentleman cannot calculate. At today's rate of exchange, that is £5·068 million. Other countries have contributed various sums, but none as large as Britain's contribution. The French contribution in which my hon. Friend is interested amounts in pounds to £1·18 million only.

Ms. Mildred Gordon (Bow and Poplar): Perhaps the Minister would explain to her hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant) that the reason why there might be some political divide on the matter is that Opposition Members represent large numbers of constituents with relatives who are suffering. While Conservative Members are busy congratulating the Government, our constituents are extremely worried that comparatively little help has been sent, while there is so much hardware in the Gulf that could be used even in bad weather conditions. What international arrangements are being considered for earlier warnings of possible floods? It happens repeatedly and is obviously an international issue as warnings must come from higher up the Ganges. Other countries must be involved, so that steps can be taken to protect people and to evacuate them in good time.

Mrs. Chalker: The hon. Lady is quite unfair in what she says about my hon. Friends and their relations with Bangladeshi friends and constituents. I made it quite clear in answer to a previous question that I have already been in touch with Bangladeshi friends. I am just as concerned as she is, but the reason why I will not throw the British taxpayers' money into an aircraft which cannot get to its destination is prudence—not stupidity or unwillingness but prudence. The money has been put up and we know that we can use it to help the Bangladeshi people, and that is exactly right.

Sir John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): While we are all most sympathetic to the appalling tragedy in Bangladesh and are grateful for the lead that the Government have given, and for the support of other Governments and private individuals to alleviate the suffering there, we must ask ourselves whether we should be discussing the matter as we have no control over it and no responsibilty for it. Furthermore, should we not fix our own agenda in our discussions here, rather than using that fixed by the television companies?

Mrs. Chalker: I can assure my hon. Friend that we do fix our own agenda. However, when so many people are in need, I believe it absolutely right, first, that the world should be told by the media what is going on, and, secondly, that the British Government, in partnership with other donors, should do their best to play their part in relieving the tragedy affecting those people. I and the Government will continue to make sure that that happens. There are tragedies all over the world and whether they are natural disasters or the man-made effects of conflict in places such as Ethiopia and Sudan, we have a moral duty to help the people involved.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): The Minister should be aware that many of my constituents, all British taxpayers, are deeply concerned, because of their family ties, about the scale of the tragedy in Bangladesh. They feel, as I do, that the British Government's response so far has not shown the necessary urgency or generosity. Will she reconsider the point that has been raised on several occasions about the need for helicopters? Will she give us a guarantee that, if the Bangladesh Government or responsible non-governmental organisations request the assistance of British helicopters, those helicopters will be sent?

Mrs. Chalker: I have already said that the important thing is to get the aid that the Bangladeshi Government can use to its destination as quickly as possible. That was why, yesterday, I made an approach to the Thai Government, knowing that the Bangladeshi Government —[AN HON. MEMBER: "Why only yesterday?"] I was only told yesterday. The Bangladeshi Government had requested nearby helicopters. The point of doing that work in a logical and sensible way is that we do not waste resources and that we get them to the people who need them. There is no lack of urgency in my Department or in the Government. It is a question of what is practical in some of the worst weather conditions ever in the bay of Bengal.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): May I remind my right hon. Friend that many Conservative Members also have Bangladeshi constituents? We commend her for her vigorous and effective efforts to help their relatives. Does she agree that her comparisons with the Gulf war are very useful? It took six months to build up the troops for the Gulf war and more than 30 countries were more than actively involved. Should there not be an international reaction to such disasters, instead of the British Government being well out ahead but leading a somewhat straggling pack?

Mrs. Chalker: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I thank her for what she said at the beginning of her question. It was notable that we had time—not that we wanted it—to build up our forces and stocks and make the necessary assessments and other preparations to free Kuwait from the invasion of Saddam Hussein and his troops. My hon. Friend is also right to say that more than double the number of countries were involved in the Gulf conflict as have made any attempt to help in the present crisis. We need a better international response but, until we have one, we are pleased to continue to do our best and to take the lead where we can.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): The Minister says that she has the support of the Prime Minister, the Chancellor and the Chief Secretary. Is the £6·5 million to which she referred—that is only 40p a head for each person affected—new money to her Department or does it come from her existing budget? If it is from her existing budget, is not money being snatched from one area of need to help people in another?

Mrs. Chalker: I assure the right hon. Gentleman that no current aid activity is being displaced or delayed by the £6·5 million expenditure and that £1·2 million of the 10 million ecu aid package announced by the EC and the balance of £5·3 million are from our disaster relief funds. As yet, those funds are uncommitted and are specially kept in the budget. We are well aware of the pressure of having three simultaneous disasters on our hands. I am not afraid to ask for new money when it is necessary but, until I have used my budget, I cannot make as good a case as I can when I have used it. Given the response that I received for £20 million for another disaster last week, I have no doubt that I shall receive an equally generous response from my right hon. Friend.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Did my right hon. Friend hear that there is a great deal of comment about taxpayers' money and Government expenditure on aid? Does she agree that the British Government have done extremely well to be at the forefront of providing that money? However, does she also agree that, although money could be made available through voluntary contributions, it would not be a bad idea for those who can afford it—there may be more such people than realise it—to give as much as 5 or 10 per cent. of their net salary for this month to help the people in Bangladesh and also those in Africa and Iraq?

Mrs. Chalker: I believe that no public are as generous as the British when it comes to giving money for people in need. That is why the British Government have taken measures every year in our budgets to make it easier for people to donate funds, and more beneficial for voluntary agencies to carry out such splendid work. I hope that the British public will respond to the current appeals. The Government will back the people in responding to the needs of those who have been so badly affected overseas.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): Does the Minister accept that she is protesting too much to the House and not enough to the Treasury? If she is addressing the three areas of crisis that she mentioned, why do we read in this morning's newspapers that undernourished children in Ethiopia are having their supplementary food rations halved because donors have not provided the necessary food? Why could she not answer the simple question that was asked on television last night, about whether Britain has donated the 0·7 per cent. of GNP that virtually every other European country has given? Is she not ashamed that Britain has donated only 0·31 per cent. in the light of the crisis that she has outlined?

Mrs. Chalker: I hope, Mr. Speaker, that you will allow me to respond to the point that the hon. Gentleman raised on the Ogaden, although it lies outside the scope of this statement. I, too, saw with horror this morning's newspaper report about the specific problem in the Ogaden. I gather that it is partly a delivery problem, but we are looking into the matter with the non-governmental agencies, and I shall ensure that the food that we have already put in the pipeline is destined for such districts. That is exactly what the World Food Programme in Addis Ababa is seeking to do at present.

On the hon. Gentleman's other point, which is regularly raised, we have to gain the support of the British people, which now exists, for a higher percentage, and seek to make the aid programme grow in real terms. That is exactly what my predecessors and I have sought to do, and I hope that we will achieve that aim.

Mr. Michael Lord (Suffolk, Central): Is it not the sad truth, which we are all loth to accept, that sometimes the forces of nature are so overpowering that there is nothing that man can do in the short term to combat them? While the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd), I am sure, cares as much about that as we all do, there is little point in suggesting that we provide shovels to plant seed on ground that is still many feet under water.

I thank my right hon. Friend for her statement to the House, which shows real purpose on the part of the Government. Will she assure us once again that we shall do all we can in the short term and stand ready to give the right help in the right place when it is needed?

Mrs. Chalker: My hon. Friend is right to say that the forces of nature are quite terrifying and cannot necessarily be coped with in the short term. That is why we have been supporting work towards the convention on climate change, under which we hope that all countries will take steps to limit their emissions of greenhouse gases, which cause global warming and make the difficulties experienced by such low-lying districts all the worse. We pledged £40 million in 1990 to help the global environmental facility work, which will help countries such as Bangladesh.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): May I reiterate the points made by my hon. Friends about the urgency of the position in Bangladesh, where hundreds of thousands of lives are at risk? While the weather is obviously very bad at present and makes it difficult for helicopters to get through to the offshore islands, that is no excuse for not getting helicopters to Bangladesh so that they can then be used when the weather gets better. Clearly, the Ministry of Defence has at its disposal all the helicopters necessary, but they have to be placed in position. Will the Minister make arrangements to get the helicopters there immediately so that the relief aid can be provided?

Mrs. Chalker: I remain firmly convinced that we must work with the Government of Bangladesh on the plans that they are making for the provision of food, medicine and shelter. We shall be guided by the information that we receive from them, and from our aid co-ordinators on the ground. We shall put in all the aid we can, in conjunction with other countries—the problem cannot be left to Britain alone.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): Does my right hon. Frend accept, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) said, that the staff of the non-governmental organisations and the Overseas Development Administration deserve congratulations for coping with this and the other two great disasters, which are prompting urgent and effective action from private individuals, the national Government and multilateral agencies? Is my right hon. Friend aware that, if she needs to come back to the House for approval for extra money to be added to her budget during the year, she will receive a great welcome from both sides of the House? Other people would like her to be successful in achieving movement towards the 0·7 per cent. of GDP target, preferably in a planned, co-ordinated and urgent approach.

Mrs. Chalker: I am certainly aware of the excellent work of the NGO and ODA staff. I thank my hon. Friend for what he said in the second part of his question, and I am glad that I shall have his support.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): My hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross) made a plea on behalf of Bangladeshi farmers. I should like to make a similar plea on behalf of the fishermen—[Laughter.]—the Bangladeshi fishermen—and it is no laughing matter. Many of these people lost their lives along with their boats and fishing gear. With regard to their colleagues who lost boats and gear, will the Minister discuss with her European Community colleagues the urgent need for replacements? Surely, in the maritime communities of the EC, there must be up to 1,000 boats suitable for use by these fishermen, who should not be saddled with heavy loans for the purchase of vessels. The EC and its fishing communities ought to be able to help.

Mrs. Chalker: I certainly note what the hon. Gentleman has said, and we shall consider it. The most important thing is that the Bangladeshi fishermen should be able, when the weather improves, to regain their livelihood. I fully appreciate the importance of the hon. Gentleman's remarks.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Was the hon. Member present for the statement?

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Very well.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: I understand your resting between questions, Mr. Speaker. Certainly I do so at times.

Does my right hon. Friend agree that, while nature can never be entirely stopped, we can spend money, on super-computers and satellites? The better we can forecast tragedies, the better our chance of saving lives. If we could stop nature, we should be better than any god or any David Icke. If money were spent on forecasting, it would help to save human life, which is what we are all most concerned about.

Mrs. Chalker: I fully agree with my hon. Friend about the importance of satellite warning systems. I understand that the people of the area were given two to three days' warning of the cyclone but that, sadly, some of them were unwilling to move.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Some could not.

Mrs. Chalker: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right: some were unable to move. However much satellite warning is given, the machinery has to be in place locally if people are to be able to move; and they have to be willing to move. One cannot make people move, and that can result in great tragedy.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: I shall try to call hon. Members who are standing—not those who have been meditating. I hope that questions and answers will be brief, as there is a very heavy day ahead of us. Mr. Nellist.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): There is a business motion.

Mr. Speaker: Do not argue, please.

Mr. Nellist: All I said was that there is a business motion.

Did not the Minister see last night's television news, which reported that, according to aid agencies, more than 500,000 people in Bangladesh had lost their lives, and more than 10 million had been made homeless? It has been announced that two additional Sea King helicopters are to be provided, but a total of 11 helicopters is completely pathetic. In the case of the Gulf, a huge task force was mobilised for the sake of oil. In the case of Bangladesh, where there is no oil, all that the Minister can say is that contact with those who have helicopters is under discussion.

Will not the Minister recognise that, if the cycle of drought, flood, famine and cyclones—decade after decade—is to be broken, she and her Department will have to consider not only the removal of poverty from that country but also the solution of the debt problem? The amount of money coming back to the west in this way each year is greater than the amount that goes out to tackle disasters.

Mrs. Chalker: I am glad to be able to say that international concern can be expressed at the long-term consultative group in Paris at the end of this month. The major donor agencies will be able to discuss what might need to be done for the future. I hope that those who estimate that more than 500,000 people have died are exaggerating. The Government of Bangladesh said today that they believed the number to be in the region of 200,000, but it will be quite some time before we know.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Whatever the figures, the Minister will accept that the disaster for Bangladesh is worse in terms of deaths, disease and homelessness than the events in Kuwait and Iraq over the last year. Given that, may I put it to her that the House and, I believe, Bangladeshis, wherever they are in the world, expect Britain, because of our historic ties with that country, to lead the mobilisation of the western world to go to the rescue of Bangladesh now? We have the capacity to do so. The west has the ships, the aircraft, the helicopters, the personnel and the skill to do so. Next week will not be soon enough.

Mrs. Chalker: If anyone has lost a loved one in a disaster, or has someone crippled by disease, for that family and that person that is the deepest tragedy. Whatever the total numbers, if we add them up across the whole world, it is a sad world in which we live. I hope that the efforts that we are already making to mobilise the western world will succeed, but I repeat that Britain is playing its part and will go on doing so. What I want is support from our partners and others who can also contribute and not leave it all to Britain.

Mr. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East): The Minister has acknowledged the contribution made by members of the Bangladeshi community in Britain. She will know of initiatives in various cities by the Bangladeshi community. One problem is co-ordinating such initiatives. Can she offer any assistance to the various groups, such as Indian restaurants run by Bangladeshis in Manchester, who do not know where to send their contributions? Should it be done through the high commission for Bangladesh or through her Department?

Mrs. Chalker: I think that the best thing is to make the contributions to the aid agencies which are already working in Bangladesh. Concern, Save the Children Fund, CARE Britain, the Catholic Fund for Overseas Development, Y-Care, and, I believe, Christian Aid and Action Aid have already set up operations. In addition, the British Red Cross has put money into the Bangladeshi Red Crescent. All those organisations are worthy of support. Those who wish to donate should donate cash to those organisations, because many of the goods which are needed by the people are available locally in the region. Putting cash into the region is helpful to it, as the hon. Gentleman understands. That is better than sending goods which may or may not be suitable in Muslim communities.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): I accept that the Minister and her Department are doing the best they can in the face of the great series of tragedies, within the constraints of Government policy. Does she find it as distasteful as I do, when turning on the television at night, to see desperate, starving people and often in the same bulletin, to see her parliamentary colleagues calling for tax cuts, tax cuts, tax cuts? Will she accept that many people in my constituency, and no doubt many who support her party, would willingly pay higher taxes if they could be sure that the money would be used to help the people in the desperate situation that we see on television every night?

Mrs. Chalker: One reason that this Government have made sure that it is easier for people to give has been their willingness to forgo tax so that people may donate to worthwhile causes. I can think of no more worthwhile causes than the people who are suffering from the Bangladeshi floods, the people suffering in Africa and the people suffering from the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait and from the penalisation of Kurdish people in Iraq. They are all worthy causes. Of course, there are many more besides.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): The ODA is trying to deal with three major disasters. I understand that it deals normally with about 90 disasters a year. It does not have the resources to handle all that. There are six officials in the disaster unit; I believe that the staff have been increased because of the Kurdish problem. The ODA needs more resources from the Treasury. Only in that way can we begin to handle the problems as they should be handled.

Mrs. Chalker: To correct the hon. Gentleman, there are nine officials and their support staff. [An HON. MEMBER: "For how long?"] There have been nine officials for some weeks. We have been drawing on our professional advisory resources, on senior officials, on the Ministry of Defence and on the diplomatic wing, as I made clear in answer to an earlier question. We are coping very well, but the pressure is great. I am deeply grateful to my staff, many of whom have been working enormous hours, all weekends and all hours of the night. They deserve the House's congratulations, not some of the more mean-minded comments that I have heard over the past two weeks.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Should not the ludicrous procedure whereby the Ministry of Defence invoices the Overseas Development Administration for the use of military equipment be terminated immediately? What possible justification can there be for taking money out of the ODA's stretched budget and putting it into the Ministry of Defence's budget? How can the Minister possibly justify that? Will she terminate it immediately?

Mrs. Chalker: I would that I could change all the things that the hon. Gentleman thinks desirable and, even better, those which I think desirable, as quickly as he makes the case for doing so. It is right that we should calculate the proper cost, but I am looking for ways to assist our relief efforts. We find it most convenient on some occasions to use the Ministry of Defence and, on others, to use private chartered aircraft to carry our goods where they are needed.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): In the longer term, will the Government organise trips by contractors to Bangladesh—as they have done to Kuwait—to ensure that, in the future, there are adequate flood defence measures—or at least an attempt to provide them—so that such a tragedy is unlikely to be repeated? Will the Government provide real money for such facilities?

They could perhaps think of using the ability, technology and techniques of workers in this country to preserve and develop lives in Bangladesh instead of pouring away £10,000 million on Trident nuclear weapons. Most people recognise that the priority of preserving life is better than the preparation for destruction.

Mrs. Chalker: I have been very pleased to acknowledge the work of British engineering firms, consultants and others in the Bangladesh flood action plan work, which has now been going on for some time. We have always supported British companies in doing that work, and we shall continue to do so. I hope that the action will provide work for people in this country, but I cannot deny that I believe that it is absolutely right that, where British companies can do good work abroad, they should be helped to do so and should be given the contracts in order for them to gain work so that people in this country may have employment.

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): It appears from the view expressed by some Conservative Members that they doubt the Government's responsibility. Does the hon. Lady agree that some countries, especially this one, exploited Bangladesh to create their wealth over the years? Therefore, does she agree that there should be no consideration of limited aid to Bangladesh at this time?

Mrs. Chalker: I get the firm impression that the hon. Gentleman is living in the past. Bangladesh is a very poor country, and it has always been poor. Year after year, this country has sought to help Bangladesh. Our annual aid programme is £50 million, and this year our aid to Bangladesh is already much higher, because we shall continue to help that country once the flood waters have subsided.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): In an earlier reply, when comparing the Government's response in Kuwait to their response in Bangladesh, the Minister said that we were not at war. Many of us think that we should be at war—at war against poverty and against disasters in areas such as Bangladesh. As such disasters are, tragically, likely to continue to occur around the world, could we not benefit from the peace dividend by converting a significant proportion of our armed forces into a disaster response force? The forces have the material and the skills which could be put to such great use in a disaster area such as Bangladesh or elsewhere.

Mrs. Chalker: I thought that the hon. Gentleman was already aware that we had increased our poverty alleviation measures throughout the world and intend to continue to do so. No one could be more grateful than I to the British officers and men who work in various places in the world to alleviate the awful problems that countries face. They do not work only in the well publicised and sudden disasters: British troops go anywhere and everywhere to help when they are needed.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is the Minister aware that nothing characterises the Government more than their attitude to war, their patriotism and jingoism and their attitude to the starving thousands and millions throughout the world? Would not she be better displaced today and on other occasions when there is a need for Government money if the budget had been increased to 0·7 per cent. of GNP? Is it not a fact that we live in a society based on the entrepreneurialism of the Tories, in which Gazza can be sold for £8·5 million while we have a paltry £6·5 million for the Bangladeshis?

Mrs. Chalker: I am glad to say that I have no responsibility for Gazza. I do not intend, in the hon. Gentleman's word, to be displaced. Some of the best entrepreneurs among many of my friends and acquaintances have come from southern Asian countries such as Bangladesh, India and Pakistan. They are among the best entrepreneurs we have.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): May I ask the Minister a question of which I gave her office notice this morning, about the long term, and especially about the flood action plan to which she referred in her statement? What consideration is being given to the effects of global warming on the snows? Will she call into her office Dr. Houghton and Dr. Keith Browning of the Meteorological Office for a considered opinion about the effects of the Kuwait oil fires which are apparently affecting the snows of the Himalayas? We read this morning that the effect has now reached as far as west China. She should ask about the effect on the Bangladeshis of what happens in the upper areas of the great rivers.

Mrs. Chalker: I know that the hon. Gentleman agrees with me that Saddam Hussein's action in setting fire to the oil wells of Kuwait was environmental vandalism of the worst order. I cannot predict with any certainty the environmental consequences for the Indian sub-continent or wherever else there may be difficulties. However, I assure the hon. Gentleman that we are studying the emerging scientific work with great care. The immediate priority for my Department is to bring urgent relief to those affected by the awful cyclone and the continuing bad weather, but I shall ensure that our chief natural resources adviser is made fully aware of the hon. Gentleman's question and that we use all the information available to us from scientific sources to pursue the matter.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): Last but not least, Mr. Speaker. I am grateful to you for leaving me until last. I usually walk up and down the stairs to my office three times a day for exercise but the exercise that I have had in the past hour and 10 minutes will save me the trouble today.

Will the Minister allow me the pleasure of simplifying her statement for her? One hour and seven minutes into answering questions on her statement, all that she has announced is a miserable, inadequate £2 million additional money for the NGOs and an extra two helicopters some time next week. Everything else is under discussion. That reflects the level of the Government's concern about the plight of the Bangladeshis. Will she answer the question put to her by the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Sir D. Steel) on behalf of the Liberal Democrats? Has the Ministry of Defence sent to her office an account for the use of the vessel that is to go to Bangladesh? If it has, does she support the transfer of overseas aid to the defence budget?

Mrs. Chalker: I will use overseas development resources to help the people of Bangladesh. I shall use not only what has already been announced and what was announced last week and today, but any other resources that are necessary.

The hon. Gentleman does not understand—I do not blame him for that—the way in which Government financing and accounting works. If the hon. Gentleman believes that the resources of one Department are just handed over to another, he is much mistaken, and he would have been mistaken in his own Government, in which he served for a while. The resources that are necessary for the Bangladeshi people will be provided, but they must not be provided just by the British people; they must be provided by the whole international community.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Is the Minister aware that we are disappointed that many of the questions asked last Thursday have still not been answered today, nearly a week later? I refer to questions about the deployment of the Royal Navy and the Royal Marines with sophisticated communications, helicopters and boats, as requested by the Government of Bangladesh, as a Tory Government did in 1970 in response to a similar disaster. It is no use hiding under the excuse of the weather, because, in another area last week, the Minister blamed the European Community and she had to confess her error on that as well.

Will the right hon. Lady admit, as many of my right hon. and hon. Friends have said today, that the charge that the Ministry of Defence makes would devastate an already inadequate ODA budget? Will she now stand up with some courage at the Dispatch Box and say that she will get the Chancellor—at least she will ask the Chancellor—to agree the additional funds to the ODA to cover the cost of all necessary military personnel and equipment to deal with this emergency?

As you know particularly, Mr. Speaker, we have a special responsibility to Bangladesh as a Commonwealth country to lead the aid effort. We have not just a moral responsibility to act both speedily and generously, but, following the elections in February, which I had the privilege of attending, a responsibility to underpin the democracy that now exists in Bangladesh.

Mrs. Chalker: Nobody is more glad than I that Bangladesh now has a democracy. We obviously must help the Government of that country, who are very new and very inexperienced, to carry through the work that they are seeking to do. That Government obviously have no experience of disaster co-ordination, but their army has, and that is why it has now been called in to play a central role in alleviation.

I am, and I hope I always will be, a realist about what can be done. I believe that more resources are necessary in these exceptional circumstances, but, however helpful he might think his comments are, the hon. Gentleman must leave to me the approaches that I have made, and continue to make, for the resources that I need to carry out my job efficiently.

Points of Order

4.42 pm

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I seek your guidance on a serious and perplexing matter relating to European Community Standing Committees A and B. I am deeply concerned about those Committees and, inter alia, their modus operandi. This morning, European Community Standing Committee B was adjourned after about 16 minutes—the Minister may confirm that—among some confusion and irritation felt by Committee members. The Chairman of the Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Cumbernauld and Kilsyth (Mr. Hogg), with characteristic courtesy and good sense, agreed to the adjournment of the Committee.

The irritation this morning was caused by, among other things, the dismally late production of the documents that were to be considered by Committee members. Growing anger and concern are being felt by the permanent members of European Community Standing Committee B about the way in which it is treated in terms of, first, the disgracefully short notice of its meetings and, secondly, the unacceptably late production of the documents.

In addition, I am given to understand that Standing Order No. 102 governing such Committees is to be changed, with no consultation whatsoever with the permanent members of the Committee. You know, Mr. Speaker, that those Committees are engaged in very important work—the consideration of draft directives, regulations and other paraphernalia flowing from Brussels. We deserve at the very least some guidance on this disquieting matter.

Mr. Speaker: I am well aware that documents were not available this morning. I have allowed the hon. Gentleman to raise his point of order at some length, because it is important that the matters that he raised are on the record for the Leader of the House to deal with tomorrow, as they are matters for him. Does the Minister wish to say something?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry and Consumer Affairs (Mr. Edward Leigh): Perhaps it might help the House if I explain what happened and the circumstances. The explanatory memoranda from the Department were made available to the Vote Office when they were published last October and February.

Last week, the report of the Select Committee was delivered to the European unit of the Department of Trade and Industry on Friday. On the next working day, which was Tuesday morning, those papers were delivered to the parliamentary unit at 10.45. There were 100 documents to be photocopied, and they were photocopied. They were delivered to the Hallkeeper's Lodge at 1.15. Those who delivered them were assured by those who work in the Hallkeeper's Lodge that they would be put on the letter board, and I am assured that they were put on the letter board. Therefore, those documents were available to hon. Members by lunchtime yesterday.

If there has been any fault, I am entirely responsible, and I apologise to the House. I have given instructions that in future, even if reports or documents are late coming from Select Committees, the DTI should deliver its documents to hon. Members a full five working days before the Committee meets. I apologise to the House. I am responsible, not my officials.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Not the same point of order?

Mr. Nicholls: My point of order concerns your responsibility for the accuracy of our proceedings, Mr. Speaker. It arises out of early-day motion 775, which is entitled "Alternative to Council Tax" and sets out the inadequacies in Labour's plans. Today's Votes and Proceedings state that 53 of my hon. Friends have also signed it. The difficulty is that the list now includes also the name of the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden).

The implications of that are really quite difficult. If the hon. Gentleman now wants to join myself and my hon. Friends, it may be the start of a long overdue process of conversion. Having seen the hon. Gentleman perform in the House over a number of years, I doubt whether he has undergone a conversion. I think that he has probably been slightly careless in signing early-day motions.

The problem is that we know from the proceedings in the House yesterday that you were able to quote for us from "Erskine May" and point out that, in normal circumstances, obvious mistakes can be corrected. One must simply assume that the addition of the name of the hon. Member for Bradford, West is an obvious mistake. The difficulty is that that view may not have any consensus within the House, because we know that the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) has been complaining loudly about any change to the record whatsoever.

Is there any consensus about what should be done? Have we any way of finding out whether the hon. Gentleman is a convert to the cause or, in the interests of ensuring that the record stays how Opposition Members want it to stay, should it remain as a standing reproach to the hon. Member for Bradford, West?

Mr. Speaker: I have had no intimation from the hon. Member concerned that he has complained about this matter. It may be a mistake; it may not. No doubt we shall hear that tomorrow.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Have you had any intimation from the Department of Trade and Industry or from the Ministry of Defence that they would have wished to have made a statement this afternoon on the news that emerged after 12 o'clock this afternoon, the latest time for raising Standing Order No. 20 debates, that Rolls-Royce is to axe a further 3,000 jobs in Coventry, Bristol, Derby and elsewhere?

I realise that it is possible—I shall try to do so tomorrow—to raise with the Leader of the House the possibility of a debate on this matter, but thousands of anguished families throughout the country will be worried about why those Departments are not at least liaising with that company to talk about diversification and the guaranteeing of jobs, particularly on the day when we hear how air transport is sorely needed all over the world to cope with disasters. Have those Departments approached you, Mr. Speaker, about making a statement to the House about those disgraceful redundancies?

Mr. Speaker: I understand that this news broke after 12 o'clock, which is when I consider such matters. I have not had any information since that time. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman raises this matter at business questions tomorrow, when I am sure that he will get an answer; what he has said will undoubtedly be reported to the Leader of the House.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I understand that, during my brief absence from the Chamber, a Conservative Member with nothing better to do drew attention to the fact that my name appears on early-day motion 775. I am pleased to inform you that that was a mistake and that the Table Office is kindly making arrangements to withdraw my name.

Mr. Speaker: I am not surprised to be given that information.

Asylum Seekers and Refugees

4.50 pm

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the law to facilitate the safe entry into the United Kingdom of asylum seekers and their families; to provide a right of appeal against refusal of entry, and a right of independent representation; to make administrative provision for the resettlement of asylum seekers, refugees and their families; and for connected purposes.

The Bill would change the way in which asylum seekers and refugees are dealt with in this country. They are not well dealt with now and it is time to change our approach to them.

The 1951 convention on refugees, which was agreed at Geneva in July 1951, defines a refugee as "someone who, owing to a well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership of a political social group, or political opinion is outside the country of his nationality and is unable or, owing to such fear, is unwilling to avail himself of the protection of that country."

That was what was agreed after the second world war about those seeking political asylum. Since then, the issue has grown in importance throughout the world. Much of what is written in the newspapers deliberately exaggerates the number of cases in this country in which political asylum is being sought. However, like other European countries, I believe that this country deliberately tries to foist the refugee problem on to other much poorer countries. The largest number of refugees are not in western Europe, but in the poorest countries, such as India, Jordan, Mexico and other places near to considerable conflict.

In the past 11 years, there have been 83,000 applications for political asylum in this country, of which only 13,000 have been granted, with 17,000 being given exceptional leave to remain, which is a sort of halfway house. At least 15,000 applications for political asylum are outstanding.

The purpose of my Bill is to alter the procedures in order to speed them up and to make the system much fairer. The current law on immigration and refugees is unfair and contrary to the general principles of English law in that it has a presumption against rather than in favour of the applicant, as is the case in civil or criminal law.

The Bill has three main proposals. The first is the creation of a refugee protection agency, which would have the job of deciding requests for refugee status, of ensuring that the people carrying out the interviews are properly trained in psychological as well as normal interviewing techniques, and of providing independent interpreters to undertake the translation of the interviews. All decisions would have to be conveyed in writing to the applicant within three months of the initial application. At present, many applications take several years, which often means great hardship for the applicant and his or her family who are often unable to come to this country to join the applicant.

The Bill's second proposal is the creation of a refugee review board, which would hear all appeals before anyone could be removed from this country. A majority of the board's appointed members would have to make a decision against the applicant being granted refugee status for there to be any decision against the applicant. At the board, any applicant would have the right to legal aid. Again, the decision would be taken within three months.

If the board were in operation now, last week's disgraceful incident involving a Zairean refugee could not have occurred. Despite representations from my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), that refugee was bundled out of the country and is now back in Zaire. We do not know his fate.

There was another scandalous case not long ago in which a Kurdish person from Turkey, Shiho Iyuguven, was denied the right to asylum in this country and was subsequently removed, despite strong representations from myself and many others. That applicant refused to go and subsequently took his own life in a horrific and successful suicide attempt at Harmondsworth detention centre. Those are just two of the many cases in which people have been removed from this country against their will and are put in considerable danger if they return to the country from which they came. If they go to a third country, their families are often put at considerable risk of retribution from the oppressive regime that they sought to leave.

The third part of my Bill provides for the introduction of a charter of rights for asylum seekers and refugees in this country. The decision on whether someone should be admitted to this country is that of central Government. Nobody seeks political asylum lightly. Nobody leaves his own country lightly, even if running away from considerable danger. We have a responsibility to treat the people who are admitted into this country humanely and decently. I find it sad when highly motivated groups of people from Somalia, Zaire, Iran, Iraq and central and south America find that, having sought asylum here, they are unable to work because no decision has been made on their right to work. They also find great difficulty in getting housing and are allowed to receive only 90 per cent. of the income support or social security benefit for which they have applied.

My proposed charter of rights would include a right to housing and education and access to the social services. It would also place a responsibility on central Government to ensure that sufficient resources are given to the predominantly inner-city local authorities that are doing their best to provide the necessary services to support people who have sought political asylum. There is something wholly wrong when people who have fled in fear of persecution end up begging for support from churches and charities simply to make ends meet when, as other European Governments have accepted, it should be the responsibility of central Government to provide the local authorities with the necessary finance so that they can provide the housing and education that are so valuable and necessary for those who have sought political asylum.

The charter of rights would also provide for the right of family reunion. Nothing can be more devastating than family separation. Last Friday an asylum applicant from Somalia visited my surgery. He was desperate with worry and concern about his family because he does not know where they are. He is having great difficulty communicating with them and it is unsafe for him even to write to them because of the retribution that might be meted out. He is the sort of person whose family should have the right to come to this country so that they can join him in some safety.

We live in an age when, tragically, racism and xenophobia are on the rise again in Europe. I have a feeling that the Government's approach to this matter, through the Trevi group, which we set up to deal with terrorist attempts throughout Europe but which has now turned itself into a secret organisation dealing also with immigration and refugee policy, has been to agree to adopt a refugee policy in Europe that relies on the lowest common denominator and tries to push the refugee problem elsewhere—never mind the fact that European countries have consistently supported the oppressive regimes, such as that in Iraq, which have forced many people to seek political asylum in the first place. The 1990 Dublin convention is also unfortunate because it exempts people's right to apply to the European Court of Human Rights for justice in cases where they have been denied the right to political asylum.

My Bill also seeks to amend the Immigration (Carriers' Liability) Act 1987, a disgraceful piece of legislation which seeks to fine carriers for bringing into this country people who are not subsequently legally admitted. Last year £6 million was collected in fines under that Act. It means that people seeking political asylum have to pay extortionate air fares to cover the fine that the carrier has to pay if those people are not subsequently admitted to this country. I have met people from Turkey who have encountered that.

That militates against legitimate seekers of political asylum. I pay a warm tribute to the churches and voluntary organisations which have done so much to support people seeking political asylum in this country. I mention especially the Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants and its general secretary, Ann Owers, and the British Refugee Council, and Jessica Yudelivich who provided much of the information that forms the basis of the Bill.

Nobody in this country has ever woken up in the morning to a military coup or has had his family taken into custody. No one has ever found himself in the position of having no rights of free expression or movement. No one has ever had to leave Britain, probably never to return. We have a responsibility to recognise that those who suffer such fates and who seek political asylum receive justice when they seek safety in this country.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Does the hon. Gentleman seek to oppose the motion?

Mr. Howarth: I do indeed, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I oppose the Bill with some hesitation because the House was kind enough last week to give me leave to introduce my National Enterprise (Reconstruction) Board Bill.

The whole premise of the measure is to make it easier for yet more foreigners to be admitted for settlement in our overcrowded kingdom. Its other premise is that the Government are lacking in humanity and are mean. The nation and the Government have no need whatever to be ashamed of their performance in this area because we have an honourable record of responding to the needs of others. Those of us who have been in the Chamber for the past one and a half hours heard my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development set out at length Britain's response to the latest natural disaster in Bangladesh. As she said, we are among the first and largest donors and that is indicative of the measure and nature of our response.

There are many other examples showing the support that the United Kingdom, its people and its Government have given to others in need in recent years. The Government have put our forces at the disposal of relief organisations in countries such as Ethiopia which have suffered from famine. Our people have dug deeply into their pockets and I am sick and tired of listening to Opposition Members constantly urging people to give more while they do nothing. The Opposition do not dig into their own pockets but they constantly ask the Chancellor to do something, as though he had money of his own upon which he could draw. The Chancellor can draw only upon our money.

A further example of the United Kingdom's humanity was the admission of the Ugandan Asians when they were being persecuted by Idi Amin. Vietnamese boat people have also been admitted and the House recently sanctioned a measure to allow 50,000 Hong Kong Chinese to settle in the United Kingdom. That worthy record shows that over many years the Government have responded sympathetically, often in the face of opposition from our people who resented some of the measures.

Let us look at our record on the acceptance of asylum seekers. In 1987, 460 were accepted. In 1988 the figure was 970 and in 1989 the number accepted for settlement had risen to 3,000. Between 1979 and 1989 some 34,000 people were allowed to stay in this country and a further 17,800 were allowed to remain here under exceptional leave arrangements.

It is a matter of great concern that applications are rising alarmingly. In 1989 there were 15,500 applications and I understand that last year, for which no official figures are yet available, there were getting on for 30,000 applications. That is 20 times the number of people who applied in 1979. Opposition Members should not lecture us about humanity, because our record in these matters is good.

We deplore the Governments and systems of government in many countries and, since the demise of the much-maligned great British Empire, most countries probaby fall into that category. Under the inspiring and determined leadership of my right hon. Friend the Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher), this country became a place to which people from all over the world wished to beat a path. [Interruption.] That is because of the liberal regime that operates here, and the freedom of expression that Opposition Members seek to deny me. This is a great country to which people from all over the world are anxious to come. However, these overcrowded islands simply cannot become some kind of safe haven for the world's opposition parties. It is enough that it harbours its own Opposition.

We owe it to our constituents to take their concerns into account. There is no point in Opposition Members wearing their hearts on their sleeves and engaging in the sanctimonious humbug that has emanated from the Opposition all afternoon. The money that is sought is that of our constituents. Opposition Members who visit working men's clubs and pubs will find that people are perfectly prepared to pay into voluntary funds organised by the relief agencies. However, they resent Opposition politicians taking money out of their pockets and preening themselves on how concerned and caring they have been.

We cannot be expected to sort out the consequences of everyone else's civil wars, corruption and socialist economic mismanagement. However, the Bill must be seen in the wider context of immigration policy generally. That was mentioned by the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn). The Bill is Labour's Trojan horse by means of which they want to effect a policy of uncontrolled immigration, trading on the good will of the British people to accommodate those who have found affliction and oppression abroad.

There is deep resentment in my constituency about a story which appeared last week about an Asian family with seven children who arrived here knowing just one word of English—house. They were instantly housed ahead of people, taxpayers, who had been on the housing list for many years. Labour's policy is to encourage such immigration. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is entitled to express his view.

Mr. Howarth: A fine cartoon by Jak in the Evening Standard found its way to the Express and Star in my area. It shows an Asian family queuing at the immigration desk and uttering three words in English—"G band house"—reflecting the new council tax arrangements. During the last Labour Government's five years of office about 250,000 new Commonwealth citizens were admitted to the United Kingdom for settlement. That was about 50,000 a year. Under this Government the figure has fallen in the last five years to an average of about 23,000—less than half the rate that prevailed under the last Labour Government.

The Conservative party and the Government have a firm and fair policy on these matters, which include the question of asylum seekers. Labour's policy would pave the way for a massive influx of immigrants. The Bill is part of that process and should be rejected.

Question put, pursuant to Standing Order No. 19 (Motions for leave to bring in Bills and nomination of Select Committees at commencement of public business):—

The House proceeded to a Division—

Mr. David Ashby (Leicestershire, North-West) (seated and covered): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for hon. Members to stand in the Lobby, shouting abuse at the hon. Members as they go in to vote saying, "This way for the racists. All the racists go in here."? Would it not be right for the Serjeant at Arms to tell the hon. Member concerned to eject himself and get away from there?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): It is certainly not in order for hon. Members to shout abuse at each other. I hope that, if that has been occurring, it will cease forthwith.

Mr. Ashby: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Should not someone tell that hon. Member to stop and eject him, because his abusive behaviour is interfering with voting? Will you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, arrange that?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If that has been happening, I hope that the hon. Members involved will take note that from the Chair I have strongly deprecated such conduct.

Mr. Ashby: Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The problem is that hon. Members in the Lobby cannot hear what you are saying. They are in the Lobby stopping people from voting and it is still going on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand that what I have said from the Chair has, in fact, been conveyed to those hon. Members.

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point) (seated and covered): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have been an hon. Member for more than 40 years and I have never before witnessed the sort of behaviour that has been taking place for some time during this Division. It was threatening in character, abusive, and it might have confused hon. Members coming in to vote. In that respect I support my hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire, North-West (Mr. Ashby). It is no use expressing an opinion from the Chair that cannot be heard by the offenders. I hope you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will instruct the appropriate Officer of the House to call upon the hon. Member involved to desist.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand that there has been no physical obstruction in the Division Lobbies. That is my concern from the Chair. I repeat that if there has been verbal abuse, it is grossly out of order and I strongly deprecate it.

Mr. Ashby: Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I understand that the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) did not just say, "This way racists"; he also said, "Pick up your legs and goosestep in" and other phrases of that sort to hon. Members who wish to vote freely. Would it not be right for you to call that hon. Member to order and to explain himself? I see that he is entering the Chamber. It is disgraceful.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is nothing further I can do at this stage. The doors have now been locked, but it is exceedingly important in this place that we observe restraint in our language and in our conduct.

Mr. Ashby: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Would it not be proper to ask the hon. Member to apologise for his obstructiveness? Should we not have an apology for his misconduct?

The House having divided: Ayes 116, Noes 73.

ASYLUM SEEKERS AND REFUGEES BILL

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn accordingly presented a Bill to amend the law to facilitate the safe entry into the United Kingdom of asylum seekers and their families; to provide a right of appeal against refusal of entry, and a right of independent representation; to make administrative provision for the resettlement of asylum seekers, refugees and their families; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 17 May and to be printed. [Bill 154.]

Orders of the Day

Finance Bill

(Clauses 14, 21, 22, 23, 24, 31, 77 and Schedule 14)
Considered in Committee [Progress 7 May.]

[MISS BETTY BOOTHROYD in the Chair]

5.20 pm

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South): On a point of order, Miss Boothroyd. I want to raise a matter that I believe affects the constitutional behaviour of the House. It is obvious from the events surrounding the presentation just now of a private Member's Bill that anything that occurs outside this Chamber is not within the purview of the Chair. We have seen today a violation of the procedure of the House, whereby an hon. Member stood outside either the Ayes or the Noes Lobby, exhorting right hon. and hon. Members to vote this way or that way in a very offensive manner. Something should be done to prevent right hon. and hon. Members from being subjected to that kind of behaviour by someone who does not really believe in democracy.

Several Hon. Members rose——

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. I will take no further points of order on that matter. A number were raised earlier. Mr. Speaker will be made fully aware of what took place, and if he has anything to report to the House, he will do so tomorrow.

Clause 31

RELIEF

5.22 pm

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): I beg to move amendment No. 14, in page 21, line 14, leave out '1992' and insert '1991'.

Unemployment is rising, the economy is in recession and our trading relationships with our European partners require our economy to be as strong and competitive as theirs. In those circumstances, it is right for us to discuss education and training. It may be commonplace to say that this country's greatest single asset is the skills and abilities of its people, but I predict that over the next decade that will become even more self-evident.

In a timid but nevertheless welcome way, the clause acknowledges the need for education and training. It will allow people to claim tax relief for course fees, assessment, and regulation costs for properly accredited vocational training. It requires a claimant to be a United Kingdom resident who is undertaking a course without any public financial assistance or other type of tax relief to help with its cost. Companies have always been able to obtain tax relief for providing training, and the clause is designed to allow individuals who incur expenses to do the same.

I shall leave to one side for the moment the issues that we want to explore with the Government on other amendments. As far as it goes, clause 31 is welcome—so welcome that our amendment is intended to make the tax relief begin this tax year rather than in 1992, as the Government intend. I understand that the cost of the change that we propose would be about £15 million, although I suspect that it might turn out to be less.

I can think of only three possible objections to our proposal. First, it might be argued that the MIRAS-type arrangements that are supposed to accompany the tax relief cannot be put in place in time. That does not seem to be an insuperable reason for not granting the relief now. It would be possible, by deduction or set-off, to give taxpayers the relief at the end of the tax year.

Secondly, it might be suggested that the regulations for those not liable for tax, but who would nevertheless be able to take some advantage of the scheme, would not be in place in time, so that the arrangement could not start in 1991. That does not seem to be an insuperable difficulty, either. I do not think that many people would come into that category. It may be possible to think of examples of people without a charge to tax who would still be able to pay for their own vocational training, but it is hardly likely that there will be many. I am sure that the Inland Revenue would be able to deal with the small number involved.

The third possible Government objection is that the public expenditure implications of starting the scheme in this financial year rather than the next would be beyond their resources. They may say that they could not possibly spend up to an extra £15 million on training. Such a sum would be slightly more than a quarter of the publicity budget of the Department of Employment, which puts the matter in perspective. We could forgo a little publicity and encourage more training instead.

The real disagreement between the Government and ourselves is whether, in the present economic climate—with rising unemployment and industry complaining of skill shortages—it is necessary for the future well-being of the economy to make training a priority use of public expenditure. Of course, the costs of the scheme are important, but so is the price of unemployment. It costs the state about £8,000 per annum if a person who could be economically productive is kept unemployed.

The costs of our declining international competitiveness are important, too. I welcome the present direction of trade agreements, but they mean that over the next decade our ability to compete internationally is bound to become even more important. To forgo training in those circumstances seems foolish.

Other important costs are those that skill shortages cause British employers, who will rightly argue that skill shortages are not easily met in the short term. It is a privilege of speaking from the Opposition Front Bench to be able to draw on examples from one's own community. There could be no more pertinent example than that offered by Tyneside, where my constituency lies. It is an area noted for its skilled work force. The skills there have been accumulated over generations because of the presence of the shipbuilding and heavy engineering industries. Those industries have endured an enormous, and probably permanent, shake-out, in employment terms, in the past decade. Alongside that, no region has suffered more from persistently higher than average levels of unemployment. Yet, in spite of that residue of highly skilled manual workers on Tyneside, employers are complaining of skill shortages. The high unemployment rates that the Tyneside community is still enduring are composed of unskilled workers more than any other single element.

[Mr. Nicholas Brown]

The Swan Hunter shipyard is a good example, as it is not always easy for that major employer on Tyneside to find people to fill skilled vacancies. That might surprise Conservative Members, in view of the shake-out in the shipbuilding and engineering industries, but it is the case. There is a waiting list of about 2,000 people for the occasional unskilled job at that workplace. Those circumstances will be mirrored throughout Tyneside and if they are mirrored there, where there is a residue of skilled labour, how much more likely are they to be reflected in other parts of the country?

5.30 pm

The Government have got their priorities wrong. They are estimating negative growth in the economy for the next year. By implication at least, the Government are saying that, given the country's growth rate, unemployment will be a problem. Therefore the Government should be in a position to do something about it.

The something that they have done is to cut expenditure on training. That is not a minor point of detail which divides us, but an issue of principle. The Labour party's view is that expenditure on education and training will be crucial to our position in the international trading community in the next decade and will be a necessary element in pulling this country through the recession.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman, whose speeches I always enjoy—especially the witty parts. Could he enlighten the House still further on his party's policy in this matter? He has just begun to talk about it. I seem to recall that his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) said that the increased expenditure on education and training which the Labour party hopes for would essentially be financed by borrowing rather than by taxation. Is that still the case? Has the hon. Gentleman made any estimates of the effect on interest rates, were that to happen?

Mr. Brown: Investment in training has to be a priority for the economy. Before the last Budget we did something that Oppositions do not normally do. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is aware that we set out our own proposals for the Budget. They included the expenditure of about £800 million—if my memory is correct—on training, as well as the training levy; we proposed a 0·5 per cent. levy on the payroll, which we believed would generate more than £1·4 billion. We added the two figures together and said that that amount would be spent on training. Those measures were part of a package presented before the Budget.

When we come to office we shall have to measure our objectives against the changes that have been made in this year's Budget. We shall not come into office with the tax system that we endured last year or the year before. We shall certainly not be able to go back to where we were in 1979. Therefore, I cannot tell the hon. Gentleman that we will definitely spend X amount and that, whatever the position of the economy, so much must be spent on training; nor can I say that rates of income tax will be Y rather than Z. As the hon. Gentleman knows, it is not my prerogative to do so.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Francis Maude): Come clean.

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman says come clean, but, assuming that there will not be a general election before the next Budget day, which does not seem to be a very safe assumption, will he stand up and say what the basic rate of income tax will be after the next Budget?

Mr. Maude: I can certainly assure the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) that it is our intention to reduce the basic rate of income tax. I take issue with the hon. Gentleman over the fact that he is proposing to spend all that money without giving the slightest indication of where it will come from. The only conclusion we can draw from that is that if the Opposition were elected to government they would increase the basic rate of income tax, as all other Labour Governments have done.

Mr. Brown: I have this in common with the Financial Secretary—we both have good intentions and we are setting out the direction in which our tax policies intend to travel.

Mr. Maude: Yours are up and ours are down.

Mr. Brown: The Financial Secretary says that ours are up and theirs are down and he does not mistake the position, as we see it. We have made it very clear—it is one of the matters that are to be firmly established—that the top rate of income tax under a Labour Government would be 50 per cent. and not 40 per cent. We have said that we intend to introduce a banded system, although we have not said where the bands will sit. Clearly that would impinge upon the prerogative of a Chancellor. We regard the 50 per cent. rate as a firm pledge. Conservative Members argue that that is too much, but Opposition Members view it as trying to arrive at a consensus with top-rate earners. That figure would be the norm, would not move about from year to year, would endure and, in time, would probably be accepted by both Labour and Conservative Governments as a consensus.

The Financial Secretary has put his finger on the heart of the disagreement between us. Even this Government have benefited from economic growth, and if there are extra fruits to be distributed as a result of such growth, it is our view that the money should be invested in the economy in ways which stimulate further economic growth, especially on training the people of this nation. It should be invested in the work force. As the Financial Secretary has spelt out perfectly fairly, it is the Government's belief that the money should be spent on further direct tax cuts for high-rate and indeed basic-rate taxpayers.

I hope that the Financial Secretary does not disagree with that explanation, because it is at the heart of the disagreement between us. We think that the position of the British economy requires Government incentives to invest in the supply side. We regard training as a special priority.

I am surprised that that is thought to be controversial. It can only be thought so in the context in which the Financial Secretary puts it. There is such a breadth of disagreement between us on that matter that I think it will be a fundamental issue on which the next general election will be fought. We believe that a failure to invest could underpin the existing lack of skills and exacerbate the present situation. As a protest, I shall ask my hon. Friends to join me in voting—if the Financial Secretary does not accept this amendment—to bring the starting date for this modest little relief forward to 1991. The Financial Secretary may well say that it cannot be afforded. However, if he says that even that expenditure cannot be afforded he is saying something very heavy about the Government's commitment to training and to expenditure on training.

Mr. Maude: In moving the amendment, the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) has talked as if this measure, in the Budget and now in the Finance Bill, to introduce tax relief for people who pay for their training were the only thing that the Government are doing about training. Clearly that is not so. He has used the debate on this amendment to talk in general terms about training and about what the Government are doing or should be doing and what he believes could be done.

I shall deal first with the specific issue raised in the amendment—whether the relief could be brought forward a year to the 1991-92 tax year. The date has nothing to do with constraints on public spending. I see no need to apologise for exercising tough discipline on public spending, but that is not the concern in this case. There are overwhelming considerations of practicality.

One of the most important features of the relief is its delivery at source, which will allow it to extend not only to those who are working and could benefit from a conventional tax relief, but to those who do not have current taxable income. That feature will give the relief greater impact and flexibility. For a variety of reasons, relief at source requires a long run-in period. The regulations will need to be drafted and brought into force. Administrative systems will have to be designed and put in place. Those in colleges and institutions running the scheme will need to know precisely what to do. We are conscious that the providers of training will have some extra administrative work. We intend to consult widely on what would be the best and simplest scheme for them. We are already working hard on that.

The provision will take time to implement and it would be unrealistic to expect the new relief to begin before April of next year. Even that will impose a strict timetable, but I believe that it can and will be delivered. The delay will allow the accreditation process for the national vocational qualifications and the Scottish vocational qualifications to get further ahead, so that a more comprehensive coverage is available when the relief begins next year. Therefore, the Government are unable to accept the amendment.

The hon. Gentleman talks as though this were the only measure that we were taking on training.

Mr. Forman: Is it true that relief at source—which is the method that the Government have sensibly chosen—has the benefit of not discriminating against the self-employed if they wish to take advantage of the arrangements?

Mr. Maude: Certainly. A person who is self-employed will receive the tax relief at the time of making the payment for training, rather than waiting to obtain it when the final calculation of his tax is made.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East talked rather grudgingly about the measure, apparently because it encourages individuals. I do not take issue with what he said about the need to stimulate investment in training, to encourage it and to give incentives. That is precisely what we are doing. The measure provides an incentive for investment in training, including a direct incentive for individuals to provide training for themselves.

I freely confess that the measure does not form part of a great national scheme. There will not be a huge bureaucratic organisation or a national body to decide who should have what training. It will be for individuals to decide for themselves. That makes the hon. Gentleman uncomfortable. The Labour party's approach to training is based on compulsion. Why else would it propose a payroll levy in which every employer is forced to pay a levy for everyone who is employed, with all the bureaucratic paraphernalia that that would inevitably involve?

Mr. Brown: The Minister has a right to indulge in attacks on our payroll levy scheme—that is a matter of contention between the parties. He is entitled to make those points, but many employers have welcomed the scheme. Many employers who invest heavily in training will be beneficiaries under the scheme.

However, the hon. Gentleman is not entitled to say that we have given the substance of the clause a grudging welcome. We have not, but we believe that it is no substitute for a proper commitment to training from the Government. In its own little timid context, the proposal is welcome. It is so welcome that we are trying to introduce it a year earlier. We are not against it, because it helps the individual; I have no quarrel with that.

5.45 pm

Mr. Maude: I did not say that the hon. Gentleman was against the measure: I said that he was grudging about it. If describing it as a "little timid" measure is not being grudging, it would be interesting to know what is. That is hardly fulsome, whole-hearted praise. The hon. Gentleman hardly speaks like a man full of enthusiasm for the measure. I stand by what I said, and stand by my view that the Labour party is only interested in compulsion. It is only interested in training if people are made to do things. That is a sort of puritan ethic: it is good only if it is not enjoyable—if it is not what people want to do.

My mind goes back to the old days of compulsory levies and industrial training boards. There were many bodies, committees and national boards and, in theory anyway, much training was taking place. At the end of it, however, there was no great addition to the nation's stock of skills. We should be considering not how much is put into training, but what extra skills are acquired.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): The Minister is babbling on in a nonsensical way about training. Does he not realise that the compulsory training schemes were introduced by a Conservative Government, not by a Labour Government? Employers' organisations by the score welcomed them. Without those compulsory levies, many employers bitterly criticised those who poached their apprentices and other trained people after they had taken the time and energy to train them. Those employees were simply sucked away. Does the Minister agree with such practices?

Mr. Maude: I agree with those employers who warmly supported the ending of compulsory levies and the disbanding of the national bodies. In the past decade, the amount spent on worthwhile training for the enhancement of skills has increased dramatically.

[Mr. Maude]

I am not just referring to public spending, although I point out in passing that, for every £100 spent on training at today's prices by the last Labour Government, £250 is spent now. I am not talking only about that huge two-and-a-half-times increase in public spending on training. What matters more is the money spent by the private sector. Skills for business are what make a difference to the economy. Sometimes, the Labour party talks as though all that was needed was investment in plant, no matter what the plant was. The same applies to training: it does not matter what the skills are. Labour Members think that all that can be stirred together to make a vibrant economy. Anyone who deals with these matters knows that that is not so.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Was it not Mr. Robert Carr who introduced the Industrial Training Act 1964, which created the industrial training boards? The Minister should not denigrate those industrial training boards. Some of them provided people, especially young people, with first-class training.

Mr. Maude: I am sure that some first-class training was provided. The complaint was that skills were not being enhanced under the old compulsory system of training. We now have a system of training delivery which is employer-led, based locally, not nationally, with the emphasis on training and enterprise councils, which have been a remarkable success. They were in operation well in advance of the proposed timetable, and will make a huge difference. The emphasis will be on what comes out at the end.

The training programmes will focus heavily on qualifications and employment training will focus heavily on getting people jobs. That must be the test of whether training is successful. Youth training should lead to qualifications, and employment training should lead to employment. The funding of training and enterprise councils is designed to fulfil that objective, with a quarter of the funding related to output quality—whether the trainee achieves a job or a qualification.

Dr. Godman: Will the Minister explain why, when we discuss training, hardly any mention is made of the training needs of employees and of our fellow citizens who suffer from physical and mental handicap? Why are they always at the end of the queue for employment training places?

Mr. Maude: I do not believe that to be the case. Ample provision for handicapped people is made within the £2·7 billion of public money which is spent each year on training and enterprise. I do not accept for a moment that they are at the end of the queue or that no thought is given to the trainees. The purpose of the measure we are discussing today is to give trainees an incentive to enhance their skills.

The amount of training being provided is increasing in a way that should win forthright and enthusiastic support across the Chamber. Each year, the private sector spends about £20 billion on training. That is excellent news. The training culture is improving hugely. There is no doubt that, in previous decades, many businesses considered training to be a low priority. We have paid a price for that in the past. There is no doubt that, in the recession in the early 1980s, spending on training by businesses fell. A good many businesses considered training to be dispensable. It is a source of considerable satisfaction that that does not appear to be happening in the current recession, although pressure on businesses' costs is intense.

The most recent economic situation report by the CBI, published last month, asked how much companies expected to spend on training and retraining in the next 12 months, and whether they expected to spend more, the same or less than they had spent in the past 12 months.

The outcome was most satisfactory and encouraging. At a time of recession, with intense pressure on costs, 26 per cent. expected to spend more, 49 per cent. expected to spend the same and only 18 per cent. expected to spend less. That means that the attitude toward training in the private sector has improved considerably. When the economy begins to move out of recession, businesses will be very much better placed to recover quickly, and their capacity to produce and to meet renewed demand will be greater than it was in the early 1980s. That bodes well for the future.

The Government have absolutely nothing to apologise for in their approach to training. Apart from the huge increase in public spending on training and enterprise, there has been an enormous improvement in the quality of training. We should be concerned about the output. What matters is not what the Government put in but what those who undergo the training get out of it. There is no doubt whatsoever about the quality of training.

I hope that the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East will be big enough to accept that the quality of training in Britain is vastly better than it ever has been. With the introduction of the national system of vocational qualifications and the national network of locally based training and enterprise councils, with all their local links and local knowledge of what is needed and what can be provided, the quality of training is continually on the increase. I hope that, just for once, the hon. Gentleman will be big enough to accept that.

Mrs. Llin Golding (Newcastle-under-Lyme): I have a letter from the Staffordshire training and enterprise council saying that "it would be failing in its responsibilities to the local community if it did not highlight the fact that its adult training budget is totally inadequate for the current needs of the County."

I had a meeting with some of the trainees, who are halfway through their training programme and are now going to lose their places and be unable to take part in the vocational training that the Minister is so fond of quoting. What will he do for the people of Staffordshire who are losing out on his training schemes?

Mr. Maude: The hon. Lady refers to particular circumstances and budgets. I cannot comment on the circumstances of one particular training and enterprise council.

Mrs. Golding: Why? Is it too trivial?

Mr. Maude: No. It is not trivial at all, it is a matter of considerable concern, but every organisation paying for training in the public sector is subject to a budget. That is the case under this Government, just as it was under previous Governments.

It is worth making the point again that the budgets for training are substantially larger than they were under the last Labour Government. For every £100 that the last Labour Government spent on training, we spend £250. I am delighted if many people are seeking training in Staffordshire; those people are very much better placed today than they would have been under the last labour Government.

Mrs. Golding: The supervisors who have been supervising trainees for many years are losing their jobs in Staffordshire because there is no room for them. Eventually the Staffordshire training and enterprise council will have to spend money on training new supervisors. It is a nonsensical programme and a waste of money.

Mr. Maude: No doubt the hon. Lady can raise that with the local training and enterprise council.

Mrs. Goulding: I have.

Mr. Maude: It is a matter for the TEC how it arranges its affairs locally, and no doubt it will do so.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): We should start by putting the debate into the context of the United Kingdom's appalling failure to train our young people compared with training in other countries. The Department of Education and Science statistical bulletin issued in January 1990 revealed that the United Kingdom has 35 per cent. of its 16 to 18-year-olds in full-time education or training compared with, at the top of the range, 79 per cent. in the United States of America. At the middle of the range France trains nearly twice as many 16 to 18-year-olds. Those statistics show what a long way we have to go to provide a reasonable level of training in Britain.

The Minister referred to the quality of training provided through the training and enterprise councils. I would be the first to agree with him that some of the training provided by the TECs is of a higher quality than before, and that is certainly to be commended.

I should like to make a particular point about training in rural areas and the way in which TECs are coping with the requirements placed on them. I have a letter which has been sent out to trainers by the chief executive of Powys TEC, which is based in my constituency. That TEC started with a bang and is already doing good work. One of the problems in rural areas is that many trainees must travel great distances to their traineeships. The public transport —or rather the absence of it—in those areas is such that many trainees cannot take part in such schemes unless they take lodgings during the week.

A case was brought to my attention last week of a young 16-year-old girl who had taken a training place with a veterinary surgery in a small town in my constituency. She has been working there successfully for five or six months and has been enjoying her training. Last week, she was told by the training agency that managed the scheme that her training would have to finish within seven days because it was no longer possible to meet the cost of her lodging in eastern Montgomeryshire, where she lodged during the week. She could not travel to work every day because her training place was 45 miles from her family home. No public transport was available and she was too young to drive, so there was no way in which the scheme could continue if the training agency kept to its decision.

Through the intervention of the chief executive of Powys TEC, that training agency was forced—I use that word advisedly—to change its mind and the girl was allowed to continue her training. That happened because her mother contacted me on the day the decision was made known and I contacted the chief executive on the same day. Action was then taken which many trainees would not have the initiative to take themselves.

There must be many trainees around the country, particularly in more heavily populated areas, who are losing their training places halfway through. As a result of that case and another which I shall mention in a moment, steps are being taken by Powys TEC to avert such problems in the future. However, just a few weeks ago, training for a number of ladies and, I believe, one man to provide a day nursery in Machynlleth was brought to an end at a stoke—almost without notice. It was summarily terminated after the expenditure of a large sum of money to provide the equipment and decorate the premises where the day nursery was to be situated. This was a much more difficult problem to handle because the training organisation concerned was losing money on the scheme.

The reaction of the chief executive of Powys TEC, Claire Coates, has been commendable. She has contacted every trainer and urged them to absorb travel and lodging costs where necessary. However, in a letter to them she had to say:

> "In the meantime, travel costs have been included in your contract price which will mean that you are likely to make a loss on some trainees' travel costs and gain. . .on others".

If any group of people understands the market and the balance sheet, it is the Government. What proportion of businesses are willing to make a loss on contractual arrangements? Most businesses, particularly small and medium-size trainers, will pull the plug on contractual arrangements on which they are losing money.

In this instance, it is not merely a matter of a decision not to supply widgets because an organisation cannot make a profit on them or to bring a bus service to an end despite the difficulties that that causes in rural areas. These decisions bring misery into people's lives. I therefore make a plea, on behalf of a rural area, to the Minister to look into the problem and to ask his right hon. and hon. Friends to ensure that training costs in rural areas are fully covered so that we do not run into the problems that were suffered by the young girl whom I mentioned.

Nevertheless, it is fair to give a measure of welcome to a proposal that encourages training. The Minister will expect me, as a Liberal Democrat from a long Liberal tradition, to welcome a measure that places the initiative in the hands of the trainee and lets the individual say, "I am going to better my prospects by choosing my own training scheme." That is an excellent idea.

It is also a good idea that, under the simple scheme that is proposed, tax relief at source will be provided. However, it is extremely disappointing—as has been emphasised by the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East, (Mr. Brown)—that tax relief will not become available until 1992. Will the Minister investigate whether tax relief could at least be provided in the current financial year on new courses in which new machinery and new office procedures are being set up anyway? Why cannot tax relief be provided at source to new trainees? Surely the Inland Revenue can cope with those administrative arrangements. A Government machine capable of introducing a 2·5 per cent. increase in VAT across the board in just a few weeks should be able to manage the administrative procedure to introduce this new change—at least in part—in less than 14 months.

Will the Minister explain why the proposal is limited? Why does not it include national vocational qualifications and Scottish vocational qualifications at the highest level? Why does it discriminate against professional qualifications? Will it include relief for distance learning qualifications, such as those provided by the Open university and elsewhere? It should do so but does not.

The Government's measure may be wise but it is not generous. The cost of relief will be nil in 1991-92—the scheme is not yet effective—and will cost £20 million in 1992-93, including a public expenditure element of £5 million in respect of non-taxpayers. When the NVQs and SVQs are fully developed, the cost is expected to rise to £40 million, including a public expenditure element of £10 million. What is £10 million? How many yards of motorway can be unrolled for £10 million? It can probably be measured in hundreds of yards, but certainly not in miles. Surely the Government can find more than a mile or two of motorway to support training for national vocational qualifications. The Government should be funding training much more generously and considering a far more extensive scheme. There is nothing wrong with requiring companies to provide a small proportion of their payroll to train people between the ages of 16 and 19. We believe that, probably on the basis of asking too few or the wrong people, the Government have grossly overestimated industry's reaction.

The Government are particularly failing to support training for the unemployed to any reasonable extent, either in this proposal or elsewhere. Unemployment is increasing at an alarming rate. In the past three years, year on year, redundancies have increased. Today, we heard the shocking news that 3,000 people are to be made redundant from the aircraft division of Rolls-Royce. That is but one example of what is happening.

There is a catalogue of companies that are currently making people redundant. It includes Marks and Spencer and Rolls-Royce, which are at the top of the class in British industry. As an hon. Member from the Labour party said——

Mr. Ian McCartney (Makerfield): The hon. Member for Makerfield.

Mr. Carlile: Yes, the hon. Member for Makerfield may have his credit. The hon. Gentleman made a good point when he said that those companies are also major trainers.

Mr. McCartney: I always do.

Mr. Carlile: I will not accept that every point that the hon. Gentleman makes is good.

Major trainers are now making people redundant. This highlights the need for much greater support for training, particularly for those who become unemployed as a result of the Government's economic policies and their failure to introduce a real strategy for manufacturing industry. Last month's trade figures showed beyond doubt that imports are rising relative to exports. That tells its own story.

In the past, the quality of training schemes provided for the unemployed has not been good, as the poor attendance rates demonstrate. One cannot blame the trainees. If the training programmes were good enough, the trainees would turn up for them in much greater numbers. When unemployment fell and resources were freed, resources could have been used to increase the quality of training; but the Government simply cut the training budget in 1991-92 by £350 million.

Now that unemployment has begun to rocket again, the Government still continue to make insufficient provision. The recent announcement by the Secretary of State for Employment of another £120 million for the main training schemes operated by the training and enterprise councils not only failed to restore the cuts of last summer and preceding years but failed to allow for the size of the increases in unemployment. That funding failure is especially regrettable when TECs are attempting to establish themselves in the face of many functional difficulties, such as those I mentioned at the beginning of my speech.

We believe that extra resources should be devoted to starting the transformation of Government training schemes into quality programmes, which would be well regarded by participants and employers alike. The Minister referred to payroll requirements. Employers would not complain if they thought they were getting "value for money"—I believe that the Government understand that phrase. I support schemes that give value for money, as do, I believe, all responsible companies in this country. Many of those schemes could be provided by companies in-house, provided they met the requisite standard. That is the sort of philosophy that should be guiding the financing and devising of training schemes. I fear that, as yet, that philosophy has not led the Government's thinking.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): I welcome clause 31, which introduces new tax relief for vocational training. It recognises that it is not just the Government and employers who have responsibility for training, but individuals, and that it is right to give individuals some incentive to better themselves. The new tax relief, modest though it may be, is most welcome. I believe that, in future, it may cost more than the Treasury has estimated because there will be a wide take-up as people seek to take advantage of the new relief.

When I looked at amendment No. 14 I had some sympathy with the suggestion that the relief should be introduced immediately. After all, if it makes sense to introduce a new tax relief, we should make it available to taxpayers and others at the earliest opportunity. However, I understand that if we are to adopt the approach chosen by the Treasury, of allowing people to deduct the tax from payments that they make, it will not be practical to introduce such a change until the beginning of the next tax year. My hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury said that adopting that approach would allow non-taxpayers as well as taxpayers to take advantage of the relief. That is welcome and I was interested to hear the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) say that that part of the proposal will cost £5 million, which is a lot of money. After all, we are talking of £5 million of relief, so that means £20 million of expenditure by individuals with no taxable income. That seems quite a lot of money, and if the Treasury is right, I welcome the fact that people without a taxable income will spend on training at that rate to improve their chances of acquiring taxable income—that is what the proposal is all about.

Another advantage to the approach adopted by my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary is that relief is available immediately, both to taxpayers and non-taxpayers. It is not necessary for them to pay the fees and then wait for a considerable period before receiving tax relief. The alternative would be simply to make the relief an allowable expense, so that there would either have to be an adjustment to people's PAYE codes, which would be difficult, or people would have to wait until the end of the tax year before they could claim back the money. The Treasury have adopted the right approach, and I note that it has adopted the same one in relation to a number of new tax reliefs. I accept that it means that we cannot introduce the relief until 1992 because we must set in place the necessary arrangements, introduce regulations and ensure that the people to whom the money is being paid are able to get the tax back from the Treasury.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) said that we should ask whether training should be a priority for public spending. Earlier this week, I received a leaflet from Battersea Labour party, which stated that the priorities for a Labour Government would be a massive increase in spending on education and training, and on public transport. Leaving aside the question of where the money will come from and other such issues —although it is important to recognise that both those proposals, however commendable, have long lead times in terms of improving the country's economic performance —it is nonsense to say that we can make an investment on day one and achieve economic growth on day two.

I recall saying in a debate in the House late last year that one reason why the performance of British management had improved during the 1980s was the expansion of university education in the 1960s. There are long lead times on investment in education and training. The Labour party is misleading the country if it is suggesting that the increased investment in education and training will, overnight, lead to an improvement in our economic performance. I am afraid that life is not like that. The hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) must answer the question: "How does she square that circle?" I think that she and the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) have both said on many occasions that their first priorities for public spending would be to increase pensions and child benefit and that all other increases in public expenditure would have to wait until we had improved our economic performance. They tell us that in one breath and then, in the next one, they say that, in order to improve our economic performance, we must have a massive increase in investment in education and training, transport infrastructure and all sorts of other things. Whom are we to believe? Perhaps we shall have a better idea when we have had a chance to read the text of the speech that the Leader of the Opposition is making on this subject today

Apparently the right hon. Gentleman will tell us that, under Labour, there would be no tax reductions for five years. He assumes—I hope that hon. Members will note this—that, come what may, we shall have economic growth of 2·5 per cent. per year. Clearly, he has decided in advance how the extra £20 billion of tax revenue generated by the economic growth would be spent.

People are naturally very suspicious of the Labour party when it comes to questions of taxation. Indeed, they would do well not to listen to the Opposition. On that score, of course, there is cause for considerable concern, as the Labour party has already told us that it would increase the burden on many taxpayers. But people would do even better to look at the performance of all past Labour Governments, who increased the burden not only on higher-rate taxpayers, but on all taxpayers. In the end, there is only one way in which the extra £20 billion of expenditure to which the Opposition are committed could be funded, and that is by putting an extra burden on every taxpayer.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: On the question of increasing the tax burden on ordinary citizens, can the hon. Gentleman confirm that the Conservative Government, throughout their time in office, have done exactly that?

Mr. Smith: What I can confirm is that over the past 12 years the Conservative Government have managed to reduce the standard rate of tax from 33 to 25 per cent. and, at the same time, achieve substantial growth in public spending. That is a very remarkable achievement. At the next election, people will judge the various promises according to past performance.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: No doubt the hon. Gentleman is aware of the system of indirect taxation, which accounts for part of the tax burden on citizens of average and below-average means. Will he confirm that the Conservative party has increased, rather than decreased, the total tax burden borne by ordinary citizens?

Mr. Smith: What people will want to consider is net take-home pay. During the Conservative Government's period of office, a married man on average earnings and with two children has seen an increase of more than 30 per cent. in his net take-home pay. By contrast, the performance of the last Labour Government over a period of five years resulted in an increase of just 1 per cent. in the net take-home pay of such a person. What people are concerned about is net take-home pay. That is where the Conservative Government have scored, and where Labour Governments will never score. It is in that context that people will set the speech that, apparently, the Leader of the Opposition is to make today. People have not forgotten what life was like 15 years ago under a Labour Government. It was a very unpleasant experience, and not one which people will want to repeat. The present Government have cut tax and have increased spending.

Investment in training is another priority for the Labour party, but anyone reading the Labour party document that was published a couple of weeks ago will find that it is full of priorities. There is an endless list of priorities, together with an endless list of new Government bodies to spend the money that implementing them will require. Every priority will involve additional public expenditure, and there will be a new quango to do the spending. On the question of training, it is entirely wrong to assume that quantity is in itself a virtue. The quality of investment is equally, if not more, important. That is a matter upon which this debate ought to focus.

A better means of securing increased investment in training is to improve the profitability of British industry. Whether we are concerned about fixed investment, about investment in research and development, or about investment in training, the way to achieve increased investment is to increase the profitability of British industry. Over the past 10 years, we have seen a huge increase in industrial profitability and, as a result, a huge increase in retained profits. That is why there has been a better performance in terms of investment in training.

The CBI forecast figures that have just been given by the Financial Secretary are very encouraging. It is remarkable that, in the middle of a recession, so many companies should contemplate increasing their expenditure on training or, at least, not reducing it. Clearly, when profitability improves next year—as it will—there will be an increase in training budgets. Employer-led training is so much better. The key is to ensure that training is of the kind that employers want, the kind that makes trainees employable. The hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) has talked about the training of disabled people. I agree that that should be no less a priority than is the training of able-bodied people. Indeed, it is a very important aspect of the whole matter.

Dr. Godman: I cannot speak about the situation in England and Wales, but I can tell the hon. Gentleman that, in Scotland, the numbers and percentages of people with a mental or physical handicap who underwent employment training in each of the past two years were dismally low. Indeed, that was conceded in a recent answer by the Scottish Office Minister who is responsible for industry.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Interesting as these exchanges are, I must point out that the Committee is dealing with a very specific date, which is mentioned in the amendment. I should like hon. Members to return to that, rather than engage in a general debate on training matters.

Mr. Smith: I have to accept what you say, Miss Boothroyd, although the debate has ranged very widely. I fully accept that we are discussing a specific tax relief, which involves public expenditure, but hon. Members have been putting that item of public expenditure in the context of the resources committed to training, whether by the Government, by way of taxpayers' money, or by the private sector. Of course, every tax relief has a public expenditure cost. I intended to refer to a particular example of the training of disabled people, but I shall abide by your ruling, Miss Boothroyd, and return to the amendment. Let me say simply that this new tax relief to encourage individuals to better themselves and to enable them to choose training is very welcome, and when it comes into force in 1992 it will be very popular.

Dr. Godman: I support the amendment, as I believe that it would improve a modest measure. It is surprising that, in relation to training bodies, the Minister should have been so dismissive. I have always regarded the Act that established those bodies as being one of the finest pieces of legislation passed, under the stewardship of Mr. Robert Carr, by the then Conservative Government. It made training provision for very many people. The legislation was passed many years before you, Miss Boothroyd, became a Member of Parliament, and a few years before I came here.

I do not want to incur your wrath today—or, for that matter, any day—but I have to say that, like the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile), who spoke on behalf of the Liberals, I have reservations arising from the Government's failure to make provision for distance learning. This is particularly regrettable in respect of information technology training, which can be provided by, among various institutions, the Open university.

Distance learning programmes are very important for would-be trainees in many parts of Scotland, particularly the highlands and islands and the Shetlands. I think that I am right in saying that the Open university has in the Shetland islands alone several hundred students who undoubtedly benefit from its unparalleled teaching.

6.30 pm

Can the Minister tell us why Scottish vocational qualifications at the highest level are being excluded? It means that the Scottish higher national diploma is being excluded. I know trainees who are studying for such qualifications. If the amendment were passed, others could benefit.

I am sorry that there is to be a delay in the introduction of a provision which could help many of my constituents. May I remind the Minister that, according to Government statistics, the unemployment rate in the Greenock travel to work area is 13·5 per cent., which is far above the levels of unemployment in constituencies represented by Conservative Members? It is certainly much higher than the national average.

When we talk about the training of young people, may I point out to the Committee that just yesterday Kvaerner-Kincaid of Greenock announced the redundancies of more than 100 employees, most of whom are highly skilled engineers, but who include 12 apprentices? When employers engage apprentices to undergo training, they have a moral obligation to ensure that the apprenticeships are completed. Kvaerner-Kincaid is acting irresponsibly, even immorally, in putting the apprenticeships under threat.

Nothing is worse for a young person of 17, 18 or 19 than to have an apprenticeship disrupted. Where can he go? I say "he" because I am talking about 12 young men who are deeply anxious about their future. What are their prospects if the Norwegian company has its disgraceful way and puts them into the dole queue? I told the chief executive, Mr. Hanna, yesterday that it was a disgraceful state of affairs. If the apprentices are put out of work, it will be nothing short of a scandal.

My constituency and other areas in the west of Scotland are suffering badly because of the lack of systematic training, particularly in electronics and in information technology. That is a matter for regret. If the Government were to accept the amendment, it would make a modest provision much more sensible for many of the people whom I represent north of the border.

Mr. Cryer: I want to comment on the Minister's reasons for rejecting our useful and modest attempt to improve the modest provisions of clause 31. The Minister said that there were administrative difficulties because regulations need to be drafted. I am surprised that the Government are admitting that they are introducing primary legislation without a thought for the regulations which will flow from it. According to the Minister, the Government have not troubled to look through the Bill to see what regulations will be needed.

The Minister said that there would be enormous difficulties about consultation. The Government use consultation when they want to and dismiss it when they do not. The Minister is contemptuous of training boards. When the clothing industry training board was told that there would no longer be a compulsory levy to fund it, there was no consultation. The Government did not ask members of the board what they would do about providing training in an area where we have to be competitive. They simply said, without consultation, that there would be no levy. The Minister chose his arguments to suit himself. There was no question of consultation.

I must reiterate my concern about the machinery of government. We have a slapdash Government who do not know what they are doing from one week to the next. They are so dithering in their attitude that they have not gone through the Bill to check what regulations will be needed to enable tax concessions to be made. It is not a question of whether the Government will get the measure through the Committee. They have a majority of 150 so they know that they will get the legislation through.

The Minister said that regulations will need to be drafted. It would have been prudent for the Minister to ask his officials, when drafting the Bill, to consider what regulations would be needed. Will the regulations be made under the affirmative procedure or will they be less important in the Minister's eyes? Has he made a judgment? Has he decided just to dig out regulations at some time in the future, some to be made by affirmative resolution and some by negative resolution?

These are important questions, because most provisions are created not by primary legislation but by secondary legislation, through powers delegated to Ministers. Therefore, Ministers should regularly assess the regulations that will be necessary. It is not as though the Treasury is unaware of the need to produce regulations. Even when tax concessions concern other Departments, the regulations have to be drawn up with the consent of the Treasury.

The Government have rooms full of people dealing with regulations, yet the Minister tries to tell the House that they cannot draft regulations quickly. It is incredible. I will lay a bet with the Minister that there are five times as many people in Government Departments drafting regulations as there are in the emergency unit dealing with relief for the Bangladesh victims. There may even be 10 times more people involved in drafting regulations, because there are only about a dozen officials grappling with one of the biggest disasters that the planet has seen, in which perhaps as many as 500,000 people have been killed.

The Minister's argument about regulations does not wash; he has used it as an excuse. He could have accepted our amendment, brought forward regulations and introduced the provisions in this financial year. An element of retrospection might have been needed, but I have never been one of those who says that there should be a bar against retrospective legislation under any circumstances.

The Government want to induce people to enter into vocational education. That is necessary. We are not grudgingly accepting the notion, as the Minister tried to suggest. We are urging the Minister to ask his civil servants to get cracking on the regulations so that the legislation may be brought into operation in this financial year. What could be better? The Minister is getting support for a Bill which is mostly pretty awful, but at least the regulations would help people. We are supporting the Government, but the Minister says no, it is administratively impossible, because the Government have never introduced legislation in 24 hours, never introduced regulations, plonked them before Parliament and brought them into effect during the 40 days within which a prayer can be tabled. We know that that is not true. They have used administrative expediency when they wanted to and when there was the political will to do so. There is not the political will to encourage people to undertake vocational training.

Why is it especially urgent for people to undertake training? It is urgent because some manufacturing industries are in difficulty, and people might need an additional inducement to encourage them to undertake training in view of the relatively dismal prospects for some of those manufacturing industries.

Let us take the example of engineering. New car registrations are down by about 20 per cent. The fall in registration in cars manufactured in this country has enormous repercussions. It means that component suppliers such as GKN have shed people and created redundancies because of the downturn caused by the Government's economic policies. The suppliers of steel and tyres and of cloth for the upholstery in cars and other vehicles are all affected by the downturn in demand, which has been created by the Government's blind and foolish ideological adherence to the use of interest rates alone to control the economy. As a result, more people have joined the dole queue. Therefore, there must be some inducements to encourage young people to go into the engineering industry, which is one of our most vital manufacturing industries.

The inducements should be on the premise that there might be an upturn—not under this Government, but after the next election. With a Labour Government and a decent attitude towards the economy, we shall create jobs, not destroy them. People will then have more confidence, but not at the moment. Therefore, inducements to enter an industry that faces difficulties will be a help.

The textile industry is important in Bradford. Fourteen thousand jobs depend directly on that industry. It is not an antique industry—it has invested and modernised—but it faces uncertainty, again because of the downturn in demand. There is much short-time working and a continuing trickle of redundancies. I predict that over the next few months mills will close in Yorkshire and the west riding because of the Government's economic policies and also because the textile industry in particular bore much of the burden of the perfectly legitimate sanctions against Iraq. The Gulf war meant that the market diminished in the middle east, which had been a fairly lucrative market for British textile manufacturers.

People might ask why they should go into the textile industry when it has been contracting for years, and over the past 10 years has lost at least 100,000 jobs in its woollen sector. Why should they go into an industry to learn a craft or a skill only to find that, at the end of the day, they are redundant and that the skill is not required?

The tax concession is needed now to counteract the economic downturn—the recession or slump—which the Government's policies have introduced once again into our economy.

It makes more sense to give tax concessions now to encourage people to go on a training course than to spend the money on the dole queues. Although Ministers are shy about telling us the cost of the dole queues, they cost between £20,000 million and £25,000 million a year in unemployment payments, various other benefits and loss of tax revenue. The Minister can correct me and give an accurate Treasury figure, but it is far better to start this year with the modest tax concession outlined in the amendment to encourage people to go into training rather than for the Government to shrug their shoulders and say, "It is administratively impossible—we can't do it now," while the dole queues grow ever longer.

The Minister mentioned the cost of training in relation to Government expenditure. I should like to probe the figures a little further. He said that the Government were already spending that sort of money, so the amendment was not necessary. If the Government are so concerned about training, I wonder whether the figures that he gave for Government expenditure on training include expenditure on the skill centres. I presume that the tax concession would be available to an individual who decided that he wanted to go on a course at such a centre, but what has happened to the skill centres?

The Minister may not be aware—as he is from the Treasury, he should be—that the centres were a nationwide network run by the Department of Employment to provide training, but what did the Government do? They advertised them for sale, saying that they were making a loss, that they were not effectively run—although the loss was not so big—and that something had to be done about them..

It was strange that the Government sold the centres —in fact, they did not sell them but gave them away—to the people who were already in charge of running them at a loss. I wonder whether that money is incorporated into the Government's figures. The Government gave the new concern not only about £100 million, but the freehold. The new concern—Astra Training Services, in the main—has been busy closing down the centres, sacking people and diminishing training opportunities. It has sacked about 500 people—the Minister can correct me if he has up-to-date figures. It has been one of the biggest rip-offs of the privatisation procedures, and they have all been rip-offs of the taxpayer to some extent.

As the Minister knows, the sale is being investigated by the Public Accounts Committee. I hope that its report will be produced pretty speedily, because we are dealing with a huge gift of money to Astra Training Services and with the three civil servants who got into the Minister's good books, pulled out a plum and said, "What a good boy am I." That is an Elizabethan poem based on the corruption of Government in that era. The amount of money that would be provided by the tax concession is peanuts compared to the amount of money that the Government squandered on Astra Training Services and on giving away the freehold of important training facilities and sites.

I hope that the Minister has a few answers, that he will rise to the occasion and say that the Government have many facilities and lots of skilled draftsmen for regulations, that they will draw up plans and regulations, send round a circular and ensure that the minor tax concession is introduced in this financial year. The Minister has the opportunity to do that and to do a bit for people who want to take advantage of training. We encourage him in that, and I hope that he will accept the amendment. My guess is that he will not, but people who are looking for training will know where the real concern for training lies—not with the Government, but with Labour. We want an early opportunity in government to put our plans into action.

Mr. Peter Hain (Neath): The Financial Secretary sought to deflect criticism of the Government's measure by saying that it was not all that the Government were doing on training. That is a statement of the obvious. But the proposed £20 million in tax relief on training costs is a drop in the ocean compared with the £245 million that has been cut from employment training and youth training this year. It is a tiny droplet compared with the £1·5 billion cut from public spending on training during the five years from 1987 to 1992.

The Government's proposal does not even begin to address the skills gap in Britain. In particular, it does not address the dilemma and the problems faced by women trainees. Women should be a prime target for any training scheme, especially in view of demographic trends which are causing a shortage of adult men and making it necessary to bring more women into the labour market. Many women do not have the qualifications to take advantage of the jobs that companies need to fill. Others who would like to return to the labour market after a period of caring for dependants but need to top up their skills to take advantage of opportunities are unable to do so. The measure does not even begin to address that problem.

Under the clause, there will be a deduction on the basic rate of tax, so those who pay a higher rate of tax will receive much greater relief. As women represent a small proportion of those in the higher tax bands, almost no women will benefit. In addition, the tax deduction will be available to non-taxpayers only in the form of a reduction in the cost of their training place. Many women who are on low pay cannot afford the massive cost that is often levied for a place on a training scheme.

The main beneficiaries of the proposal will be people who are already in work. They will be mainly professional people. Not many will be women and few will be low-paid workers. That should be considered against the background of the overall impact of the proposal. It is a molehill of a measure compared with the mighty mountain of the skills crisis in industry and across the economy. At present, 60 per cent. of trainees emerge without any qualifications and two thirds of our work force have had no training in the past three years. Many have had no training in their entire working lives.

The Financial Secretary referred to the rosy picture painted by the Confederation of British Industry by drawing selectively on its forecasts. I invite him to come back into the real world. For example, in west Wales, training places have been halved through the measures taken by the Government in the past year. One example is at a successful company called Kenyons in the town of Pontadarwe in the Neath constituency, which has trebled its turnover in the past two years. It builds industrial refrigeration plants and provides building services. It is a skilled engineering company employing 500 people in that part of the world. It is just the sort of company that we should encourage. In the past few months, its youth training places have been cut from 90 to 70, despite the fact that the company had the places and people wished to fill them. The funding was cut by 20 places.

Only after the managing director created merry hell, as he described it, was the company able to win from the local training authority an additional 10 places. Similarly, employment training places in that company were cut from 30 to 18. Again, that opened up a skills gap even though the company had the opportunity and the desire to fill it. All that is in an area where we desperately need engineering skills in order to compete with foreign companies, which are rapidly taking over our markets. I have been approached by business men in Neath who want to provide places for computer training, which is desperately needed in our information technology society. The funding for those places is not available.

Several of my hon. Friends mentioned the lack of training opportunities for people with special needs. Training places for people with special needs have also been cut. All in all, the measure does not address the real world. The £20 million tax relief for training which is being provided one way or another should be compared to the £1·1 billion of tax subsidies for personal pensions last year and the incitement to contract out of the state earnings-related pension scheme in the form of a £6 billion tax subsidy. The £20 million does not even begin to measure up to the needs of our economy.

The £20 million can also be compared to the tax subsidies to encourage people to take more and more shares and invest more in equities; yet in the past 10 years it has been highly profitable for individuals to invest in shares. People have received an annual gross return of 19 per cent. on their investments. Why is money spent in that direction when it should be spent on funding the training that we so desperately need?

The Financial Secretary complained that the Labour party's policy was one of compulsion. That is not the case. The Government have abandoned their responsibilities for training and their duty to fund and provide the training opportunities so desperately needed in the economy. The Government have washed their hands of those responsibilities. The Labour party says that the Government should fulfil their responsibilities and duties to people who want to train to fill the skills gaps that are appearing everywhere. The Financial Secretary appeared to suggest that he would leave it all to the private sector. But almost universally the private sector is not filling the skills gap. I would ask why the directors of large companies pay themselves 22·7 per cent. increases in their remuneration when they are not providing the funding for training places that we need?

The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) childishly suggested that we claimed that we could accomplish overnight the training revolution that is needed in Britain. No one claims that. The Labour party has never maintained that that would be the case, but we are saying that the Government are paying lip service to addressing the skills desert in society. People see, even if Ministers do not, that the Conservative party is a party of quick buck predators devouring our skills base as they asset-strip the economy. Labour is the party of enterprise and industry which is prepared to invest in skills for a strong economy.

Mr. Maude: This short debate has been essentially about the proposal in the Finance Bill to introduce tax relief on vocational training for individuals. The debate has ranged more widely than that, into training in general, and I welcome that.

The hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) spoke as if the administrative difficulties of putting the scheme into place this year were pure fabrication and a figment of our imagination. He talked as if in the Government there was a sort of regulation factory—if one pressed a button, out would come a set of all-purpose regulations to fit any set of circumstances immediately. However, we are introducing a new scheme which must work. Nothing like it has been done before. The scheme must be relatively as simple as possible for training providers to operate. It must not impose too great a compliance burden on them.

It is important that we should get the regulations right, so that the system works in the best way possible. It would be dead easy to produce very quickly regulations which were wrong. I prefer to make sure that we get things right and that training providers have the time to set their systems in place and operate them. There is no doubt that to apply the system in this way—tax relief at source—places a burden on training providers. That is part of the price for what everyone has accepted to be a worthwhile measure.

As I said at the outset, the reason for deferring the implementation of the scheme until next year is that we are anxious to get it right and do not want to introduce it in a way that would be impossible for training providers. In those circumstances, I am not able to accept the amendment.

Several points, including those raised by the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman), related to the ambit of the measure—which vocational qualifications would be within it. That is the subject of a further amendment that we shall debate before long, and I shall deal with it then. However, I shall now deal with the specific point that the hon. Gentleman raised about higher national diplomas. Most higher national diplomas—this applies particularly to England and Wales; I cannot say whether it applies to the same extent to Scotland—would be at level 4 and therefore included within the ambit of the provision. Perhaps we can deal with that matter in a little more detail in the context of a later amendment.

The hon. Gentleman talked about the provision of training for people with disabilities. Training and enterprise councils are obliged to provide suitable training which meets the needs of local employers and local people, which of course includes those with special training needs. Performance-related funding for this year will reward training and enterprise councils for achievement of employment outcomes for people with special training needs, including people with disabilities. It is by no means the case that people with handicaps are at the end of the queue, with no consideration being given to their needs.

Mrs. Golding: Will that include adult low achievers, many of whom in my constituency have lost their places midway through their training programmes?

Mr. Maude: The hon. Lady will understand that that is not something for which I have direct ministerial responsibility. I imagine that it includes people in those circumstances, but it will be for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Employment to provide detailed answers.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) and the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow referred to distance learning. Distance learning will be included if it leads to a national vocational qualification at levels 1 to 4.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery made much of the relatively low financial cost of this measure —almost as though that were something that the Government could automatically increase to make it a bigger and more spendid programme. I am bound to say that it is not a cash-limited programme. The figures in the Red Book—the "Financial Statement and Budget Report" —simply reflect the best estimate of demand for tax relief under the scheme. My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), who is unable to be present because of an obligation elsewhere, believes that the cost could be more because demand would be greater. That may be the case, but it is simply an estimate of what demand is likely to be.

A number of other hon. Members referred slightingly to the cost. The hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) described it as a molehill or a drop in the ocean. I am not sure whether he also said that it was chickenfeed, but someone has described it as chickenfeed. Of course, in the context of the entirety of the Government's training programme and training strategy, it is a relatively modest measure. It is not meant to be the kingpin of the exercise.

As I said, the Government are spending £2·7 billion overall, which is two and a half times as much as was spent on training in 1979. In that context, the measure is relatively modest—I make no apology for that—but it is particularly valuable because it places the emphasis on individuals' choice, encourages them and provides a direct incentive to enhance their skills.

In those circumstances, I am confident that the Committee will warmly support the measure and accept that it is not possible to bring forward its implementation in the way that has been suggested, for reasons which are good and will be understood.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: I welcome you to the Chair, Mr. McWilliam. It is a great pleasure for me not only to see you in the Chair but to hope that it means that you will follow our deliberations Upstairs as well. It would be a great pleasure for me if a fellow Member of Parliament for Tyne and Wear joined me in the early hours of the morning as we considered the Finance Bill.

If you join me and the Financial Secretary for breakfast on Wednesday and Friday mornings during the passage of the Finance Bill, you may find the Financial Secretary a hard man to help and a hard man to please. Yesterday, he complained that I was smiling and nodding as he was speaking, and today he complains that I am grudging and curmudgeonly in my welcome for the clause. There is nothing grudging in our welcome. Most certainly, we are not opposed to it, because it gives some choice to those who are fortunate enough to be able to take advantage of its provisions. Those arguments are not the basis of our reservations.

I notice that, in defending the Government's case, the Financial Secretary came up with his version of events under the previous Labour Government. That is becoming commonplace. The Conservative party is not willing to have the events under the previous Labour Government taught as history in schools, but nevertheless it turns up time after time as fiction in our debates.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) rightly pointed out, circumstances were quite different under the previous Labour Government. We had training boards, apprenticeships, a manufacturing base and a balance of payments in equilibrium—things that we do not see nowadays. I was saddened to hear what my hon. Friend had to say about the very last of Britain's marine engineering industry. I followed the slow retreat of that industry from Wearside to Tyneside and then up to my hon. Friend's constituency. It is very sad to hear of the plight of young apprentices.

Dr. Godman: It is not just a matter of job losses in such a highly skilled sector. The decision announced yesterday could lead to the end of the building in the United Kingdom of slow-speed marine diesel engines—in other words, no building of diesel engines for merchant ships in the whole of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I am aware of the extent of the tragedy to which he refers, which is why I made a special point of mentioning it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) picked up the Minister on his main excuse for not accepting the help that we offer him—that it is difficult to make regulations. Are regulations required? Clause 31(2) states:

> "The payment shall be deducted from or set-off against the income of the individual for the year of assessment in which it is made; but relief under this subsection shall be given only on a claim made for the purpose, except where subsections (3) to (5) below apply."

Clause 31(4) states:

> "An individual who is entitled to such relief in respect of a payment may deduct and retain out of it an amount equal to income tax on it at the basic rate for the year of assessment in which it is made."

Surely the clause does not require further regulations. It would, of course, be desirable from the taxpayers' point of view if a MIRAS-type arrangement were in place, but that is not necessary. Under the clause, it would be possible to make a start this year. The argument about the technical difficulties and about the need for regulations is so much bunkum. In any case, what does the Minister expect the initial take-up to be?

My hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) made a very good point about the difficulties of those who would not have a charge to tax, many of whom would be women, but who might nevertheless want to take advantage of the relief. I find it difficult to accept that many citizens would be in that position—that many people would not have a charge offsetable against tax but nevertheless would have enough money to sustain the financial burden of undertaking such a course.

Having said that, however, and having done my very best to help the Minister, the real issue that divides us is not the clause, or even the Minister's unwillingness to accept our modest amendment, which has been tabled with entirely helpful intentions; our real quarrel with the Government is their failure to establish the properly funded training programme that is so necessary for the country. It is for those reasons that I seek to put our amendment to the vote.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: I beg to move amendment No. 16, in page 21, line 27, at end insert '; provided that subsection (1)(d) above shall not apply so as to deny relief under this section for the excess (if any) of the payment over the amount of public financial assistance which the individual either has received or is entitled to receive at the time the payment is made'.

The amendment and amendments Nos. 15 and 17, which we shall debate later, explore matters of detail in clause 31, the principles of which we have already debated. Will it be possible to make some concession to those who wish to take advantage of this relief and who receive some assistance from public funds? The circumstances that I specifically envisage are those in which some assistance from public funds is provided but the assistance is not up to the value of the tax relief. I do not propose that tax relief should be granted on that proportion of expenditure that is assisted from public funds. However, I should be interested to hear the Financial Secretary's view about providing tax relief on the balance because, given the nature and size of some awards, such a situation could arise, and it seems against the spirit of the legislation to disadvantage someone in that position.

Mr. Maude: The amendment would allow trainees in receipt of direct assistance also to get relief for any part of the cost for a qualifying course which was not covered by that assistance. The main financial help for people undertaking vocational training is provided by their employers who, typically, meet the whole cost so that the trainee has nothing to find. Generally speaking, there is no tax penalty for such support, provided it is totally related to the current job, as it normally would be.

Many other trainees can benefit from a variety of Government programmes carefully designed and targeted at specific groups. Young people benefit from youth training and training vouchers and those who have been unemployed for a long time benefit from employment training. The new relief provided by the clause contrasts with both state and employer funded training in being aimed at those people who embark on vocational training on their own initiative and at their own expense. Such people would include mothers who wanted to return to the job market after having families or someone in work who wanted to retrain for a different career.

Acceptance of the amendment would mean that those who receive public support for undertaking qualifying courses, but only such courses, would get a double amount of help. The clause simply aims to ensure that everyone who embarks on a course for a national vocational qualification can get some help. We shall look carefully at the schemes of public financial support to be included in the Treasury regulations, by virtue of which relief would not be available. When we frame those regulations, I shall take careful account of views that have been expressed. Essentially, the matter can be dealt with in the context of the regulations to be issued on the clause, and I invite the hon. Gentleman to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: I am grateful to the Minister. It is not our intention, through the amendment, to give people twice the help that they would otherwise receive, and I do not think that the amendment is framed in that way. It is our intention to allow someone who has had some help from elsewhere to claim tax relief on the remainder of his expenditure. I am grateful to the Financial Secretary for taking that issue on board and agreeing to look at it when the regulations are being drafted. That was a helpful assurance and I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: I beg to move amendment No. 15, in page 22, line 12, after 'entitled', insert '; provided however that no tax shall be required to be so accounted for to the Board by the person to whom the payment was made if that person can show (i) that he took all reasonable steps to satisfy himself that the individual in question was entitled to relief under this section and (ii) that at the date the payment in question was made he had complied with any obligation imposed on him by any regulations made under section (32) below'.

This is an exploratory amendment designed to discover whether the Financial Secretary, when he drafts the regulations, will safeguard the position of colleges that have acted in good faith, but which could find themselves laid open to a charge if they have been duped by a student who has not acted in good faith.

It seems unfair that an obligation to the Exchequer could fall on a college in those circumstances and the amendment will cover that point. The amendment sets out some conditions. It is not sufficient for a college to say that it has acted in good faith; it must be able to demonstrate it. If the Financial Secretary says that the point will be dealt with in the regulations, I shall be satisfied.

7.30 pm

Mr. Maude: I assure the hon. Gentleman that the concern expressed in the amendment, though understandable, is unnecessary. The regulations seek to protect training providers from having to repay any relief at source granted to a person who did not qualify for relief if the training provider took reasonable steps to satisfy himself that the relief was legitimate.

The regulations will be aimed primarily at trainees who, after beginning a course, have their fees repaid to them. Equally, it is the case that the subsidy should be repaid to the Exchequer, and I do not think that the hon. Gentleman would quarrel with that.

There would be no requirement on the person granting the relief at source to undertake any arduous checking of claimants, and we would not expect those providing training to compensate the Revenue for false claims made by trainees. I hope that that covers the hon. Gentleman's point.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: The Financial Secretary's remarks entirely satisfy me. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: I beg to move amendment No. 17 in page 22, leave out lines 36 and 37.

It is nice to learn from the Financial Secretary that the regulations are a little further advanced than my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) might have thought when he contributed to an earlier debate.

Amendment No. 17 explores two slightly different matters. The first is the failure of the Government's scheme to offer tax relief at the highest levels offered by the two vocational training councils. I have received a letter—I expect that other hon. Members will have received similar correspondence—from the Chartered Association of Certified Accountants asking why clause 31 does not make relief available for all levels of training, including that leading to professional qualifications. The association is not the only group to have raised this point. The Financial Secretary mentioned it earlier and I refer to it in a neutral way because it needs to be clarified. The amendment is a probing one to seek such clarification.

My second point is one of detail and I am sure that the Financial Secretary will be able to satisfy me on it. It has been suggested to me that tax relief at the lower level might be clawed back or denied if a student went on to the higher levels of vocational training which do not attract tax relief. I suspect that it is not the Government's intention to claw back or deny such relief, but I hope that the Financial Secretary will set the matter straight.

Dr. Godman: Earlier the Financial Secretary gave some details of the English qualifications that the clause covered. Will he assure me that he will seek to determine the likely effect on the equivalent Scottish qualifications by approaching his ministerial colleagues at the Scottish Office in the usual way? I do not want to see Scottish students or trainees disadvantaged in any way vis-à-vis their English counterparts. I should be grateful if the Financial Secretary, perhaps at a later date, could give me that assurance.

Mr. Tim Smith: The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) asked about professional qualifications and I too received a letter from the Chartered Association of Certified Accountants. I do not know what the situation is now, but when I qualified as an accountant many employers paid for training. However, my employer did not, and I had to pay for my training out of my taxed income. I am not asking for retrospective legislation to cover my case 21 years ago, but there is a case for extending tax relief to students who have to pay fees out of their taxed income.

Mr. Maude: I am grateful for the way that the points have been raised. The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) is right to say that the matter has aroused some interest and I am glad to have the opportunity to deal with it.

The hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) was concerned that the Scottish qualifications included in the scheme should be on all-fours with the English and Welsh ones. I cannot imagine that that will not be the case, but I will ensure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland is aware of the hon. Gentleman's point. If necessary, we shall clarify the matter.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East asked about the possible clawback if a trainee moved from level one to level five. I can assure him that that would not happen.

Let me explain why we have chosen to include simply qualifications from level one to level four. National vocational qualifications and Scottish vocation qualifications will cover a wide range of vocational skills across most industrial groups, based on employer-defined standards of competence and performance. That will mean that the schemes are flexible and that the qualifications will be properly targeted. That will guarantee the success of the qualifications.

The structure of both schemes is to have qualifications that extend to jobs at all levels within particular industries. Level one covers most manual work and similar skills for each kind of job and level four broadly applies to supervisory middle management and technical skills. Levels two and three will obviously fill the gap between the two in a progressive way. The range of vocational training that the relief will support is quite wide. We hope that by April 1992 about 70 per cent. of the relevant qualifications will be in place and that the accreditation task up to level four will be substantially complete by the end of 1992.

Level five will in due course cover the very highest levels of vocational training. They will extend to senior managerial skills and to professional and degree level qualifications. We carefully considered including the new level five within training relief, but decided not to do so for a number of reasons.

First, there is little criticism of our performance in vocational training at that level. British professional skills are internationally recognised as being of the highest quality. Secondly—and I say this with some diffidence in view of the personal experiences of my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith)—those who embark on training at that level can readily reap the personal financial reward for their investment in human capital. Therefore, they have less of a claim on the support of taxpayers. However, that may not apply to those who abandon their professional calling to enter the more doubtfully rewarding profession of politics.

The third, purely practical, reason is that there are no level five qualifications currently in existence. The National Council for Vocational Qualifications and Scotvec are still discussing with professional and other bodies how best such qualifications might best be brought into the scheme. By restricting relief to levels one to four, we are concentrating resources on practical and supervisory skills, which is where the main criticisms of our current performance are directed, and where help and encouragement are needed.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: I am grateful for the Financial Secretary's assurance that tax relief given at the lower level of training will endure if a student advances to a higher level, and for the hon. Gentleman's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman).

On the more vexed question of exclusions at the highest level, in the light of the Financial Secretary's explanation, I believe that the Bill should proceed as drafted. If it is found that the hon. Gentleman's explanation has not stood the test of time, we can return to the issue in a future Finance Bill. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 31 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 21

MARRIED COUPLE'S ALLOWANCE

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): I beg to move amendment No. 18, in page 15, line 40, at end insert—

'(3) Subsection (2) of section 257B of that Act shall cease to have effect after the year 1990-91; subsection (1) shall have effect for 1991-92 and subsequent years as if it read

"(1) Where a man is entitled to relief under section 257A for any year of assessment, he may transfer to his wife the whole or any part of the relief to which he is so entitled; and where such a transfer is effected, he shall cease to be entitled to a deduction from his total income for that year of the amount transferred and his wife shall be entitled to a deduction from her total income for that year of that amount"; and subsection (3) shall have effect for 1991-92 and subsequent years as if after "relates", there were added

"(aa) shall specify the amount of relief which is to be transferred to his wife.".'.

Clause 21 freezes the married couple's allowance at the current level of £1,720 per year for the financial year 1991-92. Only last June, the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, who is now Prime Minister and who I suspect exerted some influence over the contents of the Bill before us, said in a speech to Welsh Conservatives that Labour's proposals in relation to the allowance were especially malign, and reserved for special attack and venom any proposal to freeze it.

Ten months later, the self-same Government, now led by the self-same person, are proposing precisely to freeze the married couple's allowance. It therefore comes as something of a surprise to my right hon. and hon. Friends and myself to find that a Government who were excoriating such a proposal only a few months ago are now including it in the Finance Bill.

The married couple's allowance should really be called the married man's allowance in another guise. Under section 257(1)(a) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988, which was brought in as part of the Finance Bill 1988, the allowance initially goes to the husband and can only be transferred to his spouse with his consent. Even then, only that part of the allowance that the husband himself cannot use may be transferred—only that portion that he cannot set against his own taxable income. The transfer of the allowance from the husband to the wife can be done only in very limited circumstances, where the husband's taxable income is not sufficient for him to be able to make use of the allowance in its entirety.

That makes a mockery of any pretence that there is independent taxation of husbands and wives. It makes a mockery also of the allowance's description as a married couple's allowance. It is directed primarily—and for the majority of taxpayers, entirely—at the husband and not at the couple. That can lead to discrimination against the wife in cases where there is no specific agreement between the couple as to who might make best use of the allowance.

The allowance may also discriminate against a couple where different rates of marginal tax are paid by the husband and the wife. If the wife is paying at a higher rate than the husband, yet it is only he who can offset the married couple's allowance against income, the couple will lose, whereas they would not if the wife could offset at least part of the allowance against her income.

The current operation of the married couple's allowance is not good for equity, fairness, or the dignity of wives in the taxation system. Independent taxation is a mirage. For three years in succession, we have sought to press on the Government a change in the way in which that allowance is applied.

Mr. Tim Smith: How can the hon. Gentleman assert that independent taxation is a mirage when, for the first time, married women are being sent tax returns?

Mr. Smith: That may be so, but most married women still cannot make any use of the married couple's allowance, which makes nonsense of any claim of truly independent taxation.

We acknowledge that an amendment that sought to put into effect the full import of our proposals would not be in order. In an ideal world, we would like to see the married couple offered a choice of how they apportioned their allowance. If they wanted to apportion it entirely in the name of the husband, or in that of the wife, or if they preferred to split it in any way between them, they would be able to choose to do so.

Failing agreement between the two parties about the proportion that should go to each, we should like an automatic equal apportionment between them. That would be a sensible approach, which would preserve the principles of independence and would benefit a small number of people who are disadvantaged by the way in which the present system operates.

However, within the terms of the Bill we cannot frame an amendment to put that into operation, because it would increase the tax liability of a limited number of men, and it would therefore be out of order within the terms of this Committee. Therefore, we have drafted what I would describe as a second-best proposal, which forms the content of amendment No. 18.

The amendment goes some way to redress the problem of the present married couple's allowance and would allow it to be freely transferable, with the husband's agreement, whether he could have used it or not. That is the key change as, at present, it is freely transferable from husband to wife only with the husband's consent and if he is unable to make use of it. We are lifting that restriction. Under this amendment, if the husband wished—whether or not he were able to use the allowance—it would be possible for him to transfer it to his wife. That is fairer than the present position, and that is why we have tabled the amendment.

Having explained why we tabled the amendment, two further matters arise in connection with this amendment and this clause which ought to be named. First, when the Chancellor announced in the Budget that he was going to freeze the married couple's allowance for this year, he said that he would use the money to extend other forms of support to families and children.

"more should be done to help families with children. I propose to use the resources released by not increasing the married couple's allowance for that purpose."—[Official Report, 19 March 1991; Vol. 188, c. 179.]

Note carefully the words:

"use the resources released by not increasing the married couple's allowance."

That brings £360 million in revenue to the Exchequer in 1991-92. In 1992-93, it will bring in £490 million.

In return, the Chancellor made some modest increases in child benefit, but they amounted to a cost of £220 million only to the Exchequer, which leaves a substantial surplus of revenues from the freezing of the married couple's allowance.

As far as I can tell, those substantial extra revenues have fallen into a black hole, and have not been used for child or family support. The Chancellor should have used the entirety of the money that the Exchequer raised by freezing the married couple's allowance to support families with children in other ways. We have long held the view that support for child benefit is by far the most effective means of targeting help to families with children.

It is sad that the Chancellor did not live up to his statement in the Budget and use the entirety of the revenue open to the Exchequer as a result of that change to help families with children. He should have done so, he said he was going to do so, but he did not. That is a failure on his part. Later, it would be useful to hear from the Minister of State what will be done with the extra money which falls to the Exchequer as a result of this clause.

I mentioned child benefit, and it is important to view the measures in this clause and the proposal contained in our amendment against the background of what is happening to that benefit. It is a tax-free cash benefit, paid per child, per week, directly to the person responsible for the child or children—usually directly to the mother. It was introduced in 1977, replacing child tax allowance and family allowance. Child benefit is universal, and is paid regardless of income or capital.

In Britain, 6·7 million families receive child benefit for 12 million children, at an annual cost to the Exchequer of £4·6 billion. The take-up rate is 98 per cent. Quite clearly, it is the best way to assist families on low incomes with children.

Child benefit was frozen at £7·25 per week in September 1987 by the then Chancellor, the right hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Lawson), until April 1991, when the Government granted a £1 per week increase to the first child, taking the benefit for them to £8·25 per week. The rate for subsequent children remains frozen at £7·25 until October of this year.

In his Budget statement in March 1991, the Chancellor announced that the rate for the first child would increase by another £1 to £9·25 in October. The rate for subsequent children would increase by a miserable 25p per child.

In his Budget statement, the Chancellor also promised to start uprating child benefit in line with inflation from April 1992. However, child benefit is still below what it should have been if it had been uprated in line with price increases since April 1987, when it was frozen. If that had been the case, the value of child benefit for each and every child would now be £9·55 per child per week. Even for the first child, the value is short of that amount from October this year, and the value for subsequent children is substantially short of the amount that it should have been.

One of the immediate acts of a Labour Government will be to fulfil our pledge to uprate child benefit in full to the value to which it ought to have been uprated to account for the rise in prices since 1987. That would be a more substantial way to assist families with children than anything that the Government have done in recent months or years, even after considering the repentance in the Budget and in the Chancellor's statement.

The Government are accruing extra income to the Exchequer by the change that they are making in clause 21. They are not devoting the entirety of that income to the purpose for which it was supposed to be used. They are using only a portion of it to increase child benefit, and they could have used more.

In tabling the amendment, we are doing two things. First, we are drawing attention to the inadequacies of the present arrangement for the use of the married couple's allowance, and to the unfairness of that arrangement; we are seeking to make it fairer, and to offer couples at least some choice in how the allowance is apportioned. Secondly, we are drawing attention to the fact that the Government should be offering families with children much more support. In freezing child benefit and then neglecting to uprate it properly, the Government have failed Britain's families. Opposition Members will continue to remind them of that during the coming weeks and months.

8 pm

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): I shall be brief, because I know that the Minister of State wishes to speak. Let me put it on record, however, that my party shares the objectives of Labour's amendment—and shares even more emphatically those of the amendment that Labour Members would have tabled had that been in order. Indeed, we tabled such an amendment; and it is intriguing to note that an amendment along the same lines was debated last year, but somehow slipped through the net. The objective that we share is, of course, to make independent taxation genuinely independent.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: I know that the hon. Gentleman has strong views about whether amendments are in order. Given what he said to my hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) in yesterday's debate, I hope that he will make fulsome apologies for having enabled an amendment that was out of order to be deemed in order last year. The strictures that he applied to the Opposition were, after all, very severe.

Mr. Beith: I shall do nothing of the sort. It was Labour's amendment that was found to be in order last year, and it is the Labour amendment that has turned out to be out of order this year. I shall not stray too far from the subject of our present debate; let me point out, however, that my criticism last night related not to whether the amendment was technically in order, but to the confusion that was apparent in the setting out of its objectives. It also related to the failure of the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett)—the spokesman for the official Opposition—to explain how her party could achieve two objectives at once without adding up the cost of both.

Happily, that does not apply to amendment No. 18. We agree—I hope—that we want to secure genuinely independent taxation that will not depend on the husband's choosing to transfer allowance that he does not require, but will allow each partner to obtain the maximum benefit from his or her share. The current procedures do not allow that. As the arguments advanced in support of them have been largely technical, I should like to think that the Government really wish to achieve the objective of the amendment, and that they will continue to try to do so. Indeed, I rather hope that the Minister of State—who, I am sure, takes a personal interest in the matter—will tell us that the Government are still trying to achieve that aim of genuinely independent taxation and genuinely divisible married couple's allowance.

I am glad that you called me before you called the Minister of State, Mr. McWilliam, because I want to underline the question put by the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith): what is the future of the married couple's allowance? Do the Government intend to phase it out and let it wither on the vine by not increasing it in line with inflation year by year; or is that simply a short-term treatment?

The failure to index the allowance has released considerable sums, more of which could have been devoted to child benefit. Is it the Government's policy to use more and more of the savings obtained from not indexing the married couple's allowance to fund child benefit improvements? If it is, we can support them in that objective, but so far the position is unclear. The Minister would do us a service if she set out the Government's policy on both the future of the married couple's allowance and the extent to which the savings to the Exchequer will be devoted to child benefit. She should also continue to try to find a mechanism to achieve the objective of the amendment.

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West): I wish to make a small but, I hope, important point about child benefit and about whether people will actually receive the proposed increase.

On Second Reading, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury said:

"perception is lagging behind reality".—[Official Report, 30 April 1991; Vol. 190, c. 179.]

I sometimes feel like turning that phrase the other way round, and suggesting that reality—in terms of tax and benefits—often lags behind public perceptions.

Many people believe, deep down, that they will receive £140 off their next poll tax bill when it arrives some time in June, as a result of the proposed changes. In fact, we know that that applies to only 40 per cent. of people; but that did not prevent Conservative candidates in the local elections from putting out leaflets suggesting that every person in the country would receive a cheque for that amount, as if it would be signed by the Secretary of State for the Environment himself.

That is manifestly not the truth; and exactly the same is happening in regard to child benefit. When we consider one benefit, we must also consider its interaction with others. The increase in child benefit has been sold as a great bonus; the brakes are off and, we are told, every family will gain. Will the Minister confirm, however, that the effect of that increase will be rubbed out by the impact of the Government's freezing of single-parent benefit? Lone parents must be among the poorest groups in our society, especially when they have no opportunity to work —or, if they have, can work only in part-time and, usually, low-paid work. Some must stay at home with their children. When the freezing of the single-parent benefit is put together with the increase in child benefit, the result will be that such people will not receive the extra money that the Government are promising.

This is another classic case of the Government's giving out what they nowadays call a "headline" figure—that usually means a figure that they hope will make the headlines in a newspaper or on television—which does not represent money in people's pockets. What has been given with one hand has, effectively, been taken away with the other.

If the Government had done the decent thing, they would have uprated child benefit properly. Then we would not have had to witness the farce of the Government's playing with the language in the last Conservative manifesto, in which we were told that the benefit would be uprated "as now". That meant that it would remain "as now" on the day of the last general election. No uprating took place until the public put pressure on the Government to take the brakes off and begin to uprate the benefit in line with inflation—and they are not there yet.

I hope that, next time, the Government's promises will be listened to carefully. What has happened to child benefit is, in my view, an illustration of what the Government do. They make a promise and wrap it up in language, and people think that they will receive the money; but, when they work out the details, they find that they have been short-changed.

The Minister of State, Treasury (Mrs. Gillian Shephard): I appreciate the aims of the amendment—and those of the "non-amendment", if I may use EC parlance. I must admit that I have some sympathy with those aims. The amendment is similar in some respects to one that was considered in Committee last year. My right hon. Friend the present Chancellor of the Exchequer expressed his sympathy with what that amendment sought to achieve, but felt unable to accept it and others because, in his view, the benefit would not be commensurate with the cost. The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) has given some idea of what his amendment aims to achieve and of the complications that might ensue.

There were three reasons for my right hon. Friend's decision last year. I think that it is worth repeating them, because they apply, to a greater or lesser extent, to any proposal to make the present arrangements more flexible. My right hon. Friend said that the present straightforward system might be made more complex. He did not want many more people to have to fill in tax returns, and to have to deal with the Inland Revenue, which would place increased burdens on both sides. He also felt that there should be no reduction in the privacy that husbands and wives enjoy under the present system

The amendment that we are discussing raises similar concerns. The concerns might not matter and the cost might be worthwhile if many people were better off as a result. But the amendment would not have that effect because it would enable fewer than 50,000 people, or about 1 per cent. of the total, to arrange their tax affairs in such a way as to reduce the wife's higher rate tax liability. No other couples would be better off in cash terms as a result of the new transfer option offered by the amendment.

It is possible for a husband and wife to run their financial affairs separately now. That is why we were the first Government to treat a married woman as a fully independent taxpayer under the new system of independent taxation. I realise that, although a couple might not benefit financially from being able to split the married couple's allowance, they might consider it the right thing to do as a matter of principle. That point was made in the amendment and by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith).

In considering the present amendment we have to look at the principle—which I agree is important—and the practicalities. I believe that the considerations are outweighed by the practical disadvantages of the proposed amendment. The main advantage of the present system is that it ensures that the married couple's allowance is given initially to the partner who is most likely to be able to use it effectively—the husband. That minimises the need for transfer, so it is a cost-efficient way of giving relief to married couples. Of course that is not popular with everyone. Some people do not like it because they would gain more by a different set of rules and others do not approve of it as a matter of principle.

I assure the Committee that the Government have considered carefully on several occasions various options for making the rules more flexible for transferring the allowance. However, we have always come up against the fact that the benefits to be gained from a change are not sufficient to justify the upheaval.

Last year my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer explained some of the disadvantages of that option. I shall briefly repeat his explanation. Eighty per cent. of taxpayers are dealt with through pay-as-you-earn. The amendment would entail moving away from a system whereby 80 per cent. of these taxpayers do not make tax returns and do not deal with the Inland Revenue but are covered by PAYE. From a practical point of view the amendment could be regarded as a retrograde step. If the amendment were accepted, married couples would have to be informed about the new options and given the opportunity to choose them. The Inland Revenue would have to ensure that the husband's and wife's tax offices, which deal with each other only occasionally under independent taxation, made the necessary adjustments to their records. Procedures would have to be set up to deal with couples who wanted to change their decision later because during the year their income turned out to be more or less than they had expected. That would carry a cost in extra staff and extra worry about the options for millions of married couples whose tax affairs are now straightforward.

Although the amendment is not exactly the same as those that were tabled last year, the intention is the same, and I must reach the same conclusion as my right hon. Friend did last year. I certainly admit quite freely that the present system is not perfect, but in practical terms it is the best possible solution.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury raised some specific matters including the apparent discrepancy of £140 million between the yield from freezing the married couples' allowance and what is being spent on the increase in child benefit from October this year.

I know that the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) will understand that the social security system is a great ship of the state and it takes time to get new systems into place and that 7 October is the earliest date on which the additional increases in child benefit can be paid. There is generally a six-month lead time before social security changes can be implemented and from that day all families with children will receive a further £1 a week for the first eligible child and 25p a week for subsequent children. To that extent, the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury is correct that there is a discrepancy of £140 million, but I ask him to regard the Budget as a total package. Of course the £140 million is within all the measures included in this year's Budget. Next year, however, the cost of introducing the increases in child benefit will be accounted for by freezing the married couples' allowance. I ask the hon. Gentleman to accept that, here again, there was a practical difficulty.

8.15 pm

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed asked about the Government's future intentions for the married couple's allowance. He asked whether the freeze was the first step towards its abolition. He reads far too much into a decision that was taken in an economic situation which called for a tight Budget this year to direct scarce resources towards families with children. It reflects the Chancellor's priorities this year. As the hon. Gentleman knows, all the allowances are reviewed each year in the run up to the Budget and considered in the light of the economic circumstance then prevailing.

The hon. Member for Leeds, West asked about the freeze on one-parent benefit. Lone parents already have the £1 increase in child benefit for the first child. One-parent benefit has been frozen, but that freeze is fully offset in income support. The level of one-parent benefit is subject to review by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security each year. The hon. Gentleman will understand that, although it is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security, important improvements for lone parents are on the way in the child support Bill which will come to the House next month.

The hon. Members for Islington, South and Finsbury and for Leeds, West asked about the freezing of child benefit in the past. I remind them and the Committee that the resources from the freezing of child benefit were used for other social security priorities. Annual spending on poorer families has increased by £500 million since 1988 and the resources released by the freezing of child benefit during that period were in part directed to helping poorer pensioners.

Mr. Battle: Is it not true that the increase in money to the poorest was used in housing benefit as their rent went up, so in effect it was a subsidy to the housing system?

Mrs. Shephard: No, I do not agree with that. The hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that there were enhanced arrangements for people on income support and family credit which accounted in part for the £500 million. I remind him that the overall spending on families with children is higher now than it would have been had child benefit been regularly uprated since 1988. As we have been talking about the prosperity of families, I remind the Committee that the take-home pay of families on half the average wage has gone up by 29 per cent. under the present Government compared with 4·2 per cent. under Labour and that of the average family with two children has gone up by nearly 37 per cent. compared with a measly 0·6 per cent. under Labour. I think that families know where their best interests lie.

Mr. Chris Smith: I should begin by welcoming the Minister of State to our proceedings on the Finance Bill as the clause that we are discussing is her first segment of the Bill. I also welcome some of her remarks. She said that she had some sympathy with the aims of our amendment, that she regarded the principle enshrined in it as important and that only practicalities outweighed it in her mind. In another part of her speech, she said, quite correctly, that the present married couples' allowance system is not perfect.

I welcome all those statements. It is a pity that, although the Government support the principle of making the married couples' allowance a joint decision between husband and wife rather than an automatic accretion to the husband's tax relief, they do not carry their sympathy into legislation.

The Minister of State said that the cost next year of the commitment to child benefit would use up more of the amount raised by freezing the married couple's allowance, I do not think that it would use up all of it. If I am incorrect, I shall happily give way to the Minister. The figures in the Red Book do not seem to indicate that, even then, it would use up all of it.

Mrs. Shephard: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that there is a minor difference between the two figures. I say "minor" within the context of the Government's whole public expenditure budget, which is enormous—amounting to some £50 million. Given that we are talking about next year, and given the difficulty of predicting the number of children who will qualify for child benefit, the discrepancy should be regarded as just that. It may be ironed out by the birth rate next year.

Mr. Smith: I am glad that the Minister of State confirms that there will be a shortfall in the use of the money for child benefit next year. Although £50 million may be a minor amount in terms of the overall public budget, I should prefer it if £50 million had been used to support children through child benefit rather than simply being swallowed up by the Exchequer.

The Minister of State also argued that our amendment, which would allow the husband to transfer the married couples' allowance to the wife if he so wished, would benefit financially only 1 per cent. of tax-paying couples. I accept that only a small number of people would benefit financially from such an arrangement, but the point of the amendment is that not only financial benefit but the principle of choice is at stake. A couple should jointly determine what happens rather than having the Exchequer determine by fiat that the whole amount will go to the husband. The amendment is not just about financial gain but is about equity of treatment between husband and wife within the taxation system.

We believe that the principles that we have adumbrated in relation to the amendment and the clause still stand. The Government's praying in aid of practical difficulties has not stopped them dreaming up systems of local government finance and all sorts of other mechanisms to penalise people. Praying in aid practicalities in defence of doing nothing on a basic principle that is right does not wash. However, because of the Bill's strictures, we could not put forward in its entirety the proposal that we should have liked to make on the married couples' allowance. Our amendment is therefore very much second best, and although it would be a small step in the right direction, it would not be right to push it to a vote. However, I hope that we can return to the matter on a future occasion. Therefore, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 21 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 14

BAD DEBTS

Mr. Chris Smith: I beg to move amendment No. 19, in page 11, line 18, after 'one year' insert

'and after "elapsed" there shall be added ", or the company or individual liable to pay any outstanding amount of the consideration has become insolvent and (except where paragraph 10(1A)(B) below applies) the person has submitted a claim in the insolvency for the oustanding amount of the consideration.

(1A) a company becomes insolvent for the purposes of this section if:

(a) it goes into liquidation in the United Kingdom or the Isle of Man at a time when its assets are insufficient for the payment of its debts and other liabilities and the expenses of the winding up;

(b) a person who has been appointed in Great Britain to act as the Administrator or Administrative Receiver issues a certificate of his opinion that, if it went into liquidation, the assets of the company would be insufficient to cover the payment of any dividend in respect of debts which are neither secured nor preferential; or

(c) a composition or scheme proposed by the Directors is approved under Part I of the Insolvency Act 1986.

(1B) An individual becomes insolvent for the purposes of this section if:

(a) in England and Wales he is adjudged bankrupt, a deed of arrangement is made for the benefit of his creditors, a composition or scheme proposed by him is approved under Part VIII of the Insolvency Act 1986 or, after his death, his estate falls to be administered in accordance with an order under Part XV of the Act;

(b) in Scotland, sequestration of his estate is awarded, he signs a trust deed for his creditors or, after his death, a judicial factor is appointed under section 11A of the Judicial Factors (Scotland) Act 1989 to administer his estate;

(c) in Northern Ireland he is adjudged bankrupt, a deed of arrangement is made for the benefit of his creditors, a resolution of his creditors is approved by the court under section 5 of the Bankruptcy

Amendment Act (Northern Ireland) 1929 or, after his death, the court makes an order for the administration in bankruptcy of his estate; or

(d) in the Isle of Man, he is adjudged bankrupt, a deed of arrangement is made for the benefit of his creditors or, after his death, the court makes an order for the administration in bankruptcy of his estate,".".

Clause 14 relates to the recovery of bad debts on which value added tax has been paid to Customs and Excise. It reduces the waiting period for recovering such VAT from two years to one year. The issue is important because it affects substantially many businesses, especially smaller businesses. However, many traders in the smallest category of businesses, with a turnover of under £300,000, use the cash accounting mechanism for paying VAT, which becomes payable to Customs and Excise only when it is received by the trader rather than when the invoices are issued. The cash accounting system gets round the problem of bad debts altogether. The companies that use that system are unaffected by the clause.

However, other traders must pay the VAT to Customs and Excise as they issue invoices to their customers. If they never receive the VAT from the customer, they can eventually reclaim it from Customs. Until 1990, they could reclaim it only if the customer could be proved to be insolvent. As a result of the change introduced in the Finance Act 1990, they were allowed to reclaim it if they had written off the debt in their own books and if the debt was over two years old and had not been paid. That helped some traders but disadvantaged others, for example, if the customer who owed the VAT went rapidly into liquidation but the trader then had to wait for two years before he could recover the uncollected VAT.

In our debates on last year's Finance Bill, we argued that the Government's proposal was unfair. We tabled amendments that sought to allow the old and new reliefs to run in parallel, so it would then be a case either of a period having elapsed without the debt being paid or of the company that owed the debt becoming insolvent and, as a result, the relief being triggered. We suggested that those measures could run side by side and that that would solve the problem. As an alternative, we proposed that the two-year period should be reduced to one year, thus relieving hard-pressed traders and reducing the number of cases where the old system would have given relief before the new system came into operation.

It is worth examining exactly what happened during the passage of last year's Finance Bill, because the Government's behaviour on the specific issue of bad debts was instructive. When we debated the measure in Committee on the Floor of the House, the Government clearly said that they believed that there was some merit in our argument for a shorter time period than the two-year one. The then Economic Secretary to the Treasury, who has subsequently risen in the ranks to become the Government Chief Whip, said:

"Our judgment was that two years is an appropriate period of time to elapse before a company decides that a debt cannot be recovered."

8.30 pm

The then Economic Secretary said that he was aware of the arguments that we and others, including some of his hon. Friends, had been mounting. He continued:

"I have concluded that there may be scope for further improvement to the scheme. We shall be examining that possibility between now and Report stage."—[Official Report, 15 May 1990; Vol. 172, c. 812.]

That welcome sign of movement on the Government's part came about last May. But in July last year, when we debated the Bill on Report, there was no sign in the amendments of any extra relief on the bad debt issue. Our proposal for a reduction in the time period from two years to one year was nowhere to be seen. Having given a sign that they were likely to see fit to bring forward some further improvement to the Bill in May, the Government reneged on that commitment when we discussed the Bill on Report in July.

The then Economic Secretary also spoke in the debate on Report. He said that he did not believe that it was right to go for a shorter period and stated:

"In the past two months, we have given careful consideration to whether we could justify a further change, but we have come to the conclusion that we could not."—[Official Report, 16 July 1990; Vol. 176, c. 797.]

Having reached that conclusion on 16 July last year, the Government came forward in this year's Budget and Finance Bill debate to say that they were wrong all along. They have, in effect, accepted the arguments that we mounted in Committee and on Report during the passage of last year's Finance Bill and have introduced precisely the proposal that we made in Committee to reduce the qualifying period for relief from two years to one—that is welcome.

Our amendment seeks to draw the Government just a little bit further along the road to provide relief to hard-pressed traders. The U-turn that they have made on the issue of the time period—agreeing to reduce it from two years to one year—should be accompanied by the additional provision that, if a company becomes insolvent within that one-year period, the VAT bad debt relief should be immediately claimable, rather than the claimant having to wait the full year.

We believe that that proposal is important for two reasons. First, the rate of company insolvencies and liquidations is currently running at a record level. Some 24,442 firms failed in 1990 in Britain and, in the first quarter of this year, the numbers were up by almost 70 per cent. on the equivalent period for last year. Peat, Marwick, McLintock has estimated that there will be five times as many receiverships in 1991 as there were in 1988. Therefore, the problem of firms going bust and, as a result, being unable to meet their VAT debts to other traders is bound to increase. While the provision of a reduction to one year in the time period is welcome, the introduction of an alternative, parallel system of being able to claim the relief when an insolvency occurs would bring extra relief.

The second principal reason for the amendment is that cash flow problems often catch out companies, especially small ones, and force them to close earlier than was, perhaps, economically necessary. We propose the amendment in order to assist the cash flow position of traders who have already paid VAT to Customs and Excise but have not received it from the person to whom they sold the goods or services. If the company owing VAT goes into liquidation three, four or five months after the VAT was paid to Customs and Excise, there will be a further seven, eight or nine months to wait before the VAT can be reclaimed—that makes a seven to nine months delay in the cash flow represented by that VAT payment.

Our proposal would directly assist the cash flow problems of such companies by enabling them to claim the VAT relief immediately upon the liquidation of the person or company owing the money. Therefore, we believe that our measure will enable the Government to go further than they have. We welcome the fact that they have now seen the light and accepted this year what we were urging on them last year. However, we wish that they could go a little further and ensure that the "payable on liquidation" system that was in place could run in parallel with their new provision to improve the system further and assist businesses, especially smaller ones, even more than the new clause does.

Mr. Beith: This useful amendment addresses the particular problem of insolvency. We all welcomed the introduction of the VAT bad debts provision and sought to extend it last year. We have all welcomed the shortening of the period to one year, as announced in the Budget statement. All that is the tip of the iceberg of the bad debt problems affecting small businesses. We believe that many more steps should be taken, including the sort of measures for interest provisions for bad debts supported by some of the Government's own Back Benchers. Bad debts cause severe problems for small business men and women and, with the VAT man on their back as well, they should be afforded any possible relief from bad debt problems that they ought not to be bearing. Therefore, the Government's decision to shorten the time period is most welcome.

I am glad that the amendment addresses the insolvency problem and I hope that the Minister will be reasonably sympathetic towards it. I hope that she will also realise that, within the purview of her Department, there are other issues affecting small businesses to address. The Government should recognise responsibility for those problems relating to debt, as they presided over the recessionary climate in which those debts arose. I hope that the Minister will be sympathetic to that problem.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) has given us some background to clause 14 and the amendment. He said, as did the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), that in 1988 there was a comprehensive review of the arrangements for the relief of VAT on bad debts. During that review, the views of professional and business organisations were sought. The review recommended a change from the old, restrictive system, dependent only on the formal insolvency of the debtor, to a new, comprehensive scheme, providing relief on all bad debts, subject to elapsed time and write-off in the trader's accounts.

When last year's Finance Bill was debated in the Committee of the whole House and the House, one of the main concerns expressed centred on the effect of the two-year waiting period. During the year there have been representations from professional and business organisations, as well as individuals, to the effect that the waiting period is too long and that, at a time of recession, the cash flow problems thus caused are onerous. I began to wonder whether the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury too would be begrudging, but he welcomed the reduction of the waiting period to one year. It was precisely because of the concerns that had been expressed during the year that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer introduced the provision to reduce the period. That reduction should help to meet the concern and the criticisms that have been expressed.

Mr. Chris Smith: I hope that, in the point that I am about to make, I shall not appear grudging. During the passage of last year's Finance Act, people involved in business and industry up and down the country, as well as Members of Parliament, made innumerable representations about the two-year period that the Government then proposed. The Government considered the matter carefully for two months. Why, after their careful consideration, did they fail to accept that one year would be better, whereas this year they have felt able to accept the case that we made then? Why have they changed their minds?

Mrs. Shephard: I thought I had made it clear that the representations continued during the year. The Government and the customs authorities have listened, and have responded by introducing these changes.

The old, very restricted scheme allowed relief only on the formal insolvency of the debtor. At the centre of all argument for the extension of relief is the feeling of injustice on the part of a supplier who has to pay tax on a supply for which there is no prospect of payment. That is very well understood. Indeed, that theme was consistent throughout the consultative exercise before the 1988 bad debt review. Many trade associations criticised the inadequacy, the ponderous nature and the unfairness of the old arrangements. It is clear that, on grounds of equity, there are no strong arguments for defending the restrictiveness of the insolvency-based arrangements. The new, comprehensive scheme greatly widens the scope by providing relief on many more debts. It extends relief to the very many cases in which debtors, over a long period, refuse to pay or pay only token amounts, or simply vanish. The new scheme removes a legitimate and long-standing grievance, and, together with the halving of the waiting period now proposed, will provide an immediate boost —estimated at £340 million in 1991-92—to the cash flow of business.

At the time of the 1988 review, detailed consideration was given to a dual scheme of bad debt relief, and the concept was rejected. Let me outline the main reasons. First, there was the problem of accounting arrangements. There would be a need for voluminous regulations and instructions to cover all contingencies, and an attempt to minimise the dangers of double claiming would be both burdensome and intrusive to business. Let me give an example. The two schemes do not match in every respect. They do not match in clawback. There is no clawback under the formal insolvency scheme, but there is under the new scheme. If that were left unaltered, it would advantage one type of debtor over another. If clawback were extended to the existing insolvency scheme, it would lead to quite a nightmare changeover, in which claims to liquidators under the new scheme would be tax-inclusive, whereas those under the old scheme would be tax-exclusive.

I know that the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury is aware that the introduction of regulations—after the contribution of the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) I hardly dare utter that word—to cope with this kind of problem would be difficult. The existence of a dual scheme, governed by complex regulations, would be wide open for double claiming—either accidental, by traders not unnaturally confused, or, more worryingly, deliberate, by unscrupulous traders. It would be all too easy to claim once, when the debtor became insolvent, and again when the elapsed time criterion had been met. There is also the question of controlling the system. Any VAT system has to be both fair and convenient to operate, not only to business but to the Customs authorities. When one looks at the problems of controlling a dual scheme—complex to operate, and open to abuse—it becomes clear that the control problems would be formidable. We estimate that we should need 150 to 200 extra VAT control staff just to police a dual scheme. I am sure that most hon. Members agree that that would not be a very productive use of resources.

8.45 pm

Perhaps our overwhelming reason for not supporting the amendment is that our consultations with business and industry have revealed that the main support for a dual scheme resulted from the waiting time of two years. Indeed, at a recent meeting with the Customs authorities, the CBI said that it would not be interested in a dual scheme if the waiting period were one year. There were other representations to the same effect. The reduction to one year has gone a long way towards meeting the problems expressed by representatives of trade and industry.

The hon. Members for Islington, South and Finsbury and for Berwick-upon-Tweed mentioned current problems of companies and other businesses, including insolvency and cash flow. In that regard, I should remind the Committee that this year's Budget injected £750 million into business. Many of the Budget measures were designed to help cash flow—the reduction in corporation tax; the extension of the carry-back period for losses from one year to three years; the deregulatory measures; the 40 per cent. increase in VAT threshold; the possibility of quarterly PAYE and national insurance returns for small businesses to help 700,000 firms; and the extension of simplified accounts. The Budget, of which this clause is a part, went a very long way to help companies and other businesses with the problems that they currently face.

Mr. Chris Smith: I immediately acknowledge that the reduction from two years to one year goes a long way towards meeting the problems that people in business identified when the two-year period was introduced last year. That is precisely why we urged this course on the Government last year. Their repentance is a year late, but, none the less, welcome. The Minister dwelt on the benefits of the new system, but failed to recognise that it has disadvantages where liquidation occurs within a few months of the payment of VAT to Customs and Excise. That raises a very genuine problem. I agree that there may not now be as much pressure for a parallel scheme of this kind as there was last year, when the period was two years, but insolvencies that occur within a very short period of the payment of VAT present serious problems. I hope that the Government will consider whether such a parallel scheme could be implemented. We may even find another case of the repentance that we have seen this year. Of course, it will be a different Government of another party who will introduce next year's Bill.

The Minister referred to practical problems. She talked about the complexity of the clawback system and about the dangers of double claiming. We accept that there might be practical difficulties, but they would not be insurmountable. When something is worth doing, it is worth overcoming practical difficulties to do it. None the less, I hope that, in respect of this issue, we shall be able to proceed by means of consensus rather than confrontation.

It is a matter to which I hope the Government will pay continuing attention. If it becomes identified during our further deliberations on the Bill that business is unhappy without the parallel provision of an insolvency trigger for VAT bad debt relief, I hope that the Government will consider an amendment even at the 11th hour.

With that hope and with the wish to proceed by consensus if possible, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Roads (Western Isles)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Greg Knight.]

8.51 pm

Mr. Calum Macdonald (Western Isles): Good communications are the key to economic progress. That is especially true the more remote and peripheral people are from the core, and therefore especially true in the Western isles. We need good communications both between us and the mainland, cut off as we are by the waters of the Minch, but also internally, between the various islands of the Hebridean chain.

The Western Isles council currently maintains a roads network of approximately 740 miles of adopted road, of which only 155 miles are of double track width. The remaining 585 miles are single-track and of extremely sub-standard foundation and alignment. That presents a huge problem for the development of good communications, and is therefore a major impediment to economic progress in the islands. I accept that it cannot all be tackled overnight or even over the next decade, and I want to make a plea this evening for a focused effort to tackle one crucial part of that road network, the main road running north and south through the Western Isles, which I shall refer to as the spinal route.

The spinal route runs from Ness in Lewis to Leverburgh in Harris; and then from Newton in North Uist to Ludag in South Uist, and from Eoligarry to Castlebay in Barra. Upgrading would ensure a good north-south road linking the island chain, serving the most populated areas in the Hebrides, including all five of the mainland ferry terminals. The strategic nature of the spinal route for future economic development and inter-island as well as mainland communication means that the benefits of upgrading will be widely spread and provide maximum value for money.

I do not propose to dwell on the inadequacies of the present road. The Minister is familiar with the islands from the days when his family used to own a sizeable chunk of them, and he and his brother were themselves familiar sights, tramping through the heather in their kilts. He knows full well the deplorable condition of the road network in the islands, particularly in the Uists, as do the officials from the Scottish Development Department who visited the islands last year to make a special report on this issue. To refresh his memory, however, I have provided him with some photos to peruse. What they depict are not isolated tracks in the most remote parts of the islands but sections of the main spinal route, the main economic thoroughfare of the Hebrides over which all trade and commerce have to pass.

Why is the road network so bad? Most roads in the Western isles have been developed from rough footpaths to cart tracks and then to vehicular carriageways by means of various layers of clay, stones and rocks being placed one on top of the other, with no attempt to remove the underlying layers of peat which, in places can be up to 3 m thick. That results in a road which floats on a peat foundation and which is therefore prone to excessive shrinkage, expansion and consequent deformation under even moderate traffic. In addition, climatic conditions contribute to extensive cracking and rutting.

I am assured by the engineering department of the Western Isles council that, if assessed on mainland criteria, over 50 per cent. of the island network would be classified as failed. In consequence, maintenance cycles have to be more regular on the islands than is the mainland norm. The problem, caused by inadequate peat foundations, is exacerbated by the roads being single-track, so large wheel loads in particular get concentrated in the same ruts.

That is the historial background to the problem. But over the past decade, the increasing tempo of trade by fish farming, agriculture under the programme of the Industrial Development Board and fishing has led to increased heavy lorry traffic on the roads. It is estimated also that the introduction of roll-on/roll-off ferries has led to a further 37 per cent. increase in heavy vehicles on island roads. Finally, thanks in large part to better promotion of the islands by Caledonian MacBrayne and by the tourist authorities, regular travelling tourist traffic and traffic from the ordinary travelling public has also increased enormously in the past decade.

There is no sign of a reduction in the trend. Indeed, if anything, it is expected to intensify with the construction of the Skye bridge with which the Minister will be familiar, and the hoped-for development of a vehicular ferry link across the sound of Harris. With a major multinational even now applying for planning permission to excavate an estimated 10 million tons of material annually from a new super quarry at Lingerbay, the heavy traffic pressure on the fragile and inadequate road network will continue unabated.

The local authority is working hard to upgrade the spinal route. One must remember that the first problem facing the local authority after local government reorganisation in the early 1970s was to establish vehicular links to all the permanently inhabited islands in the Hebrides. With the completion of the Vatersay causeway, that ambition has been realised. Since 1983, the Western Isles council has been devoting the bulk of its transport capital consent to upgrading the islands' single track roads. But such is the poor nature of those roads and the high cost of bringing material on to the isles that to upgrade a mile of road costs approximately £500,000. At the present rate of progress, therefore, with the existing capital consent, it will take until the year 2025 just to upgrade the main spinal route.

When he has studied the figures, and the case made by the islands council, I am sure that the Minister will agree this is simply unacceptable. It is a disgrace that a region of Scotland, considered sufficiently distinct and self-contained to merit its own separate local government, should look like entering the 21st century with its main north-south commercial road still single track in large parts. Surely it is a modest enough ambition for the spinal route to be fully double-tracked by the year 2000. My constituents do not ask for dual carriageways, they do not ask for motorways, they do not even ask to be latched on to the official trunk road network in Scotland. All they ask for is an end to the age of the passing place on the main public thoroughfare connecting all the outer islands.

There are those, of course, who still have the temerity to argue that we ask for too much and who like to point out that expenditure per head is higher in the islands than the Scottish average. But, of course, that is necessarily so, because there are more miles of road per capita in the islands than the Scottish average. In any case, per capita comparisons are entirely the wrong way to look at the matter.

Roads are one of the basic services provided by Government. In this, they are like education, health and social security. It would be unacceptable to argue that people living in the Scottish islands should expect significantly lower quality schooling, much poorer medical care or less social security provision than people elsewhere in Scotland. The Government rightly accept that they have a duty to provide a similar quality of provision across Scotland in all these areas. So it should be with roads and communications, a responsibility of Government so basic that even Adam Smith acknowledged it.

I therefore urge the Government to look hard at the case which the Western Isles council will be making this summer in its transport policy programme for 1991-95 and to adopt it as their target that the main spinal route through the Western Isles be upgraded to basic double-track standard by the year 2000—that is by the end of this century. That target is realistic, achievable, eminently reasonable and long overdue. I commend it to the Minister.

9.1 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): I welcome the fact that the hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) has raised the subject of roads in his constituency. I have a great affection for the whole of Scotland, but especially for the Western Isles. Their outstanding beauty is so striking that it reminds me of the words of the Canadian Boating song:

"From the lone schieling of the misty Island
Mountains divide us, and the waste of seas,
Yet still the blood is strong, the heart is Highland
And we in dreams behold the Hebrides."

For my part, as a Scots lowlander, I have many extremely happy memories of the Western Isles, which have some of the most magnificent scenery in the world, a scenery which more and more tourists are in the process of discovering. Indeed, many more tourists will go there once the Skye bridge is built in the years to come. All that will have implications for the employment prospects and for the way of life of the islanders.

I have listened carefully to everything that the hon. Gentleman said, and I congratulate him on the way in which he put his arguments. I realise that people in the Western Isles are concerned with the down-to-earth practicalities of life, so I am glad to say that I essentially agree with the case that the hon. Gentleman advanced on behalf of his constituency. I am sympathetic to his cause, which is to put an end to passing places, as I was to the building of the Vatersay causeway. We shall study the photographs that he has provided, the points that he has made and, of course, the transport policy programme of the Western Islands council as soon as it has been submitted.

Let me start by summarising the position on resources. With the exception of small amounts of capital expenditure which some authorities are able to finance from current revenue, capital expenditure which local authorities spend on roadworks must be covered by capital consents issued by the Secretary of State under section 94 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973. Of the £160 million capital consents issued under section 94 to Scottish regional and islands councils for expenditure on roads and transport in 1991-92, £5 million was allocated to the Western Islands council. Several points are worth emphasising about that £5 million figure.

First, on an expenditure per head of population basis, the Western Isles figure, £161, is more than five times higher than the average figure for Scotland as a whole, which is £31. Secondly, on the perhaps more appropriate comparison basis for a thinly populated rural area, the Western Isles allocation per kilometre of local road length, at £4,226, is also substantially higher than the Scotland figure of £3,311. Thirdly, the Western Isles' £5 million final allocation for 1991-92 was increased from the previous provisional figure of £4·8 million. That increase was made at a time when the resources available for capital allocations generally were severely limited. We were able to increase the allocation this year in this way, although four of the nine regions, and both the other islands councils, received no such increase. That is evidence of our concern about the position in the Western Isles and of our commitment to ensuring that resources are channelled where they are most needed.

The statistics that I have just quoted show objectively that we accept many of the points that the hon. Gentleman has made, and demonstrate our commitment to take action to overcome the particular problems in the islands. But the Scottish Office's practical concern has also been shown by the strenuous efforts that officials in the Scottish Office Environment Department have taken to apprise themselves of the particular conditions which apply in the Western Isles and the work which the Western Isles islands council is doing to meet the most pressing needs.

Last August, the Scottish Office's director of roads visited the islands, as the guest of the islands council, to inspect the authority's road network at first hand. This followed on a tour of inspection the previous year by a senior member of the roads directorate staff. In October 1990, the head of the Scottish Office's transport and local roads divisions also visited the islands, again on a visit kindly arranged by the islands council. I must at this point express my warmest thanks to the council, first for making the three visits possible, and secondly for ensuring that all the officials concerned were able, during intensive programmes, to see the full range of the problems facing the authority and the work done to overcome them. I know that these senior officials were able to penetrate parts of the road network which they normally would be unlikely to reach. I should also like to thank Convener Donald Macaulay for his personal welcome to me last summer, which was greatly appreciated.

I agree with the hon. Member for Western Isles that the Western Isles council faces particular difficulty in maintaining its roads. The main concerns are the proportion of single-track roads in the network, the high proportion of roads which are founded on peat, and the damage being caused to those roads as a result of the significantly increased volume of heavy goods vehicle traffic, and the weight of the vehicles using the roads.

From this point of view, the considerable improvement over the past 10 years in the ferry services provided by Caledonian MacBrayne Ltd. from the mainland to the Outer Isles has been a mixed blessing. Substantial levels of investment in new linkspans and new larger vessels to provide roll-on/roll-off ferries has brought about a significant change in the traffic levels and weights using roads which, anywhere else in Scotland, would not be looked on as acceptable.

[Lord James Douglas-Hamilton]

On all occasions when Scottish Office officials have visited the islands, they have been very impressed by the programme of maintenance and improvement planned and being carried out by the islands council engineering team. We recognise that a substantial part of the council's road system runs beside the coast or through inland lochs with long causeways. Those sections of road are prone to damage in the storm conditions which are common in the islands and thus impose an additional burden on maintenance resources. The high proportion of single-track roads results in the speed of traffic being reduced, in an increased risk of accidents, in higher vehicle operating costs, and in access difficulties for large and heavy vehicles.

But the main difficulty, as I understand it, is that heavy vehicles which use roads floated on peat cause extensive cracking and rutting of the flexible road pavement. Such defects are expensive to repair, and the repairs need to be carried out very frequently. With the new roll-on/roll-off facilities at Castlebay, Lochboisdale, Lochmaddy and Tarbert as well as Stornoway, and with recent important commercial developments such as fish farming—which the hon. Gentleman mentioned—generating additional traffic, the proportion of heavy goods vehicles using both the primary and secondary routes on the islands has increased markedly. Even allowing for the larger lorries having more axles, a 38-tonne lorry causes over 40 times more damage than an eight-tonner.

The ideal solution to these peat-related problems would be to reconstruct the road network completely, particularly the main strategic roads. The peat foundation would be dug out and replaced with rockfill or other suitable material. Where that has been done, the resulting rebuilt roads require significantly less expenditure on repairs or improvement, as well as offer a much more acceptable ride for vehicles. When using roads in the Western Isles, one does not need to be an engineer to know whether the road is solidly based or floating on peat.

In the long run, the council and the Scottish Office accept that reconstructing roads on a hard base is undoubtedly the value-for-money approach to road engineering on the islands. The difficulty, however, is that such wholesale rebuilding of such an extensive network of roads would be prohibitively expensive. It would be quite out of line with the level of resources available now or likely to be available in the foreseeable future. The work therefore cannot be carried out overnight, or even over a few years; it has to be a very long-term programme. That is because the depth of peat on which the roads are floating in some areas is very considerable, and substantial excavation or use of considerable volumes of imported material would be required. What is necessary in the short term, and what the islands council is doing with considerable success, is to target the resources available to priority areas.

Hand in hand with carrying out major improvements such as rebuilding sections of road on a hard base, the council must maintain the other peat-based roads and ensure that the network condition overall is not allowed to deteriorate. Scottish Office officials were extremely impressed by the way in which the council has been programming, designing, constructing, maintaining and improving its road schemes. The council took a policy decision in 1985 that it would devote resources available in four years out of every five single-mindedly to maintaining and improving its primary road network.

In the fifth year, it has concentrated its resources on the top priority minor schemes. The effectiveness of a small operation with two or three engineers properly overseeing the work being done in detail has been very evident. I believe that the council has recently been able, for example, to procure 6 m two-track new road for about £0·5 million per mile and has completed at least 50 per cent. on Lewis and Harris and about 20 per cent. on the southern islands. That is a very competitive rate compared with elsewhere in Scotland, and it represents excellent value for money.

Road engineers on the council recognise that, even now, with the increased traffic levels that I have already described and the further increases which improved services may bring, the flows on the islands roads are and will be extraordinarily low. For example, fewer than 1,000 vehicles per day use the main inter-island route. The council is using modern highway design standards with the fullest permitted deviations for reasons of environment and economy, and without any question of reducing road safety. The islands council has recently built several new single-carriageway improvements on roads with low traffic. The engineers take a pragmatic approach to the use of design standards and are prepared to lower the standards without significantly reducing safety, enforced by reasons of topography, property or economy. That can result in reducing the sheer size of earthworks to a more sympathetic scale.

The Scottish Office roads directorate has congratulated the islands council on its approach, and considers that mainland authorities can learn much from that pragmatic approach to the design of low-traffic roads, including low cost, a good safety record and aesthetic appearance.

Let me refer, however, to matters financial rather than technical. I was very pleased that the Scottish Office was able to find additional resources in 1989-90 and 1990-91 to enable the Western Isles council to build the Vatersay causeway. The full cost of that project—£3·7 million, including additional reconstruction and resurfacing work on a number of single-track roads on Vatersay—was covered by additional capital allocations in those two years. That ensured—we believe this to be extremely important—that the rest of the council's roads programme was not prejudiced. Moreover, 50 per cent. of the eligible costs of the new causeway were met by grant from the European regional development fund, and a further 25 per cent. from the Scottish Office. The new causeway, opened last November, is real evidence of the Scottish Office's commitment to the promotion of development in rural and island areas, and to the maintenance of populations.

I know that, in the longer term, the council will want to consider whether it would be cost-effective to build causeways or bridges to the islands of Berneray, Eriskay and Scalpay. These possible projects, which would inevitably involve substantial expenditure, add to the pressure on resources available. The council must also consider investment in ferry services within the resources allocated to it. Inevitably, therefore, the council will have to take decisions on priorities in the light of the finance that is likely to be available.

I have acknowledged the problems facing the islands council, the impressive work being done by the council's staff to stretch the resources available to achieve maximum value for money, and the islanders' aspirations for the future.

I recognise that, at the present rate of investment, it may take more than 30 years to complete the work required on the inter-island main route, but I must emphasise that there is no bottomless bag of resources from which roads and transport expenditure, however systematically and efficiently organised, can be funded. The Government's policies are designed to create the conditions necessary for sustained economic growth. This necessarily involves restraining public expenditure to assist in the fight against inflation. We must therefore look at priorities for public expenditure across all services and in all areas very closely indeed.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State each year reaches a view on what proportion of the total resources available in the Scottish block can be devoted to different services. Roads and transport needs must be considered against other services such as education, social work, health and housing. Of the funds he decides to allocate to roads and transport, my right hon. Friend then has to determine how much should be issued to each authority. He is guided in this exercise by the transport policies and programmes documents drawn up by authorities, by their financial plans, and by such other information as my be available. We shall, in due course, study with great interest the council's proposals. Information may also come from reports of officials' visits to the authorities or from additional information submitted by the councils themselves.

It was because the Secretary of State had information from a variety of sources on the clear priority needs for investment in the Western Isles that he was able to agree to increase the Western Isles' final allocation for this year. The percentage increase was higher than for all but one other council in Scotland. That council was Tayside where resources were exceptionally required to replace the flood-damaged Caputh bridge.

I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on the able way in which he has presented his case on behalf of his constituents. I promise him and the Western Isles council that we accept that there are particular problems in the Western Isles. On behalf of the Secretary of State and the Scottish Office, I give the undertaking that the needs of the Western Isles will be carefully, seriously and sympathetically considered against the claims of all other authorities. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for having drawn these matters to our attention tonight and for submitting additional evidence, which we shall study with the utmost care.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Conservation Bodies

1. Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many times during the past 12 months he has met representatives of conservation bodies.

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John Selwyn Gummer): I have met representatives of conservation bodies formally on four occasions. My colleagues have also had a number of such meetings.

Mr. Nicholson: My right hon. Friend will know that my interest in the subject derives from the fact that my constituency ranges from the smallest English national park to the Somerset levels. Will he ensure that that land, which is not suitable for intensive and, therefore, fairly profitable farming or for conservation assistance, does not drift into a gentle decline? Will he therefore, as a matter of some urgency, bring forward proposals to ensure that all the countryside is farmed in an environmentally sensitive way?

Mr. Gummer: As my hon. Friend knows, I have had many individual and informal meetings with conservation bodies and I am pleased to find that they increasingly recognise that if the British countryside is to be conserved, it can be only through the activities of farmers. That is why we are insistent that the reform of the common agricultural policy should be driven by a demand for environmental support. The Government are working for that fundamental change, which we hope to achieve.

Mr. Geraint Howells: I hope that, when the Minister meets conservationists in Monmouth next week, he will remind them that Welsh farmers' incomes have dropped by 50 per cent. over the past two years and that 14 per cent. of Welsh farmers are contemplating giving up farming due to the policies of the Secretary of State for Wales, who has full responsibility for agriculture in Wales. The Minister may not be aware that his colleague said yesterday at the annual general meeting of the Farmers Union of Wales in Aberystwyth that there is worse to come. Is that policy due to the advice given by Ministers in London and by the Government?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman's question would go down better were it not known that his party was wholly in favour of the European Community and supported the common agricultural policy. He knows perfectly well that the events about which he is talking are a result of the CAP, which we are committed to changing and which we are fighting to alter. The hon. Gentleman has no possible answers to that. He should not do this and he does so only because it is this week.

Mr. Onslow: Will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity to emphasise the importance of conserving water resources in the countryside? Will he redouble his efforts to encourage farmers to impound the water from excessive rainfall in the winter rather than running down river levels by extraction for spray irrigation in the summer?

Mr. Gummer: I agree with my right hon. Friend that the problems of water levels, especially in the east of England, are of great seriousness. Happily, even the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells) cannot blame the Government for that. The truth is that we shall have to share out the use of water. I was very unhappy about some of the suggestions that the National Rivers Authority put forward originally. I am pleased to say that they have now been considerably revised in a way that will protect the water table and, at the same time, enable farmers to use water as they need it to produce crops. I assure my right hon. Friend that we are looking carefully at the water levels of rivers in which I know that he has a particular interest, which he has pressed regularly to me.

Mr. Dalyell: Why cannot the Minister tell Mr. Ian Richardson and other conservationists in his constituency who is behind the Swiss bond holders who own Heveningham hall, one of the 20 most beautiful houses in England? Does he understand that, as I represent Hopetown and Dalmeny, it would be quite remiss of me as a Member not to know who owns those great houses?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman referred to a matter which is entirely under the control of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be more careful with his comments and I also hope that he will recognise the enormous amount of work that has been carried out to save that particular house——

Mr. Dalyell: It is 20th century restoration of an 18th century house.

Mr. Gummer: —and take that in the context of a long period of misuse of the house by the former owners. Who that former owner was—he is now dead—is no more clear to me than it is to the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that that is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment and it would be quite improper for me to answer in any other way except to say that I do not know who the owner is.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I hope to raise the matter in an Adjournment debate.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is not legitimate to raise that matter on a supplementary question.

Fishing Vessels

2. Mr. Harris: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many fishing vessels have taken the gear option as opposed to the tied option.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. David Curry): One hundred and eighty-five vessels have taken the gear option while 258 have elected to tie up.

Mr. Harris: Although I accept that the gear option is not always practical for many boats in Scotland, does my hon. Friend agree that the number that have taken the alternative route and are tying up is gratifying? Will he accept the congratulations of the House on having fought so hard to ensure that that option was made available in the first place?

Mr. Curry: My hon. Friend will know that when we entered the Council we faced proposals that included the 120 mm mesh size, a 10-day tie-up and no gear option. We had to fight very hard to get the tie-up limited to eight days and to get the gear option. I am pleased that that has been taken up by about one third of the Scottish fleet. We knew that it would not be appropriate for a large number of vessels and we did not pretend that that was other than the case. However, I hope that it is proving effective for those vessels that can take advantage of it. Tie-up is certainly the preferable option where it will work.

Mr. Salmond: Does the Minister accept that the boats have not elected to tie up but have been forced to tie up? Will he confirm that more Scottish boats are now affected by the regulation than boats in the rest of the European Community put together? Has the Secretary of State for Scotland spoken to the hon. Gentleman about his conduct during the tie-up debate and is the hon. Gentleman now able to apologise to Scotland's fishing communities or, better still, to signal a change of policy?

Mr. Curry: The hon. Gentleman says that more Scottish boats are affected than other boats. That is true. The stocks affected are those that are fished predominantly by Scottish fishermen. The rules stated that the boats affected were those with 40 per cent. of cod and haddock in their total catch in areas IV and VI which are fished predominantly by Scottish boats, and those with more than 100 tonnes. The action is imposed by the Community. It is not something which we have dreamt up. In fact, we mitigated that measure. We are acting to conserve stocks for the Scottish fishing industry. That was our sole reason for acting. Had we not done that in respect of stocks of haddock, of which we have 80-odd per cent. of the catch, and stocks of cod, of which we have 50-odd per cent. of the catch, we would have been remiss in our duties.

In the debate, I explained to the hon. Gentleman and to the fishing industry the facts behind the decision and the importance of making it stick. I have no apologies to make about the thoughts that I expressed during that debate, because I was simply expressing the truth. The fishing industry preferred to have the truth presented bluntly than to have it wrapped up in silken phrases that mean nothing.

Mr. David Porter: The tie-up rule clearly means "Thou shalt not fish." Is my hon. Friend aware that in some cases it means "Thou shalt not earn a living"? The fishermen on some boats that are affected claim that they cannot get other work, such as standby and diving support work. Will my hon. Friend undertake to look into that matter?

Mr. Curry: In so far as I can assist, I shall certainly do so. The regulation was imposed upon us by the Community because of concern about stocks. We agreed that the stocks were in a serious condition. We did not say, "There is no problem" or "Let us pretend that the problem does not exist." We sought to obtain the most sensible application of a rule that we had to observe. Having obtained it, we are obliged to enforce that rule, or we will end up next year with an even more inflexible rule from Brussels. It would be in no one's interests if that happened.

I shall look at the cases that my hon. Friend can bring before me, but I cannot alter the rules that we are obliged to follow.

Fish Conservation

3. Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proposals he has for improving conservation of fish stocks.

7. Mr. Irvine: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proposals he intends to make to the July Council of Fisheries Ministers on the conservation of fish stocks.

Mr. Curry: We have already announced unilateral conservation action to apply from July. My immediate priority now is to achieve greater selectivity of gear on a Community-wide basis.

Mr. Mitchell: As we have a conservation crisis in the North sea in particular, a proper system of conservation would require a ban on industrial fishing, a ban on bream trawling and a ban on fishing in spawning grounds during the spawning season. It would also require a ban on square mesh panels, a one-net rule and a series of such measures. Why is not the Minister developing a proper British conservation programme instead of sitting there like a Saudi kleptomaniac with a hands-off policy, waiting for the Commission to do it all by such daft measures as the eight-day lay-up?

Mr. Curry: The hon. Gentleman knows the facts. He cannot complain simultaneously that we are not introducing our own measures and that we are about to impose measures on the United Kingdom fleet because of the importance of the stocks that we must conserve. It is a difficult choice. We have not been afraid to take that choice. Many of the matters that the hon. Gentleman mentioned are in the United Kingdom proposals—for example, the single-net rule, which is applicable. Other measures can be proposed only by the Community. Where we have national scope, it must be within the framework of the Community rules. That is why we had to apply, for example, a 90 mm square mesh panel in a 90 mm net. We did not have the flexibility to go beyond that proposal. We have not hesitated to take those actions. Where we have taken those actions, they have hardly been greeted with overwhelming acclaim by the fishing industry.

Mr. Irvine: Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the main problems with the conservation of fish stocks is that, while the British Government play by the rules and take effective enforcement measures against our own fishermen, too many other European Governments do not properly apply the rules against their own fishermen? Will my hon. Friend take care at the Council meeting in July to make that point forcefully to his European counterparts?

Mr. Curry: Because of our desire to have effective conservation, we defended at the previous Council meeting, and will do so at future Council meetings, the basic idea that the common fisheries policy should be enforced by the member states in the waters that they control. We can impose that system on all vessels fishing in those waters. If that policy disintegrated and enforcement were handed over to some centralised control, or if we were to slacken our enforcement, I fear that we would then have differentials.

Certain member states enforce rules strongly. The Dutch, for example, impose a tie-up on their own fishermen and are suggesting that the tie-up should become the principal instrument of Community conservation. We would have great difficulty with that, but we will certainly do our best to make sure that we get a proper level of enforcement. That is one respect in which the United Kingdom is acknowledged to be ahead of the field.

Mr. Wallace: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree that the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food said last week on a visit to Scotland that fishermen had to take an initiative in conservation. Will he confirm that the Scottish Fishermen's Federation put to the Government a comprehensive conservation package almost two years ago, that the industry has also proposed a decommissioning scheme and that some sections of the industry have actually advocated that the industry make a contribution to a decommissioning scheme? Will the hon. Gentleman take this opportunity to clarify the confusion at the recent meeting between Scottish fishery leaders and Ministers on the Government's position on decommissioning and say whether the door is still open to some form of decommissioning scheme, possibly involving an industry contribution?

Mr. Curry: My right hon. Friend has made it absolutely clear that he is ready to examine any workable proposal for the industry that is based on an industry-funded scheme and would deliver long-term conservation gains. That is a perfectly clear statement. The hon. Gentleman said that the industry brought forward its proposals two years ago, which is true. Those proposals were based on 90 mm mesh with an 80 mm panel.

We tried to get those policies accepted in Brussels, but they were not acceptable. The Scottish Fishermen's Federation has now understood that. I understand that it recently introduced proposals, accepting that it should go further on the size of the square mesh panel, but that there are also other conditions. The industry is moving and recognises that it must move forward, and we welcome that fact. As I said, we are willing to look at a package of measures that will assist the industry, provided we get effective gains which would be in the interests of the fishermen. It is their futures that are at risk.

Sir Michael Shaw: Is my hon. Friend aware that fishermen in my constituency fully realise the need for conservation, but that, at the same time, they demand fairness in the enforcement of the restrictions on gear and quotas throughout the United Kingdom?

Mr. Curry: I appreciate the thrust of my hon. Friend's comments. Although our fishermen fish for different stocks in different vessels, we must ensure that they all play by the same rules. We can hardly complain about other people failing in this regard if we do not maintain effective enforcement around our own coasts. I am sure that my hon. Friend is aware that the enforcement authority in Scotland has now become an agency. I am extremely confident that that agency will make a great contribution to enforcement practices north of the border. We shall ensure that that is the case south of the border also.

Dr. Godman: The Minister said a moment ago that the eight-day tie-up was imposed upon him by the Fisheries Ministers Council. I must question the accuracy of that statement because Mr. Marin, the European Commissioner for Fisheries, said that that proposal came originally from the Minister's Department. Is not the truth of the matter the fact that the fleet is too big and has to be reduced and that the most humane and fair-minded way of doing that is by a decommissioning scheme?

Mr. Curry: No, it is not true that that scheme originated in my Department. It originated with the International Council for the Exploration of the Seas, which stated that there must be a 30 per cent. reduction in effort. The Commission translated that into a 10-day tie-up per month. We got that reduced to eight days, for various reasons, partly because we thought that it was excessive.

We must have effective effort control. We cannot dodge that issue. That is why it is important that we enforce the rules effectively this year and that fishermen obey them because, if they do not, there is a danger that we will be faced with an even more draconian scheme next year which, like everything else, will go through on majority voting. We are anxious to avoid that. That is why it is important to make the proposals work this year.

Mr. Morley: During these exchanges hon. Members have expressed the need to link conservation measures with a reduction of effort. I was recently in Brussels to talk to the fisheries directorate-general, which expressed great surprise at the fact that, of all the countries in Europe, this country has not taken the opportunity of using the EC funds that are available for decommissioning schemes in order to reduce that effort. I agree that we need a package of measures and that, on its own, decommissioning would not be adequate. However, will the Minister give the House the undertaking that he will make it a priority to discuss with the industry a total package on conservation and, above all, on effort limitation, which would involve fair compensation for the fishermen who have suffered so much as a result of the measures to reduce the pressure on fish stocks?

Mr. Curry: My right hon. Friend the Minister has already begun that debate with the fishing industry. We accept that we can put together a package of measures that will be of benefit to the industry, and it is essential that we do so because we are talking about the long-term future of the stocks.

On the capacity problem, may I point out to the hon. Gentleman what I am sure he already knows: when we finally receive the figures for the first guidance programme from Brussels, we will find that the United Kingdom is over target by much less than was originally suspected. We do not have any idea about the targets for the second programme and, until we have them, it is clearly a little premature to talk about how we can reach a target that does not yet exist. However, we have begun discussions on a sensible package of proposals and we shall pursue them.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We have spent rather a long time on fishing, but I recognise its importance. We must now get on more rapidly in the interest of those hon. Members who have questions on the Order Paper.

Whales

4. Mr. Archer: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received on the proposal at the International Whaling Commission to review the moratorium on the killing of certain species of whale.

Mr. Gummer: I have received a very great number of representations, many expressing appreciation of the Government's strong stand on the conservation of whales.

Mr. Archer: Although I do not dissent from that statement, will the Minister take the opportunity to confirm that our common ecological heritage is as much a legitimate subject of international law as our common security? Will he give an undertaking that the Government will do everything possible to give effect to the overwhelming consensus among civilised countries in favour of the continuing enforcement of the moratorium, if necessary by trade embargoes on those countries that ignore it?

Mr. Gummer: I have made it absolutely clear that there is no case for raising the moratorium and we are using every possible pressure to ensure that it continues. We have been successful in using the framework of the International Whaling Commission. It has a lot of faults and we want to extend its framework to cover some of the small cetaceans which some people believe are not covered, although we believe that many are. We have a lot of work to do and we should press on and make sure that the protection of whales continues.

Mr. Skinner: Introduce legislation and stop blubbering.

Mr. Gummer: It is all right for the hon. Gentleman to make comments from below the Gangway, but some of us take seriously the conservation of whales and do not make jokes about it.

Mr. Ashby: Does my right hon. Friend understand that most people in Britain find whaling abhorrent and extend that feeling to the fishing of porpoises? Countries such as Japan are fishing thousands of porpoises for no real reason. Is there any possibility of extending the moratorium?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend is right, particularly about Dall's porpoise. The Japanese have carried out a major attack on that species and I am concerned to extend the controls. However, we have used the present framework effectively up to now. I am determined that we should use it more effectively in future. No one must be in any doubt about our commitment to the protection of the whale.

Dr. David Clark: Is the Minister aware that there is deep concern in Britain about what is regarded as the abuse of scientific whaling, especially by Japan? Will the Minister give us a categorical assurance that he will oppose commercial whaling and tighten up scientific whaling so that it is not abused by other countries in future?

Mr. Gummer: I made it clear as long ago as the conference in Brighton that the Government are wholly opposed to scientific whaling being used as a cover for commercial whaling. We shall continue to fight that. We are particularly concerned that not just one but a number of nations have signified their intention to extend their whaling activities. In today's circumstances, that is clearly unacceptable.

Mr. Dickens: Does my right hon. Friend agree that whales are slaughtered throughout the world in barbaric ways and that the numbers of many species are getting rather low? The management of the slaughter of whales is deplorable. Will my right hon. Friend give the House an assurance this afternoon that he will not agree to anything until he is satisfied that those dreadful trends have been reversed?

Mr. Gummer: The history of monitoring and controlling whaling shows a very poor record. One reason why we are concerned about management proposals is that management has been very bad in the past. I see no sign that the problems are being overcome. We have succeeded much beyond our expectations so far. Our job is to make sure that we continue to do so.

EC Surplus Food

6. Mr. Cryer: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will ensure that EC food distribution is available to all pensioners; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: I see no reason to provide free food for people like my noble Friend Baroness Trumpington or the hon. Gentleman's friend the chairman of Mirror Group Newspapers.

Mr. Cryer: When the Minister has finished with his little sneers at pensioners, does he realise that men and women who fought for this country in the war have queued up to find, when they get to the end of the queue, that they are denied butter which they have paid for, since the Government have handed over £14 billion to the Common Market in the past 10 years because of their arbitrary impositions? Would not it be a decent gesture to allow all pensioners to have that little bit of butter, especially since some charities—the public schools of this country, where the sons and daughters of the wealthy go —are also eligible for free butter?

Mr. Curry: The hon. Gentleman will be familiar with the scheme from his days in the European Parliament. He will be aware that there are 3,000 tonnes of beef and 3,800 tonnes of butter. He will therefore be able to do the mathematics. If they were distributed to all those eligible and all pensioners, they would each get the princely amount of 7·5 oz of beef and 9·5 oz of butter. If that is the gesture that we are about to make to them, I expect that I would get a gesture in return.

Mrs. Gorman: Although I have no objection to the distribution of surplus food to pensioners or anyone else, does my hon. Friend agree that pensioner families, like all others in this country, are now contributing £830 a year on average to the common agricultural policy and pensioners, like the rest of our families, would rather have that money in their pockets to spend on the food that they choose to buy?

Mr. Curry: I agree with my hon. Friend that the way to deal with surpluses is to tackle them at source so that they cost less to ordinary people and to those on relatively modest wages. The surplus should not be perpetuated and then dished out free, because that is most inefficient. If there is food to be distributed, the United Kingdom will have its share and it will go to the poorest people in society, which is the right way to do it. I am determined that that should happen. However, the thesis that my hon. Friend proposes is the sensible one—not to produce surpluses in the first place, which would cost us all less.

Mr. Cryer: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the totally inadequate answer to my question and the fact that the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) described Bradford pensioners as stupid, I reserve the right to raise this matter on the Adjournment.

Mr. Holt: He has no right to do that.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. Gentleman kindly contain himself. It is perfectly legitimate for the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) to say that he will raise the matter on the Adjournment. The hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) has been here long enough to know the rules.

Mr. Holt: I am right.

Mr. Speaker: Unless the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) contains himself I shall have to ask him to leave the Chamber for this afternoon. Will he please be quiet.

Common Agricultural Policy

8. Mr. Andrew Welsh: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent discussions he has had with his European counterparts on the reform of the common agricultural policy.

Mr. Gummer: The reform of the common agricultural policy was considered at the meeting of the Agriculture Council on 22 and 23 April, where discussions concentrated on the Commission's 1991 agricultural price proposals.

Mr. Welsh: This is beginning to get close to "The Muppet Show".

When the Minister meets his European counterparts, will they do something about the plight of the soft fruit industry, especially the Scottish raspberry industry, which is under threat from a flood of cheap eastern European imports? Is he aware of the importance of raspberries, not only in terms of direct employment but for the transportation industries? Will he obtain an extension of the minimum import price system until the end of this year and, in the long term, seek to maintain a stable market through quantitive controls?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman will know that my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) has kept that matter very much in my mind. Therefore, on every occasion when it has been possible I have raised the matter in the European Community. I have obtained a further extension of four months, but that is not enough. However, more important than the extension is ensuring that it is monitored. The hon. Gentleman will know that I have strong objections to the way in which the Commission has so far failed to monitor properly the arrangements which it put in place at our insistence. I am perfectly well aware of the importance of the Scottish raspberry industry and the soft fruit industry to the United Kingdom. We need to provide a market for eastern European products and to insist that that market is at a price similar to that which we get at home. Otherwise the benefit goes to the processor, not to the eastern European country. The disbenefit is to the British farmer. I am determined that, as far as it is possible to find new ways to press the European Commumnity, we shall do so. I believe that the Commission has let us down on this issue.

Mr. Hunter: In the light of continuing arguments in some circles that nitrogen quotas should form part of a reformed CAP, may I ask my right hon. Friend to take this opportunity to explain his continued opposition to that argument?

Mr. Gummer: I could give my hon. Friend a large number of reasons. First, it could not be policed; secondly, what does one do about natural nitrogen that comes from farmyard manure; thirdly, how do we make sure that others keep the rules, even if Britain were able to police such a system; fourthly, how could one ensure that it was a fair system; fifthly, how would rationing be done in countries where the authorities have no idea what people used in the previous year, anyway; and, sixthly—well I could give a number of other reasons which would all go to show that the system would be unworkable.

Dr. David Clark: Does the Minister realise that while Opposition Members support the Government in resisting the details of the MacSharry proposals for the reform of the CAP, we still believe that there must be a fundamental reform if we are to get a fair deal for the British consumer and farmer? The Minister should take the high ground. Will he take the offensive and table his proposals for reform of the CAP so that we can start arguing on our terms rather than on MacSharry's terms?

Mr. Gummer: I hope that the public recognise that the hon. Gentleman's willingness to advise others stops short of his willingness to learn that proposals cannot be tabled at the EC in that way. Proposals are tabled only by the Commission. I am determined to see that the Commission's new proposals contain our suggestions. I have put those proposals forward absolutely clearly.

Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will answer a question that is now being widely asked. In the event of there being a future Labour Government who would cut spending on the national health services, as the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) said yesterday, how much would the hon. Gentleman cut from the support given to farmers?

Animals (Live Exports)

9. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects final decisions to be taken regarding the future of minimum values on the export of live horses and ponies; and if he will make a statement.

10. Mr. Burns: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects the draft directive on the transportation of live animals to be next discussed at a meeting of the European Community Council.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. David Maclean): EC discussions have recently resumed on the welfare of animals during transport, but we will resist most strongly any proposals to resume the export of live horses and ponies.

Mr. Greenway: Is my hon. Friend aware of the passionate concern that exists across the country about the continued pressure on the Commissioners to end minimum values in 1992 on the export of live horses and ponies? Animals would end up being brutally and viciously slaughtered if they were exported in that way. Will he shake up the EC and seek an early assurance that if the EC's present plans go forward, horses and ponies will not be exported from this country after 1992 in such an inhumane way?

Mr. Maclean: The only good thing about the present proposals is that they unite the Government and all the welfare organisations, including excellent bodies such as the International League for the Protection of Horses. I assure my hon. Friend that we are in harness on this issue, along with all the British people, in arguing to keep our specific minimum value proposals. I am not interested in getting an early decision from Brussels. I am determined to get the right one and that should be that we do not have to resume the export of live horses and ponies.

Mr. Burns: Is my hon. Friend aware that my constituents in Chelmsford warmly welcome the efforts that are being made by him and his Department on minimum values, but are disgusted and dismayed at the prospect of the live exportation of animals across the continent as a result of EC measures? In view of the improvements in refrigeration in the 30 years since the signing of the treaty of Rome, why must animals be subjected to such inhumane transportation practices, despite the efforts that are being made by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food improve the arrangements? We beg the Minister to fight hard in Europe to put an end to this Euro-nonsense.

Mr. Maclean: Animals have been and can be transported safely across international boundaries. Britain has had the most comprehensive detailed regulations on the safe transport of animals for many years. We take as our starting point in EC negotiations the excellent British regulations and we suggest that they should be the basis on which the EC comes up with proposals on the movement of animals to apply to the whole of Europe. We are also keen to encourage an EC-wide inspectorate so that the high standards of animal welfare that we enforce in this country will be enforced throughout Europe.

Mr. Corbett: I welcome the fact that the Minister is so firmly opposed to the export of ponies and horses, but why does not he apply his opposition to the transport of calves and sheep? Will he acknowledge that it is impossible for this country to ensure that the arrangements and regulations in place in the rest of Europe are enforced? Would not it be sensible to promote a policy of slaughter as near to the point of production as possible?

Mr. Maclean: We have always transported cattle and sheep safely and believe that it can be done. The hon. Gentleman should realise the conditions of the EC treaty, under which we have no power unilaterally to ban the transport of live animals. We make a distinction in the case of horses and ponies, however, because we believe that, from a welfare point of view, they are quite distinct. The sad, sordid history of their export shows that they cannot be transported safely but only at great risk of damage. Cattle and sheep can be moved safely round the country and are moved safely from Ireland and the Scottish islands to the mainland. We must be very careful before seeking a unilateral ban on the safe movement of animals which would severely disadvantage many parts of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Pike: Does the Minister accept that, although he has widespread support in resisting moves to transport horses and ponies, it is essential that he makes no concessions in securing the best possible transport of animals or with regard to ponies and horses? The House will accept no concessions. Should not the Government be doing more to encourage the transportation of meat by hook rather than on the hoof?

Mr. Maclean: I cannot dictate to consumers, particularly European consumers, in what form they should eat their food. Although I sympathise with the view that much more meat could be safely transported in carcase rather than live form, it is a fact of life that Europeans want a live meat trade and the EC treaty protects that wish. I assure the hon. Gentleman that we shall not enter negotiations with the view that we must start off with concessions, as that would not be sensible. Rather, we shall enter those negotiations on the basis that the excellent British rules have served us well, that they should be extended to the rest of Europe and that we do not intend to give way on the issue of the export of live horses and ponies.

Dame Janet Fookes: May I encourage my hon. Friend in his insistence on an international inspectorate for the export of animals throughout Europe? However, does he agree that unless those inspectors are given real powers, their existence will be useless?

Mr. Maclean: I wholly agree with my hon. Friend. Our experience of the EC international inspectorate for abattoirs suggests that those inspectors have considerable powers and that their powers work. We would wish for no less on the animal welfare front. Britain has nothing to be ashamed of and is among the countries with the best record on animal welfare in Europe. We would welcome an EC-wide inspectorate to enforce our high standards in other parts of the EC.

EC Expenditure

15. Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list (a) overall European Commission expenditure as a percentage of overall European Community gross domestic product, (b) net European Commission expenditure on agriculture as a percentage of overall European Community gross domestic product and (c) the net United Kingdom expenditure on agriculture including net receipts from the European Commission as a proportion of United Kingdom gross domestic product, for the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Gummer: The figures are 0·9 per cent., 0·6 per cent. and 0·24 per cent.

Mr. Howell: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. Does not it prove that some of the statements that he has made about the high cost of agricultural support have been grossly exaggerated? Will he also bear in mind the fact that British agriculture is supported even less than European agriculture and we are spending less than a quarter of the amount on agricultural support than we were in 1960 and only half what we were spending in 1973 when we joined the EC?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend must accept that the budget is likely to go up by 30 per cent. next year, which cannot be sensible in the present circumstances. It must be reasonable to bring the budget under control and ensure that a higher proportion of it reaches the farmers whom it is supposed to support. I do not think that we help the situation by arguing on the basis of the percentage of gross national product.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Janner: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 9 May.

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall have further meetings later today.

Mr. Janner: Does the Prime Minister know of the grave shortage of resources that is affecting children's wards and units in hospitals throughout Britain? Is he aware that the unique baby life-saving unit in Groby Road hospital in my constituency is likely to have to close because there is no money locally and the Department of Health has refused central NHS funding? If that unit closes, as is almost certain unless the Government change their mind, what will the Prime Minister say to the parents of babies who will certainly die, totally unnecessarily?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. and learned Gentleman will know, I cannot carry in my head the details of each and every aspect of the national health service, but he knows that the average annual increase in the national health service budget has been more than 3 per cent. during the period of this Government—substantially higher than it was under any previous Government.

Sir Michael Shaw: If public spending is to be paid for in the future by increases in our economy, in the opinion of my right hon. Friend do policies of increased taxation, increases in quangos and Ministries and a minimum wage level make a sensible policy to increase such a demand?

The Prime Minister: I suspect that I know what my hon. Friend is driving at. The reality is that the Labour party would never deliver any growth whatsoever to fund increased public expenditure. It never has and never would and any suggestion that it would is sheer wish fantasy.

Mr. Kinnock: Has the Prime Minister seen the letter from the health authority district general manager to his clinical directors stating that is that

"the reality of GPs holding their own . . . budgets"

"equity has gone out the window"?

In view of that, will the Prime Minister withdraw the claim that he made in the House on Tuesday that operations are done on the basis of clinical need, as that claim is obviously fiction?

The Prime Minister: It is not fiction. Operations are done on the basis of clinical need. I have been advised within the last hour or so that the doctor to whom the right hon. Gentleman referred has also said that the big advantage of the trusts is that you are opting out of bureaucracy, not out of the national health service. At Bart's, the hospital at which he works, they are treating more patients at less cost. Over 1,000 jobs may have gone in the last five years, but more patients are being treated.

Mr. Kinnock: Since the Prime Minister also wants to quote Dr. Grant, I remind him that he is the man who said that they are opting out of equity. Can I put it to the Prime Minister again? Is not it clear that the Prime Minister's health market policies have now made queue-jumping the order of the day and that the clinical needs of patients are coming second to commercial considerations? I put it to him again. In view of that reality, on the testimony of Dr. Grant, will he now withdraw the false claim that he made two days ago that operations are done on the basis of clinical need? It is fiction.

The Prime Minister: No, I will not, and I will call in evidence to support my position Mr. Rowden, the chief executive of West Lambeth health authority, who writes to the press as a nurse, a general manager in the national health service and a member of the Labour party. I quote:

"For Labour to suggest that the old-style district health authorities provided a sound basis for the management of the NHS is spurious to say the least. Decisions prior to the reforms were arrived at by a process of those who screamed the loudest, and we have all witnessed various displays of shroud-waving . . . This was not a rational way of making difficult decisions, and perhaps the key benefit from the NHS reforms will be the evolution of a system that will lead to rational and informed debate about how and why we use precious resources in our NHS."

Mr. Kinnock: Like his predecessor, the more the Prime Minister goes on in his answers, the less convincing he becomes. May I put it to him again? Does not he agree with the testimony of one of his supporters, a district general manager, who says that because of his system equity has gone out of the window? Will not he affirm now that, as a consequence, operations are not being done on the basis of clinical need but on the basis of commercial considerations?

The Prime Minister: I neglected inadvertently to complete the quote from Mr. Rowden, the Labour party supporter. He deals with the point that the right hon. Gentleman now raises:

"When all the politicking stops, it has to be said that many of the Government's changes to the NHS give us the first opportunity in decades to begin explicitly to make choices about where we spend our money in the UK health care system."

Mr. Harris: Will my right hon. Friend give an assurance that, unlike the Labour party, he will keep public expenditure in line with what the country can afford? Furthermore, as the First Lord of the Treasury, will he make available to Her Majesty's Opposition the full facilities of the Treasury to check out their taxation and spending plans, as clearly their sums do not add up?

The Prime Minister: I can certainly give my hon. Friend the assurance that he seeks. Our economic policies in the last 12 years have achieved a remarkable treble—tax cuts, spending increases on public services and a reduction in the national debt. The extra £20 billion that Labour promises is spending that it could never deliver out of growth which it has never previously provided when in government. The only things that would grow under the Labour party would be taxes, inflation and national health service waiting lists, just as they always have done.

Mr. Ashdown: Does the Prime Minister realise that while the scale of international relief in Bangladesh is still pitiful in relation to need, there is nevertheless real pride about Britain's lead in providing it? I again ask the Prime Minister why it is that he, his Government and, it appears, the written press continue to ignore the incalculably greater scale of the disaster now unfolding in Africa? I want the right hon. Gentleman to assure the House that he knows and understands that 27 million lives are imminently at risk and that in some areas food will run out at the end of this week. If he knows about these matters, will he tell the House what he intends to do to help?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for what he said in the first part of his question. The assistance that we have given to Bangladesh has made us the largest single national donor. We are prepared to do more and are urging others to do more. Particularly in the months ahead we will need to seek a better international way of co-ordinating assistance when great tragedies such as this are faced. I shall do what I can to bring that sort of system about. On the subject of Africa, I remind the right hon. Gentleman that we are providing substantial aid and providing it fast. After the United States, we are the second largest bilateral food aid contributor to the Horn. We have done a great deal and, where necessary, we will be able to do more. However, we cannot do everything that is necessary on our own. We have a better record than almost anyone in the world and we can justly be proud of that record.

Mr. Butcher: Is my right hon. Friend aware that 12 years ago to this day he and I first entered the House? I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his personal dedication and commitment to an improvement in public services throughout that period. If the history of the 1980s shows anything it is that it is possible to reduce taxation while simultaneously and dramatically improving public services.

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is quite right about that. Perhaps I may take this opportunity to welcome my hon. Friend back to the House after his illness. We are all very pleased to see him here and looking so fit and I look forward to seeing him sit here with me for at least another 12 years and possibly a good deal longer. My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Such improvements depend on the levels of growth that we have achieved over the last decade, which levels Conservative Governments traditionally achieve and Labour Governments fail to achieve.

Q2. Mr. Andrew Welsh: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 9 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Welsh: As the Secretary of State for Scotland and the Secretary of State for Energy both oppose test drilling by Nirex in their constituencies, does the Prime Minister understand why the people of Scotland do not wish to see up to 6,000 planned test boreholes being drilled in Caithness? If Nirex proposes to spend such time, effort and money in drilling up to 6,000 boreholes, how can the Prime Minister expect anyone to believe that Nirex has not targeted the north of Scotland as a nuclear dump? Scotland has been badly let down by this decision.

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman will know, there will need to be quite specific planning consents before there can be any dumping of waste there. That matter lies in the future, but before any dumping at all could take place after the test borings, quite specific planning consents would need to be granted. We will look carefully at those when they come forward.

Q3. Mr. Beaumont-Dark: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 9 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Will my right hon. Friend accept that when we came to office 12 years ago the top rate of taxation was 82 per cent., that it is now 40 per cent. and that the miracle has happened because everyone has been encouraged to work harder which has meant that £17 billion more has been spent on the health service this year than when we came to office? Does he agree that a nightmare will strike people such as a police sergeant, a deputy head teacher or a doctor when they hear that if they earn £20,300 a year they are among the rich and are to be taxed and taxed and taxed again.

The Prime Minister: That would certainly do nothing but damage to enterprise; and it is certainly true that, over the past few years, lower rates of tax have produced a higher yield.

My hon. Friend is right about people earning £20,000 a year. In no sense can they be described as rich. Last year in London and the south-east £20,000 was less than the average white collar wage and it will certainly be much less this year. It is less than many Metropolitan police constables and sergeants, senior house officers, registrars or junior doctors earn. It is less than many teachers earn. Those are the people whom the Opposition regard as rich and whom they would tax not only unreasonably but as they did in the 1970s: right out of this country.

Q4. Mr. Ron Brown: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 9 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Brown: As the poll tax has been a big mistake, why should people be hounded and imprisoned in England? Why should they suffer because the Government got it wrong? People outside think that something has to give —that there should be an amnesty. The Government should understand the position of the 16 individuals in England—[Laughter.] It is not funny.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This does not help the hon. Gentleman. Briefly, please.

Mr. Brown: Those 16 people are in prison because they did not pay the poll tax. We know that the Prime Minister claims to want a classless society—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. Gentleman now conclude his question?

Mr. Brown: This is important, because people cannot be imprisoned in Scotland but they can be in England. Let us free these political prisoners. That would be an important decision.

The Prime Minister: I know that the hon. Gentleman feels deeply about these matters, but I must point out that he did not even carry his own side of the House with him in his remarks.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows that I take points of order after Question Time.

Business of the House

3.32 pm

Mr. Bruce Grocott (The Wrekin): Will the Leader of the House tell us the business for next week?

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John MacGregor): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 13 MAY—Motion for spring Adjournment.

Motion on the Coal Industry (Restructuring Grants) Order.

The Chairman of Ways and Means has named opposed private business for consideration at seven o'clock.

TUESDAY 14 MAY—Opposition day (11th allotted day). Until about seven o'clock there will be a debate described as "The damage caused to the NHS by the implementation of the National Health Service and Community Care Act". Afterwards there will be a debate described as "The need for improved policies to deal with famine, flood and refugees in the world". Both debates arise on Opposition motions.

WEDNESDAY 15 MAY—Debate on a motion to approve the Government's public expenditure plans for 1991-92 to 1993-94 (Cm. 1501 to 1520).

Motion relating to the Education (Grant-Maintained Schools) (Finance) Regulations.

THURSDAY 16 MAY—Remaining stages of Planning and Compensation Bill [Lords].

FRIDAY 17 MAY—Private Members' motions.

MONDAY 20 MAY—Consideration of Lords amendments to the Disability Living Allowance and Disability Working Allowance Bill.

The Chairman of Ways and Means is expected to name opposed private business for consideration at seven o'clock.

The House will also wish to know that European Standing Committees will meet on Wednesday 15 May at 10.30 am to consider European Community documents as follows:—

Committee A—Document No. 5491/91 relating to milk quotas.

Committee B to continue to consider document No. 8597/90 and COR 1 relating to unfair terms in consumer contracts.

[Wednesday 15 May

Mr. Grocott: May I thank the Leader of the House for arranging, for next Wednesday, a debate on the Government's public expenditure plans? I am afraid that that is the only thing for which I shall be able to thank him.

I know that what I am about to say upsets the right hon. Gentleman and that he will be annoyed again today, but I have to point out that the Government are running out of steam. Why is it that the two key debates next week—the one on the crisis in the health service, and the one on the famine in Bangladesh and Africa and the problems facing the Kurds—have been arranged by us in Opposition time, and that the Government have arranged no major debates on national issues in Government time? As the Leader of the House is running short of ideas, I put it to him that, for a start, it is high time we had a debate on unemployment. Yesterday, 10,000 redundancies were announced at British Coal and Rolls-Royce, making 15,000 in the last 15 days.

It is also high time for a debate on the education service. The Prime Minister seems to think that that service is important, but not important enough for a debate. Let me make an offer to the Leader of the House: if he cannot think of key issues for debate, let him hand over the precious parliamentary time to the Opposition, and we shall choose the subjects.

Mr. MacGregor: Once again, the hon. Gentleman has got himself completely in a twist. He really cannot make that case. After all, I have been urged for some time by his hon. Friend the shadow Leader of the House to arrange a debate on public expenditure plans. According to the hon. Gentleman, we are wasting the time of the House next week by doing just that. It is absolutely ridiculous. As I have told the hon. Gentleman before, I am keen to have a debate on public expenditure plans. I am anxious that we should have a whole day to compare the Government's achievements in public expenditure with the nonsense that the Labour party talks. I am glad to have been able to provide such an opportunity. When the hon. Gentleman himself has asked for the debate, he cannot accuse me of wasting the time of the House.

As to the point about unemployment, I need only remind the hon. Gentleman of the spring Adjournment debate. As he knows, I have an obligation to find time for such a debate, which provides an opportunity to raise these matters. I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not saying that the Planning and Compensation Bill is unimportant. In fact, it is an extremely important part of the Government's legislative programme, welcomed by very many people. The same is true of the Disability Living Allowance and Disability Working Allowance Bill. The hon. Gentleman is trying to score cheap points, and he is completely off target.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Will my right hon. Friend make arrangements for a very early debate on the document issued on 3 May by the presidency of the intergovernmental conference on European political union? Will he ensure that in such a debate a Government spokesman will comment on the section about a proposed European foreign policy, which might be held together by qualified majority voting? Will he please make sure that the Government will emphasise that, while they are prepared to be polite and correct to our allies in the EC, they have set their face like granite against ceding any more sovereignty from this House, this Parliament and the British people to the institutions of the EC?

Mr. MacGregor: I cannot promise my hon. Friend an early debate on the IGC in particular. However, he will know that we have regular debates on European developments. I hope, shortly after the recess, to be able to arrange such a debate, in which all these points may be discussed.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): Can the Leader of the House confirm the rumour that the Government are to set up a Northern Ireland Select Committee? Such a Committee would be very welcome indeed, but would seem rather out of place in view of the fact that the Government have failed to set up a Scottish Select Committee.

On the subject of Select Committees, will the right hon. Gentleman find time to debate the very valuable report from the Select Committee on the Environment on the tropical rain forest?

Mr. MacGregor: I have indicated that I recognise that the second subject is obviously very important, but it is a question of finding time, because we are debating many important subjects both in legislation and in ordinary debates at the present time. On the first point, I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to the Government's response to the Committee on Procedure's report on Select Committees, from which he will see very clearly our position on the Northern Ireland Select Committee.

Sir Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): As it is now some years since the House held a debate on civil aviation, and in view of the many changes that have taken place since that time, ranging through matters of regulation, competition and, indeed, safety, would not it be appropriate for us to hold a debate on this important matter at the earliest possible moment?

Mr. MacGregor: I have noted my hon. Friend's request, but, while in no way wishing to diminish the importance of the subjects that he raises, I do not think that it will be possible for me to find time for a full debate on these matters in the near future. There are, of course, a number of other ways in which they could be raised in the House, including the motion for the spring Adjournment next Monday.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): Is the Leader of the House aware that his right hon. and hon. Friends in the Foreign Office still decline to publish the text of the draft treaty on political union? It so happens that the text of the treaty is available in the Library owing to the initiative of the Library in obtaining it, which makes this an absurdity as well as an insult to the House. Will the right hon. Gentleman consider very carefully indeed what further progress can be made in getting Ministers to make periodic reports to the House on the state of the negotiations as they proceed, as the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) did when he was Prime Minister and we were negotiating the original treaty of British entry?

Mr. MacGregor: As far as the document is concerned, as the right hon. Gentleman knows, he and I and my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, have had a number of exchanges on this in the past few weeks in an attempt to find a solution acceptable to the House. As he also knows, this is an intergovernmental conference and it would be wrong for the Government to deposit negotiating texts while it continues. We did not do so during the negotiations on the Single European Act, and the presidency has enjoined member states not to publicise conference texts. However, that negotiating draft text did get into the public domain and that is how it is now in the Library.

Mr. Peter Fry (Wellingborough): Will my right hon. Friend reconsider his reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Sir R. McCrindle)? Civil aviation has not been debated for a long time and it is now clear that negotiations are commencing to replace the agreement between this country and the United States, Bermuda 2. In view of the controversy that has surrounded recent negotiations, is it not time that the House had an opportunity to put its view forward to guide Her Majesty's Government?

Mr. MacGregor: I have certainly noticed my hon. Friend's comments in support of my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Sir R. McCrindle) and I will draw them to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. However, there are other ways in which these matters can be debated in the House and a ministerial reply can be given. I must be honest with my hon. Friend: I think that it will be difficult to find Government time for a full day's debate in the near future.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Reverting to the topic of the non-publication of this so-called non-paper, which is, in fact, a draft treaty of political union, is the Leader of the House aware that the authorities of the House, using their ingenuity, have obtained a copy from the library of the Luxembourg Parliament? Does he agree that the House should be at least as well officially informed as any Parliament of any of the member states of the EEC? Why should proposals on the important subject of the welfare of animals, about which we are all concerned, be available and be debated in the House when working documents concerning the constitution of a new pan-European state are kept secret?

Mr. MacGregor: I have already described the previous practice on these matters and that is what we have followed in this case. The hon. Gentleman knows that I try to help the House whenever possible. We have endeavoured to make arrangements to ensure that some of these drafts are available in the Library to hon. Members, including the hon. Gentleman and his right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore).

Mr. Terence L. Higgins (Worthing): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the present practice is simply not acceptable to the House? The position on the draft treaty on economic and monetary union is the same. It is absurd for the presidency to say that it will not release the papers. The House is unable to have official knowledge of them although they are circulating far and wide throughout the Community. Will he ensure that the Government make representations to the presidency to say that this is an intolerable situation and that we will not put up with it?

Mr. MacGregor: I will certainly discuss the matter further with my hon. Friend the Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones), the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office. Clearly, I tried to ensure that hon. Members who wish to follow these matters in detail are able to do so because the documents are now accessible to them.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshaw): The right hon. Gentleman wrote to me recently about the report to the Government on resettlement grant. Can he say now when he intends to table the necessary motion, or will he be able to do so early next week?

Mr. MacGregor: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for raising that point, because I know that it is a matter of concern to many hon. Members. As he knows, I announced that we had received the review by the Top Salaries Review Body on resettlement grant, which has been placed in the Library of the House. I have made it clear that it will be my intention to bring forward the necessary resolution to implement that recommendation, because it will widely commend itself to hon. Members of all parties. I very much hope that I shall be able to table the resolution and that it will be agreed by the House, if it so wishes, before the Whitsun recess.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): May I thank my right hon. Friend for rearranging the adjourned debates in European Standing Committee B? May I also ask him whether he can find some way to inform the House and those whom the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) calls the permanent members of such Committees of what is likely to come up in future? Will my right hon. Friend also find some way to let such information be known to outside groups, because I fear that only those advised by expert lobbyists will be able to get their views to the hon. Members who will consider some of the draft directives? In practice, outside groups should know what is going on here and in Europe without having to pay others to tell them.

Mr. MacGregor: Yes, I suspect that some of the problems about advance information also occurred when these matters were normally debated on the Floor of the House. I take my hon. Friend's point. It is desirable that as much notice as is realistic in all the circumstances should be given to members of the Standing Committee. I said earlier that I should like that to happen and I am pursuing the matter further to ensure that it does. I should be happy to listen to members of the Standing Committee on such matters, because my hon. Friend makes a reasonable point.

Mr. Roy Beggs (Antrim, East): I am sure that the whole House would want to avert another mini-De Lorean scandal in Northern Ireland. There is perceived to be a veritable can of worms relating to the stewardship of Northern Ireland Electricity by its chief executive. Can the Leader of the House make time available for the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to make a further report on NIE so that we can ask him whether he has confidence in that board, whether he has confidence in the chief executive and in his ability, and whether he is likely to reappoint him in view of the heavy rumour that the NIE board does not intend to reappoint the chief executive? That would also afford us the opportunity to ask the Secretary of State whether it is his intention to reappoint the deputy chairman when his contract comes to an end later this year.

Mr. MacGregor: I will draw the hon. Gentleman's remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. I am afraid that I do not know the details of those matters.

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): In view of the scurrilous and inaccurate reports in some of the tabloid newspapers this week about the working hours of Members of Parliament, does my right hon. Friend think that it is time that we had a high-profile debate on the accepted duties of Members of Parliament, on the hours that we work in this place and on the necessary reforms which need to be considered soberly and carefully so that we can, perhaps, bring ourselves more up to date? Such a debate would impress on the public the fact that Members of Parliament, by and large, do a good job.

Mr. MacGregor: I do not think that we need a debate on how Members of Parliament fulfil their duties. My hon. Friend makes two points. I should be happy to agree with him that the amount of time that we spend in the Chamber or in Parliament itself does not reflect the amount of time that we spend on our duties as Members of Parliament. As an example of that, I—and I am sure that this applies to many other hon. Members—spent a large number of hours over the weekend in constituency engagements on a bank holiday. It is necessary to keep repeating that the duties of Members of Parliament are not just reflected by the amount of time they sit in the Chamber.

With regard to reforms, I have said that I am considering those matters and I hope to come forward with some thoughts in due course. However, some of the reforms that we have carried through in this Parliament, such as the European Standing Committees, are already having an effect on the hours in this Chamber.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Will the Leader of the House make time available as soon as possible for a debate on the Government's policies towards the middle east in view of the continuing problems facing the Kurdish and Palestinian peoples? Will he ask the Government to reconsider their policy towards non-recognition of the right of Kurdish people to self-determination? Many people believe that peace in the region can come only when the rights of people such as the Kurds are recognised. That will be the key to a long-term and just peace in the region.

Mr. MacGregor: I am not sure when it might be possible to have a full-day's debate on that subject. As I have said, the Government are keen to keep the House fully informed about developments. I will bear in mind not the hon. Gentleman's point about the particular policy proposals, but his point about the possibility of a debate.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): May I return my right hon. Friend to the question about European debate and the intergovernmental conferences? Is my right hon. Friend aware that in the saloon bar of almost every pub in my constituency, and at Eton college debating society and in Lady Antonia Fraser's drawing room, those matters are discussed daily with anxiety? Why is it uniquely that this House, which is and should be the authority to allow the Executive to proceed with those negotiations, is not permitted to address those matters that are fundamental to the constitution of this country?

Mr. MacGregor: I am not familiar with the discussions that take place in all the areas to which my hon. Friend has referred. However, I am aware that those matters are frequently discussed within the precincts of the House and there are opportunities to question my right hon. Friends.

The Select Committee on Foreign Affairs will shortly do that in a session with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Does the right hon. Gentleman recall that in his excellent interview titled "The Challenge of Conjuring" in this week's House Magazine he states:

"My first love really is mind-reading."

In those circumstances, did he know that I was going to ask him for a debate about American pitbull terriers and the serious problem whether fighting dogs of that kind should, as the Leicester Mercury so rightly demands, be banned because of the danger that they cause, as revealed in the disastrous injuries caused to a man who is at present being treated in the Leicester royal infirmary?

Mr. MacGregor: It did not require much mind-reading to know that the hon. and learned Gentleman was going to quote the Leicester Mercury. As he is aware, legislation is already in place to put down any dog that is dangerous. Furthermore, any owner who fails to take action about a dangerous dog can be banned from keeping a dog in future. Because the Government recognise that there may be a need to extend the law further, we issued a consultation paper last year entitled "The Control of Dogs" which contained several specific proposals. We have received a diverse range of views in response to that. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will announce his proposals this summer.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): May I remind my right hon. Friend of the statement made in the House a few weeks ago by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Transport on the civil air transport regulations? Since then, they have had a considerable impact and there are also major policy implications and employment considerations. If my right hon. Friend cannot allow a full-day's debate in Government time, can he at least allow a half-day's debate on civil air transport policy?

Mr. MacGregor: I do not think I can add to what I said earlier. Half days are in quite short supply in some respects as well. There are quite a large number of matters that hon. Members want to raise in the House. As I said earlier, I will bear in mind the point that my hon. Friend raised.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): Given the right hon. Gentleman's welcome comment that he will consider the reform of the working processes of this place, what consideration will he give to the decentralisation of decision making, particularly against the background in which support for the independence of Scotland is rising, and even one third of the tattered remnants of his own party want constitutional change? Will he seriously take that matter on board?

Mr. MacGregor: I was in Perth last night discussing some of those matters with a lot of my friends in the party in Scotland. On my way back this morning, I noticed a headline in The Scotsman suggesting that there was some change in attitudes to such matters as a result of a recent poll.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): In order to make next week's debates totally useful, will my right hon. Friend use his best endeavours to persuade the Opposition to give some figures for their policies and tell the House and the country whether extra taxation would be needed to pay for them? My right hon. Friend will agree that it is dishonest for the Opposition constantly to hold out promises without giving any figures and that, without such details, our time in such debates would be wasted.

Mr. MacGregor: My hon. Friend makes a very good point, and I hope that that will be clear in next week's debates on the national health service. It is clear to me from what the Leader of the Opposition said last night that he does not understand what has been taking place in the health service in recent years and does not understand public spending. It is quite clear that the very substantial increase—over 53 per cent. in real terms—which we have achieved in NHS spending has arisen partly as a result of the priority that we have given it and partly as a result of economic growth. He could not do better—he would do worse.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Since the Leader of the House is so good at mind reading, does he know the question that I am about to ask him? He is obviously not as good as my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) thinks he is.

As a member of the Procedure Committee, I was encouraged by the Government's response to the Committee's report on the workings of the Select Committee system. When will the necessary changes in the Standing Orders come forward? Will we have a debate? Since it appears that the Government are running out of business—business has collapsed on the past two evenings—could we discuss some of the outstanding Procedure Committee reports, in particular the Joint Committee report on the workings of the private Bill system? That matter also needs to be sorted out, and we now have the time to do it.

Mr. MacGregor: The hon. Gentleman is wrong about running out of business. The two days to which he refers were the two days that were given to the Committee stage of the Finance Bill. In a number of previous years we have given three days, and we have sometimes been accused of not giving enough. This year there have been two days. As the hon. Gentleman will know, it is largely up to the Opposition how those two days are deployed. I was giving the House the normal amount of time. It is largely for the Opposition how that time is used. It is not a matter of the Government running out of business. I would have been much criticised if I had given less time to the Finance Bill on the Floor of the House.

On the Select Committee on Procedure, I confirm that I hope to be able to lay the orders fairly soon. That would be the appropriate time to have a debate on them. That is the proper way to proceed. I am very keen to do so because it is a very good report. As the hon. Gentleman knows, we accepted a large part of it and I am anxious to see it implemented.

Mr. Bob Dunn (Dartford): Will the Leader of the House please arrange for an urgent, early debate on the workings of the grant-maintained schools provisions of the Education Reform Act 1988? That would enable the House to demonstrate to the people of this country the Labour party's commitment to abolish not only grant-maintained schools but grammar schools, city technology colleges, the assisted places scheme, Church schools and independent secondary schools, and to reduce everything to the single common denominator of 11-to-16 comprehensive schools and tertiary colleges, thereby creating no choice whatsoever for the people of this country.

Mr. MacGregor: I agree 100 per cent. with my hon. Friend. He puts his points extremely well. I am happy to tell him that some of the points, at least in relation to grant-maintained schools, may be raised next week, because we shall debate regulations next Wednesday.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): Is it not time to have a debate on the report of the Scottish Constitutional Convention, bearing in mind that the Scottish constitutional question managed to reach the agenda of even the Scottish Tory party conference in Perth this week, and the fact that the opinion polls in today's Scotsman reveal that the overwhelming majority of Scots, including almost half all Scottish Tory voters, are in favour of some form of Scottish Parliament?

Mr. MacGregor: We had some extremely good debates yesterday in Perth. The hon. Gentleman knows that the issue of the Scottish Convention was not put forward by the Government. He also knows that there are other ways of raising in the House matters on which the Government cannot find time for a debate, including all the Supply days that are available to the Opposition.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): While we are on the subject of constitutional issues, may we have a debate about the role and position of the Leader of Her Majesty's Opposition, given that his job security is more dependent on the well-being, prestige and the length of the membership rolls of the Confederation of Health Service Employees and of the National Union of Public Employees than on the effectiveness, efficiency and caring ability of the national health service? If we were to have that debate good and early, before the debate next week on the health service, might that be illuminating and set out some of the ground rules?

Mr. MacGregor: It would be in order for my hon. Friend to raise those matters in next week's debate.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): If the Government are so confident of their case on taxation and benefits, why can we not have a debate on that as early as possible, in which we shall be able to show that a large majority of the people of this country are now paying more in taxation—in both direct and indirect taxation—[Interruption.] The Leader of the House is asking for information about the local election results, but he will not get any satisfaction in relation to my seat. Although the large majority of people are now paying more in both indirect and direct taxation, the fact remains that the richest 1 per cent. of the population are now paying £30,000 less per year than 12 years ago. Does not that show the unfairness of Tory policies? If the Government really want a debate on such subjects, we shall be only too pleased to have one as quickly as possible.

Mr. MacGregor: The hon. Gentleman wrongly read either my mind or my lips. I was trying to find out whether he was present for our debates on the Finance Bill, where the issues——

Mr. Winnick: I was not.

Mr. MacGregor: The hon. Gentleman says that he was not here for our debates on the Finance Bill——

Mr. Winnick: I was attending the British-Irish parliamentary body.

Mr. MacGregor: Well, that cannot have been running through both the Second Reading and Committee stages of the Finance Bill. The plain fact is that we have recently had three days in which all those issues could have been fully raised if the hon. Gentleman had wished, so I do not intend to find another day. However, his point about higher-rate taxpayers entirely misses the point, which is that, as a result of our changes in higher rate taxation, the yield from higher income earners is now very much greater than under the Labour Government. I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman is suggesting that his own party should go back to the disastrous tax regime of Labour's period in government.

Mr. James Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth): Is my right hon. Friend aware of Warwickshire's difficult position because of the reductions in revenue support grant and because of being community charge-capped? Is he further aware of the damage that is likely to be done to education in the county of Warwickshire as a result of the reductions in funding for schools? Will he therefore allow us an early debate on this matter next week?

Mr. MacGregor: Not next week, but I shall find time fairly soon for the general issue of capping to be raised.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Did the Leader of the House see the article that stated that he was going to make an announcement that the House would rise on 15 July until 22 October? In view of all the representations that have been made today for debates on Bangladesh, and on unemployment and all the rest, will he ensure that we do not get those suggested extra weeks so that we can have all those debates? We could have a debate on the Common Market and another vote on the Single European Act so that all those Tory Members who now have misgivings about the Common Market could join those Opposition Members who voted against the Single European Act and tell the Common Market to get lost.

Mr. MacGregor: As the hon. Gentleman knows, not for the first time I disagree entirely with his stance on European issues as well as on many others. Of course, those issues can be debated in June when I hope we shall have a full day's debate on developments in the European Community. We all get used to seeing speculative stories in the newspapers about the rising of the House. I simply do not know where that one came from as I have made no announcement.

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): Will my right hon. Friend reconsider the debate on the Government's public expenditure plans for 1991-92 to be held next Wednesday? Following the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey), my right hon. Friend said that it would give us the opportunity to compare and contrast the Government's plans with those of the Opposition. However, for us to make that comparison, is it not necessary for us to have the Opposition's public expenditure plans on public display for every Member of Parliament and everyone outside this place? We can have no constructive debate on Wednesday unless the Opposition publish their proposals which so far they will not do. What is the point of the debate?

Mr. MacGregor: The debate on Wednesday is about our public expenditure plans which are real, financable at present levels of taxation, and I believe have absolutely the right set of priorities. As my hon. Friend knows, there have been real and significant increases in expenditure. The debate on Wednesday is about ours, but I see no reason whatsoever why my hon. Friend should not raise the points he has made then. Certainly we shall continue doing so time and again in the weeks and months ahead.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Will the Leader of the House arrange for a statement next week from the Home Secretary in regard to early-day motion 691 which concerns the importation of powerful and potentially dangerous and brutal dogs?

[That this House draws attention to the proposal to import a second Japanese Tosa dog for breeding purposes; notes that this species of dog grows to 17 stone and was originally bred for fighting; and calls on Her Majesty's Government to propose amendments to the law so that the import of new breeds of dog may be prohibited if it is against the public interest by virtue of the size, nature and purpose of the animal and so that, where appropriate, even where dogs are imported conditions may be attached to import licences as to the custody and breeding of such animals.]

Does he realise that the Department of the Environment already has powers passed by the House to introduce a dog registration scheme which will enable those potentially brutal and vicious dogs to be registered and traced and the owners to be given guidance and advice and any potential visitors warned about the dangers? The Bradford Telegraph and Argus and the Yorkshire Post have carried a number of stories—[Laughter.] Although hon. Members may find this amusing, some people have been savagely attacked by dogs such as American pitbull terriers, alsatians and doberman pinschers which have been allowed to roam loose. It really is time that the Government did something about it. They have the appropriate powers and we should not be waiting for vague statements from the Home Secretary at some vague future date.

Mr. MacGregor: I do not think anyone was finding the subject of the hon. Gentleman's remarks amusing. It was simply because a smile flitted across his face when he mentioned the Bradford Telegraph and Argus that others responded in like fashion. I am sure that he will accept that we all take the matter extremely seriously. As I have already said, there is legislation to put down any dangerous dog. We have received a wide range of comments on the consultation paper and I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will wish to make a statement as soon as he can.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Bristol, East): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that Wednesday's debate on the Government's public expenditure plans will provide the Government with an opportunity to confirm that they will continue to fund spending on defence at a level which enables us to deal with an uncertain and unstable world and that they have no intention of following the Labour party's plans to slash defence expenditure by £9,000 million a year?

Mr. MacGregor: One of the documents to which I referred in my announcement about business relates to our defence expenditure plans which are clearly set out. I have no doubt that they will be referred to in Wednesday's debate.

Mrs. Ray Michie (Argyll and Bute): When is the Scottish Grand Committee likely to resume its sittings? I hope that we can have an early debate either through that forum or on the Floor of the House about Scottish fish farming. The problems affecting that industry are being exacerbated by Norwegian dumping on the European Community which will be made worse if the reports that the United States will impose a levy on Norwegian farmed fish are true. My fish farming constituents believe that the Government do not know what they are doing or how to tackle the problem and I should welcome a debate on the matter.

Mr. MacGregor: I am aware of the issues facing the fish farming industry, in which, as the hon. Lady may know, I have taken and will continue to take a close interest. Indeed, I was discussing some of those matters in Perth last night.

Mrs. Michie: In Perth?

Mr. MacGregor: Yes. I do not know why the hon. Lady is so surprised—it seems to me to be an appropriate place to discuss such matters, with people who are experts in them. As regards how the matter is raised in the House, the hon. Lady will have ways to raise it, but, if she will allow me, I shall look into the matter and reflect on it.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): In view of the amount of public disquiet expressed in the media and in all the pubs in my constituency about the level of public support given to people who borrow inordinately large amounts of money on mortgage and cannot repay them, may we have an early debate in this House on the subject, not because we object to helping such people, but because my constituents feel that the burden of those bad judgments in overlending should be borne equally by the lenders of those very large sums?

Mr. MacGregor: My hon. Friend may be referring to a specific case that has received much publicity. The rules on help with mortgage interest are applied even-handedly to all owner-occupiers who suddenly become unemployed. In that case I think that there was some reference to a second home. No help is given with outgoings on a second home, and the possession of a second property will preclude entitlement to income support if its value, less any debts secured on it, exceeds £8,000. My hon. Friend may wish to know that the chief adjudication officer is taking legal advice on some aspects of the commissioner's decision to allow full payment of mortgage interest in one recent case.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): Is the Leader of the House aware of the great concern in colleges of education in Scotland about the Secretary of State's proposal, in his poll tax announcement, to take them out of the ambit of local government? Today, I received a letter from the principal of Coatbridge college—he is also secretary of the Strathclyde Principals Association—and from the chairman of the council at Coatbridge college expressing grave anxieties about administrative and other difficulties that would arise. Since that college serves Lanarkshire, including the village of Shotts which I gather is dear to the right hon. Gentleman's heart, will he agree that those well-informed views on education should not be dismissed lightly?

Mr. MacGregor: I hesitate to say this, but I referred to Shotts in Perth last night as well—it was obviously a long night. When I was Secretary of State for Education and Science I was certainly enthusiastic to work towards what we have announced—further education colleges coming outside local authority control in England. I know that that has been widely welcomed by many colleges in England and it is a desirable policy development. As regards the administrative problems of a college in Scotland that the hon. Gentleman mentioned, I shall draw them to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): May I impress on the Leader of the House the need for an early debate either in the Chamber or in the Scottish Grand Committee on the worrying subject of the present circumstances of child care law in Scotland, especially when we compare the present state of the law with English legislation? The right hon. Gentleman well knows that there was a time when Scots law was well in advance of English law in the protection of children. I refer to the Social Work (Scotland) Act, 1968. Today, children in Scotland are discriminated against, compared with the protection that is given, rightly and properly, to children here in England. There is no Children (Scotland) Act similar to match that in England. Under the provisions of the Criminal Justice Bill, children caught up in sexual and child abuse cases in England will rightly be spared the ordeal of giving evidence in court but a few feet away from the accused. We do not have that type of legislation in Scotland. We ought to have it and we need that debate.

Mr. MacGregor: The hon. Gentleman will appreciate that it is not possible for me to comment on a particular child abuse case in Scotland which is sub judice, but my right hon. Friend has announced that when that matter is completed, there will be an inquiry into this whole area. I am not sure that it would be appropriate to find Government time for a debate on the matter in the near future. It is important that the inquiry should take place. The hon. Gentleman will be able to raise issues that concern him—and I fully agree with him that these are important matters—in other ways in the House.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): When might we have an opportunity to debate the proposed European extradition treaty—or does that come in the general van of the House not knowing until things are finished—so that hon. Members might express their views on the Republic of Ireland constantly seeking favoured-nation status with us while being unwilling to sign a treaty of extradition, when this nation suffers most because of that failure?

Mr. MacGregor: I am sure that the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has made clear the Government's position on those matters. I cannot promise a debate on them in the near future.

Mr. Ron Brown (Edinburgh, Leith): The Government are not even handed about certain matters. As a Scot, the right hon. Gentleman will appreciate that north of the border a different law operates on the poll tax, which is how the struggle started. Nobody can be gaoled there, although in England 16 people have been hounded and imprisoned by the Government under the laws of England. We need a debate to see whether we can be more even handed on the issue. It seems clear that there should be an amnesty. Can we discuss the matter next week? It is important that we do that, because the people outside are demanding it, and they are the people who matter. People power matters.

Mr. MacGregor: The people outside, as the hon. Gentleman puts it, in England—I am sure that the same applies in Scotland—feel strongly when they pay their community charge and find that others, sometimes on higher incomes than themselves, do not. There is very strong feeling indeed in the country about that. People feel that those who do not make their payments should be properly pursued in the normal way.

Ms. Marjorie Mowlam (Redcar): Will the Leader of the House allocate time for a debate on the practice of the HFC bank in selling insurance-linked loans? Revelations in the Daily Mirror have recently shown how many people have been misled in a cold and calculating way. One couple who had a loan of £5,000 were misled into taking out an insurance policy and now have a loan of £14,000. They are not alone in that experience. People who have worked for the bank have complained. It is essential that we debate the matter so that the Minister has an opportunity to explain what will be done by the regulatory bodies about such scandals.

Mr. MacGregor: I did not see the newspaper report to which the hon. Member referred, so I cannot comment on it. I cannot find Government time for those matters to be discussed in the near future, but there are other ways in which they can be raised in the House.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Regarding Tuesday's business, since fortunately, but deservedly, I have the Adjournment debate on the subject of the Kuwaiti oilfields, may I ask the right hon. Gentleman to say who will answer my debate? Will it be the Foreign Office, which must conduct relations with paralysed Kuwait; will it be the Department of the Environment, in view of the fact that the effects now stretch to the Himalayas, west China, Quetta and Baluchistan; will it be the Department of Energy, with its oil well responsibilities; will it be the Department of Trade and Industry, which is responsible for contracts; or will it be the Ministry of Defence, whose sappers are trying their best in the most difficult conditions to fight the oilwell fires? Whoever answers, will the Leader of the House arrange for a formal statement to be forthcoming from the chief medical officer, Sir Donald Acheson, giving the Government's views on the carcinogenic or other effects of what is happening to those who are trying to put out the dreadful fires?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member should not go into the subject of his Adjournment debate. He may ask which Minister will reply.

Mr. Dalyell: Can I not use this opportunity to ask for a formal statement of the Government's view? If not, the issue will be evaded.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is about business next week. I thought that the hon. Gentleman was asking who will answer the debate.

Mr. Dalyell: Yes, but perhaps we could have a statement from the Department that will not be answering it—the Department of Health—because part of the debate is a serious statement on the considered, non-political, governmental view of the medical authorities on the cancer risks that our people, as well as the indigenous populations, face in an increasingly appalling situation.

Mr. MacGregor: I am not yet sure who will answer the hon. Gentleman's Adjournment debate. It will not be all five Departments, but I shall let him know which one it is as soon as I can find out. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his usual courtesy in indicating the subject that he will raise and I shall draw it to the attention of the Minister who will reply.

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton): Will the Leader of the House allow time next week to discuss a serious matter that has arisen because of the policy directive that Yorkshire regional health authority has issued to GPs? It has told GPs that if they refer patients to a hospital that is not contracted to the local health authority there could be delays in that patient's treatment, but that if a patient is referred from a funded practice there will be no delay. It is a two-tier system and, until someone decides who will pay the cash for the patient who will be under the practice contracted by the health authority, there will be tremendous problems. Will the Leader of the House allow time for this two-tier system in the health service to be discussed so that we can resolve the matter?

Mr. MacGregor: We do not have a two-tier system and the matter can be raised if the hon. Gentleman catches your eye, Mr. Speaker, in the debate on Tuesday.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Does the Leader of the House agree that there is now an urgent need for a debate on the defence industry in general and the aerospace industry in particular? The huge number of redundancies that have already been announced this year were disgracefully augmented yesterday by the axing of 3,000 jobs by Rolls-Royce, not least in Leavesden. If the Leader of the House could find time to organise such a debate, it would allow a contrast to be made between the chaotic way in which defence jobs are being run down—often losing highly skilled men and women who have worked for the same company for 20, 30 or 40 years—and the need for those companies to diversify into socially useful products. If the companies will not do it, why will not the Government offer some direction from the Ministry of Defence or the Department of Trade and Industry? If they will not do so in the private sector, the industry should be brought back into the public sector so that the jobs of those skilled defence workers can be guaranteed.

Mr. MacGregor: This is the first time that I have heard the hon. Gentleman argue for higher defence expenditure. He has always moved in a different way.

Mr. Nellist: I was talking about diversification.

Mr. MacGregor: I know, but the hon. Gentleman was also complaining about the loss of jobs because of the lack of defence expenditure. He tries to have it both ways. As he knows, we have debates on defence matters. There will be two more in this Session and the defence aspects could be raised then.

Points of Order

4.23 pm

Mr. Speaker: A point of order, I think—Mr. Howarth.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): I am grateful to you, Mr. Speaker, for reading my mind.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): It did not take long.

Mr. Howarth: I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that I and other Conservative Members have waited patiently for 53 minutes to raise our points of order. We did not seek to press you at the beginning of business questions because I understand that, during Agriculture questions, the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) raised a point of order——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let me just clear that up, because the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) blew his top about it. It is perfectly legitimate for an hon. Member who disagrees with the answer to his question to say that he will seek to raise the matter on the Adjournment if the question on the Order Paper is his own. That is exactly what happened. I stopped another hon. Member, who said that he would raise the matter on the Adjournment because his point of order was on a supplementary question, which is quite a different matter.

Mr. Howarth: I am most grateful that the precedent has been set that points of order may be raised now.

As I think that you, Mr. Speaker, will anticipate, my point of order relates to the disgraceful behaviour that occurred yesterday afternoon during the Division on the Asylum Seekers and Refugees Bill—a ten-minute Bill promoted by the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn). I do not know whether you have had a chance to read the exchanges, which are recorded in Hansard, in columns 749 and 750.

I was telling for the Ayes, and the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East, (Mr. Nellist), who is in his place, was behaving in the customary menacing and contemptible manner which he frequently displays in the House. It is clear that, yesterday afternoon, some of my hon. Friends might have voted against the measure had it not been for the menacing and thuggish remarks of the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East, whose complete lack of a sense of humour is well known to the House. He was behaving in a thoroughly intimidating fashion.

Mr. Speaker: What is the point of order for me, though?

Mr. Howarth: The point of order for you, Mr. Speaker, is that Mr. Deputy Speaker, while deprecating what took place, took no effective action——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let me deal with this. I have received a report of the incident, and I wholly support what Mr. Deputy Speaker said about this yesterday. He said that such conduct was strongly to be deprecated. He established that there had been no physical obstruction of hon. Members, and the Division was able to proceed without interruption. The Chair has no power to require the withdrawal of words spoken outside the Chamber, and furthermore nothing that occurs on one day may be dealt with by the Chair under disciplinary powers on a subsequent occasion.

Following Mr. Deputy Speaker's strong condemnation of yesterday's incident, I hope that the matter can rest there. I do, however, absolutely deprecate language and words of the sort used yesterday, which would have been dealt with strongly if they had been made in the Chamber.

Mr. Howarth: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am grateful for what you have said, but the point about the behaviour of the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East relates not so much to what he said —which was his usual fatuous nonsense—but the manner in which he said it. The Serjeant at Arms is present, armed with his sword, to deal with thugs and villains like that.

Several Hon. Members: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think that swords are called for. I call the Father of the House.

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): I rise with some reluctance because I do not like criticising any hon. Member, from whichever party.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth) has raised a point of great substance—yesterday, an attempt was made to ventilate it. I understand perfectly, and entirely agree with you, Mr. Speaker, that no criticism can be made of the Chair. Mr. Deputy Speaker, by virtue of being locked in the Chair, cannot be cognisant of what happens outside the Chamber, and I could not quarrel with one word that he said. However, the fact remains that that little area between the doors——

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): There was nothing as vicious as during the abortion law debates which the right hon. Gentleman led.

Sir Bernard Braine: My point is of far greater importance than anything that the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) has raised, either today or any other day—it goes to the heart of the liberties and rights of the House.

That little area and the two Division Lobbies are an integral part of the decision-making process for which the House exists. What happened yesterday was disgraceful.

I do not wish to repeat in detail what I said yesterday, but in my 40 years in the House I have never witnessed any behaviour like it. The behaviour of the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) was intimidating and offensive. He barred the way to certain hon. Members who were trying to get into the Lobby. Indeed, it alarmed some hon. Members, who turned away. If such behaviour had taken place in the Chamber, it would have resulted in Mr. Deputy Speaker disciplining the hon. Member straight away.

This is a serious problem. Mr. Deputy Speaker could not be cognisant of what had happened. I am supporting my hon. Friend because abuse of privilege outside the House is rightly taken seriously by all hon. Members. But abuse of the voting procedure of the House is far worse. Behaviour of that kind cannot be tolerated.

I shall not pursue the matter further now, but I hope that you will consider it, Mr. Speaker, and see what restraints can be put upon such behaviour, either by the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East or by any other hon. Member.

Several Hon. Members: Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We have a very busy day ahead of us. May I say to the Father of the House and to the whole House that I entirely accept what he said; such behaviour is unacceptable. The Deputy Speaker who was in the Chair at the time sent to find out if there had been obstruction, and it was reported to him that there was no obstruction. Therefore, there was nothing that he could do about a matter that had taken place outside the Chamber. In order to clear the matter up, the hon. Member who was concerned is present in the Chamber, and if he would like to give an explanation, we could get on with the next business.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) rose——

Mr. Speaker: I understand that the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) was present. Let us hear what he has to say about it.

Mr. Skinner: And I was present on the previous day when there was a vote on a ten-minute Bill, and I heard someone shouting, "Vote this way for porn videos." It was not exactly that. I have been around many times when I have seen Tory Whips shoving hon. Members into the Lobby to vote when they have not wanted to. What happened yesterday was that my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) saw some Tory Members who were goose-stepping on their way into the Lobby. He thought that he would make a few apposite remarks because they were anxious to vote against the measure. The hon. Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth) has been referred to many times in the House as a Member of the goose-stepping tendency—and saying that is not prevented by "Erskine May".

The truth is, as you know, Mr. Speaker, that on many occasions there has been a little bother beyond that line. I remember, as I am sure you do, when Tom Swain got hold of the neck of the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit). Some people asked, "What is going on?" Hansard could only say that it was an altercation. He nearly throttled him. Someone said, "Somebody had better stop him." The deputy Chief Whip at the time, who is not a million miles away from the Chair, had to go and sort them out. But it did not get in Hansard, and I did not hear any Tory Members raising a fuss about it. The right hon. Member for Chingford had to send a letter of apology to my hon. Friend.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman reminds me of things that I have witnessed in the Division Lobbies. I am bound to say that I have heard some rough things said in the Division Lobbies. Let us leave it now. The whole House knows that we should behave with decorum. Comments made outside the Chamber, which are clearly designed to raise the temperature, which, I have to say bluntly to the hon. Member, are offensive, and which would be dealt with strongly if said inside the Chamber, are to be deprecated. I think that we should move on.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, on another matter. I am sure that you will have seen a number of reports in the Today newspaper this week that are causing concern to hon. Members. You have always sought to protect the reputation of the House.

In one article on Tuesday Today said:

"the evidence confirms that Britain's MPs are the laziest in Europe."

It goes on to say:

"Britain's lazy MPs are to award themselves a Summer holiday which could last up to four months."

You know that that is not true, Mr. Speaker. We do not award ourselves holidays; we have a recess, and during it some of us manage to eke out perhaps one or two weeks' holiday, but the great majority of hon. Members are hard at work in their constituencies.

More importantly, the editorial in Today states:

"Televising parliament allows us to see that apart from Prime Minister's question time, the chamber is usually at least nine tenths empty. Do the Hon. Members honestly expect us to believe the rest of them are all working away busily?"

No reference is made to Select Committees or Standing Committees, both of which are heavily attended by Members and deal with legislation. No reference is made to Back-Bench groups, the meetings of which are heavily attended. Nor does the newspaper refer to policy meetings of all the parties in the House or to meetings with Ministers, constituents and other Members. We are within an hour and a half of a meeting, which will be well attended, with a delegation of Commonwealth parliamentarians who are in the House. The record must be set straight, and the British people should be given some indication from the Chair about what is happening.

Under a headline which asks:

"So just how hard does your M P work for you?", there is a list of more than 600 Members and their voting records. It is significant that, at the bottom of the list, is a Scottish Member who has had a lung transplant. A little further up the list is the name of a Liverpool Member who is deeply ill, an illness that is of concern to many hon. Members. Further up the list there is a reference to Mr. Norman Buchan, who was a close friend of many hon. Members and who died quite a long time ago. Somehow his name is included in the list in the context of his voting effort, but clearly he was not in a position to vote in the House.

The bottom of the list refers to Ministers, who are often in different parts of the country carrying out their public duties, and to Front-Bench members of my party, who can be in all parts of the country carrying out engagements. The first 100 names contain a heavy concentration of Conservative Members but, of course, we all know—there is nothing wrong about it—that the Government have to maintain a majority in the House and Conservative Members are detained here.

That list is supposed to be an indication of the effort made by hon. Members in carrying out their public duties. The article is clearly a disgrace. It is a misrepresentation of what happens in Parliament. Although Mr. John Craig is a good friend to many hon. Members, if pressure was exerted upon him by his editors to write the article, he should at least protest and perhaps indicate his protest to Parliament as a whole. Let us express the hope, as I do on behalf of my hon. Friends, that Today will be wise enough to print an apology for this gross misrepresentation of the democratic process in the United Kingdom.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have allowed the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) to make his point of order at some length, because it is important that the truth about Members of Parliament and their work load in this place should be known to the public. This country has a free press and there is no way in which any of us would seek to muzzle it. As the guardian of the reputation of the House of Commons and its Members, I deprecate what has been said. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Leith (Mr. Brown), who is present in the Chamber——

Mr. Ron Brown (Edinburgh, Leith) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Do not get up yet, please.

In a debate which I well remember about a year ago, the hon. Gentleman said, if I may paraphrase him, that one could sum up some of the modern press in three short phrases—"Make it brief, make it juicy, make it up."

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not have the advantage of having the article in question to hand, but I did read it carefully yesterday, and I should like to endorse everything that the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) has said. The article was run under a headline that suggested that we have voted ourselves a four-month break during the summer, and it went on to question the work load of hon. Members. Perhaps we should be interested in the work load of members of the Press Gallery, but that might be mischievous. Just because this House does not sit in the summer months does not mean that our duties end there. I have no doubt that the person who wrote the article would be the first when in trouble to get in touch with his Member of Parliament—if necessary at midnight on Christmas day—to solve his problem.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. Would you agree that the House of Commons should not be immune from criticism, and that journalists have as much right as anyone else to criticise us? It would be most unfortunate if we ever did anything to stop people criticising us. But is there not an important distinction between informed and uninformed criticism? I am sure that we all disapprove of the sort of trashy criticism that brings the House into disrepute.

Tabloid newspapers are read by a large number of people, and if some people look on the House of Commons with contempt as a result—I hope that they do not—does not that undermine our democratic liberties? This House is the custodian of the democratic liberties of our people, and to the extent that it is brought into disrepute by valueless criticism of this sort, that is unfortunate, to say the least.

It might be useful if we compared the working hours of most Members of Parliament with the working hours of the journalists who have written some of this trashy criticism.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): Further to that point of order——

Mr. Speaker: Is it the same point of order?

Mr. Bottomley: Yes, Sir.

The right point to emphasise is the use of information. When an article clearly contains glaring errors and insulting remarks, as described by the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), it should be exposed in public, but we should be careful about trying to remove from newspapers their right to be wrong. It is important that we have a free press and that, when newspapers are wrong, people should be able to raise the matter.

That should be the end of it, except for one suggestion that may be outside the rules of the House. Perhaps one of the cameras could be turned for one minute every hour on the Press Gallery, and the resulting photographs printed and made available to Members of Parliament and to the editors in charge of those who report our proceedings.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Speaker: Is it the same point of order?

Dr. Godman: Yes, Sir. I am grateful for your response to my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours). Do you agree that, at the very least, the editor of the relevant newspaper should send his profuse apologise to Mrs. Janey Buchan, the widow of our late and dear friend, Norman Buchan?

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not defend the inaccuracies in the article, but you may recall that, at one time, the attendance and voting records of Members were published every year in an independent publication, which gave a much better idea of our work load because it covered oral and written questions tabled by Members as well. Do you agree that, although we can criticise inaccuracies, a number of Members of this House do not exactly shed lustre on our proceedings when we are criticised in respect of attendance by holding so many outside interests, many of which they acquired when they came here——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is widening the point of order; we do not want to debate that now.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North) rose——

Mr. Ron Brown rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have mentioned the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Leith, but I call Mr. Marlow first.

Mr. Marlow: I do not think that we should be over-sensitive or over-precious about this. One of the roles of this House is to seek to sustain the interests of the people of this country, and from time to time we have to take on vested interests and lobbies. So it is not very pleasant if we are seen as being lobbyists on our own behalf, as we seem to be at the moment.

It is certainly true that many hon. Members work as hard and are as dedicated as anyone in the country, but that is not true of everyone in the House. It is fair and proper that the press should criticise. Sometimes that criticism is not as impartial as we should like it to be, but the press is free, and long may it remain so. Let us not be too precious about it.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Finally, Mr. Ron Brown.

Mr. Ron Brown: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Your paraphrasing of my statement showed what all of us feel—that the press should not make up a story.

We are of course open to criticism. It annoys me, however, that a certain tabloid, the Daily Record and the Edinburgh Evening News, recently made up a story that I had forged signatures on an early-day motion. That goes on all the time, even though no such criticisms about me or anyone else have come to your notice. Have I to your knowledge, Mr. Speaker, forged signatures on early-day motions about any issue, sensational or otherwise?

Mr. Speaker: I am certain that that is quite untrue.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will take one question from Northern Ireland since we have not yet had a comment from there; then we must move on.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): I appreciate being called, Mr. Speaker, although I was trying to catch your eye before this matter was raised, but what I have to say is linked with the earlier issue.

I support those who defend the right of the press to be free, but the press should give the whole facts. For example, some of us have abstained in person in votes because we were not prepared to vote for or against some motion, so the voting record has distorted what goes on here.

I regret that the Leader of the House is no longer present but I seek guidance from you, Mr. Speaker, following the right hon. Gentleman's response to my question about the extradition treaty in Europe. He said that the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland would explain the Government's position to us. I was actually asking for a statement in the House so that the House would be given responsibility. We learned about this from the Daily Mail yesterday—that is why I said that this was an associated matter; sometimes the media inform us about things that Ministers do not tell us about in the House—and I am not aware that the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland is responsible for dealing with extradition in Europe. The Minister responsible should come to the House so that we can debate the matter with informed minds.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that those on the Government Front Bench will have heard that.

I have allowed this matter to go on for some time because it is important that the public know the facts about the House of Commons—the fact that Standing Committees meet at 10.30 in the morning, so we do not sit only in the afternoons; the fact that there are Select Committees, so that the work of Members of Parliament does not go on only in the Chamber; and there is constituency work as well.

We all agree that we must have a free press in this country; we also want a responsible press. What has upset a number of parliamentary colleagues today is the fact that some hon. Members, for reasons that they could not help —in one case, a death and in others, illness—were mentioned adversely in a newspaper report. That draws attention to the fact that journalists should do their homework just as we do.

Royal Assent

Mr. Speaker: I have to notify the House, in accordance with the Royal Assent Act 1967, that the Queen has signified her Royal Assent to the following Acts:

Consolidated Fund (No. 2) Act 1991
Representation of the People Act 1991
Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Act 1991
Tay Road Bridge Order Confirmation Act 1991
Shard Bridge Act 1991
Adelphi Estate Act 1991
Heathrow Express Railway Act 1991.

Act passed in accordance with the provisions of the Parliament Acts 1911 and 1949: War Crimes Act 1991.

Orders of the Day

Social Security (Contributions) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

4.49 pm

The Minister for Social Security and Disabled People (Mr. Nicholas Scott): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The purpose of the Bill is to fill what I believe to be an important gap in the national insurance contributions system as a result of which employers do not pay contributions to the national insurance fund if they pay their employees in cars rather than in cash. As hon. Members will know, the fund is used to finance a wide range of contributory benefits, including retirement pensions and widows' benefits. Its income is generated by levying contributions on employees and their employers and on the self-employed. Under the present law, employers are required to pay contributions on the earnings of all their employees if they are above the lower limit, but earnings are defined in such a way as to exclude payments in kind. This exclusion dates from a time when such payments represented only a very small proportion of people's earnings.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): My right hon. Friend, very interestingly, has indicated that the national insurance fund is a specific bucket of money to be spent in various areas of Government policy. We are aware of proposals that employees' contributions should go right up the range. If that were to happen, would not national insurance become exactly the same as income tax? It is suggested, in addition, that some people should have to pay 10 per cent. extra in income tax. That, together with the payment of 9 per cent. right up the range, would mean that the managers of the country would be faced with a marginal tax rate increase of about 50 per cent. In those circumstances, as night follows day, every handbag and wallet in the country would be mugged by people seeking this extra money.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): I am sure the Minister recognises that this is a comparatively narrow Bill and that we cannot debate the whole range of things that have just been raised.

Mr. Scott: I certainly accept your judgment, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I would not, in any case, have responded in detail to my hon. Friend, although I understand his impatience and his inclination to draw attention to some of the nonsense being suggested by the Opposition in the run-up to the election. In due course, there will be opportunities to tackle these matters.

The situation that the Bill seeks to address dates from a time when payments in kind of this sort represented only a very small proportion of people's earnings. They were generally made on an irregular and infrequent basis and often consisted of goods that were difficult, if not impossible, to value accurately. The situation today is very different. A large number of employers choose to offer their employees a total package of remuneration, which includes substantial non-cash items.

The commonest and largest such item is the company car. One has only to look at the advertisements in the appointments sections of the national newspapers to see how common that is these days. We estimate that, this year, more than 2 million employees will receive, as part of the remuneration package, the benefit of having a company car. This represents a doubling of the number of company cars since 1985-86. Company cars have become a normal and accepted part of people's earnings. I cannot believe, in those circumstances, that it is right that this form of payment should lie outside the national insurance system. Perhaps I may advance an additional, tangential argument by saying that nor can it be right, given the impact of motoring on the environment, that there should, in a sense, be a built-in encouragement for people to be paid in terms of cars rather than cash.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg (Hampstead and Highgate): My right hon. Friend said that one purpose of the national insurance fund is to make provision for such benefits as retirement pensions. If employers are now to pay national insurance contributions in respect of staff motor cars, will the employees get some additional state benefits by way of extra pension?

Mr. Scott: That is certainly not the case. There are certain demands on the national insurance fund. A certain percentage is guaranteed to the national health service. The fund also pays for other contributory benefits. Obviously we, as well as the Government Actuary, monitor the state of the fund, but there is no essential link between the benefits that are paid and the contributions that are received. From year to year, a judgment is made as to contributions and payments. There is no automaticity.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): My right hon. Friend has mentioned the number of cars provided by companies for the use of their employees. Does he agree that a vast number of those employees simply must have a company car? I think, for instance, of electricians, washing machine servicers and representatives of confectionery companies. If such a person has a car, it is not part of his remuneration package. The car is needed as a tool of the trade, just as a secretary needs a word processor or a telephone. Surely it is unrealistic to suggest that employers should be especially burdened in this way for providing their employees with the tools to do the job for which they are paid.

Mr. Scott: I shall respond briefly to my hon. Friend, but will give more detail later in my speech. There is a range of provision for company cars. Some cars are, in effect, a perk; some are essentially a tool of the trade, in the sense that they are necessary to the job; in the middle, there is a mixture of business and private use, which varies very considerably. I hope that later I shall be able to satisfy hon. Members that the changes that we are making reflect those different uses. If a motor vehicle of one sort or another is used entirely for business purposes it will be outside the scope of this legislation. My hon. Friend referred to such vehicles as being tools of the trade, but where a vehicle is used to a significant extent for private purposes, a halved-scale rate payment will be expected to comply with these provisions. Any vehicle that is used entirely for business purposes will not be covered.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): Will the Exchequer make such national insurance contributions in respect of the private use made of ministerial cars—for example, on journeys between home and place of work?

Mr. Scott: Ministerial cars, and, indeed, cars used by some other hon. and right hon. Members, are provided from a Government pool as required. They are not allocated to individuals.

Mr. Couchman: Ah!

Mr. Scott: Having been a Parliamentary Private Secretary, my hon. Friend will know that there are very strict rules about the use to which ministerial vehicles may be put.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): Another story for the Today newspaper.

Mr. Scott: They are no different from the rules applied by Governments of all parties since the war.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I thank the Minister for his characteristic courtesy in giving way.

Can he confirm that the implementation of this legislation will not result in an extra workload on the staff in Department of Social Security offices? In Greenock and Port Glasgow, there is great concern about the slowness with which local offices deal with claims—in particular, claims for backdated benefits. I assure the Minister that this matter concerns people in my constituency.

Mr. Scott: If I may turn the tables on the hon. Gentleman, I should say that I admire his characteristic ingenuity. There is a total distinction between the new Benefits Agency, which I expect to improve the delivery of services to the constituents of all hon. Members, and the Contributions Agency, which will be responsible for the collection of national insurance contributions. There again, my right hon. Friend and my colleagues in the Department expect to see improved performance in the collection of national insurance contributions from employers, the self-employed and so on in coming years. So there will certainly be no impact at all on the service, which we aim to improve, in the local offices of the Benefits Agency.

Returning to my main theme, I do not believe that it is right that the rules should continue to operate in such a way that employers find it financially more attractive to pay their employees with cars rather than with cash. The Bill that I am urging the House to support today aims to correct this imbalance in our present legislation by requiring employers to pay national insurance contributions on cars and free fuel.

Individual employees who are provided with company cars and fuel are at present required to pay income tax on the benefit which they derive from free private motoring. The value of this benefit is assessed using a set of scale charges devised by the Inland Revenue to reflect the costs of owning and running a motor vehicle. We propose that the same scale charge rules shall be used to determine an employer's contribution liability. As with the Inland Revenue scheme, employers will face no contribution payments if a company car is provided purely for business purposes and there is no private mileage. Similarly, there will be reductions in contribution liability where business mileage is high. I believe that to be right. It is a way of recognising, within this pattern of provision, that for some employees a car is essential to the performance of their duties, whereas for others—those who do very little business travel—the car is provided solely or largely for the employees' private use.

As the House will know, there is a liability on both employers and employees to pay class 1 contributions. Nevertheless, we have decided—I hope that I can carry the House with me on this—that employees will not be liable to pay contributions in respect of company cars and free fuel. They already pay tax on that use.

There is a variety of practical reasons why we have decided not to impose national insurance contributions on those people. First, more than half all employees who have a company car are above the upper earnings limit for contributions. Secondly, employees are already required to pay tax and the imbalance in the tax and contributions rules for them is not so manifest as it is for employers. Finally, the rules for assessing primary contributions make it very difficult to integrate the new system with the existing national insurance contribution arrangements so as to produce a workable system for collecting the new contributions from employees. We believe that the additional complications for employers would be out of all proportion to the extra revenue raised and we therefore intend that employees should be excluded from any new liability.

I turn now to the practical arrangements that we intend to make for the collection of the new contributions. In devising these arrangements we have paid careful attention to the need to produce a scheme which employers can operate with the minimum of extra work. We have therefore decided to stick very closely to existing Inland Revenue rules with which employers are already familiar. Accordingly, the Bill will impose a contribution liability in respect of those employees provided with cars only where a scale charge would apply for tax purposes. Broadly speaking, these are company directors and employees earning more than £8,500 a year, including benefits in kind. The substantial advantage of this approach is that employers are already required to report annually to the Inland Revenue the details of such cars and we see no reason why they should face any particular difficulty in combining that reporting process with the assessment of contribution liability under the terms of this Bill.

The annual reporting takes place at the end of each tax year and forms detailing the cars and petrol provided during the previous year have to be sent to the Inland Revenue by 19 June. Under our proposals employers will use the same information, together with guidance which my Department will provide, to assess their contribution liability. The sums due can then be paid to the Inland Revenue as part of the normal PAYE national insurance return. The only other task employers will have to undertake is the inclusion of the contributions paid, in the normal way, in their wages records and end-of-year documentation.

The Bill will enable us to make regulations to determine those arrangements. However, before drafting the regulations, laying them before the House and setting out the practical arrangements for collection, we have invited employers' representatives to comment on the scheme that we have in mind. We will listen very carefully to their views and take them into account before settling the final details. We have time to do that because, although the Bill introduces the new contributions from the beginning of the present tax year, they will not be assessed or collected until 1992-93—in essence, in June 1992.

I know that some employers have expressed to us and in the press, to some extent, concern about the need for additional record-keeping. I do not believe that such concern is well founded. As I have explained, details of company cars already have to be provided to the Inland Revenue each year. Only a small amount of additional information will be needed to calculate the appropriate contribution charge. If, for example, the employer intends to claim one of the discounts for high mileage, he will have to satisfy himself that the car was used for more than 2,500 or more than 18,000 business miles during the course of the year. I do not believe that that will represent an insuperable problem.

We believe that in the majority of cases the information will already be available from the employers' records. First, it will be generally clear from the nature of the employee's job whether a discount for business use over 2,500 or 18,000 miles a year is appropriate. Secondly, the employer will be able to check details of business mileage with his employees. Finally, since the employer will be meeting the costs of petrol used for business mileage and may be keeping records for VAT purposes, further information will be available. So I do not believe that this will put any substantial extra burden on employers. There will be no requirement to maintain comprehensive business mileage records in every case and, generally speaking, we shall be adopting precisely the same approach to this as the Inland Revenue does at the moment in assessing individual liability; and after consulting employers, we shall be providing them with detailed guidance about what information will be required to comply with the requirements of the system.

To ensure that the system is operated correctly, we shall not be giving discounts to employers who at the time that the contributions are due do not know, or cannot say, which business mileage band is appropriate. I believe that that is a sensible protection for the fund. Subsequent adjustments will be possible if the wrong, or insufficient, information was used in the first calculation. In the event of disputes, employers will have access to the existing departmental machinery which at present determines the outcome of contribution problems.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: Is my right hon. Friend saying that any disputes should be settled by the Department of Social Security and not by the Inland Revenue? If the details have to go to the Inland Revenue, can he assure us that disputes will be dealt with by the excellent set-up in his Department?

Mr. Scott: My hon. Friend is, of course, very familiar with that system, and we will use exactly the same machinery as we use at the moment to settle contributions disputes.

In essence, we are looking to have here a system of self-assessment, with checks undertaken, in the normal way, by national insurance inspectors, who will obviously want to be sure that employers understand and operate the rules correctly.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): Before my right hon. Friend continues, I want to ask him about the payments. Is not it the case that most national insurance contributions at the moment are collected monthly with PAYE? How much is collected after the end of the national insurance year at the moment, because, as I understand it, in June 1992, £550 million will be due in one lump sum from employers and there are no interest penalties for late payment? How will the Department ensure that the money is paid over on time?

Mr. Scott: Under the Inland Revenue scheme, the money has to be paid by 19 June following the end of the tax year. Those would be our arrangements for any money that had not been paid in the course of ordinary monthly payments. Anything outstanding would have to be paid by 19 June following the end of the tax year. We shall follow the existing arrangements closely. It must be for the convenience of employers that, in establishing the contribution rules, we follow the Inland Revenue as closely as possible. Employers who are familiar with what happens with the Inland Revenue can lock easily into our provisions for national insurance contributions.

I turn now to the individual provisions of the Bill. Clause 1 amends existing legislation and specifies the circumstances in which the new contributions are payable and who will be liable to pay them. It also defines the amount on which the contributions will be calculated and the percentage rate at which they will be charged.

Subsections (1) to (4) introduce the new contribution which is to be called "class 1A". The provisions of subsection (5) form the basis of how the contributions will be calculated and who should pay them. The value of employer-provided cars and fuel will be determined, as I explained earlier, by reference to the income tax rules given in sections 157 and 158 and in schedule 6 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988.

The liability for the new contribution will arise where an amount is chargeable under tax rules for the employment in question and where that employment is employment for which national insurance contributions would be due. The effect of that is to exclude from the new contributions any employee earning less than £8,500 a year, including benefits in kind. Having established the basis of the liability, subsection (5) then identifies the secondary contributor—generally the employer, but not exclusively so—as the person who pays the new contribution.

The Bill deals next with the amount on which the contribution is to be calculated. That is determined by using income tax rules on scale charges for cars and fuel. Subsection (5), therefore, provides for the appropriate discounts and premiums, as well as excluding any case in which the car is not made available for private use or in which fuel is available for business travel. Having established the cash equivalent of the benefit of a car or fuel in that way, the amount of the contribution is calculated at the percentage rate set for the main employers' rate, currently 10·4 per cent. Subsection (5) also makes provision for employers who, because they have insufficient information, are unable to determine the relevant cash equivalent of the benefit of the car or fuel. The Bill provides that, unless the employer has information to the contrary, the cash equivalent is set at the highest relevant level. That will ensure that the discounts for high business mileage are available only to employers who can show that the appropriate conditions are satisfied.

Further provision is made to allow for this part of the legislation to be amended by regulation following any alteration to the main provisions of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988. Any such alteration is most likely to be brought about by means of a Finance Act and the regulatory power in the Bill therefore avoids the need for additional primary legislation to follow any changes in a Finance Act. The power is limited to such amendment as is necessary or expedient.

Subsection (5) includes a regulation-making power to except persons from liability in prescribed circumstances or to reduce the class 1A contributions due. That power will be exercised only in very limited circumstances. Its purpose is to make special provision for the employers of those taxpayers who benefit from extra-statutory concessions currently made by the Inland Revenue. Broadly there are two such concessions. The first—I say this wearing my secondary, but in many ways more important, hat as Minister for Disabled People—allows disabled drivers to count their home-to-office travel as business mileage. The second grants exemptions from liability in certain circumstances in which a car is made available for use by a member of an employee's or a director's family. Once again, our aim is to ensure that our provisions follow as closely as possible those of the Inland Revenue. Our legal advice is that, under social security law, that can be achieved only by regulations.

Clause 2 extends the current arrangements for the collection of national insurance contributions to the new class 1A contributions. It includes provision for deciding who should pay the charge when employers share the cost of a car, allows for refunds in cases in which the contribution has been overpaid and provides a regulation-making power in respect of record keeping. That parallels existing provisions for class 1 contributions and will include, for example, the need for a record of contributions to be kept on deduction working sheets. The penalty provisions that exist in respect of other class 1 contributions have been extended to class 1A contributions and clause 2 also provides that previous non-payment of contributions can be declared before a court in cases in which legal proceedings are necessary to recover class 1A contributions.

The remaining four clauses, the House will be glad to hear, require only a brief explanation. Clause 3 extends the existing adjudicative system so that, where there is a dispute over class 1A contributions, employers will be able to apply to the Secretary of State for resolution of the question. Clause 4 provides that, as for all other contributions, a specified percentage of the new contributions shall be allocated to the national health service. That will make over an estimated £50 million to the NHS from the new contributions. Clause 5 contains provision for Northern Ireland. Finally, clause 6 contains consequential provisions and provides for the Act to have effect from 6 April 1991.

I have said that the purpose of the Bill is to put right an anomaly in the national insurance system which has arisen because of changing practices in employment remuneration. As a result of the Bill, employers will no longer find it so attractive from the financial point of view to pay their employees with cars rather than cash. The scale charge rules will ensure that contributions are levied on a valuation of cars and fuel which is easily understood and calculated. In 1992-93, we expect the new charge to generate some £550 million in respect of company cars and a further £60 million in respect of fuel. In terms of overall labour costs, that amounts to about 0·2 per cent.

The charges will be spread among some 300,000 employers, so the additional financial burden should not be exaggerated. Instead, the provisions of the Bill should be seen in the context of the Chancellor's overall Budget judgment, which was good for business. Other Budget measures provide significant improvements, worth £750 million in 1991-92, for business. As now, employers will have a choice of whether they want to provide cars for their employees' private use. If they do, they will now quite properly face a contribution liability in just the same way as if they had paid their employees in cash. I believe that the provisions are long overdue and I commend the Bill to the House.

5.17 pm

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): I am pleased to open a debate on behalf of my party for the first time. It is a unique occasion for me and may be rapidly followed by another unique occasion when I say that there is little in the Bill with which I can find fault. As the Government approach their dying days, they seem to be adopting more and more Labour party policies, so this may not be a unique occasion. I shall welcome the occasions on which I am at the Dispatch Box and can concur with most of what the Government say.

The Bill is essentially part of the Budget and its provisions might sit more easily in the Finance Bill. I am pleased to take this chance to thank my eminent colleague, my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown), for nursing me not only through the provisions of the Bill, but through the Finance Bill last year. That was quite an experience for someone like myself.

Mr. Tim Smith: Now we know who writes the hon. Gentleman's speeches.

Mr. Allen: Indeed.

I must admit to some surprise that changing the regulations on company cars requires a social security Bill, although my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East will know that I am very much in favour of the budgetary process being opened up not only to include departmental Budget Bills, but to involve the departmental Select Committees of the House and outside organisations at the pre-Budget stage rather than having the wham, bam, thank you ma'am Budget speech that passes for the Budget process at the moment. A more protracted and intimate relationship between the Executive and the legislature is possible and essential in a modern democracy. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), the shadow Chancellor, is committed to considering improvements to the budgetary process. He is in the enviable position that almost anything that he ultimately proposes must be an improvement on the current arbitrary, truncated and secretive process.

The Bill relates to national insurance contributions to be paid by employers for the first time in respect of company cars and fuel made available for private use. Most people outside this place will know that in shorthand as the company car perk. Coming new to these matters, it was explained to me that, at its simplest, a company car is deemed to add an amount to an individual's income which is liable for tax. The controversy has always arisen over the size of that amount. Seeing certain hon. Members in the Chamber today, no doubt further controversy may arise about the actual amount that should be added to the income and be liable for tax. It has been and remains considerably cheaper for an employer to provide £100-worth of benefits in kind than to provide £100 in cash as net income.

The most popular benefit-in-kind device is the company car. I understand that company cars account for 80 per cent. of all benefits in kind. That accounts for the importance of the company car and explains why the Government are taking on that benefit in kind before any others. I welcome the fact that the Government are considering the matter seriously.

There can be little doubt that the company car as a device for avoiding fair tax is destined to diminish in popularity whetever party is in government. The tax regime in the United Kingdom has favoured payment in cars rather than in cash. Despite Government attempts to move to a fairer system, some further evolution may still be necessary, as the Investors' Chronicle survey of executive cars reported last year after the previous Chancellor's bite at the issue. The Investors' Chronicle stated that that earlier attempt brought "a sigh of relief".

"It could have been so much worse. Business had braced itself for a much higher rise, especially in respect of the 'perk' car which covers a small annual mileage. A rise of 50 per cent. in the scale benefit taxation and banding of Vehicle Excise Duty to penalise large cars had been forecast."

That report concluded on the rather weary note that future Chancellors would perhaps return to those issues and ensure that there was an equal balance between payment in kind and taxation.

In spite of the increasing burden of taxation under this Government, the effects of the recession and alleged corporate cost cutting, a recent report from the Monks Partnership revealed continuing and massive use of company cars in the United Kingdom in comparison to our neighbours. For example, in the United Kingdom 96 per cent. of senior financial posts come with a company car, compared with 29 per cent. in France.

The number of people paying tax on company cars has doubled to 2 million in the past four years according to the Inland Revenue. We appear to be a long way from the balance of advantage shifting towards using personal cars and claiming a mileage allowance for business use which is what some people would like to see. Fewer than 5 per cent. of companies expect to reduce the provision of cars and one quarter of employers intend to expand their fleets. It is still a matter of debate whether the proposals in this Bill have the balance right.

Mr. Couchman: The hon. Gentleman has just quoted most interesting figures about the number of employers who expect to reduce or increase the number of company cars that they provide. When was that survey carried out? Was it carried out before this year's Budget or afterwards? The hon. Gentleman's figures seem to conflict with information that I have read in the newspapers.

Mr. Allen: The survey was conducted after last year's Budget.

Britain still tops the European league for company cars because, even after the proposals in this Bill, Britain will still have by far and away the most favourable company car tax regime in the world. The movement on car perks by consecutive Chancellors may owe more to the eye that they are keeping on potential European directives and European average levels of assistance than to the proposal to eliminate market distortions.

We should be aware of the distorting effect of unfair taxation on the motor industry. There are several eminent representatives of that industry in the Chamber today and they may wish to refer to that point later. Over-concentration on the company car market can weaken its competitiveness overseas. Paying less in tax may encourage companies to accept a slightly higher cost for the vehicles. Higher specifications demanded by company car fleet managers may mean that vehicles are produced to too high a specification to be competitive in certain overseas markets.

Mr. Thompson, the vice chairman of the British Vehicle Rental and Leasing Association, said:

"the corporate sector had tolerated such price increases and there is no sensible mechanism for controlling prices."

That may be part of the explanation why car prices in the United Kingdom are higher than in most parts of Europe. The Monopolies and Mergers Commission report referred to in last week's Financial Times showed that some pre-tax car prices in the United Kingdom are more than 50 per cent. higher than in other European markets.

Business buyers account for an estimated 65 to 70 per cent. of new car sales in the United Kingdom. The Financial Times stated recently that partly as a result of that "Manufacturers had felt able to impose price increases more readily than elsewhere."

When purchasing abroad is made easier after 1992, United Kingdom car makers may regret the price cushion that has distorted the company car market.

Another reason to tax company cars fairly was referred to by the Minister. They should be so taxed because of their adverse environmental consequences. According to a wide range of studies, company cars are used more, driven further and are larger than private cars. They are driven faster, and their drivers have more accidents, take more risks and drink more alcohol than the drivers of private cars. In addition, since 1988 free parking at work has been exempt from tax and national insurance contributions, adding a further incentive to bring cars to work and create congestion.

The National Economic Development Council has estimated that 90 per cent. of cars entering central London between 7 am and 1 pm are subsidised by companies. A study of free parking at work was recently carried out for the NEDC by Transport and Environmental Studies—or TEST. It was found that free parking is a more widespread perk than company cars and most motorists driving to work have their parking costs paid for. The TEST report proposed taxing company-provided parking spaces at a rate equivalent to their rateable or market values. TEST estimated the value of that perk as £2,000 a year for a space in the City of London and £300 a year in Swindon. I understand that the Treasury estimates are £1,500 and £500 respectively. Free parking has been estimated by Earth Resources research for Greenpeace to result in a £408 million revenue loss, comprising £288 million in tax, £30 million in employees' national insurance contributions and £90 million in employers' national insurance contributions.

It should be noted that the exemption of tax and national insurance contributions on parking at work was introduced only in the 1988 Budget on the ground that calculations of its value were too complicated. Of course, since then the revaluation of business premises with the introduction of the uniform business rate has made valuation potentially easier.

The other main unresolved issue about company cars is evasion. There is some evidence that evasion is considerable and that much business use of cars is simply not declared. There are considerable discrepancies between Inland Revenue figures for those declaring company cars and Department of Transport registration figures. Earth Resources estimate that as many as half those using company cars may not be paying their full tax on them. There can be no question but that hidden subsidies to the car are detrimental not least to the taxpayer but to other transport users or providers such as the railways and other more environmentally friendly means of transportation. Greenpeace estimates that the company car subsidy costs £150 per household, or £3·4 billion, to the nation. Government funding for all forms of public transport is lower than the subsidy for company cars and investment in road transport.

A difficult matter that has been touched on by hon. Members is that the bona fide company car user is in a different category from highly paid executives who have a company car almost exclusively, as the Minister said, as an executive perk. That is a peculiarly British institution. The Investors' Chronicle put its finger on the issue when it said:

"Only the naive believe that companies provide employees with cars merely to allow them to perform their duties properly. User-choices perceive their cars as a reflection of their status."

Indeed, 70,000 individuals have two or more company cars. Of those earning over £35,000 a year, a staggering 73 per cent. have a company car.

There appears to be consensus that the present tax regime penalises the high business mileage user but is overly generous to high status and low business mileage users. Even after the passage of the Bill, future Governments will need to rethink their policy and relate the level of taxation more closely to business mileage. One aim could be to ensure that the high business mileage driver can be better off with a mileage allowance on his or her own car rather than a company car. Placing national insurance contributions on company cars is a long-overdue rectification of an unfair anomaly in our tax system.

Mr. Couchman: Is the hon. Gentleman under the impression that national insurance contributions are not presently leviable on the use of a company car for private use?

Mr. Allen: That is not my impression at all.

Future Governments may also regard it useful to have established the first significant precedent of levying national insurance contributions on fringe benefits, although since May 1988 national insurance contributions have been levied on gilts, but I do not regard that as a particularly significant precedent.

Mr. Couchman: Will the hon. Gentleman give way yet again?

Mr. Allen: If I may be allowed to continue the rest of my speech——

Mr. Couchman: I should like to put it right.

Mr. Allen: I have been very generous in giving way. The hon. Gentleman will seek to make his own speech shortly.

A further serious problem that has arisen concerns value added tax. I should be grateful if the Minister would consider the problem. I presume that the Government are seeking to encourage the payment of cash rather than kind or smaller cars plus cash rather than large cars. However, it now appears that VAT could become payable by an employer when cars are retained in preference to cash in lieu of cars or when a small car plus cash payment is made instead of a large car. I do not expect the Minister to spring to the Dispatch Box to answer that point—it is rather complicated. It could be possible for one arm of the Treasury, VAT collectors and Customs and Excise, to undermine the policy direction that is evident in the Bill by levying VAT, and prevent people from switching to cash payments or smaller cars. I should be grateful if the Minister would discuss that matter in the Department to see whether that is the case.

The answer to a recent parliamentary question by my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East on 30 April showed that the Budget changes will raise an extra £550 million in respect of cars and £60 million in respect of fuel. That was reaffirmed by the Minister. However, those yields will be reduced by £200 million due to employers claiming corporation tax or income tax relief on their payments. That additional income for the national insurance fund is most welcome, not least because the fund is still carrying the immense and unnecessary burden of the £6·7 billion bribe to encourage individuals to take out private pension plans.

The measure is a small contribution, but it is welcome. For that reason if for no other reason, we generally welcome the Bill.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): I begin by declaring an interest. Since 1964, I have driven a company car. I have been allowed to use it for my private use. As chairman of my own family company, I drive an opulent Vauxhall Astra GL. I am concerned that the difference between the perk car and the workhouse car is inadequately differentiated by the Bill. The hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) seems to be unaware that, since 1975, national insurance contributions have been leviable on fuel provided by an employer for private use.

I declare a further interest. Recently, my small company had a pay-as-you-earn audit. One of the few things that the inspector picked up was the fact that we were not paying national insurance contributions on private fuel. However, he admitted that until 1989, when the so-called green book was issued, the fact that a sum was leviable on the private use of fuel supplied by an employer was a dark secret known not even to PAYE audit inspectors. That is extraordinary. The inspector concerned actually wants to go back six closed years. Hon. Members will not be surprised to hear that we are contesting that.

The matter has been peculiarly badly handled by the Department of Social Security, and it is a great sadness to me, having served that Department for several years, that I am in conflict with it on this matter. The matter has not been clear to employers or employees. What is more, the impost that my right hon. Friend is being asked to make is to balance this year's Budget. Let us be under no illusions. It is interesting that my right hon. Friend the Minister of State answered our hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) in an evasive manner when our hon. Friend asked where contributions would reflect in benefits from the Department of Social Security—contributory benefits, presumably. That point was not answered.

When the Minister replies, I should be grateful if we could be told where that substantial sum of £0·5 billion will manifest itself in benefits for employees. It is interesting to note that the £0·75 billion of benefits in this year's Budget, which are apparently good for business, are shaded by the clawback under the impost. We are talking about the national insurance fund because the money that is raised by the contributions will go into that fund. Can we be sure that that fact will be reflected in the benefits to employees, and that it will not be clawed back by the Treasury to balance this year's budget?

I am also worried about what the provisions will do to the British car industry. I have no doubt that my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) will wish to make his own contribution on that score, because I know that he will be worried by the fact that the British motor industry will certainly not benefit from any diminution in the provision of company cars. From the newspapers that I have read in the past few days, I understand that companies are now preparing to buy themselves out of the provision of motor cars by providing large additional salaries. I have read the figure of as much as £10,000 per year. Clearly, that would be for a more opulent car than my Vauxhall Astra, but the principle is clear.

As I have said, I wonder about the damage that that will do to the British motor industry because if we buy our cars ourselves, we tend to go abroad for them rather than buy from the home market. That is because of the perceived benefits of other-than-British motor cars. As the big fleets comprise largely British motor cars, any diminution in the provision of company cars by employers will damage the British motor industry.

The other thing that I should like to make clear——

Mr. Tim Smith: Before my hon. Friend gets on to the other thing, does he not agree that it is an appalling indictment of the British motor car industry that, apparently, it is sustained at the moment only by company car fleets, and that, if individuals had a choice, they would go abroad for their motor cars?

Mr. Roger King rose——

Mr. Couchman: My hon. Friend makes a valid point, to which I see that my hon. Friend the Member for Northfield wishes to reply.

Mr. King: The point is not that the private buyer is disillusioned with the quality of the British-built product; it is that, if the private buyers want to drive something that is more original and a little different, as opposed to something that can be seen in the average driveways of the kingdom, such as Cavaliers, Montegos and Sierras, that buyer might be tempted to buy something from an overseas manufacturer. But that in no way reflects any inadequacy in the British product.

Mr. Couchman: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention, because my son, who is aged 22 and is car mad, speaks pejoratively of the Cavalier as "the rep's motor" which, indeed, it is; as my hon. Friend has said, many of the big fleets consist of Cavaliers, Sierras and Montegos. That is why I think that the provisions will do considerable damage to the British motor industry.

I have another brief point to raise—I know that the House will not want to be detained by me for any great length of time on this point. I refer to the concept that, in some magic way, someone on £8,500 is a higher-paid employee. I pay more than that wage in my business to bar staff and it is my understanding that £8,500 is about two thirds of average earnings. One can hardly consider that a representative who earns £8,000 or £9,000 a year and who is on two thirds of average earnings is a higher-paid employee. The impost will hit hard the companies of those who are quite lowly paid.

I hold no brief whatsoever for the company director who never uses his company-provided car for business and for whom that car is a pure perk. I am happy to see such company directors pay tax on their cars. However—I come back to where I started—the impost will be unfair on the companies of those people who use their company-provided car for their job and who cannot otherwise do that job sensibly or viably.

Eighteen thousand miles may seem a high mileage, especially to those who do their business in London and the home counties, but I doubt whether those whose business is in rural areas and who have a wide area to cover will regard it as a high mileage. There should be some differential between those people who do their business miles in London and those who do them in rural areas, where miles come easily on to the mileometer.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I have no intention of opposing the Bill, but should like to support some of the comments of the hon. Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman), especially his point about the number of miles travelled for business purposes. That is important to me, coming from a rural part of Scotland and representing a rural constituency. I hope that the Government will give further consideration to that matter.

I start by being slightly pedantic. I do not accuse Social Security Ministers on this point, because I know that they are not masters of their own destiny when it comes to the way in which legislation is put through the House. However, I am puzzled and a bit nervous about such legislation being put through all its stages in one evening. I am doubly worried because, as a result of this matter being part of the Budget provisions, there was not much time to canvass views more widely before the measure was announced in the Budget statement.

We have had an assurance—I am sure that it will be honoured—that there will be consultations thereafter, but bringing forward such primary legislation on an evening like this and with a low attendance of hon. Members is a casual way of submitting the legislation to the statutory processes. There must be constitutional and legal reasons for it, but I cannot understand why the Bill does not form an integral part of the Finance Bill. I have no doubt that hon. Members who serve on the Finance Bill Standing Committee will spend long and happy hours upstairs considering the totality of the Government's financial proposals in the Budget. That would be a much better vehicle for giving this measure the proper consideration that it is due.

It is a small Bill, and I agree with the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) that it is a technical Bill which is difficult to understand, but £550 million-worth of national insurance fund contributions are to be raised, with an additional £60 million from fuel. As that is a very big sum of money on any definition, for that reason alone we cannot dismiss the Bill as unimportant.

I am interested that the financial and explanatory memorandum states that "50 staff years" of additional manpower are involved. The Minister of State skated over this matter—I do not know whether he did so deliberately—but he seemed to think that the extra administrative costs were fairly small beer. I wonder whether that will be the perception of the people who will have to pay the contributions for the new administrative scheme.

If the Government are to bring in the extra impost, I agree that the Inland Revenue machinery is by far the most efficient and least disruptive way of doing so, but it is not enough to say, "Using the existing systems will make no difference," because I do not think that that is true. There will be a significant increase in bureaucracy, which will fall on the shoulders of the employers, many of whom will be small employers.

Although the provision of company cars has been abused and, as the hon. Member for Gillingham said, the Government are right to tackle that abuse, there is a world of difference between the tax perk that is now an accustomed part of the stock in trade of the finance directors of big firms where fleets of company cars are used as a form of surrogate remuneration, and the little knitwear companies in my constituency, such as in the town of Hawick, which have only one works van. They use the works van six days a week to take the piecework to the outworkers so that they can knit up pieces of garments and bring them back to the factory for processing and packing. They also use the van at weekends.

I listened carefully to the Minister's speech and I assume that employees such as district nurses in rural areas will not be affected by the Bill.

Mr. Couchman: We have also had representations recently from charities that allow cars which are provided to people earning more than £8,500 a year to be used for private mileage, so the Bill will be an impost on charities.

Mr. Kirkwood: Some employers that are not commercial organisations will be caught under the provisions. I am anxious that we should have a full discussion, and that Ministers provide a complete explanation of the extent of the Bill's effect before we take it further.

I agree with the hon. Member for Gillingham that the Government should reconsider the limit of £8,500. The Bill will have a dire impact on employers and employees of small companies. That figure represents only two thirds of average national earnings. That is not a large sum of money, and I cannot work out why the Government decided to impose a limit at £8,500; the figure cannot have been plucked out of nowhere.

Mr. Tim Smith: It has always been like that.

Mr. Kirkwood: That is news to me. I freely confess my ignorance; I am sure that the Minister will confirm whether what I have said is the case. If it is an established figure in Inland Revenue rules, that is obviously why it was chosen. Has the Department considered the effects that it will have, and have Ministers considered the possibility of making exemptions so that the tax would not affect small businesses and the directors and employees of small companies who earn relatively small salaries, as £8,500 is a small annual income?

The Minister said that the Bill will affect 2 million cars and 300,000 employees. Do the Government have any idea how that figure is broken down? What is the profile of the average employer or employee that the Bill is designed to catch? If it is big companies and their employees, I would find it easier to allow the Bill to complete its passage. However, if the burden will fall disproportionately on small companies, I would see it from a different perspective.

Finally, I should like some reassurance. Have the Government considered using engine size as a way of bringing back into control the abuse of company cars? The Minister made a valid point when he said that there are environmental aspects to controlling the use and abuse of company cars.

Mr. Tim Smith: It depends on the size of the engine.

Mr. Kirkwood: I am perfectly well aware that there is a scale for company cars based on engine size, but the Government have the possibility of making it more advantageous financially for companies to buy smaller cars, so that company directors would run around in 1300 cc Vauxhall Astras. Have the Government considered making smaller cars totally exempt from taxation? In future, all Government Departments will have to look at the tax burden on motoring costs in general.

The Government are right to end the present anomaly. I am certainly prepared to allow the Bill a Second Reading, but I object to the way in which it is being put through the House in one evening. The Government still have to answer some of the questions about which people will carry the cost of the new impost that the Bill will introduce.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): I do not welcome the measure, although I well understand the difficulties faced by my right hon. Friend the Minister in presenting the Bill this afternoon. The measure was included in the recent Budget, so it is no surprise that it has surfaced today.

It is unfortunate at this time in our economic resurgence to place further financial burdens on our motor industry. I do not disagree with the motives behind the claim that the perk that the company car offers a number of working people needs to be tackled. About 10 per cent. of those who have company cars have them simply as a perk. I am concerned that, in tackling the problem in order to raise money—my right hon. Friend explained earlier that the measure was designed to bridge a financial gap in the Budget—it is likely to have some disadvantages that the Government have not thought through thoroughly.

The problem with the company car was created when we had stop-go wages policies, and employees were rewarded with company cars instead of salaries, which were then very heavily taxed. That trend started a process which has grown into the present problem. However, it goes further than that. The United Kingdom is a densely populated country, and our population is scattered throughout our land. We seek to bring employment and opportunity to all regions of the kingdom, and the only way to do that is by means of a system of communications which is available to everyone, and for people to travel freely.

If we are anxious to create jobs and employment prospects in remote areas, we must enable the equipment needed for that employment to be purchased relatively cheaply and to be readily available. That is why the car has played such a formidable part in bringing employment to the more remote areas of our country. Jobs cannot depend on rail connections, if there are any. Businesses cannot wait for the next bus to turn up. They need components and goods to be supplied when they want them, and people must have the opportunity to make deliveries.

The necessity for the true company car has been overshadowed by the perk element, which has got out of hand in recent years. In successive Budgets, the Government have raised the tax bands, and that has brought the company car into balance between a perk and an essential business tool. The proposal we are discussing cannot be seen in isolation. It has to be considered in terms of the increase in tax bands that the Chancellor announced in the Budget, plus the 2·5 per cent. increase in value added tax. A car attracts 27·3 per cent. tax. No other product on sale in the Kingdom is taxed that highly; in Germany, there in only a 14 per cent. tax on cars. The combination of measures that the Government have introduced has exacerbated a problem which may come to the fore during the next few months.

There is no doubt that the British car industry is enjoying a good time, but I must stress that it is the manufacturing industry—times are far from rosy in the retail sector. About 350 large dealers have gone out of business in the past year. Nevertheless, manufacturers have been able to sustain and even increase production as a result of producing goods which have an enviable record for quality and market acceptability, and they are exporting increasing quantities. We need a strong and healthy home market behind those exports, and we do not have one at the moment. Sales are declining: they are now down to 1·6 million units per year, from a high of 2·3 million in 1989.

My fear is that the combination of measures introduced in the Budget and in this Bill will further exacerbate that problem. There are signs that the European market and other world markets, which are not untouched by the change in the world economic climate, are tending to dry up, and manufacturers in the United Kingdom will not have a buoyant home market to pick up the shortfall that will result from dwindling imports.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): I apologise for not hearing my hon. Friend's opening remarks. Manufacturing industry is now heavily dependent on the export side, especially in the case of General Motors in my constituency, as 80 per cent. of its Vector cars, produced at Luton, are going for export. My hon. Friend is right to point out that that market is very fragile. Because of the nature of the country that they are going to—Germany, which has its own problems—those exports could dry up at a stroke. That is why this further blow to the manufacturing industry must be considered by the Government, and I agree with everything that he has said so far. Manufacturing companies could be in a serious position if those exports decline or disappear before the end of the year.

Mr. King: My hon. Friend endorses my argument. The Vauxhall Cavalier is the biggest selling fleet car. Any shortfall in demand from the United Kingdom market will have a substantial effect upon the viability of General Motors' operations in this country. That fact needs to be stressed, because the car industry offers tremendous opportunities. We have few industries which can look forward to a positive expansionist programme in the next 10 years and which can largely overcome our balance of payment difficulties. Some forecasters predict that, by the year 2000, the motor industry alone can bridge the gap in our balance of payments deficit, provided that it has the encouragement it needs to expand and invest.

One of the reasons that the United Kingdom has proved attractive to incoming investment from companies such as Nissan, Toyota and Honda is that there is a substantial bedrock of sales in the company car sector. Whatever one might think about the evil nature of the company car, it has enabled the United Kingdom market to sell 700,000 cars a year to that sector. It is a lucrative market for manufacturers, and as a consequence it has attracted many overseas companies, which come here and set up plants to cater for it.

Mr. Couchman: My hon. Friend's argument about the company car market is valid. The hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen), who opened the debate for the Opposition, made much of the fact that 65 per cent. of new car sales are to the company car market. However, I heard the other day that there are 20 million cars on our roads and only 13 per cent. are company-owned, because they are sold off.

Mr. King: My hon. Friend is correct. The average life of a company car is three years. Some are called company cars but are bought by companies such as Hertz and Avis, and have a life of nine months before they go into the used car market. Companies seek to dispose of company cars after three years. The Budget caused a problem within the industry, as companies are tending to replace cars after four years, and it is difficult for the British car industry to bridge that one-year gap.

It is evident that when employers consider the costs of providing a company car there is a strong temptation for them to buy out that perk—if one can use that expression—and replace it with a higher salary. Perhaps an economist could point out the consequences of that for inflation.

Also, there is the risk, as has been said, and as research shows, that, if employees are left free to buy their own cars, they will not want to buy a Vauxhall Cavalier or a Sierra—excellent though those products are—but will choose something a little more individual, which will almost certainly be imported either from Japan or from the rest of Europe. That is a fact of life. We do not always want to be like everyone else in the street. We want to express our individuality, so we buy something a little different. In car industry terms, such a product will come from abroad. It does not need many people to do that before it has a substantial impact on the United Kingdom car industry, and that would have serious consequences if it were repeated on a grand scale.

Undoubtedly, the House will see fit to approve the proposals before us, but I feel that it is right to express a few cautionary remarks. I accept that, having been landed this legislation, my hon. Friend the Minister cannot restructure the way in which these new charges will be imposed, but I certainly hope that the Government will see whether they can arrive at a fairer system.

The distinction between perk car and work car has defied Government for some considerable time. They tend to cover the lot by using some sort of mileage cutoff point, on the assumption that someone who does 18,000 miles a year is driving a works car and that someone who drives less is presumably driving a perk car. That is a crude dividing line, and it is long overdue for overhaul.

The first impositions made by the Government, taxing company cars and their benefits, were rough and ready and did not have a hard hitting financial impact upon users. That impact has become progressively harder, until it is now arguable whether there are any benefits in having a company car. With the addition of national insurance charges, the balance is definitely tipped against the company car in all respects.

The Government should redouble their efforts to arrive at a fairer banding system. It does not make any sense for the person who has a Sierra or a Cavalier estate, who perhaps services and maintains products or provides replacement goods for shops in central London and drives only 6,000 or 8,000 miles a year—although he spends a large part of his working life in his car, which is a business tool—to get little discount because he does not do the arbitrary limit of 18,000 miles.

Mr. Couchman: Is my hon. Friend aware that to do 18,000 miles in London, where the average speed is 12 mph, requires about 30 hours' driving a week, which is near to a working week?

Mr. King: My hon. Friend endorses the point I am making.

Mr. Tim Smith: Give that sort of driver a van.

Mr. King: I am sure that some employers consider the suggestion that my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) makes, but few will want to drive, say, a Transit or Sherpa van to deliver some fuses or packaging or cartons of cigarettes or sweets. A van is a large vehicle to use in London and is hardly environmentally acceptable if instead one can use a small car.

I hope that the Minister will redouble his efforts to draw up a more equitable system of bands. It would be fairer to have a cut-off point of 10,000 miles, with anything over that attracting a 15 per cent. discount; a cut-off of 18,000 miles for a further discount; with a maximum cut-off of 24,000 miles—a very high mileage, which should confirm that it is a genuine company car which should attract an even bigger discount. That would be fair to those who must have a company car as a tool of the trade.

The subject must be examined from the employee's point of view. I hesitate to suggest that employees do not welcome a company car; sometimes it is not the product or style that they want, but it goes with the job. The job usually reflects the advantage of a company car by attracting a somewhat lower salary than one might normally expect. For an employee to have the privilege of a company car standing in his drive, his employer must pay the extra charges, and that represents an enormous and unique imposition. After all, if a secretary has a piece of vital equipment on her desk—say, a word processor—to improve her working performance, neither she nor the company is taxed on the cost of that equipment.

Mr. John Carlisle: Perhaps my hon. Friend should remind my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) that a company car is often an essential tool of business. If we tax everything that looks like a perk—any article that might have a feel of luxury about it that we take home—where do we stop? We must consider the principle involved. [Interruption.] I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield that we are not dealing with a laughing or flippant matter, since the retail and manufacturing sectors of the motor industry are reeling from the taxation proposals.

Along with ridiculous statements that have been made about car phones, the impression has been given that the Government are against the car manufacturing industry, let alone against company cars. I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) has not taken any notice of some of the naive remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield.

Mr. King: My hon. Friend may not have been aware that I had picked up a remark about vans by my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield. Many employees have no choice, because their companies require them to take their cars home, often because they are on call. A plumber or electrician or an employee providing any other service to the community is on call, as is the company car.

A company based in Birmingham might have a representative in Basingstoke. It is suggested that every night, having finished servicing whatever it is in the Basingstoke area, that employee should take the car back to the works in Birmingham, go home to Basingstoke and repeat the journey the following morning to pick up the vehicle? That is so ludicrous as to be beyond comment. In such a case, the company car is a piece of business equipment and only as a side effect would it be used at the weekend. Indeed, an employee driving a company car doing a high mileage would not want to drive hundreds of miles at the weekend.

One could make a strong case for an almost total exemption from the type of measure we are debating. As I said, I accept that the measure will receive the approval of the House. Even so, we should examine some of its technicalities. We should examine the structure of the tax banding of company cars. We must consider that in the context of the Finance Bill, and perhaps we shall have an opportunity in due course to do that.

6.14 pm

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) is a doughty fighter for the motor industry. If I represented his constituency, I would have made many of the remarks that he made, and we appreciate the position in which he finds himself. My constituency allows me to take a wider view of the issues, although I probably have a high proportion of company car drivers among my constituents.

[Mr. Tim Smith]

I know from my experience in industry what goes on. There is much status-seeking among company car drivers. I recall getting my first job in industry and my first opportunity to drive a company car. At that time, the large accounting firms did not give company cars to their employees and getting a car was for me an attraction of moving to industry. I was asked what sort of car I would like. I asked how much I could spend. Having been told, I went hunting for a car with all the right knobs; I wanted a GT with power steering and so on.

Mr. Couchman: Why not?

Mr. Smith: I agree with my hon. Friend. From my point of view, it was a reasonable desire because I wanted the best possible car and the best remuneration package. But this debate is not about the interests of individual company employees. It is about how we tax what, in view of what I have said, is clearly a perk.

Mr. John Carlisle: No.

Mr. Smith: I disagree with my hon. Friend. The matters which interested me had nothing to do with the economic performance of the company. I was looking for the best deal, and who would not? We should be considering the economic performance of industry. We have heard much in the debate about the difference between perks and the tools of the trade and about vans. Company vans are not subject to this type of taxation. When buying a company van one does not pay car tax. The input VAT is recoverable against the output VAT, unlike the VAT on a car, and no taxation is paid in terms of a benefit in kind.

My hon. Friend the Member for Northfield referred to service engineers. They might be better off with company vans, on which tax would not have to be paid. We must concentrate on the fundamentals of the subject.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): I imagine that during his business career my hon. Friend has taken clients to lunch, for example, to discuss important business arrangements. Would he suggest that overseas clients should be taken to a restaurant in a van?

Mr. Smith: I normally use a taxi in such circumstances. I was not aware that service engineers took customers to lunch. But since, according to my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman), they spend up to 30 hours a week driving, perhaps that is what they are doing.

I accept that for some people a company car is essential. We recognise that it is taken home at weekends and is driven on holidays and so on. It would be possible for company employees to emulate Ministers and take cars from a pool. They could travel to work by public transport and use a pool car for their work.

Mr. John Carlisle: Rubbish.

Mr. Smith: Companies could make such an arrangement. If Ministers can do it, so can other people.

The Bill has my full support. It is part of a much wider Budget judgment and the issue that we must consider when discussing the future of the car industry is the same issue as we must consider in relation to the future of every industry.

The Budget was excellent for business and we must set against the points that my hon. Friend the Member for Northfield made the fact that it reduced corporation tax progressively by 2 per cent. My hon. Friend said that Japanese car manufacturers have invested in the United Kingdom because we have a large company car fleet. Although that may have been a consideration, there were far more important considerations such as the fact that we have a good industrial relations record, a low-wage economy and the most attractive corporation tax regime in Europe. It has now been made even more attractive by virtue of the Budget, which cut corporation tax by 2 per cent., benefiting industry by some £830 million in the year when the levy will first be raised.

In the light of the Budget, the measure is entirely sensible. I sympathise with the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen), who said that it should have been introduced in the Finance Bill. But the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) and I are representing the other 39 members of the Standing Committee and we should be able to tell them next week what was said in this debate. Although I sympathise with the view of the hon. Member for Nottingham, North that it is rather anomalous, it comes about by virtue of the fact that social security benefits and contributions and the whole national insurance system are separate from the income tax system, as they should be.

I am interested in the new Contributions Agency established on 1 April, which will have the job of collecting £550 million in June next year and in subsequent years. In view of the sum involved, I am sure that the Public Accounts Committee will want to look at the agency's performance. That is why I raised the matter with my right hon. Friend the Minister of State. The hon. Member for Nottingham, North referred to the possibility of evasion and suggested that it could be on a wide scale. If so, the Public Accounts Committee should examine that problem.

On the general principle, I believe that the Government are right to tax all benefits in kind across the board, so that they are treated, for the purposes of tax and national insurance, as far as possible like cash payments. That seems to be the right philosophical approach. Although the hon. Member for Nottingham, North implied that the measure had come rather late, it would not have been possible to introduce it much earlier because it was only in the 1989 Budget that employers' contributions were extended up the scale and it would have produced relatively little revenue before then. Therefore, the timing is right and, in due course, we may consider extending the levying of employers' national insurance contributions on other benefits in kind; it would be a logical extension. However, company cars are the biggest benefit in kind paid to employees.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham referred to the current position. I am not sure whether the hon. Member for Nottingham, North was aware of the fact that a national insurance employer's contribution is already charged on private fuel. It was causing considerable difficulties before this measure was introduced. I wrote to many finance directors last year about tax implications and it was one of the main issues that they raised in their replies. They said, "We hear what you say about income tax, but are you aware of how hellish the Department of Social Security is making life for us by levying national insurance contributions on private fuel?" They said that company employees who pay for their fuel with a plastic card and present the card before they fill up their car with petrol pay no contributions. However, if they fill up their car first and hand in their card afterwards, they must pay contributions on the cost of the fuel. That sounds like bad news for those who must keep the books or records. I wrote to my hon. Friend the Minister for Corporate Affairs, who was in charge of the deregulation unit, and said that he should look at the problem. I suggested that there should be a scale charge. The Bill now introduces a scale charge for fuel as well as for cars and that excellent change will lighten the load on employers.

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) referred to the fact that there would be 50 extra staff and additional burdens on employers. I wonder how much the charge will create an additional burden on employers, given the fact that it will be levied in the same way as income tax, through the P11D, and that employers were having such a hard time before in their record keeping. The measure should be relatively simple because the same scale of charges will be applied for both income tax and national insurance. I hope that it will not be too onerous because I am reluctant to impose additional burdens on employers who are already unpaid collectors of tax on behalf of the Government.

Mr. Couchman: My hon. Friend suggested that the contributions will be levied through the P11D mechanism, which is principally aimed at levying tax on the employee rather than the employer. It is often levied through a diminution in the code number much later than was suggested by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State in his opening remarks. I suspect that the mechanism may prove to be not nearly so simple as we were led to believe earlier in the debate.

Mr. Smith: I referred specifically to the P11D. The information required to complete the P11D form is the same as is required to pay employers' national insurance contributions on cars and private fuel. I accept that the P11D is a statement to the Inland Revenue about employees' benefits in kind, so perhaps I should not have referred specifically to it. The point that I wished to make was that the information is common to both requirements. Employers will not need to keep much new or additional information because of the Bill. I listened to the comments of my right hon. Friend the Minister of State on that subject and it did not seem that much additional information would be needed. Perhaps we can return to that important issue later.

As I was saying, some employers were having a hard time—my right hon. Friend the Minister of State may also be having a hard time with his pay-as-you-earn audit—because of the previous arrangements for collecting contributions on private fuel. The scale charge introduced by the Bill is a major improvement.

For those reasons, the Bill is to be welcomed. Benefits in kind should be taxed in the same way as cash. I recognise the problems of the motor industry, but they can be better tackled in other ways, rather than trying to solve them by looking at the way in which we tax benefits in kind.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): I hope that those who have participated in the debate will not think me rude for coming in rather late. I do not normally seek to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, unless I have heard the opening speeches. However, the title of the Bill is somewhat misleading. I thought that it must have something to do with social security, and not being a social security expert, I kept away. As soon as I entered the Chamber I realised that a more appropriate title might have been, "Clobber the Motor Industry yet more through Additional Social Security Contributions Bill". It is a silly little Bill—an unworthy little Bill—and is totally inappropriate for a country that is in deep recession with thousands of people being laid off in the motor industry and elsewhere. I believed, perhaps naively, that the Conservative party and the Government were primarily engaged in trying to support and encourage businesses, not in introducing pettifogging little measures that further damage them. I may have been ingenuous, but I also thought that we were not primarily tasked to create additional unproductive jobs in the public sector and not in the business of creating additional quangos such as the Contributions Agency.

I thought that we were sent to this place by those who elected us to do everything in our power to support British industry and those who work in it. I see nothing in the Bill that will have this effect, but quite a lot that will do considerable damage. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King), who is an expert on the motor industry, and my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle), who intervened, spoke from the heart and the head, and with experience.

I must declare an interest and, in case hon. Members think that it is a matter of special pleading, I shall disabuse them of that notion. I am a director and the chairman of a small marketing consultancy. My own little company is in business to promote, largely overseas, the sale of British equipment. For companies such as mine, and many other small businesses that are primarily engaged in selling, a motor car is absolutely indispensable. I find it incomprehensible that Her Majesty's Government should be putting further imposts on company cars at a time of recession. It is even more surprising that they are using the social security system as a means of doing so.

Other hon. Members have referred to the arbitrary earnings limit of £8,500 per annum for employees. Many company directors do not even earn that, and their companies will now have to pay national insurance on their company cars, as well as for any fuel used for private purposes. The amount of revenue generated will be relatively small and it would have been infinitely more honest not to use the national insurance fund as a vehicle for bringing more taxation into the Government Exchequer. I believe that national insurance resources fund only about 10 per cent. of pensions and that the rest come out of taxation. If that is so, and we use the national insurance fund as a means of gathering revenue, it would be much more straightforward to abolish it—at least, it would be much more honest.

Does my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State think that the Bill is well drafted? I think that it is a masterpiece of gobbledegook and a fantastic testimonial to the incomprehensible. I am sure that my hon. Friend will be able to clarify clause 1(6)—if she cannot, the legislation should not be passed. Clause 1(6) states:

"In calculating for the purpose of subsection (4) above the cash equivalent of the benefit of a car or fuel—(a) the car shall not be treated as being unavailable on a day by virtue of paragraph 22)(b) of Schedule 6 to the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 for the purposes of section 158(5) of that Act or paragraphs 2(2), 3(2) or 5(2) of that

[Mr. John Wilkinson]

Schedule, unless the person liable to pay the contribution has information to show that the condition specified in paragraph 2(2)(b) is satisfied as regards that day".

My hon. Friend the Under Secretary nods her head wisely. I admire her. But civil servants would be much better employed not producing such nonsense. The motor industry would be much better if it were allowed to get on with its job of satisfying the customer without such an idiotic little Bill.

We have a serious recession on our hands and it is important to get on and address it, and support the motor industry. I had the honour and privilege of being awarded a parliamentary industrial fellowship with GKN, a major automotive supplier, of which there are countless up and down the land. Any measure passed by the House which has a depressing effect on the automotive industry in general can only be deplored and should be rejected. I shall not bother to vote against it, because almost all Opposition Members have now gone; what they said had little to commend itself to me.

The hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) talked about yet more taxes. There has been an element of obfuscation surrounding the measure. Her Majesty's Government were, at least implicitly, kowtowing to the green lobby by suggesting that imposing such an impost and increasing taxation on company cars would benefit the environment. All that they are doing is to add to the dole queues, which is not worthy of them.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): Like my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson), I apologise to the House for not being present at the start of the debate. Like him, I saw the measure on the Order Paper and assumed that it was a social security matter. It was only when I came into the Chamber to hear the debate that I realised the enormous impact that the measure would have on the motor industry.

I immediately declare a professional interest: I am a non-executive director of a medium-sized motor retailing company. My constituency interest is already known—part of my constituency contains Vauxhall Motors, the largest employer in Luton. As my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) said, the company has enjoyed a certain amount of prosperity during the past few years, and has brought back boom times to my constituency town.

However, I fear that if the Government continue with the various measures proposed in the Budget and other provisions, such as the special car tax, those boom times could well be over, not just for us as a manufacturing town but for many other companies that will be deeply affected by this imposition on the company car.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood that this appears to be a shabby little measure which says more about the politics of envy than the politics of good sense. Frankly, we are more accustomed to hear about such measures from Opposition Members than from Conservative Members. The Government do themselves no credit with this Bill, which stupidly panders to the so-called green lobby and fails to recognise the enormous improvements that the industry has made to reduce noise and air pollution over the years.

Social security Ministers and their colleagues in the Treasury must understand that the measure will have a devastating impact on the car industry if it means, as I believe it could, that many companies decide that the company car is not for them and, perhaps more important, employees decide that the benefits of a company car do not make it worthwhile to pay the tax. There are about 150 to 200 company cars in my company, which is now considering charging its employees for the use of their cars because of the additional cost of the national insurance. Therefore, employees will be further penalised.

My hon. Friend the Member for Northfield was absolutely right to say that if people do not have company cars, which are generally British, or are given some other financial benefit in kind, they buy foreign cars. My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) made a ribald comment about that. However, when a large employer that gave its employees hefty discounts on certain British manufactured cars withdrew that discount and gave money in lieu, nearly every employee bought a foreign car—I shall not name the company.

The measure is not worthy, because, as my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood said, for various reasons the motor industry is on its knees. The figures for new car sales are dramatic—350 motor retailers have gone out of business in the past 12 months. Every manufacturer is reporting that new car sales are at least 20 per cent. lower. It is only the service industry and, to a certain extent, the contract hire and retail side which are keeping many retailers in business. For the Government to bring forward such a petty little measure is disgraceful. It is viewed with utter dismay by manufacturers and retailers at a time when we should be looking for assistance for them.

Mr. Roger King: My hon. Friend is the second person to refer to the Bill as a petty little measure. It is not a petty or a little measure: it will raise a large sum of money. That is the problem. If the amount involved were little, we would not worry unduly, but nearly £500 million will come out of the pockets of companies which will have difficulty in replacing it. Something will give. My fear and that of my hon. Friend is that it might be British industry.

Mr. Carlisle: I thoroughly agree, and I thank my hon. Friend for pointing that out. The pettiness is perhaps in the minds of those who conceived the idea.

The motor industry is crucial to the fortunes of the country. Let no one forget that. The Conservative party has always supported free choice on transport. We have always controlled strictly pollution within the industry. Indeed, the industry has carried us through rough times. We are now in deep recession both inside and outside the industry. The measure will sadden the hearts of our supporters and of people in the industry.

The Bill should be rejected by the House, but I will not embarrass my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) by going to get my hon. Friends out of offices and bars to vote against it. That might be even more embarrassing for the Government. However, many of us are deeply upset by the measure. Had we the opportunity, we would vote against it.

6.42 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Miss Ann Widdecombe): We have had an interesting debate, with three main themes, all of which I believe to have been ill advised. The first was a misconception, particularly on the part of my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson), that somehow the Bill will cause great financial embarrassment and will have huge economic effects on the car industry.

We should see the matter in context. The overall labour costs of the industry for this year will be £300 billion. We are talking about a sum of £500 million. We are talking about an increase in cost of 0·2 per cent., whereas labour costs alone, through wage rises, are likely to increase by 7 per cent. to 10 per cent. We have to keep in context the alleged financial effects of the Bill on the car industry.

Mr. Wilkinson: Does not my hon. Friend realise that, at a time of recession, when jobs are being lost in the motor industry, Her Majesty's Government, if they are to act wisely, should eschew any additional impost which would put an extra adverse burden on the motor industry or which would depress demand further? As for small businesses, they will get virtually nothing from the Budget. Those with the lowest profits will get no reduction in corporation tax. The requirement to pay national insurance on company cars is yet another unwelcome, adverse development. My hon. Friend should not be so glib.

Miss Widdecombe: My hon. Friend makes the point for me by admitting that in the Budget there is a net gain to the industry through the reduction in corporation tax.

In answer to the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood), may I point out that the vast burden will fall on large employers rather than on small employers in relation to company cars as tools of trade.

Fear has been expressed, most notably and eloquently by my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman), about the administrative burden that the provision will place on the motor car industry. In fact, there will be very little administrative burden. There should be a lightening of the burden. He referred to the current arrangements of levying on fuel, which we admit are more complex than we had intended.

Two themes run through the Bill. The first is to make things easier for employers by replicating exactly the provisions of the Inland Revenue, so that it will already have to hand the information, the system and the calculations. The provisions will replace the complicated administrative system that was required following the overdrive decision to which attention has rightly been drawn. In this instance, the effect will be wholly beneficial.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) on his first speech on these matters in the House. I regret that I cannot associate myself with his wholesale attack on company car ownership. The purpose of the Bill is not to make life difficult for company car owners but to achieve equity between those who draw their income in cash and those who draw income in substantial benefit through a company car. That is the sole purpose of the Bill. It has no other.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: The Minister's last point is fair. The Labour party shares those objectives.

Miss Widdecombe: It is because there is so much cross-party agreement on the Bill that we can deal with it in one day, a point raised by the hon. Member for Nottingham, North.

The provisions will not be brought into effect tomorrow. There will be a long period of detailed consultation about the administrative aspects of the Bill.

What we are doing is very fair and straight in regard to taxation. If the car industry was handing the money to its employees in straightforward salary income rather than by company cars, it would have to pay the national insurance contributions.

Mr. Couchman: My hon. Friend talks about the car industry giving up the money. The Bill has nothing to do with the car industry. It will affect every employer, whatever his business, be it service or manufacturing, who provides company cars for employees who earn more than £8,500 and who allows them to use the cars privately.

Miss Widdecombe: That is absolutely true. My reference to the car industry was a slip. It has been so widely discussed in the debate that the two have almost become linked in my mind. My hon. Friend is right: the Bill will affect all employers, and what I have said applies to all employers. Any employer who hands out cash rather than a company car would at present have to pay a national insurance contribution, so there is no reason why he should not pay a contribution on the company car.

We have also heard that the Bill will have a very bad effect on the entire British car industry because, if people have a choice, they will buy foreign cars. I bought my own car, and I bought British. My hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) tells me that he bought British. Why is there an assumption that, if people have to buy their own cars, they will buy foreign cars?

Mr. John Carlisle: My hon. Friend is being unfair. I am afraid that she is speaking from ignorance. It is not an assumption. Those of us who are in the trade could give her figures, if she wanted them, which would prove that those who are handed the money tend to buy foreign cars —for exactly the reasons which my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) has given. If my hon. Friend were sure of her facts, I would believe her, but she is on dangerous ground in talking from a brief that does not have the facts. Sadly, the reality is that people buy foreign cars, not British cars.

Miss Widdecombe: All I was challenging was the assumption that, if people had to buy their own cars rather than company cars, they would automatically choose foreign cars. There are fleets of foreign cars, and the purchase of such cars is not confined to the private buyer.

Mr. Wilkinson: If an employer wishes to provide an employee with a car that will be needed for the business, and if that employee has to buy the car out of his after-tax personal income, the employer will have to pay him much more than the cost of providing him with a car to do his job. That is an additional burden, and anything that discourages employers from providing company cars, such as the necessity to pay national insurance on that so-called benefit, is thoroughly adverse and negative.

Miss Widdecombe rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. May I ask the hon. Lady not to turn her back on the Chair when she replies to her hon. Friend?

Miss Widdecombe: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker; I stand corrected, facing the right way round.

[Miss Widdecombe]

The Bill's main thrust is exactly what my hon. Friend says: by providing a company car instead of salary, thus avoiding liability to national insurance contributions, the employer, and to a lesser extent the employee, will benefit. That is what we are trying to control.

According to Inland Revenue figures, two thirds of company cars travel more than 2,500 miles per year. That means that tools-of-trade cars, those covering between 2,500 and 18,000 miles per year, make up a large proportion of the total. We are trying to make it easier for those who use their cars as tools of trade to be able validly to do so, as opposed to those who use such cars purely as a perk. Clearly, cars which cover fewer than 2,500 miles a year are being used as perks.

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) asked where the burden would fall most heavily. A director with a new car costing, say, £25,000 who covers fewer than 2,500 business miles a year would have a scale charge for the car of £8,250, and free fuel would be worth £900. The total contribution liability would be £950. A typical sales representative covering more than 18,000 business miles a year in a car costing less than £19,250 and with an engine capacity of less than 1400 cc would have a total liability of only £130. Therefore, there is a marked distinction between the burden falling on those who clearly use their cars for less than business purposes and those who use them a great deal.

I shall not address the issue which will be debated in Committee but which was mentioned on Second Reading about those who have a small private mileage. The national travel survey shows that those with tools-of-trade cars covering more than 18,000 miles a year have an average private mileage of 8,600 per year. That is substantial. The number of people affected who have a one or two-mile drive home and to work will be minimal. That will be addressed at greater length in Committee.

The Bill does not seek to clobber the car industry or to make life difficult for employers. The administrative burden for them will be a great deal less. The Bill simply seeks to make sure that the same rules apply to those who take their income in cash as to those who take their income in kind.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood asked whether I understood clause 1(6). It is very simple, and reflects the Inland Revenue rule about the availability of a car for any period of 30 days. If my hon. Friend had gone to the Vote Office and obtained the notes on clauses, he could have informed himself about that and would not have had to ask me.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

Bill committed to a Committee of the whole House—[Mr. Neil Hamilton.]

Further proceedings on the Bill stood postponed, pursuant to Order [3 May].

SOCIAL SECURITY (CONTRIBUTIONS) BILL [MONEY]

Queen's Recommendation having been signified—

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Social Security (Contributions) Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of any increase attributable to the provisions of the Act in the sums payable out of such money under any other Act.—[Mr. Neil Hamilton.]

SOCIAL SECURITY (CONTRIBUTIONS) BILL [WAYS AND MEANS]

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Social Security (Contributions) Bill, it is expedient to authorise any increase attributable to the provisions of the Act in the sums which—

(a) under the Social Security Act 1975 are to be taken as paid towards the cost of the National Health Service in Great Britain; or

(b) under that Act are to be paid out of the National Insurance Fund into the Consolidated Fund in respect of administrative expenses.—[Mr. Neil Hamilton.]

Social Security (Contributions) Bill

Considered in Committee.

[MR. HAROLD WALKER in the Chair]

Clause 1

CLASS 1A CONTRIBUTIONS

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 2, line 37, at end insert

'; provided that if the person liable to pay the contribution can show that in the tax year the use of the car for the earner's business travel amounted to more than 18,000 miles (or such lower figure as is specified in sub-paragraph (2) of paragraph 3 of Schedule 6 to the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988) and also amounted to more than three quarters of the total use of the car in that year by the earner, or any relative of his (as defined in section 417(4) of that Act), then the cash equivalent of the benefit of the car for that year shall be taken to be £1.'.

The amendment seeks a modest reform to what has been a little intemperately described by Conservative Members as a pettifogging little measure. I agree with the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) that it is folly to describe a measure that will bring £500 million to the Government as pettifogging and little. The extra revenue that the Government hope to gain from the measure will be welcomed by them and by us. The Opposition and the Government do not differ in their objectives on this issue.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury and other Conservative Members who are in the Chamber have served on the Finance Bill Committee since 1987. They will know that every year when we debate these matters the Government steadily claw back through income tax the advantage to the company car owner. Labour's pre-Budget representations suggested a further move in that direction, although we did not suggest that it should be done by way of the instrument that the Government have chosen—employers' national insurance contributions. However, that method, although different from the one that we propose, is not objectionable to the Opposition and we would not seek to reverse it.

Government policy on this issue over the past four years is broadly right and fair, and is necessitated not only by equity, but by the trading relationships that we have to enjoin with our European partners. In time, pressures by them might have become intolerable if the Government had not moved on this issue. I wonder what would have happened if a Labour Government had travelled in the direction in which this Government have travelled in the past four years.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): There is not much difference.

Mr. Brown: I take that comment as an attack on the hon. Gentleman's own side rather than as a compliment to me. I am always willing to receive compliments from Conservative Members, provided that they are offered in the right spirit.

We wish to proceed in the same direction as the Government on this issue, and although we harbour the fear that if we had had to travel this road at the pace which the Government have chosen, which is right, the Government would not have given us the welcome that we are extending to them. If they were in opposition they would have ensured that the full anger of the automobile industry lobby was directed at the Labour Government. Instead, the Government have to weather that attack themselves. I hope that that remark was not too unworthy of me, but I must also point out that we have always argued for some exemption for those who must have a company car and who do little personal mileage. This will come as no surprise to the Financial Secretary because my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) has made the same point, in the context of income tax rather than national insurance contributions, on the past three Finance Bills.

I rather agree with the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith): it is slightly discordant that we should discuss these issues in this forum instead of in Committee on the Finance Bill, but I understand the necessity for that and take no great exception to it.

7 pm

This year I and, I am sure, other hon. Members have received a parliamentary briefing from the CBI which asks:

"Are MPs satisfied that there is sufficient distinction made by the Government between cars used as essential tools of the trade and those given as perks?"

It is clear that some Conservative Members are not satisfied and the purpose of our modest little amendment is to give them some encouragement.

The amendment is specific; it does not leave it open to the Government to make regulations, containing, as it does, the necessary regulations within it. It deals with people who use company cars exclusively on business, not for purposes about which there may be some argument, and who drive them more than 18,000 miles a year—a fairly high mileage. It seems to us likely that such a person would be sick of the sight of the car after 18,000 miles and would not regard any remaining use of it for personal reasons as much of a pleasure. The Minister touched on that point at the end of Second Reading. However, if such a person does not take that attitude, enjoys the use of the car and does a high mileage in it – the Minister referred to an average of 8,000 miles, a figure with which I have no quarrel—of course the car is a perk and the perk element should rightly be taxed.

So we set a threshold. We stipulate that in order for the employer not to be taxed on a company car as an employee's perk it should not be used for private reasons for more than a quarter of the total annual mileage. If someone, therefore, has used a car for more than the 18,000 threshold, we say that he should not have used it for personal reasons for more than about 4,000 miles. That is a clear personal-use threshold beyond which a person's employer would enter the charge bracket.

As the Minister said, a majority may not fall into that category initially, but we think that the pattern might change if the amendment were accepted, and that could be beneficial. People might think again about whether it was advantageous to use a car instead of public transport. They might think again about whether the casual use of the car was really justified. In any event, it is surely right to provide for people who are forced to have a car because of their jobs and who do not enjoy using it much for private purposes.

I realise that the thrust of the legislation is not particularly directed at employees this year; it is intended more as a disincentive to discourage employers from providing company cars in the first place. But our amendment does not deal with that. It covers circumstances when cars must be given and are not much used for private purposes, and when the Government require the clawback.

I know that there is a scale which the Minister may argue deals with our point, but we think that in the narrow circumstances that we outline—in what is called the "district nurse" case—it would be right to make an exception, and that is the purpose of the amendment.

The Minister for Social Security and Disabled People (Mr. Nicholas Scott): I shall respond briefly, but I hope equally persuasively, and try to dissuade the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) from pressing his amendment. He said that there was no disagreement between us about the main thrust of the Bill. When he spoke of our travelling in the same direction, I was reminded of the late lamented Iain Macleod who, referring to Enoch Powell, said, "I travel on the same train but I like to get off before the train hits the buffers." There may be something in that.

I am somewhat surprised by the amendment, although it was presented with characteristic good humour by the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East. In the Bill, we seek to ensure that cars doing more than 18,000 miles a year which verge on being tools of the trade but which are used for personal reasons for several thousand miles a year, and which are provided free of charge to a private individual, are covered. I emphasise that if a car is provided exclusively for business purposes and no private mileage is run up on it, no charge will arise; but on reflection, the hon. Gentleman may realise that he is going a bit far by suggesting that cars with mileages of more than 18,000—they could still be used for several thousand private miles provided, in effect, by the employer—should be wholly exempt or should make a peppercorn payment, as suggested by the amendment. That would be wrong.

We shall of course keep all this under review once the Bill is implemented, but I cannot advise the Committee to support the amendment because it would enable employers to escape contribution liability even though their employees were allowed to use their cars for quite large private mileages. I believe that employers should pay contributions on this sort of mileage just as if they had remunerated their employees in cash. The charge is reduced by 50 per cent. after 18,000 miles, but to reduce it to a peppercorn would be outwith the spirit of the measure, and I urge the Committee not to accept the amendment.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: I was rather hoping for some support from Conservative Back Benchers—perhaps one of the more likely places where I might look for support. I admit that this argument is taking place only at the margins, but, given the comments of some Conservative Back Benchers earlier, I thought that the amendment might find some favour with them.

Having failed to stir up any trouble for the Minister, I suppose that I ought to be grateful for his offer to keep the matter under consideration. This is a new move towards dealing with cars as a perk. This is year one of the approach that the Government are adopting, and I welcome the Minister's promise to return to the matter later if the anomaly with which the amendment deals is shown to be one that needs attention.

I accept the Minister's remarks in the spirit in which they were made, and in those circumstances I can do no other than beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): As my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) has said, this is an extremely complicated clause. It would be helpful if the Minister explained some of its subsections. Subsection (5) inserts into the Social Security Act 1975 new section 4A, subsection (2)(b) of which provides that class 1A contributions are payable by,

"if no such contribution is payable in relation to a relevant payment of earnings in the tax year, the person who would be liable but for subsection (4)(2)(b) above to pay a secondary Class 1 contribution".

The notes on clauses say that that refers to a situation in which "no payments were due because the earner's earnings were below the lowest earnings limit."

The suggestion there is that the earnings were very low indeed. In fact, the lower earnings limit is about £43 a week.

Mr. Scott: It is £52.

Mr. Smith: Very well, £52. I do not see how the employer of a person earning less than £52 a week would be liable to pay national insurance contributions in respect of a car. Indeed, it would be rather unusual for someone earning such a figure to be provided with a company car. However, those appear to be the circumstances to which this clause refers.

Subsection (8) of the new section 4A says:

"A person shall be liable to pay different Class 1A contributions in respect of different earners, different cars and different tax years."

The notes on clauses say:

"Subsection (8) provides that a person shall be liable to pay different Class 1A contributions in respect of different earners, different cars and different tax years."

The notes on clauses simply repeat the contents of the subsection. That is hardly a helpful way of explaining its meaning. In my view, this subsection is redundant. Surely it is obvious that there will be different contributions, depending on how much people earn, the type of cars they have, and the tax year involved. What is the need for the subsection?

Subsection (9) says:

"Regulations may provide—

(a) for persons to be excepted . . . ;

(b) for reducing Class 1A contributions".

Can my right hon. Friend tell me who will be excepted from the payment of contributions, and in which cases there will be reduced contributions?

Mr. Wilkinson: My right hon. Friend, in reply to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown), who moved the amendment, was elegantly more socialist than the socialists. I should like to refer to the reply of my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State to a question that I put to her. I asked her to explain in simple language the exact meaning of subsection (6). It has to be remembered that we are passing legislation that must be comprehensible to the ordinary man or woman in the street. Members of the public, unlike Ministers and other Members of Parliament, are not provided with notes on clauses.

Can my right hon. Friend explain why Her Majesty's Government are relying on the age-old formula whereby employees earning more than £8,500 shall incur liability for their companies to national insurance contributions? This applies also to directors. As I pointed out in my Second Reading speech, there are directors who earn very small salaries, if any at all. Often, in the case of a small company, a director's salary is a few hundred or a few thousand pounds—certainly less than £8,500. What is the logic in providing that an employee earning less than £8,500 per annum will not incur for his company liability to national insurance contributions on a company car, but that a director, by virtue of his office, shall incur that liability for his company? I know that the argument is a historic one—previous usage and the system for scale charges. That is the precedent to which we are working, but it makes very little sense, particularly as company directors have the full statutory obligations and the responsibility inherent in their office, whereas employees have not. In my view, there should be some mitigation.

7.15 pm

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): I did not intend to take part in this debate, but it occurs to me that my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) is quite right to point out that some directors who have company cars may not reach the lower threshold for class 1 contributions. That may well be the answer to the first query of my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith). What is the position of directors of companies limited by guarantee? Many charities are in that category. What imposition will there be on their directors, particularly if their salaries are below £8,500?

Mr. Scott: I shall seek to address the detailed, but important, points that have been raised.

This is a complicated Bill, but, as my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary has said, we shall conduct wide consultations with employers to ensure that the guidance issued clarifies the whole situation to the greatest possible extent. The figure of £8,500 was chosen for the threshold because it is the same as the Inland Revenue's figure. We are anxious to make sure that the procedures for the collection of these charges are related as closely as possible to those used by the Inland Revenue authorities, so that there will be no further complications for employers.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) raised the question of the £8,500 limit. That figure includes not just earnings but any benefits in kind. There has been mention of the position of directors. It would be possible for someone in control of a company so to manipulate the balance of his salary against benefits in kind as to evade proper charges. In this regard, what we propose is realistic and sensible. Full-time working directors, or directors of charities or other such bodies or officers of committees of unincorporated bodies or non-profit-making concerns who are treated as directors will be excluded from the scale charges where they have no personal stake in the operation of the enterprise or organisation. I hope that that will reassure my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman).

In respect of subsection (8), I reiterate that we are anxious to ensure that our arrangements are in most cases identical to those of the Inland Revenue authorities. That is why subsection (8) is there.

The concessions in subsection (9) reflect the extra statutory concessions provided by the Inland Revenue. We are not able to do that on an extra-statutory basis; we are advised that we have to do it by regulation. That is why we are replicating in the regulations that will flow from the Bill the extra-statutory concessions that are provided by the Inland Revenue. Thus, an employee provided with a second car for a family member, typically his or her spouse, faces two scale charges, and the second is increased by 50 per cent. But there are concessions where the family member is also an employee of the company. The rules are fairly complicated and, if it would help, I would be happy to write to my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) and perhaps place a copy of my reply in the Library, because it is a rather convoluted argument to carry through. This is widely practised by the Inland Revenue and, I think, broadly accepted as a fair practice. I will make sure that those who are interested are made aware of the details.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 1 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 2 to 6 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Bill reported, without amendment.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.—[Mr. Scott.]

7.22 pm

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): I hope that Ministers have noted the generous co-operation that has been extended on this measure. I hope that that co-operation will be reciprocated and that a large number of Bills will be dealt with similarly when a Labour Government comes to power. I am sure that that opportunity will arise very shortly. I am thinking in particular of uprating provisions for pensions and child benefit, which I hope will be among the first items placed before the House.

This Bill seeks to redress the imbalance between national insurance contributions on pay and national insurance contributions on the company car, a payment in kind. It is a matter which will require further review and examination by the incoming Labour Government. We will not oppose the measure.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

ENVIRONMENT

Ordered,

That Dr. Kim Howells be discharged from the Environment Committee and Mr. John Battle be added to the Committee.—[Mr. Dixon, on behalf of the Committee of Selection.]

Rivers (Hampshire)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Wood.]

7.23 pm

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey and Waterside): I am most grateful to Mr. Speaker for selecting my subject of Hampshire's rivers for the Adjournment debate this evening.

The "compleat angler" can fish all the year round; for someone, somewhere, fish are always in season. But on the chalk streams of Hampshire, it is the coming of mid-May and the hatching of the mayfly that herald the halcyon days ahead. So May is a most appropriate month in which to debate this subject.

Of all the chalk rivers in Hampshire, and probably in the south of England, the Test has long been queen. I am fortunate in having in my constituency its lower reaches, where the salmon join—or perhaps I should say used to join—the trout. Upstream is Stockbridge, the capital of chalk stream dry-fly fishing, mecca for fishermen and headquarters of the famous Houghton club. It should all be a scene of tranquillity, beauty and fishermen's yarns. Instead, the Houghton club is at present ahum with tales that would make Frederick Halford, the father of dry fly fishing, turn in his grave.

One hundred years ago, Halford published his "Dry-fly Fishing in Theory and Practice", in which he said:

"Of all circumstances most usually credited with exercising an influence over an angler's sport, the state of the weather is the predominant one."

We certainly have to thank the weather for having brought to a head the problems and anxieties that have been besetting Hampshire's rivers and fishermen for the last few years. Three unusually dry years, 1988-90, and in particular the March to December period in 1990, which may have been unequalled for dryness since 1921, have literally caused rivers to disappear.

Of the many rivers in Hampshire, it is the chalk streams, the Test, Itchen and Meon, that most vividly illustrate the problems. The Meon in east Hampshire and the Wallop brook and Bourne rivulet, both feeding the River Test, have been suffering from abnormally low flows, because too much water is being taken from boreholes situated in their valleys. Unless something is done urgently to improve water flows, the term "dry fly fishing" may soon take on a whole new meaning.

The Water Act 1989 established the National Rivers Authority and gave it powers to conserve, redistribute or otherwise augment water resources and secure their proper use. The NRA replaced the regional water authorities set up in 1974, which were both judge and jury over the management—or perhaps one should say, mismanagement—of our water resources. The NRA could not have come into being at a more important time, and it responded quickly to the challenges awaiting it on 1 September 1989 when it assumed authority over our rivers.

Far from having the NRA chairman, Lord Crickhowell, in the stocks at Stockbridge for failing to act, I have to admit that we in the Test valley are now applauding him and the NRA for what they are doing, in co-operation with Southern Water, to remedy the situation that faces us.

Last October, the NRA held a forum for interested groups to discuss all aspects of river management. Then, last month, it organised a well attended seminar on its scientific research into the dramatic fall in salmon catches. More NRA research is in hand with the Institute of Freshwater Ecology to see what can be done to stop salmon redds, or spawning grounds, silting up. Last week, another seminar was organised jointly by the British Field Sports Society, of which I am the vice-chairman, and the Salmon and Trout Association.

One can spend a lifetime studying statistics, borehole readings, chemical analyses, flow charts and river reports and still not understand a river as well as its keepers or managers, who for centuries have been conserving these national assets.

The fishing rod is not, as Dr. Samuel Johnson suggested, a stick with a hook on one end and a fool on the other. Fishermen and riparian owners perform a key role in ensuring that river management is at a high standard and flows are maintained. Lord Crickhowell has said that the fisheries are one of the best measures of the health of a river.

Concern over our rivers has also been demonstrated by local residents who have nothing to do with fishing. Last year, the Test valley branch of the Council for the Protection of Rural England, of which I am proud to be the founder president, invited the NRA to come and speak on the subject of our disappearing rivers, and there was a record attendance.

It is only comparatively recently that increased per capita consumption and, to a lesser extent, population growth have forced engineers to take more water from the chalk, initially without detriment to the ecology; and we are now seeing the first signs that, although rivers are not yet over-abstracted, we may be taking too much water from the wrong places.

When the NRA grants an abstraction licence, it considers whether the water taken will ultimately be removed from the river system and consumed, or will be recycled. Some uses, such as spray irrigation, evaporative cooling or bottling water, are totally consumptive; the water just goes. In the case of inland public water supply, 80 per cent. of the water is returned to the water environment via sewage farms, septic tanks and the like. In coastal areas, waste water goes straight out to sea.

The NRA has made it clear to all abstractors in Hampshire that it will not permit new public water supply or summer consumptive abstraction from the Hampshire chalk. There are no plans at present to revoke existing licences. The NRA usually insists that spray irrigation can be permitted only if the operator can provide a storage reservoir that is filled during the winter heavy rain season. Agriculture is rarely a threat to consumption, because most water is returned via soakaways or controlled discharges to watercourses. The finger of accusation, however, is being pointed at intensive farming near rivers. The banks of Hampshire's rivers used to be bounded by water meadows that acted as a filter. Most of the land is now ploughed to the water's edge. I have even seen some meadows where maize is grown year after year. The intensive use of nitrogen results in more river weed, which further reduces flows and results in rivers silting up. Heavy nitrogen use away from rivers also causes lush growth and thus greater evaporation of water.

The NRA is researching the agricultural problems as part of an appraisal of land use practices in the catchment areas. However, in the meantime, the Government should reconsider the regime for grant aid to farmers in environmentally sensitive areas, such as the mid-Test. The grants are not adequate to compensate farmers—who are already reeling under other economic pressures—for reducing their agricultural output and thus protecting their water environment.

What is being done to protect Hampshire's rivers? There is a growing public realisation that water is a scarce and precious resource, which should be used wisely in drought years. There is now demand management, and licence monitoring is the rule rather than the exception. We need better leakage control. Some 25 per cent. of water is lost through leaks. We need a charging policy that encourages wise use of water. The CPRE wants national metering of water to be introduced, which could be a starter.

We should restrict development. I am pleased to note that the southern region NRA has an input into SERPLAN—the south-eastern regional plan, but is drawing the Minister's attention to the impact on our water resources of the problems caused by over-development enough? Surely a veto over planning applications would be better.

The flows of rivers could be boosted by pumping water into them from correctly placed boreholes. Leaking riverbeds can be lined. Treated water can be returned to the river, and existing licences can be revoked. If we resorted to the last of those measures to resite boreholes, the NRA would have to compensate the water user for the high cost of developing the alternative source. Who pays? Hampshire has several boreholes that directly affect water flows. One borehole is at Broughton, on the Wallop, a tributary of the Test. One is at Totford, at the source of the Itchen, and there are others close to the Meon and to the Hamble.

Although the NRA has the necessary finance for its many investigations, a question remains over the funding of expensive remedies for confirmed problems under the existing charging or grant-in-aid arrangements. I should like confirmation from my hon. Friend the Minister that the Government will provide the NRA with the money required to carry out essential remedial work that involves licence revocation.

Some costs cannot be borne by the NRA, such as the provision of reservoirs. A reservoir is planned by Southern Water at Totton in my constituency, where the waterworks have supplied most of the additional consumption in the area in recent years. New reservoirs at Totton, which is an ideal place, could store winter river water just before it reaches the sea, but would have no effect on upstream flows or fishing. I hope that the reservoirs will receive planning approval from New Forest district council and from Test Valley borough council. The reservoirs would provide a supplement and would mean that Southern Water would not have to take more water from the river as summer peak demand grows. They would also provide a reserve if pollution occurred in the lower reaches of the Test or in the Solent. I should like the NRA to carry out a study for a national water grid. There may be many problems to overcome, not least finance, and it may be a non-starter for that reason, but it should be investigated.

I have described some of the actions being taken. There are others that, in my view, and in the view of my hon. Friend the Member for Hampshire, North-West (Sir D. Mitchell), whom I am delighted to see in the Chamber, who, I hope, will join in the debate and through whose constituency the river Test flows, need to be carried out to preserve one of England's most priceless natural resources in the same way, as Lord Crickhowell has said, as must be maintained.

"a great work of art or music"

I look forward to hearing the Minister's answers. My constituents very much welcomed the visit today to Romsey of my hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Countryside, who answered many questions from my constituents about the Test. I have left it to my hon. Friend to answer my questions this evening. I look forward very much to his answers to my questions, which have as much to do with Mrs. Colvin's washing machine as with trying to catch a trout on a day's fishing. I hope that someone will offer Mr. Speaker such a trout in return for his selecting my subject for this evening's debate.

Mr. Cranley Onslow (Woking): I am grateful for the opportunity to participate in a debate on a Hampshire matter. I support everything that my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) said. Like him, I am an interested angler. I am on the councils of the Salmon and Trout Association and of the Anglers Co-operative Association. I am also the chairman of the fisheries committee of the British Field Sports Society. I must declare all those interests, although I am angler first and foremost. Above all, I want rivers to be in a fit condition for fish to live in them and for anglers to fish in them. The sad fact is that, in far too many rivers in Hampshire and elsewhere, those conditions are no longer met. The threat to water levels and to water resources seems to many of us to be getting steadily worse.

I know that many dedicated anglers on the Test and on the Itchen can no longer bring themselves to go fishing because they believe that those rivers are dead. They are full of rainbow trout rather than native brown trout, their levels are low and the amount of weed in the rivers is seriously down. They are not the chalk streams which our fathers and grandfathers knew, and which some of us also knew. The opportunity to dwell on some of the reasons for that change is welcome.

It would be wrong if I left the House with the impression that we are discussing a purely Hampshire problem. From my experience and that of many friends, I know that there are problems with rivers in Berkshire, such as the Pang, with rivers in Kent, such as the Darent and the Stour, with chalk streams in East Anglia and with the West beck in Yorkshire, which is a famous chalk stream where a famous fishing club has been established for many years. There simply is not enough water for fish to live in those rivers. That state of affairs is no credit to the water industry.

I join my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside in his tribute to the work of the National Rivers Authority. I know how close an interest the chairman of that authority, Lord Crickhowell, takes in the problem. It was the theme of an effective inaugural lecture that he gave at Fishmongers hall last year, which was well received by everyone who is interested in this important subject.

The NRA and other defenders of our rivers need more help. Some of that assistance must come from the Government in legislative or financial form. There was welcome news in today's newspapers that there is to be a programme to line the beds of 20 chalk streams to prevent water loss through leakage, although the cost is pretty intimidating. However, the Government can still do more to limit the unnecessary loss of water from our rivers.

An analysis of the figures shows that in Hampshire and elsewhere the total theoretical take-up of the abstraction licences that have already been granted in some cases exceeds the flow of all the rivers in an area. A terrifying quantity could, in theory, be extracted from rivers and boreholes. If that ever happens, we shall have lost the battle entirely. We must study the need to revoke abstraction licences not just for farming, but for other purposes as well.

There is still scope for stricter controls on planning permission relating to the amount of water available in the area concerned. I would like to see regulations if such controls cannot be embodied in the Planning and Compensation Bill currently before the House. There is room in secondary legislation for a stipulation that the NRA must always be consulted by a planning authority which has a major development application before it, whether that be residential or industrial. If the NRA believes that adequate water resources are not likely to be available for that development, that should constitute a veto. I shall be interested to hear what my hon. Friend the Minister has to say about that. He may argue that the NRA does not yet have the technical resources to make such judgments. That may be a convincing argument, but it does not mean that the NRA should not be encouraged to develop those resources and, as soon as it gets its act together, it should have the power to exercise such controls over the increased use of water resources.

I also enter a note of caution about water recycling. My hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside accurately described the damaging effects of spray irrigation. None of the water sprayed on a field ever returns to a river from which it is abstracted. As I suggested to my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food earlier today, more attention should be paid to encouraging farmers to impound excess winter rainfall and use that as a source of summer spray irrigation instead of simply pumping the water out of rivers. That practice is all too commonplace in Hampshire and in Devon and there are well-documented examples of rivers being depleted in that way.

Too much reliance is placed on the argument that water abstraction from the bottom of a river can be recycled by being pumped to the top, used and then returned to the river and we must still recognise that that will not be the same natural water as would have entered the river if the boreholes, springs and other sources upon which it had always relied had remained unimpaired. There is a danger in the clever device of recycling water from the bottom of a river to the top which must be explored.

I hope that I have not pressed my point too much in the time available. My hon. Friend the Member for Hampshire, North-West (Sir D. Mitchell) is aware that this is a most important subject and I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside for raising the matter this evening. I look forward to a positive response from my hon. Friend the Minister.

Sir David Mitchell (Hampshire, North-West): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) on raising this important subject for debate. He expressed considerable concern about the River Test, which is important to his constituency. However, as he rightly said, it flows through my constituency first and several of its subsidiaries, such as the Dever and Wallop brook, are important to the environment in my constituency. I saw Wallop brook at Broughton at the weekend and I can confirm—I confirmed it again today by telephone—that it is now at full flood and nearly level with the top of the bank. That is highly satisfactory. However, that apparently highly satisfactory situation conceals the real concern that the aquifers underneath are getting lower year by year.

Last year Wallop brook at Broughton ran dry for the second year running. It has not run dry for two successive years since at least 1921. Although the water level above Broughton was severely constrained which resulted in a good deal of misfortune, the river dried out entirely below Broughton. That was clearly associated with the pumping from the aquifers at Broughton.

The problem is that the water company is pumping within the terms of its licence. It is not even pumping at the maximum amount that the licence permits it to draw from the borehole at Broughton. The water company should draw less water from Broughton and make up the amount by drawing water further down at Horsebridge where it can almost certainly take more water without causing the rivers to dry up.

Who will pay Southern Water to pump more expensive water from that pumping station than from Broughton? There may even be a strong case for laying additional pipelines or reopening disused pipelines between Horsebridge and Broughton to pump water back up to the Broughton source.

It is clear that in many cases licences were granted many years ago—sometimes before the war—and in wholly different circumstances for a given level of abstraction. Abstracting at those levels in current circumstances, with our lower aquifers, produces results different from those expected when the original licences were granted. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will consider the pertinent matters of whether we can revoke or partially revoke licences, who will compensate water companies and where those resources will come from.

I welcome today's announcement in relation to Wallop brook of a combination of partial revocation of licence, the augmentation of river flow and river lining at a cost of £3 million. I am fascinated to know where that money will come from.

Can my hon. Friend the Minister give any news about progress in trying to reduce water loss by leakage? It is about 25 per cent. Most people are thrown back on their haunches when they learn that 25 per cent. of the water that has been abstracted and is being pumped into the water systems of our towns and villages is lost by leakage. Apart from everything else, we need much more research, investment and work in identifying leakages and stopping them much earlier than at present.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Tony Baldry): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) for raising the important subject of vanishing rivers. The whole House will welcome his contribution and those of my right hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) and my hon. Friend the Member for Hampshire, North-West (Sir D. Mitchell). Their contributions have been extremely valuable. The Government appreciate their concerns, as was evidenced by the visit of my hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Countryside to Hampshire only today.

The subject of vanishing rivers is, understandably, hardly far from the news at the moment. Despite some welcome rain in the south-east in the past couple of weeks, there are continuing worries about water shortages this summer. The chalk streams of Hampshire and the south are well known among anglers and there is great concern about their condition, and that concern has been well amplified this evening. In particular, and understandably, there is concern about the steady decline in salmon catches in recent years. My hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside and other right hon. and hon. Friends have suggested a number of ways in which they believe that water levels in chalk streams can be safeguarded for the future. Before I comment on their suggestions, I hope that it may be of benefit if I say a little about the various issues that are affecting chalk streams generally and in Hampshire in particular. I hope in the process to dispel a few myths.

First, water quality is clearly an important factor in maintaining a river, and particularly in safeguarding its fisheries. The water quality of chalk streams has been, and continues to be, extremely good. The principal rivers, including the Test and Itchen, are all extensively monitored by the National Rivers Authority and are all well within class 1 of the current national river classification scheme—that is, they are of "good" quality —and with an excellent diversity and abundance of species present. The majority of their length is well within class 1a, the top quality class.

As for quantity, rather than quality, it is certainly the case that southern England has experienced a prolonged dry spell over the past three years, and groundwater levels are now well below normal in parts of the south-east and east. Hampshire, however, is not one of those areas worst affected.

The level of a river and the speed at which it is moving are relevant to fisheries. The long hot summer of 1989 is believed to have stimulated the growth of algae, which in turn tend to smother the weeds in a river and increase silt loadings. Those effects, combined with heavy rain the following winter, conspired to scour out much of the weed growth, so that last summer the river flowed over an almost weed-free bed, resulting in low levels, despite the flow holding up reasonably well, but a higher than normal velocity, and thus higher levels of silt.

Hampshire chalk streams do not, as a whole, suffer badly from over-abstraction. Certainly in the Test, the vast majority of abstractions from the river are non-consumptive. That is, the water is "borrowed" and returned, more or less directly, back to the river. Only 2 per cent. of the average flow is consumed after abstraction. Despite some short-term fluctuations, there does not appear to be any long-term trend of increase in either licensed or actual volumes abstracted. However, despite those general comments, the NRA recognises that some localised problems are caused by over-abstraction. I shall say more about that in a moment.

That brings me to the role of the NRA. It will be very grateful for the supportive comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside. The establishment of the NRA has provided an unprecedented opportunity not just in Hampshire but across the whole country for a new and thorough appraisal of the issues affecting the condition of our rivers. The NRA's responsibilities encompass a range of issues—for example, water resources as well as pollution control, and fisheries as well as nature conservation. I have already commented that my hon. Friend has recognised the NRA's work.

We set up the NRA as a tough environmental regulator and there is growing acceptance among those concerned, including environmental bodies that had hitherto been sceptical, that it is succeeding as a tough environmental regulator. Let me outline what the NRA is doing in Hampshire and elsewhere.

First, it has taken action to help Hampshire's salmon fisheries. While most trout fisheries reported an excellent season last year, salmon catches have been declining for some years. Reference has been made to recent local seminars. My hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside will therefore be aware of the NRA's view that river management appears to hold the answer. Salmon populations are known to depend critically on an adequate supply of clean gravel beds in which to lay their eggs. Historically, riparian owners' keepers regularly raked river gravels to ensure that they were clean, free from silt and ready for the spawning season. That practice has slipped into abeyance in recent years, and that appears to be a major factor in the decline in the fisheries.

The NRA has been seeking to tackle that problem in a number of ways. Research has confirmed that river gravels are not as productive for spawning salmon as might be expected. A programme for mechanically raking gravels is being undertaken and studies are being carried out into sediment movement and into weed growth and management, including the advantages of reinstating programmes of weed cutting in the autumn.

The NRA has also constructed a number of new fish passes on the Test to ensure that incoming salmon can reach their spawning grounds freely. It is taking steps to restock the river with artificially reared local salmon. It has also installed electronic fish counters and radio tagging equipment to study fish movements and spawning behaviour. The NRA is taking a number of positive steps to study causes and to restore the salmon fisheries.

Secondly, while the Test itself is not believed to be suffering from the effects of over-abstraction, there are rivers in Hampshire that are affected. Last year, the NRA identified 20 priority rivers in which low flows were believed to be the result of over-abstraction rather than simply low rainfall, and the NRA thus embarked on a programme of urgent studies. Yesterday, the NRA announced its programme for dealing with the first set of priority rivers. A number of those that have been mentioned are included in that list—for example, Wallop brook, one of the tributaries of the Test near Stockbridge. My hon. Friends have mentioned others, including the Darent and the Pang in Berkshire, as well as a number of other rivers in the south which the NRA has recognised require action. Solutions are now being investigated, including a combination of partial revocation of abstraction licences, augmentation of flows and river bed lining. The NRA is continuing to investigate possible solutions for a further list of rivers suffering detrimental reductions in flows. They include the Bourne rivulet, which is another tributary of the Test, the Meon and the Hamble.

The NRA recognises that where problems caused by over-abstraction exist, there are very rarely any quick or simple solutions. I am, however, impressed by the NRA's determination to get to grips as quickly as possible with such difficulties and I commend the progress that it is making.

Although the NRA has been looking so far at solutions to specific problem cases, we are all alive to the need for longer-term solutions. Abstractions must, of course, be properly managed and the NRA has a full range of powers not only to control the issue of new abstraction licences, but to amend or to revoke any existing licences. My hon. Friends have asked whether the NRA is properly resourced to use those powers. The authority's costs are ultimately recouped from abstractors via abstraction licence charges. To the extent that capital spending is necessary and justified, the NRA has access to initial funding from the abstraction charges scheme. I have no reason to suppose that shortage of capital funds is a constraint on the authority's ability to carry out its functions properly.

Sir David Mitchell: Does that expenditure availability also apply to compensation for reduction of extraction from an existing licence which is reduced?

Mr. Baldry: The costs that the NRA can recoup from abstractors via abstraction licence charges are moneys that can then be used for practical spending. Clearly, there may be occasions when, under its statutory responsibilities, the NRA will have a duty to consider whether it should amend or revoke any existing licences. In such circumstances, compensation is clearly a matter for the NRA. I shall have to take advice on my hon. Friend's specific point about whether it can pay compensation from the abstraction charges scheme. I hope that I shall be able to help my hon. Friend before the end of my speech.

As for its local abstraction policy, I can confirm that the NRA's approach is for major abstractions from Hampshire rivers to be taken from as close as possible to the tidal limit in order to preserve natural flows in the middle and upper reaches. I can also confirm that, certainly for the Test, the NRA does not generally intend to permit new, "consumptive" summer abstractions, requiring instead that sufficient bankside winter storage should be provided together with prescribed minimum flows.

My hon. Friends have referred to the pressures on water resources caused by new developments. The level of development in Hampshire is, in the first instance, a matter for the county council to consider in drawing up its structure plan. I should certainly expect the NRA and local water companies to make an important input into this process so that a proper strategic balance can be struck between development and conservation. The Secretary of State will, of course, need to consider any objections made to the structure plan.

With due respect to my right hon. Friend the Member for Woking, I cannot agree that the NRA should have a veto over planned development proposals. Although careful account must always be taken of the expert advice that is provided by the NRA, the final judgment must be that of the local planning authority.

Mr. Onslow: I should be content with that proposition were it not for the fact that there is absolutely no obligation on the planning authority to take any notice of the input of the NRA. The NRA does not know until very late in the day whether its recommendations have been acceded to and taken seriously. As long as that is the case, I am not persuaded that there is a satisfactory requirement to take the availability of water resources into account. I shall require further evidence, in addition to that which my hon. Friend has been able to give so far, that the need for a veto is not great.

Mr. Baldry: I hear what my hon. Friend says. Clearly, it would sensible if local planning authorities were to take into account the NRA's views when determining planning applications. Any instances or examples where my right hon. Friend feels that the local planning authorities have failed adequately to take into account the NRA's views must clearly be considered. However, I know of no suggestions that local planning authorities have taken planning decisions in disregard of the views that have been put forward by the NRA.

Mr. Onslow: I am sorry to press my hon. Friend on this point, but it is important. If he carries out some research in his Department, it will turn up cases that will show that in more than one instance the advice of the NRA's predecessors about the danger of flooding was not taken into account by the planning authority. Development permission was then granted and the development went ahead, but serious flooding resulted on the developed land. That seems a powerful argument for my case.

Mr. Baldry: My right hon. Friend makes the same point in a different way. I do not know of any example of a local planning authority that can be said to have disregarded the advice that was provided by the NRA. Local planning authorities have to take such advice into account, along with a number of other factors, when determining whether to grant a planning application. If my right hon. Friend knows of specific instances where the advice offered by the NRA has not been adequately or sufficiently taken into account by a local planning authority, they will clearly have to be considered as a matter of general policy. However, at the moment local planning authorities take account of the expert advice provided by the NRA. They often have to take into account a number of varying opinions from different bodies, some statutory and some non-statutory, in making a final planning judgment.

Looking ahead more generally, the NRA is developing an overall water resource strategy for the future. It recently published a first report as part of that work, giving a preliminary demand forecast for each of the water supply companies. The NRA has also commissioned consultants to take a fresh look at strategic water supply options, including a national water grid, more inter-regional transfers, and the prospects for desalination. None of those would provide an inexpensive solution. As my hon. Friend conceded, desalination is energy intensive and the plant involved can be highly intrusive. As water is heavy and bulky, it is seldom economic to transport it over great distances. However, I am sure that the NRA will consider those issues carefully.

Let me reiterate and answer the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Hampshire, North-West. The NRA's resources, to which I have already referred, cover instances where it is necessary to buy out licences. As I hope I have confirmed to the House, I do not believe that the shortage of funds is in any way a constraint on the NRA carrying out necessary activities in relation to the problem of vanishing rivers.

Sir David Mitchell: I warmly welcome what my hon. Friend has just said and I am most grateful to him for having answered the question I asked him in the middle of my speech.

Mr. Baldry: I am grateful to my hon. Friend.

My hon. Friend asked about the actions that can be taken to control the consumption of water. It has been rightly pointed out that water is not an infinite resource. I agree completely. Although I am sure that no one would want to constrain the legitimate uses of water, I suspect that we are all guilty at one time or another of careless or wasteful uses and we can all help to conserve supplies.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hampshire, North-West asked specifically about leakage. Leakage is a problem in all water distribution systems, but it is something to which the water industry is paying ever-increasing attention. The Director-General of Water Services already expects water companies to adopt cost-effective leakage control measures and to minimise charges to customers, and the companies have leakage detection and control programmes designed to minimise losses. For the longer term, the NRA will wish to ensure that leakages are minimised in order to avoid unnecessary abstractions and the development of new resources.

As for charges, there are indications that metering encourages economy and reduces wastage. However, it would be wrong for me to say more, as the director general is currently analysing the responses to a consultation paper on future methods of paying for water and proposes to issue guidelines to the water companies by the end of the year.

Finally, I have been asked about the environmentally sensitive areas scheme, which is, of course, the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. However, I understand that a review of the scheme is already under way and that, if favourable, consultations with farmers and conservation bodies will follow. I have no doubt that the issues that have been raised this evening will be among those that the review will wish to consider.

This debate is most timely and topical, given the attention following yesterday's announcement by the NRA about how it plans to tackle the problem of low flows caused by over-abstraction in certain rivers. Although Hampshire is by no means as badly affected as other parts of the country, I am pleased that the importance of its chalk streams, chalk streams in general and the fisheries they support has been fully recognised by the NRA in the work that it is carrying out. I hope that I have been able to satisfy my right hon. and hon. Friends that the Government and the NRA are taking the issues seriously and that action is being taken to tackle existing problems.

Gravel Extraction (Buckinghamshire)

8.15 pm

Mr. George Walden (Buckingham): I am extremely grateful to have a chance to take part in one of these highly elusive debates—so elusive that one beat of a Whip's heart or one spoonful too many of watercress soup in the Members' Dining Room, and the moment is passed.

I am particularly glad that the debate will be answered by the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry), and that my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) is on the Front Bench, because they both share my concern about gravel extraction and all that it involves. They are both neighbours of mine and, although they are constrained in their public utterances by ministerial office, we concert on these matters and I hope to have a sympathetic hearing if only for that reason.

I do not want to be a NIMBY negativist. I want to be positive and constructive, but I must begin by outlining what seems to me to be an unacceptable situation. In huge swathes of north Buckinghamshire people are in danger of having their lives blighted and the countryside is in danger of being irretrievably scarred by the operation of gravel diggers.

Where did we start? It is interesting to look back at a report by Sir Ralph Verney in 1976 which he recalled in a letter published in The Times about a year ago. I shall quote from it because it recalls where we started only a few years ago. Sir Ralph Verney wrote:

"the County Council as mineral planning authority should be mindful of the fact that when we planned the building of Milton Keynes, their Committee of which I was Chairman imposed a condition that no permissions should be granted west of the M1 for gravel extractions for the building of the City. This decision was fully endorsed by the London and Home Counties Regional Planning Conference and there was never any question of County quotas for extraction as has been suggested by the developers."

That is where we started a few years ago. Where are we now?

The village of Chackmore in my constituency is a charming quiet village quite close to Buckinghamshire in the environs of the historic grounds of Stowe. It is incredible to believe that an application was put in for gravel extraction within hundreds of yards of that village. It was fought, but it was only after a campaign in the national press that the application was withdrawn. Not everyone has the pulling power, in terms of media interest, of Stowe school, or the support of the National Trust.

The village of Mursley in my constituency—a tranquil and ancient village—is similarly threatened. Once again, there is a proposal to extract gravel on a huge scale within a few hundred yards of the school, which will destroy the environment of the people who live in the village.

Mr. Kenneth Tucker, the leader of a campaign against the threat to Mursley, is not a nimbyist, but a highly energetic and informed man, who takes this matter extremely seriously and looks beyond the confines of his own village. He has pointed out that gravel extraction so close to that village would lead to dust, traffic, noise and danger to the water sources. There would be consequent damage to the environment of neighbouring villages, notably Drayton Parslow.

Those are two examples, but there are more. The villages of Thornton, Beachampton and Thornborough are faced with a similar threat. They lie in an especially picturesque stretch of the Ouse valley. To give an example of the complete insensitivity to landscape with which these applications are made, gravel extraction in that area would run against the convent of Thornton which is a retreat and a teaching centre, and is set in a splendid and isolated landscape, as the nature of the convent requires. That is an example of total insensitivity to the lives of local people, and to the nuns, which can creep into applications for gravel extraction.

It is important to remember that places like the Ouse valley are close to the town of Buckingham and to the larger agglomeration of Milton Keynes. Not only the villagers would suffer; so would the inhabitants of those large towns, for whom that area is one of the closest recreation centres.

Other examples affect my constituents. One is at Finmere, which is over the frontier in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Minister. Another is in the village of Passenham, which is in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry, whom I am glad to see here tonight. Any gravel extraction there could affect the lives of my constituents in Stony Stratford.

A sudden pattern of gravel extraction proposals has developed in north Buckinghamshire in recent years, since Sir Ralph Verney pointed out how damaging it would be if that were to happen, partly as a consequence of the contruction of Milton Keynes.

We seem to be caught in a vice on this matter. We seem to be in a position where we have to despoil the countryside to improve the built environment; we have to blight the lives of rural residents to improve urban areas, housing and roads. We seem to be in a position where people who live in urban areas and who might want to seek a little tranquillity in the countryside at the weekend will find dust, noise and gaping holes in the ground in the villages that I have mentioned. It seems to me to be in everyone's interests to re-examine the whole question of extraction of aggregates and the implications for the environment.

The present arrangements appear to be neat and logical. They depend upon a system which reminds me of some of my experiences in Communist countries where I had the mixed fortune to live at one time. Those arrangements are based upon a quota system and upon rather inflexible national planning. One only has to look at the ugly acronyms associated with the process, such as RAWP and SERAWP, to get the feeling that it is an irresistible process which has lost all touch with the lives of ordinary people.

As my hon. Friend the Minister knows better than I, the arrangements depend on co-operation among the minerals industry, local authorities and representatives of the Department of the Environment. There is the south-east regional aggregate working party, the regional aggregate working party and the national co-ordinating group, which is chaired by the Department of the Environment and comprises working party chairmen, representatives of the aggregates industry and other Government Departments. That all sounds neat and immaculate as a piece of planning machinery, but, in practice, it has become completely divorced from the results on the ground. It is all very well to have RAWP and SERAWP and means of co-ordinating them, but something has gone alarmingly wrong with the whole bureaucratic structure when it ends up in a serious proposal to place a gravel extraction pit next to a school, a convent or Stowe school.

I am not chiding my hon. Friends the Ministers in the Department of the Environment for the situation, as they know, because I have raised the matter in the House before and have had discussions with the Minister, my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo), about it.

The Department of the Environment has been rather forthcoming in reply to my representations. In case it forgets how forthcoming it has been, I shall take this opportunity to remind it.

In his letter of 4 February to me, my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, South promised to take increasing account of the possibility of alternative sources of aggregates, in other words of slag and such like, rather than digging it from the ground. I also know that the Department of the Environment has spoken to Mr. Peter Smith, an expert on the subject, who happens to live at Chackmore in my constituency—one can see what a wealth of informed and serious people I am fortunate enough to have in my constituency. I am grateful to the Department of the Environment for listening to what Peter Smith has to say.

On the day of my, sadly abortive, Adjournment debate two days ago, the Department of the Environment, I am sure by coincidence, answered a written question on the subject from my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg). In that reply, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment spoke of the "forecasts of the demand for aggregates for the next 20 years"

"been prepared by independent consultants."

He went on:

"The Government are publishing the forecasts now so that the environmental implications of the rising demand for aggregates can be fully considered. These are a matter for serious concern. The forecasts do not mean that the demand must be met from new sources of land won aggregates. Nor do they mean that targets are set for production by the minerals industry."

Later, in what was an important statement, the Minister went on:

"The Government will expect the industry to make greater use of alternative sources of supply. These include the potential from marine dredged sand and gravel; the greater use of materials such as china clay, sand and colliery minestone; and the increased exploitation of waste and recycled materials including power station ash, blast furnace slag and crushed concrete. We shall also consider the contributions that can be made from coastal super quarries. The Government have research in hand to examine all these options."

At the conclusion of what was an immaculately drafted reply, the Minister said:

"Mineral planning authorities should have regard to the statement made by the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope) in July 1989 which made it clear that MPG 6 should be implemented as a matter of priority".—[Official Report, 7 May 1991; Vol. 190, c. 401-2.]

As we know, MPG 6 is the document that is causing the present problem and under which the applications—I have described them as grotesque—have been made in my constituency.

"The aggregates industry is literally consuming the country."

Those are not my words. I would not use such fiery rhetoric. They are the words of Dr. John Adams of University College, London in a document entitled "Determined to Dig", which was published this month. I hope that the Government will take serious note of that very serious document, because it shows that the problems that my constituents are encountering will be encountered increasingly across the country. Dr. Adams states in that document:

"The principal objective is achieving adequate and steady supplies of aggregates. The second, subordinate, objective is the best balance of the social, environmental and economic costs that must be paid to achieve the first."

He hit the nail on the head there, because that is precisely the imbalance into which we have got ourselves.

Mr. Peter Smith of CAGE—the campaign against gravel extraction—to whom I referred, gets to the heart of what happens to be for me a local problem but which is a much wider national one. After much study of the matter, Mr. Smith believes that the Department of the Environment is in danger of managing the land quarry gravel market to ensure an excess of supply over demand which results in an artificially low price. That is no doubt done with the best of intentions, to support the construction industry, and we appreciate the importance of that industry.

However, Mr. Smith points out that gravel is 40 per cent. cheaper today than it was in 1970. The result is that the low price prevents the use of reprocessed waste materials such as ash aggregates and limestone, which could provide 50 per cent. of aggregate demand. It also inhibits the production of alternatives such as crushed rock and sea gravel. He goes on to point out that the central planning forum for the south-east region is the south-east regional aggregate working party, to which I referred, where delegates from the Department of the Environment, local authorities and gravel companies decide where and how much gravel will be quarried. The costs of that organisation are met from local authority funds. The organisation is, therefore, a private group, and while it meets not exactly in a clandestine situation, its minutes are secret and I understand that ash aggregate manufacturers are not represented on it. I shall be happy to hear the Minister contradict that, but it is my information.

If that is so, it seems odd for a Conservative Government to be operating what is, in effect, a type of price cartel to support a particular industry and to prevent environmental conservation from playing its full part in the decisions that are made. Those may appear to the Minister to be serious charges, but the situation, as Mr. Smith sees it and as I understand it, is serious in environmental terms.

If it were just a matter of gravel and sand extraction, it would be bad enough, but since in this industry one thing leads to another, yesterday's noisy gravel extraction is today's stinking, pestiferous waste pit. I could make a whole speech about the problem of waste pits in my constituency. I have an extremely large one at Calvert, and the local people, notably at Edgcott and Calvert, have lived with that huge pit for years. It takes much of London's rubbish. They have developed a reasonable relationship with Shanks and McEwan Limited, which operates the pit, and historically, basically because of the clay in the area, the pit has been there for a long time.

But whether it is gravel or waste pits, I do not believe in the equality of misery. The fact that many people's lives are already blighted or their environments have been ruined by the existence of gravel pits in south Bucks is no reason to extend gravel pits to north Bucks. Rather, it is a reason to ask what can be done to prevent the suffering that has occurred and damage to the environment being spread northwards or to parts of the country outside my constituency.

The same is true of waste pits. There have been in my constituency, alongside the applications for gravel extraction, a disturbing number of applications recently for waste pits, notably at Bierton, on the outskirts of Aylesbury, which already suffers from a serious traffic problem, which I hope will soon be resolved by a bypass. To impose a waste tip on that area and on its attractive landscape would be an example of vandalism. The proposal has been refused, but is still under appeal. Other attractive villages such as Aston Abbots nearby could be affected.

In yet another part of my constituency, at Great Brickhill, a totally unsuitable application was made to extract sand and fill up the hole with waste. I was glad that when I took up the matter on the Floor of the House and then personally with the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, South, he told me in his letter of 4 February that he would examine the possibility of guidance in order to prevent waste pits being established within a certain distance of villages.

We know from the time that such questions occupy on the Floor of the House that the Government are environmentally active. I hope that I have made it clear in my remarks that I appreciate the serious and positive response that I have had so far from the Government. The problem is, quite simply, that, although the Government are moving in the right direction in the longer term, the threat to my constituents and those who live in Mursley, Thornton and Beachampton is immediate. Therefore, I beg my hon. Friend the Minister to take an urgent new look at the situation that threatens to tear up the landscape in my constituency and perhaps in other parts of the country and to blight the lives, not only of my constituents, but of many people throughout the land.

8.42 pm

Sir David Mitchell (Hampshire, North-West): With the leave of the House, I should like to support what my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden) said about the problems of gravel extraction and to refer to an example that illustrates the case that he is presenting. Conclusions can be drawn from his speech and from the example that I shall give.

In my constituency is the attractive village of Mottisfont. It is close to the River Test and is in an environmentally sensitive area. Therefore, of all the areas where one would expect planning consent for gravel and hoggin extraction, that is one of the least likely. However, a planning application was made, was refused by the local authority, went to appeal and has now been granted. When I objected to that planning application on behalf of many of my constituents, I tried to discover why planning permission was granted in an environmentally sensitive area of substantial beauty, beside one of the foremost environmentally attractive rivers in southern England. The environmentally sensitive area policy is designed to ensure that the landscape is not damaged by changing farming methods. If the landscape is dug up to create a huge pit, that is the equivalent of changing farming methods, so I presumed that planning permission would be refused in the circumstances that I described. However, when I followed through the council's reasons for granting planning consent, I found that the key reason was the policy of counties being largely self sufficient in the provision of gravel, hoggin, sand and other building materials of that nature. The Government should review that policy urgently.

My hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham gave examples from Buckinghamshire where that policy has had an unsatisfactory effect on his constituents. The case that I described in Mottisfont is highly unsatisfactory to my constituents. It is common sense that, when the Mendip hills have thousands of tons of gravel, hoggin and a perfectly good rail system, there is no logic in continuing the policy of counties being self sufficient in those materials.

Will the Minister look carefully at the principle of requiring a degree of self sufficiency within a council? Would it not make more sense for gravel, hoggin and other construction materials to be brought in from other areas where extraction does not damage the environment and where the rail services are such that it can be done perfectly economically and to the great benefit of the environment in the county that will not be dug up?

8.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Tony Baldry): With the leave of the House, may I say that through no fault of his own, my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden) missed the Adjournment debate in his name on Tuesday, for which I suspect the Chief Whip has much to answer. I was determined that my hon. Friend should have the opportunity to express his concern to the House and that he should have a constructive reply.

My hon. Friend explained his concerns about minerals and waste disposal sites with characteristic eloquence and reasonableness. He knows that I share many of his concerns, as does my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell). We have had a number of discussions about concerns on the impact of sand and gravel extraction and landfill sites in Buckinghamshire and adjoining counties. I am pleased to be able to respond to this debate to make it clear that the Government share his concerns about the impact of minerals extraction on the countryside. I am grateful for the opportunity to explain the Government's current thinking.

My hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham is fortunate, as am I, to represent a constituency that contains much attractive countryside. Within his constituency, the county of Buckinghamshire, and in mine, the county of Oxfordshire, and in other counties such as Northamptonshire and Hampshire, there are important mineral resources, particularly of sand and gravel. Because of that, it is not surprising that conflicts arise over the desire to protect the environment.

Those concerns are exemplified by the great many objections which I know have been made to the replacement Buckinghamshire minerals local plan. As my hon. Friend said, that plan is currently being debated at a public local inquiry which has just started. I know that he will appreciate that, against that background, I am unable to comment on the sites that he has mentioned. However, I am confident that the inspector will weigh up all the evidence put to him in a careful and thorough manner before making his recommendations to Buckinghamshire county council, which is the mineral planning authority for the area.

The Government recognise that the environmental impact of the extraction of minerals for construction purposes is a matter of considerable and understandable public concern.

The announcements that we made last week in interim development orders signalled our determination to drive up the standards of the minerals industry. Those old planning permissions cause much public concern, and the amendments that we intend to table for the Planning and Compensation Bill will, first, require IDOs to be registered within six months of commencement of the Bill's provisions, which I expect to be two or three months after Royal Assent. Secondly, in the case of sites dormant for two years before 2 May 1991, they will prevent working from the beginning until the permission has been registered and a scheme of operating and restoration conditions has been submitted and agreed. Thirdly, in respect of working sites—those where working has taken place within the last two years—they will require a scheme of conditions to be submitted for the approval of the mineral planning authority within 12 months of the date of registration. There will be no compensation for the cost of complying with any of those conditions, which will impose far higher environmental standards on the minerals industry than at any previous time in our history.

Those tough new proposals are part of the Government's general approach to environmental questions, following the environment White Paper "This Common Inheritance". The consultation exercise on IDOs shows that there is widespread public concern that the minerals industry does not always operate with sufficient regard for the environment. We take those views very seriously. Nevertheless, I believe that the vast majority of firms operating in the minerals industry have a realistic approach. I believe that they recognise the need for far more stringent environmental standards to be adopted in future, and that the Government's proposals fit naturally into their general context.

My hon. Friend referred to the guidelines, MPG6, which were issued two years ago on the provision for aggregates. We are reviewing this current guidance to ensure that it is up to date and takes full account of the increased environmental concerns.

The first step is the preparation of a long-term forecast of aggregates demand. Demand for aggregates is generated by a proper and natural desire for improvements in the standard of living. That means improvements to our transport infrastructure, especially roads and railways, and improvements in hospitals, housing and water quality. That will be a particularly important factor as we play our part in negotiating and then maintaining rising European Community standards. However, the Government recognise that the environmental consequences of meeting this demand for aggregates must be very carefully examined and weighed. A forecast of projected long-term levels of demand provides a useful starting point in those considerations.

The forecasts, which were commissioned from independent consultants, were published on Tuesday. They show that, with steady growth in the economy, the demand in England and Wales could grow to between 421 million and 490 million tonnes a year in the next 20 years. That represents an increase in demand of 4 per cent. each year, below the level of growth experienced in the past 40 years. I must stress that the forecasts do not represent Government plans, and are not targets for production which the minerals industry must meet. It is important, therefore, that they should be considered as defining a problem rather than providing a solution.

We regard the environmental implications of the forecasts very seriously, and intend to conduct a full and open debate on the planning and environmental issues they raise. The questions to be considered will include whether the present policy of ensuring a steady supply for the construction industry remains appropriate, as much as the length of time over which guidelines are needed for sensible planning. Before any new guidelines are issued, the Government will want to hear from the industry what practical steps it intends to take to improve its environmental performance and its standing with the public.

We have asked the regional aggregates working parties to consider the medium and long-term implications of the forecasts on their regions. We are seeking their advice on how demand in each region might be met and the extent to which their region can contribute to the requirements of other regions. They will, of course, have full regard to the environmental consequences of increases in the extraction of land-won minerals.

My hon. Friend has mentioned the need to increase the use of materials which are alternatives to primary aggregates. I share that opinion, and the Government made it clear in the environment White Paper that they want to see an increase in the use of waste and recycled materials, including secondary aggregates such as china clay, sand, colliery minestone and slate waste.

We also want increased exploitation of waste and recycled materials, such as power station ash, steel and blast furnace slag and crushed concrete. At present, the use of those materials is less than 10 per cent. of the current production of aggregates. That must increase, and I hope that the industry will show that it can be achieved.

We commissioned research last year to establish the extent of those materials and to identify the steps needed to achieve an increase in their use. We expect the report to be published later this summer. It has already clearly identified that there are considerable stocks of alternative materials which are suitable for use in construction. It has also recommended a number of steps which could be taken to increase their use. I can assure my hon. Friend that we shall carefully examine the report during our review of the aggregates guidelines to see what the Government might do to promote the increased use of such materials.

My hon. Friend mentioned the valuable report which Peter Smith has produced. I know that my officials have held useful and interesting discussions with Mr. Smith and I congratulate him on his work.

I should also like to advise my hon. Friend of some other research initiatives which we have commissioned to examine other possible sources of supply. One project, which has just started, is examining the possibilities offered by large-scale coastal quarries, such as that at Glensanda in Scotland. It will examine the potential areas of supply, which include Scotland, and indeed Ireland, Norway and the Iberian peninsula. The consultants will also investigate the environmental and economic consequences of providing aggregates to the south-east from such sources.

My hon. Friend will be aware that marine-dredged sand and gravel are a particularly important source of supply to the south-east of England. We have already undertaken two research projects to identify the extent of the resources that could be available, and we have a continuing programme that will provide a comprehensive view on resources. There are, of course, environmental considerations which affect the extraction of marine material, and I can assure my hon. Friend and the House that those will not be overlooked as we investigate the opportunities offered by that source.

Mr. Walden: I have been extremely heartened by what my hon. Friend has said so far, which seems to put new emphasis on the positive points that the Department of the Environment has already come up with. Will my hon. Friend add one further point? Will he draw to the attention of county councils the fact that, given that the Department of the Environment intends to take what sounds like a radical look at the current position, they should not rush into granting planning permission for quarries which could go ahead and perhaps slip from the net of a new and perhaps more positive review?

Mr. Baldry: As I made clear in the introduction to my comments, I fully appreciate and share my hon. Friend's concerns. No doubt he appreciates that county councils, as mineral planning authorities, have to have regard to the guidance which they are given and, in determining applications, have to balance the conflicts which arise, understandably, over the need on the one hand to extract sand and gravel and the desire on the other to protect the environment.

It is of course important that there should be careful use of aggregates and that there should not be over-specification in construction use. We have started further research, which will examine the specification of aggregates used in construction to see if action needs to be taken to help eliminate any unnecessary or excessive use of this valuable natural resource.

The Government recognise that it is essential to continue to raise the environmental standards in the minerals industry. That is why we commissioned Groundwork last year to undertake a study of the environmental performance of the industry. The report was recently published, and a copy is in the Library. It has made a number of recommendations on the steps which the industry could and should take to achieve higher standards.

These include the implementation of a system of corporate environmental management, including site appraisals, regular monitoring of performance and periodic environmental audits. It is particularly important that all employees in the minerals companies should realise that they have a responsibility for the environment in which they operate. Companies must recognise that they need to act as good neighbours; I am sure the Groundwork report will be invaluable as they work towards this end.

[Mr. Baldry]

As part of our overall approach to drive up standards, we intend to follow up the Groundwork study with a pilot initiative in two counties close to my hon. Friend's constituency—Hertfordshire and Bedfordshire. With funding from my Department, Groundwork will be able to visit a number of current operational sites and recommend the steps which the company in question should take to improve the site concerned.

We are also conducting other research initiatives which will lead to higher operating standards at minerals sites, and we shall shortly be issuing draft guidance on noise, a matter which my hon. Friend is rightly concerned about.

As my hon. Friend and the House will recognise, the current public local inquiry in Buckinghamshire has prevented me from saying more about Buckinghamshire itself. My hon. Friend made his own points in his own way, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Hampshire, North-West (Sir D. Mitchell), and they can be assured that they will be listened to carefully. However, I hope that I have been able to demonstrate beyond any doubt that we understand the widespread public concern about minerals extraction. We are determined that the minerals industry will in future operate in an environmentally responsible manner. The adoption of high standards is in the interest of operators themselves. We shall certainly take very careful note of the points which my hon. Friend has made as we review the aggregates guidelines.

The review will be conducted in an open and public manner. We shall welcome views on the forecast and the implications for the environment, and these will be taken into account as draft guidance is prepared. There will be a full public consultation exercise on the draft guidelines in due course.

I hope that my hon. Friends will recognise that we take these issues extremely seriously. I welcome the opportunity of being able to comment to the House on the progress that we are making.

Question put and agreed to.

Orders of the Day

Badgers Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

Clause 1

AMENDMENT OF S. 2 OF BADGERS ACT 1973

9.37 am

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey and Waterside): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 11, at end insert 'or'.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 2, in page 1, leave out line 12.

No. 3, in line 14, at beginning insert

'in a manner which causes harm, or would be likely to cause harm, to a badger,'.

No. 4, in line 16, at end insert—

'(4) An accused shall not be permitted to rebut a presumption of guilt established under sections 1(1A) or 2(2) by evidence that he was engaged in any other activity save where he can show that he was authorised to be engaged in that activity by the occupier of the land on which the alleged offence occurred.

(5) A person shall not be guilty of an offence under section 2(3)(e) (disturbing a badger) by reason of entering a terrier into a badger sett provided that his action would otherwise have been lawful.'.

No. 5, in clause 2, line 25, leave out '(a), (c) or (e)'.

No. 16, in clause 4, page 2, leave out lines 47 and 48.

No. 18, in clause 5, page 3, line 13, at end insert '"harm" means bodily harm.'.

Mr. Colvin: This group of amendments is crucial to the Bill. Those Conservative Members who had reservations about the previous Bill promoted by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) are pleased to have the opportunity to support this Bill. The House will agree that there has been a different atmosphere surrounding this Bill from the start, largely to the credit of the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes), who has been only too ready to have discussions with those of us who expressed genuine concerns and reservations about the Bill that the House considered during the last Session. There has been much consultation and compromise.

As the House will know, it is the nature of private Member's Bills that, unless such an atmosphere prevails, the chances are that a Bill will not make the progress that its promoter would like. I am afraid that that is what befell the previous Bill on the subject. Unfortunately, almost with the same breath as he proposed his Badger Protection Bill, the hon. Member for Newham, North-West proposed another Bill to ban fox hunting. That led one or two of us with an interest in field sports, who support the legitimate interests of those who go about their business in the countryside, whether they be field sportsmen, farmers, landowners or foresters, to be slightly suspicious about the hon. Gentleman's real objectives.

There is no doubt about the objectives of the hon. Member for Newport, East. All of us in the House and the many constituents who have written to us on the subject have no doubt that his objective is to see the end of the obnoxious practice of badger digging and baiting. We are in total agreement about that. Any other side effect of this measure can be hotly debated, but the principal objective must remain.

I shall concentrate first on amendments Nos. 1, 2 and 4. As several hon. Members attending this debate have not been present at earlier debates on badgers, either in this Session or the previous one, I shall begin with a few general remarks about the problem as it is seen inside and outside Parliament. The Bill creates a new offence of recklessly or intentionally causing a dog to enter a badger sett and is designed to make it easier to prosecute badger diggers—something we all want to stop.

At present, it is an offence under section 1(1) of the Badgers Act 1973 to attempt to kill, injure or take a badger. Since 1985, when the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 was amended, the burden of proof has been reversed, so that a person who enters a terrier into a badger sett is presumed to have been attempting to kill, injure or take a badger, unless he shows to the contrary—unless he shows that he is digging for foxes.

It is argued that, despite the tightening of the law in 1985, badger diggers are still evading conviction by taking fox carcases with them, so that they can claim that they were after foxes, not badgers. On the other side, it is argued that there are many legitimate terrier men who are truly after foxes and who have fallen foul of the law because they have been unable to prove their innocence —that happens a great deal in Wales.

There is general agreement that the law is unsatisfactory and results in lengthy proceedings, with expert witnesses called on both sides. However, although a simple offence of causing a dog to enter a badger sett would make it easier to prosecute badger diggers, it would also put an end to the control of foxes by using terriers in setts. Foxes frequently run into, or occupy, badger setts. Therefore, the new offence would be unacceptable to the sheep farming community.

The legitimate use of terriers by packs of fox hounds and others to control foxes does not harm badgers. If farmers were denied that method of control, alternative methods such as snaring and night shooting are likely to cause far more trouble for the badger, which is essentially a nocturnal animal. At present, packs of fox hounds and other above-board fox control operations do not fall foul of the law when using terriers in setts, as they are plainly not attempting to kill, injure or take badgers.

The offence, as drafted, makes no allowance for someone who genuinely wishes to take foxes out of badger setts. That is of particular concern, as the Bill presently defines "sett" to include disused setts. However, a simple defence allowing the use of terriers for fox control would not be acceptable, as it would open the loophole for badger diggers to claim that they were after foxes. Therefore, we must find a means of distinguishing between legitimate terrier men and badger diggers.

[Mr. Colvin]

A licensing system has been suggested, but that would be unnecessarily bureaucratic. A large number of licences would be needed—the figure would run into thousands—and it would be hard for the licensing authority, whatever it might be, to determine whether an application was genuine. A licensing system is likely to be resisted by the Government—perhaps the Minister will comment on that later.

Amendment Nos. 1, 2 and 4 provide a more simple means of permitting legitimate terrier work. It is accepted that almost all badger diggers are trespassers, but farmers or huntsmen who genuinely wish to control foxes are not. The amendments remove the right of defendants charged under sections 1 or 2 of the Badgers Act 1973 to claim that they were after foxes or engaged in any other activity, unless they can show that they were authorised to be engaged in that activity by the occupier of the land in question.

A person caught entering a terrier into a sett would face near certain conviction if he were trespassing, so it is far easier to prosecute someone for that offence. Even if authorised to be there by the occupier, the person would still, as at present, have to prove that he was after foxes, not badgers. Therefore, the amendments delete the simple offence of causing a dog to enter a badger sett.

9.45 am

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): My hon. Friend talks about the difficulty of licensing. However, clause 3 extends the exceptions so that a person will not be found guilty if he is carrying out work on land "with the consent of the landowner and is authorised by a Hunt recognised by the Masters of Fox Hounds Association". Is that not likely to give rise to some difficulties, because the Masters of Fox Hounds Association is, on the whole, regarded as the establishment organisation? There is nothing wrong with that, but there are quite a large number of perfectly legitimate Welsh packs of fox hounds which, for various reasons, are not authorised—some of them do not like to belong to an establishment organisation. It seems that perfectly legitimate organisations might be excluded by the creation of what I suppose is a closed shop organised by the Masters of Fox Hounds Association.

Mr. Colvin: I am interested to hear my hon. Friend's intervention, but a later amendment addresses that issue in some detail.

There is no doubt that a licensing system would be unnecessarily bureaucratic to administer. We should have reservations about the possibility of the wrong organisation being asked to carry out the licensing. If it were to be the Ministry of Agriculture, perhaps that would be all right, but a local authority might well be given the job. When we consider the political complexion of local government in some districts, we can see that, if a local authority were to issue licences, that might cause difficulties.

Mr. Budgen: I agree that it seems that there will be difficulties, no matter which organisation is given the duty of issuing licences. My hon. Friend spoke of the possibility of local authorities having a particular political view about a lawful activity. There is also a risk that a private organisation might carry out its licensing duties negligently or idly, which would create all sorts of difficulties. The Masters of Fox Hounds Association carries out its duties very well, but a significant minority of legitimate hunts do not belong to that association, and difficulties could arise.

Mr. Colvin: I absolutely understand my hon. Friend's point, but if he is still in the Chamber later, he will find that that issue is addressed in more detail in other amendments.

Amendment Nos. 1, 2 and 4 delete the simple offence of causing a dog to enter a badger sett. They also qualify the offence of disturbing a badger in a sett so that a disturbance is permitted if it occurs as a result of the otherwise lawful use of terriers in setts. That is necessary as, otherwise, someone could be prosecuted for disturbing a badger, however minimally—the level of disturbance is not quantified—by entering a terrier into a sett, even where that action was part of a legitimate fox control operation.

Amendment No. 5 involves the defence provided in clause 2(2), which was amended in Committee. It permits certain interferences with setts where the action is "the intentional result of a lawful operation and could not reasonably have been avoided."

In essence, that would allow unavoidable acts that interfered with setts; but the defence recognises only incidental damage, obstruction or disturbance of a badger in a sett. For some reason, the unavoidable entry of a dog into a sett or the unavoidable destruction of a sett will in no circumstances be permitted. Obviously, those behind this Bill regard the offences of entering a terrier into a sett or of the destruction of a sett as so heinous that no defence may be permitted. That is unfair, and also probably wrong in law. [Interruption.]

The Bill creates serious offences with heavy penalties. For the sake of equity, proper and even-handed defences must be allowed—I am sure that the promoter of the Bill agrees with that. Amendment No. 5 alters the defence in clause 2(2) so that it is available for all offences of interfering with a sett—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I am finding it difficult to follow the hon. Gentleman's remarks with so many conversations going on.

Mr. Colvin: I should like to raise one other point with you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. So many amendments are grouped in this first group that it will be difficult for those who want to comment on them and question them to be given answers on each amendment in turn, either by me or by my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor). Would it therefore be for the convenience of the House if I concluded my remarks now and spoke later on amendments Nos. 3 and 15?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On Report, the rules of order allow hon. Members to speak once only unless they move the amendment in question.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth) rose——

Mr. Colvin: I give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Hardy: My anxiety about amendments Nos. 4 and 5 arises because of the following problem. I recognise that dogs cannot read law and that, if a dog illegally chases a rabbit, it is no good reading out the statute to it. On the other hand, if this amendment is inserted in the Bill, there is a danger that the badger digger will say that he was walking lawfully in the countryside when his dog inadvertently entered a badger sett. He could use that loophole to excuse badger digging every weekend for another 20 years, while a succession of his dogs sometimes got lost down badger setts.

No one wants to persecute an innocent citizen whose little dog inadvertently enters a badger sett, but does the hon. Gentleman agree that there is a real difference between that innocent citizen and the thugs who perpetrate an activity which I hope the hon. Gentleman deplores as much as I do? He should not try to amend the Bill so as to provide such a wide loophole that would give the villains a field day.

Mr. Colvin: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman's concern is shared by myself and by the House. The whole object of the Bill is to close loopholes, but in doing that we must not make the legislation so onerous as to prevent perfectly legitimate activities. If the hon. Gentleman was listening carefully to me, he will know that the permission of the occupier or the owner of the land is necessary in cases of so-called interference with setts. The example that the hon. Gentleman offers, of an ordinary walker whose dog goes down a sett, could not work as a defence for badger diggers in a court.

For a start, if the digger had no legitimate right to be on the land, he would be trespassing, because he would be doing damage and would therefore be liable to the laws of trespass. Once the Bill, if amended as I would like it to be, is in force—we should remember that badger diggers are probably mainly townspeople who have no respect for country life—the defences and how the law stands will eventually become generally known.

The purpose of amendments Nos. 3 and 18 is to ensure that interference with setts which is not harmful to badgers does not become a criminal offence. The prosecution would have to prove that the interference was likely to cause bodily harm to a badger. The protection that the Bill gives badger setts would be unlimited, in the sense that any reckless or intentional interference, however slight, would be an offence—for instance, any disturbance to a badger when occupying a sett, however trivial, would be an offence.

The National Federation of Badger Groups has suggested that this provision could be used to prevent people from playing war games in a wood in a way that disturbed badgers, or that it could prevent the leaving of sacks in the proximity of setts. The Bill does not specify that any disturbance must be serious or harmful to badgers. While we may disapprove of playing war games or the leaving of sacks near setts, those are hardly matters that should become serious criminal offences. It is extremely worrying to learn that there are people who would be prepared to use the wide provisions of the Bill to prosecute others engaged in such harmless activities.

No harmful interference with setts occurs in farming operations or during hunting when setts are temporarily stopped or blocked or when hounds temporarily mark—which means indicating the present of a fox at an entrance. The amendments would permit such activities provided that they were not likely to harm badgers.

Although the amendments would allow the destruction of setts if no harm was likely to be caused to badgers as a result, it must be remembered that only setts showing signs of likely occupation and use are protected in any case. A person who destroyed an occupied sett would find it difficult to claim that there was no likelihood of harm to badgers.

The amendments would allow farming activities that disturbed badgers or slightly damaged setts, provided there was no likelihood of harm to badgers. The National Federation of Badger Groups has drawn attention to the impact of the Bill on non-harmful farming operations. It says of farmers who annually plough over the entrances of sett tunnels near the edges of fields neither intending nor causing harm to the badgers, which probably reopen the holes:

"this is known to several of our member groups who have contacted us to ask to ensure that such farmers, who are badger-friendly, are not placed at risk by the new provision."

As it stands, the Bill would lead to badger-friendly farmers committing criminal offences—damaging setts and disturbing badgers. The defence provided in clause 2(2) would be of no help because, unless a farmer was unaware of the presence of the setts, he could have avoided ploughing over them. It is precisely that sort of innocent activity that should be protected. I believe that the promoter of the Bill accepts that. The amendment ensures that harmful farming operations such as the wholesale flattening of occupied setts would not be permitted. I end with the hope that other hon. Members will take part in the debate and support some of my propositions.

Sir Charles Morrison (Devizes): I entirely concur with what my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) has just said, but I want to refer to amendment No. 16, to clause 4. It concerns the use of dogs, especially terriers, but in a different context from that dealt with by the amendments to clause 1.

Clause 4 is about the granting of licences and the type of licence that may be made available for the removal of badgers in certain circumstances. For example, they can be removed for agricultural operations, for town and country planning or for the maintenance or improvement of a water course. However, lines 47 and 48 on page 2 refer specifically to the fact that dogs may not be used, even under a licensing system, for entry into a badger sett. That appears to be a natural corollary to clause 1, but in clause 4 the lack of the ability to grant a licence allowing a dog to enter a badger sett is a disadvantage to farmers and possibly to badgers, hence my amendment No. 16.

The National Farmers Union is anxious that fox destruction societies should be able to continue to enter dogs into badger setts where authorised to do so by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. I suspect that the issue of such licences would be fairly rare, but the control of foxes by organised clearances involving dogs in certain parts of the country, and especially in Wales, is very necessary.

I understand that it is quite common in Wales for small groups of perhaps three or four farmers between them to own three or four foxhounds which are used in the open countryside to raise foxes and chase them, so that they go to ground in a foxhole or badger sett. No doubt Welsh Members with more experience of that matter will speak about it. Such foxhounds are not used in any sporting sense but purely to control foxes.

Having chased the fox into the earth, or perhaps into a badger sett, it is necessary for farmers to continue to have the ability to control it. Without the authority to use dogs, specifically terriers, under licence, the objectives of such minifox hunts cannot be achieved. That is why I tabled amendment No. 16.

Secondly, before I received the representation from the NFU, it occurred to me that when a licence is granted for the removal or destruction of a badger sett, it is essential to ensure that no badger or any other animal remains in the sett. In the case of a large sett, I am not sure how one would determine that except by putting in terriers to push out the badger or other animal that may be there. As hon. Members know, some badger setts have existed for centuries and are gigantic. I hope that the House will accept amendment No. 16, or that it will be possible to vote on it separately if need be.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): I support amendment No. 16 to which the hon. Member for Devizes (Sir C. Morrison) has just spoken. In my constituency, it is clear that farmers hate badger baiters. There is no curse on the farm worse than the trespasser and no greater curse than the trespasser who is a badger baiter. I have been told about a recent incident in Montgomeryshire, in which a farmer who caught some badger baiters was petrified with fear: he would not go to the police, because the badger baiters threatened harm to himself and his family, and threatened him with firearms. Those badger baiters were not from Montgomeryshire; such people are never country people. I regret to say that they had clear Merseyside accents and had started to dig for badgers in order to pursue their vile sport when they had transported the badgers to wherever they were taking them.

Those of us who care for badgers, such as the farmers of Montgomeryshire, think that it is extremely important for a proper balance to be preserved between badgers, foxes, dogs which roam the countryside, and people. It is crucial to remember the people.

Farmers are keen to preserve and look after badger setts. I know many farmers who are proud to take me to badger setts on their farms. They must also be allowed to carry out their legitimate activities in the countryside, and the most legitimate of those activities is sheep farming. Whatever industries have been brought to my constituency, it still depends on the major industry of Wales, which is sheep farming. If there were no sheep in the hills, there would be no people there either. Farming is already in enough financial trouble for one reason or another, without creating more problems.

It is somewhat difficult to obtain accurate figures about what is happening to foxes in rural Wales. However, I suggest that the threat posed to lambs by foxes is as great as that posed by uncontrolled dogs. I have obtained figures from the huntsman of the David Davies hunt in Llandinam in mid Wales. As some hon. Members know, that hunt is extremely well respected, and Mr. David Jones, the huntsman, is given the regard that such experienced huntsmen receive in the countryside.

Mr. Ron Davies (Caerphilly): Will the hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Carlile: I shall give way when I have concluded this point.

In the lambing season, which recently ended, Mr. Jones was called out many times. For example, he was called three times to the farm of Mr. Newey at Tynymaen, Llandinam, where 22 lambs were lost to foxes. He was called four times to the farm of Mr. Williams at Dolhafren, Caersws, where 27 lambs were lost to foxes.

He was called out twice to the farm of Mr. Higgs at Cefnllydan, Tregynon. Mr. Higgs is the chairman of the Llanidloes branch of the National Farmers Union and a moderate and highly intelligent farmer. Twenty-five lambs were lost to foxes there. He was called out four times to Mr. Trow at Llandinam hall, Llandinam, where 27 lambs were lost to foxes. Mr. Jones was called out often and took 46 foxes during the season, of which 28 were removed from badger setts. This is all clear evidence of the problem.

Mr. Jones and others like him control the problem of foxes with minimal damage to the badgers. Mr. Jones does not want to hurt badgers. Control of foxes in the way that it has been done in the countryside of Montgomeryshire for a long time is done humanely—the foxes are shot when they are caught—and with rigour and accuracy.

Mr. Colvin: What the hon. and learned Member has been saying is important, because it proves that fox hunting is a legitimate business carried out to control foxes. He has described a working hunt, as most are. They are not a collection of toffs in top hats out to enjoy themselves spoiling the countryside.

Mr. Carlile: I cannot contradict what the hon. Gentleman says, although I have never been fox hunting. I speak as someone who has no desire to go fox hunting, but I know that most of the hunting of foxes in my constituency is not done by toffs in top hats. Not many people there could afford the top hat, let alone the rest of the uniform or the horse. It is done to control foxes. It is generally done by—I hope that they will forgive me for saying so—ordinary farmers with a small number of terriers, over a restricted area.

We do the badger no service by preventing such hunts from continuing. I have to say, with much regret but realism, that there is a real danger of such fox hunting being driven underground and farmers feeling driven to disobey the law because the law does not meet their legitimate needs and aspirations. I shall now give way to the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies)—I apologise for taking so long to do so.

Mr. Ron Davies: I understand the difficulty for the hon. and learned Gentleman, and I am grateful to him for giving way. I should like to understand the totality of his argument, so perhaps he could clarify an apparent inconsistency in his position. He spoke glowingly of the David Davies hunt at Llandinam. However, I understand that it is official Liberal party policy to ban fox hunting. Does the hon. and learned Gentleman's endorsement of the Llandinam hunt extend to Liberal party policy generally?

Mr. Carlile: If the hon. Gentleman had read what he ought to have read, he would know that it has always been the policy of the parliamentary Liberal party, the parliamentary alliance and the parliamentary Liberal Democrats that this is an issue of conscience. This is a private Members' day, on which hon. Members express their own views. I am expressing my view, conscientiously. The hon. Member is right to say that my party has passed a motion calling for the banning of fox hunting, but he should bear in mind the fact that my party has always recognised, and endorsed, the parliamentary party's view that this is a matter of conscience. Perhaps we can get back to the merits of the issue.

Mr. Ron Davies: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Carlile: No, I will not give way again. I do not want to turn the debate into a political one. It is disgraceful to try to do so. I am trying to help to strike a balance between the needs of the farmers in my constituency, whose interests I have described, and the important needs to protect the badger. If amendment No. 16 is not carried, the Bill will be detrimental to the interests of the badger. It would be nonsense to suggest that any farmer would deliberately flout the law, but when his livelihood is under threat and his lambs are being killed by foxes, and the law has removed from him the instrument of protection, he will find it difficult to understand what else he can do.

I strongly applaud the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) for promoting the Bill. It is desirable that we should do whatever we can to protect badgers further. However, we must do so in a way that balances the interests of the badgers, the danger from the foxes and the needs of the people who live in rural areas such as I represent. For that reason, I support amendment No. 16.

10.15 am

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): The purpose of the Bill is to correct an omission from the Badgers Act 1973 so as to give protection to the home of a badger as well as to the badger itself. The clear duty of those of us here this morning who support the Bill—I am certainly one of them—is to resist any amendment that would weaken the shape of the Bill so much that it would become ineffective, and to support responsible amendments that improve the Bill and reflect, and protect, the genuine interests of farmers where they are not in conflict with the aims of the Bill.

The amendments in this group fall into two categories. The first are those moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) and the second is that tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Sir C. Morrison). The second, spoken to so articulately by my hon. Friend, reflects the clear view of the NFU that, without such amendment, the work of the farming community would be seriously hampered and the control of foxes as a pest would be made difficult, if not impossible. For that reason alone, I hope that the House will accept amendment No. 16. I believe that it would not have a detrimental effect on the prime purpose of the Bill.

However, I cannot accept the first group of amendments, moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside. These, and other amendments that we shall discuss later, would have a detrimental effect on the shape of the Bill to the point where it would become virtually worthless. That would be a great opportunity lost for the House to set right an omission from an earlier Act.

I hope that, when he responds to the debate, my hon. Friend will clarify the sentiment behind one of his amendments. The League Against Cruel Sports, in a brief sent to Members of Parliament, says—wholly incorrectly—that one of the amendments would create "a criminal offence ONLY if it could be shown that the interference was 'likely to cause bodily harm' to a badger."

That is not what the amendment says, and we must be clear about that and deal with fact rather than emotion. The amendment says that an offence would be created if an incident were conducted

"in a manner which causes harm, or would be likely to cause harm, to a badger."

If I disagree with the inaccuracy in the brief from the League Against Cruel Sports, I still concur with the sentiment that it is expressing. The badger is a nocturnal animal and therefore leaves its sett to hunt at night. If the amendments were passed, the unscrupulous would be able to block a badger's sett while it was out hunting, and it would therefore be unable to return to its lawful home. Does my hon. Friend regard the deprival of the lawful home of the badger as being harmful? It seems that the amendments present us with a series of quibbles and that they are designed to create a loophole in the Bill. I should find it impossible to support any amendment that would weaken the Bill and I hope, therefore, that the House will reject the amendments that would have that effect.

Mr. Eddie O'Hara (Knowsley, South): I shall speak to amendment No. 16 and take up the remarks of the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile). I accept the seriousness of the anecdotal evidence of the killing of lambs by foxes.

Mr. David Tredinnick (Bosworth): The evidence is not anecdotal.

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glanford and Scunthorpe): It is. Where is the hard evidence?

Mr. O'Hara: The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery presented a series of anecdotes—I accept the seriousness of his anecdotal evidence—concerning the killing of lambs by foxes. The source of that evidence could not be regarded as impartial.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Is the hon. Gentleman saying that my figures are inaccurate? If he is, I challenge him to make that statement outside the House. It is my view that the figures are accurate. Irrespective of whether the hon. Gentleman agrees with the conclusions which I drew from them, it is disgraceful to suggest that there is some dishonesty behind the figures. They are the figures of the person who went and took the foxes. That man spoke to the farmers and took the dead lambs. What more accurate evidence does the hon. Gentleman expect than that?

Mr. O'Hara: I was not casting any doubt on the accuracy of the statistics, nor was I casting any aspersion on the honesty of the providers of the statistics. I was simply saying—it is a matter of fact—that the statistics were anecdotal. I wish to set against that anecdotal evidence—I accept that the statistics that the hon. and learned Gentleman quoted are serious for the individual farmers who provided them—some evidence that is more scientific.

There have been studies of the activities of foxes, including the killing of lambs, in areas such as those to which the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery referred. I start with a publication that was produced by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. It was produced, I accept, in 1979 but I have more up-to-date evidence. The MAFF survey of farmers' estimates of lamb losses in three predominantly sheep-rearing counties in mid-Wales yielded the figure of 0·5 per cent. loss to foxes. More recently, in 1985, the MAFF reference book 255(83)—"Research and Development Report on Mammal and Bird Pests'—stated:

[Mr. O'Hara]

"In a study carried out in an upland hill area of Powys stocked with 3,500 lambing ewes, Lamb losses were found to be unaffected by foxes present in the area."

More recent MAFF studies in Northern Ireland and Scotland have produced the similar conclusion that, although lamb mortality may reach more than 20 per cent. in upland areas, most of that is due to stillbirths, malnutrition and hypothermia. All studies show that fox predation accounts for only between 0·5 and 2 per cent. of the mortality.

Mr. Hardy: The information that my hon. Friend is giving to the House is sufficiently serious and sufficiently soundly based and in sufficient conflict with the scale of the evidence quoted by the hon and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) that it may be that right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House would agree that my hon. Friend is doing the House a service, and that following his comments it would probably be useful if hon. Members who are now in the Chamber and who are members of the Select Committee on Agriculture were to embark on a study to establish the facts, given the enormous discrepancy between the evidence produced by the hon. and learned Gentleman and that which has been presented by my hon. Friend. I have formed the view that the hon. and learned Gentleman may have eaten far more sheep than the foxes have done in his constituency.

Mr. O'Hara: My hon. Friend has made a most useful suggestion.

I have one more piece of scientific evidence to present. The report is very recent—October 1990—and it emanated from Aberdeen university. It suggests that the persecution and killing of foxes has no impact on either fox numbers or lamb numbers. Given the discrepancy between the evidence produced by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery and that which I have put before the House, I commend the useful suggestion of my hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy).

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): Is the hon. Gentleman referring to the work that has been done on the Eriboll estate in Sutherland in taking up the findings of the survey that was undertaken by Aberdeen university?

Mr. O'Hara: I believe so.

Mr. Soames: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman is familiar with that research in any depth. Is he aware that the Eriboll estate is a unique part of the United Kingdom in terms of its landscape and the way in which the wildlife would be distributed on it? The author of the research has made it plain that it is impossible to extrapolate from the survey that was undertaken at the Eriboll estate any further conclusions for anywhere else within the United Kingdom. It is one of the great wild areas left in the United Kingdom. The key finding of the survey—this comes as no great pleasure to any of us—is that foxes do take and kill viable lambs.

Mr. O'Hara: Whatever the merits of the evidence, it is one example of the scientific studies to which I have referred. It reinforces the suggestion of my hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth that there is room for a close investigation of the matter to be carried out by a Committee of this place.

If there are pockets of serious predation by foxes upon lambs as described by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery, I suggest that the provisions in clause 2 provide adequate means for coping with such instances as they arise. If the Welsh fox hunters are as concerned as the hon. and learned Gentleman suggests to play their part in coping with the problem, the provisions for the temporary stopping of setts will provide an adequate remedy.

Mr. Jerry Wiggin (Weston-super-Mare): Unfortunately, I was unable to remain in the Chamber for the whole of the debate on Second Reading, but I listened to the opening speeches. I take this opportunity to say that, along with all other hon. Members, I abhor the evil practices of badger digging and badger baiting.

In reading the report of the Second Reading debate, my attention focused on comments made by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Home Office. She reminded the House that the Protection of Animals Act 1911 forbids the fighting or baiting of any animal, and said that the maximum penalty for that offence has recently been increased to £5,000. She then referred to the Badgers Act 1973, which similarly provides for a maximum fine of £5,000. Thirdly, she referred to the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, which provides for a level 5 fine. My right hon. Friend said that the badger is an unendangered species and therefore it already enjoys unique protection in the countryside.

I understand that the purpose of the Bill is to make it easier to prosecute those evil people who engage in badger baiting. That is a most eminent purpose, and one which I strongly support. However, the number of instances where it appears likely that the Bill, when enacted, will be used for successful prosecution is very small indeed. The reality of the countryside is such that the majority of farmers know what is happening on their land. I support the view of the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) that farmers, who understand the countryside and love the animals with which they work and the wildlife that surrounds them, will do everything in their power to prohibit badger digging on their land.

10.30 am

My interest in the Bill is confined to agriculture. The farmers have no option but to use their land as their factories; it is where they earn their living. This is not a unique Bill, because other legislation already affects the right of a man to do what he will with his land. However, it would impose a new and serious burden on farmers in the use of their land. I tabled an amendment, which unfortunately did not attract Mr. Speaker's attention, to make it possible for farmers who, in their agricultural operations, destroyed a badger sett not to be prosecuted under the Bill. I realise that clause 2 provides that a person shall not be guilty if it happens in the process of lawful acts, but I wanted to draw attention to the legitimate rights of farmers and foresters as they go about their duties.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) said on Second Reading:

"Accidents happen in the countryside, particularly involving farmers and forestry staff. It is easy to drive a truck or heavy vehicle carrying trees over a sett and damage it. I should not wish such an accident to result in people being sent to court."—[Official Report, 15 February 1991; Vol. 185, c. 1159.]

I hope that the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) will mention that aspect. I do not doubt that the majority of farmers will not be too concerned, as they know the location of the badger setts. Nevertheless, there will be accidents—one was reported only the other day—and there must be some defence when such accidents occur.

I am interested in amendment No. 16, because the National Farmers Union has made a particular plea about it. I say to the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery, as I have said to him previously, that I have fought two general elections in his constituency, where unquestionably the sheep substantially outnumber the voters. The livelihood of many of the hon. and learned Gentleman's constituents depends on a successful lambing season. Whatever the arguments about the figures, the fact is that farmers go to considerable trouble to maintain a fox population that does not endanger newly-born lambs.

The activities of the David Davies hunt and the addresses recalled by the hon. and learned Gentleman revived memories of happy canvassing in the early 1960s. He was right to say that the David Davies hunt is a working hunt. I met many of those involved in it, although I never had any other direct contact with them.

The NFU has written a sensible letter. I hope that the House will forgive me if I quote from it at some length, because it makes my point for me. The parliamentary adviser to the NFU, Mr. Holbeche, wrote:

"However, as awareness of the issues raised by the Bill has grown in the countryside, it has become clear that farmers in sheep farming areas in particular are worried that as it stands the Bill could jeopardise legitimate fox control. For example, in parts of Wales and south-west England, sheep farmers report significant losses during the lambing season from predatory foxes. Accurate figures are hard to come by though it would appear that at the present time the threat from foxes is exceeded by that posed by uncontrolled dogs. Although what surveys have been done to date suggest that foxes account for a relatively small percentage of lamb losses, there is much concern that the threat is increasing on the edge of urban areas, and in parts of Wales where the Forestry Commission has cut back its pest control operations for budgetary reasons. Preventive action to control foxes would be seriously hampered by the Bill's total prohibition on the digging of foxes where they run to earth in a badger sett, including abandoned entrances to active setts which would be protected by the Bill. . . . For these reasons we would support an amendment to the Bill to leave out lines 47 and 48 on page 2. This change to clause 4 would remove the proposed prohibition on the granting of licences permitting dogs to be entered into badger setts. The principle of licensing to allow for anything done in relation to protected wildlife that would otherwise be unlawful is well established, notably in section 16 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981."

The letter then goes on to promote the general case.

I have a large badger sett next to the first field on the farm where I have lived for many years. There is no physical way of getting a fox out of a badger sett other than by using a terrier or other dogs. We must accept that most hill farmers think that this is a serious matter and that they must take steps to keep down the fox population, and the only way to do that is to use dogs to get the foxes out of the badger setts.

I share the view of the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery that amendment No. 16 would be more likely to protect badgers than not. I am concerned about the reasons why the clause is even in the Bill, but I am sure that the hon. Member for Newport, East will say something about that. I congratulate both him and the hon. Members who took a critical view of the Bill on Second Reading on the way in which they have sought to reach a sensible compromise. At one time, the issues appeared virtually irreconcilable. I am glad that common sense has prevailed, as I hope it will on this amendment.

Mr. Ron Davies: I am in some difficulty, because I want to speak against amendments Nos. 3 and 4. I listened carefully to the hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin), but I am not sure whether he intends to press the amendments. The hon. Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor), whose name also appears on the amendments, has listened carefully to the debate. If either hon. Member could say whether he was prepared to withdraw the amendments, that would help our deliberations.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor (Upminster): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I wish to ask your advice. I think that the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) is in fact referring to amendments Nos. 4 and 5.

Mr. Davies: No, I am referring to Nos. 3 and 4.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: There are three distinct cases to be put within this group of amendments. I had intended at a later stage to ask your advice, Mr. Deputy Speaker, on how to split the group for voting purposes. I intend to request a vote on amendments Nos. 4 and 5. I have not yet made a decision on amendment No. 3.

Mr. Gale: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. If you are to consider splitting the group of amendments for voting purposes, I hope that you will also consider separating amendments Nos. 3 and 18. Amendment No. 18 refers to bodily harm, and it makes a great deal of difference to amendment No. 3.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Obviously, much will depend on what happens to amendment No. 1 when it is put to the House. In the appropriate circumstances, I would sympathetically consider the possibility of a separate Division on amendment No. 5. If amendment No. 1 fell, it would be difficult to vote on amendment No. 4. It might be sensible if I reflect on the points that have been raised before I put the Question. That might be the most helpful course.

Mr. Davies: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Upminster for giving us some idea about his intentions. I want to speak briefly against amendment No. 4. We have had a wide debate about the problems of Welsh upland sheep farmers. I note with interest the comments by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) about Liberal Democrat policy. I am delighted to know that in that regard, it fully complies with Labour party policy. I was also struck by the intense concern that the fox-hunting lobby now shows for the interests of Welsh sheep farmers. I have no doubt that tabling the amendments is a clear attempt by the fox-hunting lobby in the House to weaken the Bill so that foxhunters can continue to enjoy their sport, as they see it, without further interference. That is the purpose of the amendments, and that is why I want to speak against amendment No. 4. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) will also oppose that amendment.

We have heard the argument about the damage done to sheep farming interests and especially to lambs as a result of predation by foxes. From my own experience, I have no doubt that a problem is caused in upland farms by the predation of foxes on sheep. However, we must get the matter in perspective. The Ministry of Agriculture,

[Mr. Davies]

Fisheries and Food and the National Farmers Union have made it clear—and all the evidence is available—that, as a national problem, such predation is of minimal significance. However, I agree with the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery that predation could be a problem locally. I know that some farmers suffer considerable losses and are understandably anxious to find out about all the methods that can be used to control foxes, in the hope that it will minimise losses of lambs.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor): I hope that the hon. Gentleman will note that, on my farm in mid-Wales in the mid-1980s, I lost 34 lambs one spring, certainly because of foxes. I had a badger sett on my farm, about which I told no one. The hon. Gentleman should not underestimate the problem. Foxes kill many lambs in spring and that can cause substantial financial disbenefit to the farmers concerned. We must be careful on this issue.

Mr. Davies: I do not know when the hon. Gentleman came in. He has made precisely the point that I was making. I do not underestimate the problem, and I acknowledge that it can be a severe problem locally. I have spent more cold March and April nights than I care to recall on the mountains in my constituency at lambing time shooting foxes. I understand the problem, and I understand its severe impact on some farmers.

The question that we must ask is why some Conservative Members seek grievously to weaken a Bill to protect badger setts on the basis of a small and localised problem. It is an inappropriate response to the problems of fox predation on lambs in upland Wales to seek to weaken a Bill that should extend protection to badger setts throughout the United Kingdom.

Foxes can be controlled if they are a problem, as the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery said, possibly by the use of hounds driving to guns. I am not satisfied that, if there are localised problems and if foxes occasionally take refuge in badger setts, it is an appropriate response for the House to weaken a measure that seeks to protect badger setts and to allow interference with badger setts.

After listening to the debate, I have come to the conclusion that there is a deliberate attempt by fox-hunting interests to weaken the Bill. Some hon. Members will use any argument. They call in aid the economic interests of sheep farmers, because they will not argue truthfully that they enjoy what they regard as a sport and that they want to continue to enjoy it without interference. They are willing to weaken legislation to protect badger setts to allow them to continue enjoying their sport. It is cynical for them to attempt to torpedo such a Bill. That approach illustrates the arrogant and selfish attitude that is represented by the Tory fox-hunting interests in the House this morning.

10.45 am

Mr. James Paice (Cambridgeshire, South-East): The last remarks of the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) were——

Mr. Wiggin: They were disgraceful.

Mr. Paice: As my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Wiggin) has said, they were disgraceful. The end of the speech was typical of the bombastic way in which the hon. Member for Caerphilly often assaults Conservative Members. He makes many aspersions against our characters, our habits and our motives, which are wholly without justification.

I have not hunted foxes for 25 years. At that time, I was a member of a pony club, but I hunted only once or twice. I am not a regular foxhunter, I do not go to hunts and I give no particular support to fox hunting, although I support the right of the individual to have the freedom to do what he wants. It is despicable to suggest that those of us who are genuinely concerned about aspects of the Bill have some ulterior motive connected with fox hunting. That is nonsense.

The hon. Member for Caerphilly and his hon. Friend the Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) are both Opposition spokesmen on agricultural matters. I suspect that many farmers will look carefully at what they have said about the problem of attacks on lambs.

Mr. Morley: As an Opposition Front-Bench spokesman, I have listened carefully to what the National Farmers Union and my local farmers have said about the problem of predation. We have made it clear that there can be localised problems and that they can often be dealt with efficiently and effectively by contractors. [HON. MEMBERS: "Contractors?"] Yes, by contractors. Can the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Paice) give me one example of an independent report that demonstrates that there is a major problem of predation by foxes? Many reports do not show that. Many farmers tell me that often more disturbance is caused by hounds chasing foxes across fields than by the foxes themselves.

Mr. Paice: I am fascinated by the hon. Gentleman's use of the word "contractors". There are contractors in a range of agricultural activities. I have never heard of contractors who would get foxes out of their hiding places.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Paice: Of course. We are here to be enlightened.

Mr. Home Robertson: The hon. Gentleman has given way to a farmer who farms in an area in which we have had problems with foxes. In my part of the world, there is an excellent rabbit clearance society that employs a trapper who is by far the most efficient person to control foxes and who uses a gun. He knows where the foxes will be at any time of day, and he can kill them quickly and humanely without needing to dig them out. My hon. Friend the Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) has made a serious point.

Mr. Paice: The obvious retort is that one way of controlling rabbits is to allow foxes to do it. The other problem is that trapping is one of the cruellest ways in which to control foxes. It often means a drawn-out——

Mr. Morley: They shoot the foxes.

Mr. Paice: The foxes have to be trapped before they are shot unless they are drawn to a bait. I know what I am talking about.

The most important aspect is the question of predation, to which Labour Members have referred. One can, of course, say that only 0·5 or 1 per cent. of lambs are lost through predation and that one can, therefore, disregard the problem. It is true that there are greater losses from other causes, such as nutritional problems and stillbirths. There are other reasons why lambs do not survive. All farmers are anxious to reduce lamb mortality. It is the key criterion for profitability in sheep farming. Through a range of measures, such as training courses, farmers are able to set about reducing lamb mortality. They do it by learning about and providing better nutrition and in many other ways. Labour Members have said that that is all very well, but that there is one form of predation that they should not be able to do anything about. That is unjust and unfair on those producers.

Just as some Labour Members have cast aspersions on the motives of some Conservative Members, there are others outside the House who see the Bill as a means of getting at foxhunters. That is not what the Bill should be about. I share the view of many hon. Members that badger baiting is an abhorrent sport which must be stamped out. I shall support the Bill to the end in its efforts to do that, but we should not confuse a debate about the merits and demerits of fox hunting with the Bill. If hon. Members wish to debate that, I know that many hon. Members from both sides of the House would like to participate, but the Bill should not be used as a vehicle to take a side swipe at fox hunting.

Many people hold the belief—I fear that this came through in the speech of the hon. Member for Knowsley, South (Mr. O'Hara)—that nature is benign, and consists only of lambs gambolling and birds singing. The reality is different. Those of us who have lived and grown up in the countryside know that nature is extremely cruel and vicious—often more cruel and vicious than man, who has lowered himself to some pretty despicable acts.

We have to control foxes. They take lambs. Although doubts have been cast about some of the evidence and it has been suggested that some of it is anecdotal, I have witnessed that happening and I am sure that other hon. Members have done so. It is all very well to say that foxes take only sick or weak lambs. That is true if one defines a weak lamb as one that is only a few minutes old. Many lambs are taken almost immediately after they are born. If the ewe is tired after a difficult lambing and is unable to get back to her feet, that is an ideal opportunity for a fox to rush in and take a lamb. To dismiss the problem by saying that it involves only sick and weakly lambs fails to recognise reality.

None of the amendments, if accepted, would diminish the Bill's ability to deal with what it sets out to do, which is to end the despicable way in which a tiny minority seek to extract badgers from their setts to carry out their vile sport of badger baiting. It is an important Bill which should not be jeopardised or lost because some people wish to use it for ulterior motives, whatever they may be. So that we can do something about badger baiting, I hope that the House will recognise the merits of the amendments and accept them so that the Bill can become law.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: This has been an extremely good debate on the amendments that I and my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) have tabled. It has been spoiled only by the obvious prejudice shown by the hon. Members for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) and for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley). Until then I thought that the debate had been balanced and fair, but I am afraid that it was not once the hon. Member for Caerphilly gave his views.

Among other things, it has been alleged that foxes do not do any significant damage to lambs. I am a farmer and I must advise the House that two lambs have been taken from my farm by foxes this spring.

Mr. Ron Davies: I hope that the hon. Gentleman listened carefully to my speech. I did not suggest for one moment that there was not a problem. I said that there was a limited problem nationally, but I acknowledged that the problem can be severe locally.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has clarified his remarks, but I do not acknowledge that a problem that is limited can be severe locally, and this problem is severe locally. The hon. Member for Knowsley, South (Mr. O'Hara) produced statistics showing that only 0·5 per cent. of lambs were taken. That is no consolation to farmers in areas with a large sheep population of, say, several thousand sheep and where five sheep out of every thousand might be taken.

Mr. O'Hara: I reinforce what my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) has said. I do not underestimate the scale of the problem either locally or nationally. I merely suggested that there should be a more scientific assessment of the problem nationally and that appropriate and not unnecessary measures should be available to deal with severe local problems.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I am glad that the problems faced by sheep farmers, both locally and nationally, in the depredation of their sheep flocks by foxes are recognised by Labour Members. That is an advance on the previous position as I understood it.

Mr. Colvin: I am sure that my hon. Friend will acknowledge that the figures produced on damage to sheep by fox hunting—[HON. MEMBERS: "Yes."]—by foxes illustrate that fox hunting with terriers is effective. If the Bill ended that perfectly legitimate activity, sheep losses would be very much higher.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: My hon. Friend is right. Despite his slip of the tongue, I do not think that even the Labour Members with the most extreme views would suggest that fox hunting damages sheep.

In opening the debate, my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside covered most of the issues comprehensively and well and I shall not repeat his arguments. The amendments can be divided into four groups—amendments Nos. 1, 2 and 3; Nos. 4 and 5; No. 16; and No. 18—each of which has a different merit and argument. I shall return to that when it comes to a vote.

I shall not cover amendments Nos. 1, 2 and 3 because my hon. Friends have done that extremely well. I shall examine more closely amendments Nos. 4 and 5 in the light of the views expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale), who unfortunately is not in his place, because his views showed a deep prejudice about why the amendments had been tabled and an unfortunate misunderstanding of their consequences. I hope that all hon. Members who have open minds will accept that the amendments are not designed to weaken the protection of badgers. I and all my hon. Friends who have been involved with this Bill this year and with a similar Bill last year have sought to reach, and to a large extent succeeded in reaching, a compromise that will allow a continuation of countryside activities, especially hunting, with the substantial protection of the badger that is offered by the Bill in addition to the great protection afforded by the Badgers Act 1973.

Clause 1 adds the following five offences to that Act:

"(3) If any person shall interfere with a badger sett by doing any of the following things, that is to say,

(a) damaging a badger sett or any part thereof;

(b) destroying a badger sett;

(c) obstructing access to or any entrance of a badger sett;

(d) causing a dog to enter a badger sett; or

(e) disturbing a badger when it is occupying a badger sett intending to do any of those things or being reckless as to whether his actions will have any of those consequences, he shall be guilty of an offence.".

Provided that proper defences are given against the charge of having perpetrated such actions, I agree that they should be criminal offences. The question is whether adequate defences are afforded by the Act. I contend that adequate defences for innocent acts are not provided. Therefore, I have tabled amendments to deal with my concerns and those of many others, especially the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile), whose speech I greatly welcomed. He underlined the danger to the Welsh hill farmer that the Bill would pose if sensible amendments were not agreed.

11 am

Amendment No. 4 would insert the following subsection:

"An accused shall not be permitted to rebut a presumption of guilt established under sections 1(1A) or 2(2) by evidence that he was engaged in any other activity save where he can show that he was authorised to be engaged in that activity by the occupier of the land on which the alleged offence occurred."

That provides a substantial and significant safeguard. No one could argue legitimately—or even illegitimately—that that provision would weaken the existing legislation. It provides yet another layer of proof that anyone out with terriers or other dogs would have to establish to avoid prosecution. I suspect that the only reason why Opposition Members are unable to agree with that contention was summarised neatly by the hon. Member for Caerphilly when he expressed his attitude to those who hunt. He is clearly prejudiced against landowners, farmers and those who live in the countryside and carry on their sports on it. He does not want those people to be involved in the way in which these matters are progressed. He is roaring with laughter and rolling from side to side, but that is the inevitable conclusion of anyone who reads his speeches.

Mr. Gale: I am sure that my hon. Friend accepts that I am not anti-landowner. I represent many farmers. I do not share some of the sentiments of Opposition Members, but there is genuine opposition to some of the amendments simply because they would weaken the Bill.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I am glad that my hon. Friend has come back into the Chamber. I hoped that he would. I hope that, when he hears my arguments, he will accept that the amendments would not weaken the Bill and make it harder to catch and prosecute badger baiters, against whom we all feel strongly. The amendments are necessary to safeguard the legitimate and proper interests of others who are not badger baiting, but who could be wrongfully prosecuted under the legislation while carrying out more harmless pursuits unless proper safeguards are put in the Bill.

My hon. Friend did not deal with amendment No. 4, which would provide an additional safeguard. Badger baiters would be caught, even if they advanced any of the existing defences, unless they could establish that the owner or occupier of the land had given them permission to use that land. Unless my hon. Friend thinks that the owners or occupiers of land are accessories to badger baiting—which is virtually never the case—he should not feel that the amendment does anything other than include another safeguard against the badger baiting that we all wish to prevent.

The second part of amendment No. 4 provides:

"A person shall not be guilty of an offence under section 2(3)(e) (disturbing a badger) by reason of entering a terrier into a badger sett provided that his action would otherwise have been lawful."

That is intended specifically to help the Welsh farmer and those who hunt foxes with terriers, who face difficulties when foxes enter an earth or a sett where badgers have been. Those who live in the country know that it is not always easy to know whether a fox or a badger is present. I fear that people in perfectly legitimate pursuit of a fox will be caught by the Bill unless the amendment is included.

Mr. Morley: I have followed the hon. Gentleman's arguments carefully. He wants the Bill to be changed to allow terriers to be put down badger setts to get foxes out of them in order to destroy the foxes. Why is it that in Northern Ireland no such protection of badger setts exists, nor are they allowed to be stopped, yet fox hunters pursue their sport adequately? In Northern Ireland, sheep flocks have increased substantially without any detrimental effect on the sheep farmers. Therefore, why do we need the amendment?

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I do not believe that fox control is needed in Northern Ireland to the same extent as it is in the areas to which I am referring. The primary purpose of most of the hunts in Northern Ireland is sport. The Bill covers the whole of the United Kingdom, and it would make it almost impossible to hunt in the Welsh hills unless the amendments were accepted.

Amendment No. 5 does not amend the Bill substantially. It deals with clause 2, which provides the defence against the offences in clause 1. Clause 2 states:

(1) In section 8(1A) of the Badgers Act 1973—

(a) after the words 'under section 1(1)' there shall be inserted 'or 2(3)'; and

(b) after paragraph (b) there shall be inserted—

(c) the interfering with any badger sett;'

(2) At the end of section 8 of the Badgers Act 1973 there shall be added—

'(4) A person shall not be guilty of an offence under section (3) (a), (c) or (e) of this Act if he shows that his action was the incidental result of a lawful operation and could not have been reasonably avoided.'."

The consequence of that defence is that those who are pursuing the activities defined in clause 1 will not be defended against actions in paragraphs (b) and (d) in that clause. The defences provided in the Bill cover those who damage and obstruct access to a badger sett and those who disturb a badger, but they do not cover those who destroy a badger sett and those who cause a dog to enter a badger sett. There is no reason to make that distinction. Although it would be unfortunate if someone, in the course of a lawful action, destroyed a badger sett and his action could not reasonably have been avoided, I cannot see why he should be brought within the scope of the Bill for that reason when, if he damaged the badger sett, he would not be. I hope that the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) will deal with that when he replies.

Where should the line be drawn? Should a distinction be made between severely damaging and destroying a badger sett by driving a tractor over it by mistake? It is a dangerous line to try to draw. In either case it is not suggested that the badger is harmed by the activity. The amendment covers the destruction of the badger sett.

I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North that no one wishes to weaken the Bill. The amendment will not affect a badger baiter, who is most unlikely to want to destroy the badger sett, or to need to do so during his baiting. Catching the badger to bait is more likely to damage the sett, yet it is for damaging it that he has a possible defence under the Bill and may be able to wriggle out of it. If he destroys it, he has no such defence. That distinction is not needed to strengthen the protection of the badger.

The same applies to the action of causing a dog to enter a badger sett. The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery was rightly concerned about the consequences for those who hunt with terriers in Wales. The amendment would assist them and is essential if they are to continue their activities.

Amendment No. 18 changes the wording from "harm" to "bodily harm". The reason is that "harm" is an extremely wide-ranging word. There are those who, given the slightest excuse, would take people to court in order to pursue a vendetta against them. The definition of "harm" is so wide that it is almost impossible to know what it means. That would certainly apply to the badger who was the victim of any such action. A badger baiter does bodily harm to a badger; there can be no question about that. In what way would the amendment weaken the Bill if its purpose is to protect the badger and has not spread into the wider issue of fox hunting? A number of Opposition Members have made it clear that they would welcome that, even if that is not their specific intention. The proposed amendment would not weaken the Bill's supposed purpose. I am reliably informed by the legal advice that I have taken that bodily harm includes stress-related harm. If a badger shows signs of physical distress arising from the stress caused to it, that would be included in the definition of bodily harm. I cannot see that the Bill's objective would be weakened if "bodily harm" were substituted for "harm".

Mr. Hardy: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his reference to the stress-related aspect of the matter. One of my anxieties is that the diggers in the east midlands and South Yorkshire are frequently at their busiest when cubs have just been born and the sow is lactating. Would the hon. Gentleman's amendment include harm caused to badger cubs because the sow had been removed or disturbed? The defence may be that the digger did not know that there were cubs below the ground. Would that exclusion provide the digger with an excuse under the terms of the Bill as amended? Apart from that, I am grateful for his reassurance.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: And I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I appreciate his great expertise in these matters, as I have said in previous debates. I should not like to give him a categorical assurance that that would be the case, but it is certainly my understanding that it would. Bodily harm suffered by a cub would be bodily harm suffered by a badger, as a direct consequence of the act of the badger baiter. It is most unlikely that he would get away with the kind of activity to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

Mr. Gale: I referred to that point when I spoke briefly earlier in the debate. The reason I raised it and the reason I highlighted the comment made by the League Against Cruel Sports, which in the sense of clause 1 is incorrect but which in the sense of clause 5 is correct, is that my hon. Friend must answer the same question as I put to my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin): would he regard harm done to a badger that had been blocked out of its home while absent hunting at night as bodily harm? There is a considerable difference. Many of us feel strongly that the proposed amendment would create an opportunity for the unscrupulous to block up a badger sett while the badger was out hunting, thus depriving it of its sett. It is a moot point whether that would be bodily harm or harm.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I suppose that it is a moot point whether it would be harm at all if the badger managed to find another unoccupied sett close by and went into that instead. If the badger suffered any demonstrable bodily harm as a result of being shut out of the sett, that would indeed be bodily harm. If, however, it could be said that the badger was mightily upset and inconvenienced but not damaged by the action, it would not be bodily harm. We have to keep a sense of proportion. My hon. Friend understands the countryside well. Therefore, he knows that badgers are capable of occupying any hole in the ground. Near most of the main setts there are ancillary setts. That is one reason why there have been so many problems over the question of what is and what is not an occupied sett.

The answer to my hon. Friend is that, if it really harmed the badger, the badger baiter would be caught under bodily harm. If, however, my hon. Friend is talking about inconvenience and upset to the badger, the badger baiter would not be caught. I do not believe that the criminal law should be used against those who inconvenience and upset badgers. I am afraid that there would be no end to it, in terms of the inconvenience and the upsetting of budgerigars when kept in cages, as well as all the other inconveniences caused to animals by man. Therefore, I beg my hon. Friend to keep a sense of proportion. If the badger is seriously and genuinely harmed, that should be a criminal offence. The Bill, as I propose it should be amended, would cover that eventuality.

I believe that the clauses fall happily into groups. I hope to have the opportunity to vote on the amendments to clauses 4 and 5 and also on amendments Nos. 16 and 18 separately, if necessary. I hope that sufficient hon. Members who have listened to the debate are now persuaded that at least some of the amendments are acceptable, although they may not be prepared to accept all of them.

11.15 am

Mr. John Bowis (Battersea): I do not believe that the interests of badgers are best served by the scoring of party points across the Floor of the House or between hon. Members on the same side of the Chamber. Moreover, I do not believe that the interests of badgers are best served by turning this debate into a debate on the future of hunting. We should be profoundly uninterested in the debate about the future of hunting today, since today's debate is about the protection, preservation and the continuation of the badger's life style. If, as is estimated, 9,000 badgers are losing their lives illegally each year, those are 9,000 reasons why we should aim at getting this measure on to the statute book as fast as is humanly possible.

Mr. Ron Davies: The hon. Gentleman may like to think that that is the case and that it is possible to proceed on the basis of consensus. However, he must recognise that amendments have been tabled by people who are directly and publicly associated with fox hunting. Those amendments would grievously weaken the Bill. The purpose of the amendments is to allow fox hunting to continue. The hon. Gentleman cannot get away from that conflict of interest.

Mr. Bowis: I entirely accept that amendments have been tabled that are designed to protect the interests of fox hunting, and that a balance must be struck between the interests of fox hunting and the interests of sheep and all those who live in the countryside. We are seeking to bring together all those broad interests when considering the protection of the badger, as the Bill seeks to do.

We went to great lengths in Committee to meet the genuine and reasonable arguments by the hunting community. Clause 3 was added in response to those demands. That is a tribute to the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes), the promoter of the Bill, who was willing to seek a compromise and a balance between all the interests in the countryside to which I have referred. I have listened carefully to the arguments on amendment No. 16. I am also prepared to listen to the arguments on the amendment relating to marking. We must be careful, however, not to amend the Bill in such a way that it becomes impossible to enforce in the courts.

I intend to refer to four of the amendments, about three of which I have strong doubts; on the fourth, I am open to persuasion. I have the strongest doubts about amendment No. 2, which seeks to delete the offence of causing a dog to enter a badger sett. If that is deleted, it is deleted not only for the well-intentioned huntsman or farmer but for any immoral or evil person. The amendment is far too wide, and it would be wrong to accept it.

I hope that my hon. Friends will correct me if I am wrong, but as I understand amendment No. 4, it provides the acting-under-orders defence. I am not a lawyer, but I find the language used a little puzzling:

"An accused shall not be permitted to rebut a presumption of guilt".

I always understood that, under British law, the presumption was innocent until proven guilty and that guilt cannot be presumed until the courts have so decided.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: My hon. Friend is wrong about the law in this instance. Under British law, there is a presumption of innocence except where statute provides that there should be a presumption of guilt, and the Badgers Act 1973 is such an Act. Therefore, there is a presumption of guilt unless innocence is established. That is why the amendment is so phrased.

Amendment No. 4 has nothing to do with acting under orders. Somebody who uses someone else's land for badger baiting and legitimate terrier hunting, and interferes with a badger sett, would have no defence unless the landowner or occupier had given permission. It would make it impossible for somebody to say that he was acting lawfully for the hunt when he was not, unless the landowner or occupier was prepared to back his story, which he would not be.

Mr. Bowis: I accept my hon. Friend's interpretation of the law, as I think that he is a lawyer. However, the amendment establishes an offence, and the Bill allows certain defences to be considered in court. I still think that it is odd that we should include in the Bill the inability to rebut guilt. Surely we all have a right to prove our innocence in court.

I am more concerned about the exemption where someone can show that they have authorisation from the occupier of land. That is simply unnecessary; either it is an offence or not. It does not matter whether it is committed by the occupier or by somebody acting on his behalf. It is no defence in law to say, "I did it only because he said I could do it, guv." If the law says, "Thou shall not do it," thou shall not do it, and it is not good enough for someone to say, "The owner gave me permission."

Mr. Colvin: I thought that, in moving the amendment, I had explained fairly fully how it would work. It is unthinkable that the owner or occupier of land would authorise somebody to dig for badgers on his land, because in doing so he would be committing an offence. In practice, badger diggers dig on land without permission and are therefore guilty of trespass, which is already an offence. That is why the amendment would not give rise to the fears that my hon. Friend expresses.

Mr. Bowis: I am simply saying that the amendment is unnecessary because, if it is a legal activity, it is a legal activity. My hon. Friend's point about trespass is different. If it is illegal, the fact that a landowner gave permission should not be a defence for the perpetrator. That is all I am seeking to suggest.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I do not follow my hon. Friend's logic. The amendment does not establish that somebody who is on land for an illegal purpose will be acting lawfully because a landowner gave permission. It makes it harder for somebody who is on land for an illegal purpose to pretend that his purpose is legal, because a landowner will say, "I never gave permission."

Mr. Bowis: No doubt we could discuss that legal argument.

My hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) referred to amendment No. 18. The hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) questioned the definition of "bodily harm", about which my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor) admitted there is a difficulty. He singled out the word "harm", but equally one can question the phrase "bodily harm". I am concerned about badger cubs being blocked out of their setts. Evidence shows that they have perished during harsh weather because they lost their shelter and habitat. A court of law would not necessarily regard that as bodily harm.

My hon. Friend the Member for Upminster used the word "demonstrable". It is better to use the word "harm" than to limit it to "bodily harm", as "harm" covers a variety of causes of a badger's death.

What will result from amendment No. 16, because we are in the world of double negatives? If we accept the amendment, does it mean that the licence would permit such action, or does it mean that the licence would not not permit it? The amendment needs clarifying before we accept it.

The Bill is just about right. I am prepared to listen to hon. Members' views on amendment No. 16 and on later amendments, but we should remember that protection is available to law abiding people. I hasten to suggest that there could not be anything but a law-abiding farmer, as I am married to a farmer's daughter—all farmers are law abiding, honest and wish to protect badgers—but we must ensure that the law protects the badger from the actions of people who do not fall into that category. The Bill mentions someone "being reckless as to whether his actions will have any of those consequences, he shall be guilty."

There must be intent and recklessness. That is the defence that the law-abiding user of the countryside needs to protect his genuine activities.

Mr. David Nicholson (Taunton): I shall be extremely brief, but as I represent Exmoor and the Brendon hills, which are substantial sheep farming areas in the west country, I want to reinforce the points that were put so powerfully by my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Wiggin) and by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile). The hon. and learned Member was a little ambiguous about the Liberal party's position on fox hunting, but I shall let that pass. His speech contrasted with those of the hon. Members for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) and for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley), which reinforced a point that Conservative Members have made before in the House—that the Labour party is abdicating all interest in the countryside and the farming community and is restricting itself to its heartlands.

Farmers in my constituency, which is a substantial sheep farming area, are suffering considerable financial difficulty. They would want me to support amendment No. 16 and the other amendments as explained by my hon. Friends. The National Farmers Union and the Country Landowners Association have written to hon. Members.

Various hon. Members have referred to the role of predators. It is ironic that, at the other end of my constituency, on the Somerset levels, nature conservation societies are concerned about the decline in the population of wading birds. It has been suggested that badgers may be responsible for that, and, although badgers are attractive animals, they may have played a role in it.

I do not however, wish to resile from the commitment that I expressed in Committee, which the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) will remember, to see the Bill progress satisfactorily to the statute book. The National Farmers Union has made it clear that it wants the law to be tightened up on badger baiters, who are usually trespassing on farmland. Occasionally, there are reports of farmers being intimidated or physically threatened by badger baiters. I hope, therefore, that the Bill will be successful and that the hon. Member for Newport, East will listen to the powerful representations from both sides of the House, particularly from those of us with substantial sheep farming interests in England and Wales, and will concede the amendments.

11.30 am

Mr. Roy Hughes: All hon. Members have expressed their concern about the continuing ill treatment of badgers. I have spoken to many people and organisations to try to reach a consensus so that the Bill may become law and thus do much to close the loopholes in existing legislation. I have approached the matter in a spirit of reasonableness and have tried to make it clear from the outset that the Bill is not about outlawing fox hunting, and nor is it intended to interfere with farmers' legitimate interests. Yesterday the findings of a Gallup poll showed that 93 per cent. of those interviewed supported the Bill, which is pretty formidable backing.

The amendments rehash the Bill that was presented by the hon. Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor), which failed to receive a Second Reading. I am sorry that those old arguments have been resurrected because I thought that they had been settled after Second Reading, and especially after the amicable Committee stage.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would not wish to mislead the House. The reason that my Bill failed to receive a Second Reading was technical: I could not ask for my Bill to be given a Second Reading once the hon. Gentleman's Bill had received one. Therefore, any implication that my Bill did not receive a Second Reading on grounds of merit is misleading.

Mr. Hughes: I accept the hon. Gentleman's explanation.

I have taken advice from all the animal welfare organisations, including the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, the Royal Society for Nature Conservation, the World Wide Fund for Nature, the National Federation of Badger Groups and the League Against Cruel Sports. All those organisations feel that the amendments, with the exception of amendment No. 16, are dangerous and could even undermine the Badgers Act 1973. The hon. Members for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) and for Battersea (Mr. Bowis) appear to support that contention. The amendments would make interference—destruction, damage or blockage—a criminal offence only if it could be shown that the interference was likely to cause bodily harm to a badger. At night, badgers go out foraging for food. If the relevant amendment were successful, an unscrupulous developer could bulldoze a badger sett at night—there was one such incident recently in Petersfield. Alternatively, a farmer could block the entrance of a badger sett with slurry, or a hunter could block it with oil drums or rocks. Because badgers are not in their setts at night, they would be unlikely to suffer bodily harm as a result of such actions.

There is also the issue of putting a dog into a sett. The amendment seeks to take it out of the category of sett interference, making it a separate offence. At present any person accused of such an offence must prove that he was not digging for badgers. There is now a reversal of the onus of proof. The amendment will permit the use of the defence of digging for foxes if permission has been received from the owner of the land. Again, that could lead to intimidation of farmers by badger diggers. The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) referred to one such incident.

Welsh hill farmers are going through a difficult period and are finding it hard to earn a living. I would be the first to defend their interests. Accurate figures on the threat to their land are hard to come by, but, from my research, it appears that the threat from foxes is exceeded by that posed by uncontrolled dogs. That is the answer to some of the remarks made by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery and my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, South (Mr. O'Hara).

The amendment would allow a terrier to enter a sett if it was claimed that the person responsible was hunting for foxes or rabbits. Such a provision is wide open to abuse. Under amendment No. 5 someone could completely destroy a badger sett or put dogs into it if he could prove that it was incidental action of a lawful operation. The Bill provides only for the defence of damage, obstruction or disturbance—for example, damage caused by a fallen tree. To extend the provision to total destruction or to allow dogs to enter opens more loopholes and would certainly be exploited by unscrupulous people. Provided that the operation was lawful, a sett would have no protection against destruction or interference.

As I want the Bill to progress to Third Reading, I shall make a considerable concession. I have discussed the matter at length with the hon. Member for Devizes (Sir C. Morrison), and I am prepared to accept amendment No. 16. As a result of that gesture, I hope that the other amendments will be withdrawn.

Mr. Colvin: With the permission of the House, I hope that I may respond to one or two issues raised by hon. Members during the debate, which was constructive and thoughtful, and based on considerable knowledge of the subject. As is inevitable with an emotive subject, some of the old prejudices bubbled to the surface. Why fox hunting per se should always be associated with badger digging, I do not know. The Bill might stop many perfectly lawful activities because it affects all countryside pursuits, including fox hunting and farming, and relates to landowners.

The hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) made a major concession in accepting the arguments that were expressed extremely well during the debate by my hon. Friends the Members for Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Wiggin) and for Taunton (Mr. Nicholson), and by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile). I am pleased that the spirit of compromise and discussion that prevailed during the Bill's passage, particularly in Committee, has prevailed this morning. I hope that when I make clear what I wish to do about dividing the House on some of the amendments, the same spirit of co-operation and discussion will prevail so that the Bill can wend its way from this place to the other place, as I hope it will. There are many hurdles for the Bill yet to overcome.

The hon. Member for Newport, East referred to a Gallup poll showing that 93 per cent. of the people questioned supported the Bill. I am sure that they did not. I am sure that what they supported, as all hon. Members do, was the Bill's objective—there is a fundamental difference. If most people questioned were subjected to the detailed provisions of the Bill, many of them would express the sort of reservations voiced by hon. Members this morning. Nevertheless, I gladly accept the concession made by the hon. Member for Newport, East, and I am pleased that amendment No. 16 will, with the leave of the House, be accepted.

I support the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor) about his Bill, which was well drafted and would have worked. It was only as a result of a procedural technicality, and the fact that the Bill of the hon. Member for Newport, East, which was so like the Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster, had already begun its passage through the House that my hon. Friend's Bill was not allowed to proceed. It is not permitted for two almost identical Bills to proceed through the House. So my hon. Friend's Bill had to be withdrawn. Should the Bill of the hon. Member for Newport, East fail, my hon. Friend's Bill is ready to be resurrected—perhaps in the next Session. But let us hope that this Bill succeeds.

The hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies), who I am sorry to say is not in the Chamber now, spoke with some passion on amendment No. 4. He suggested that the object of that amendment was to torpedo the Bill. Nothing could be further from the truth. There are legitimate interests to defend, and if we can amend the Bill properly, we should do so.

The issue raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) has been adequately answered by my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster. I shall try to reassure my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North that the object of the amendments is not to provide loopholes through which those who genuinely dig for badgers and perpetrate the crimes that we want to stop will be able to escape.

Nobody has yet mentioned that the amendments would enlist the support of country people. Any legislation is only as good as its enforcement. If people are not "on side" with the law, it is sometimes difficult to obtain their co-operation to ensure that those committing the crimes are reported to the police, the evidence is gathered and the law works in practice. If the amendments were approved en bloc, the Bill would have the wholehearted support of country people and would be much more effective. I believe that hon. Members should consider how far they are prepared to go in rejecting the amendments and possibly prejudicing and damaging the legislation's enforceability.

The hon. Member for Newport, East has said that he accepts amendment No. 16. I intend to divide the House on amendment No. 4. How should we proceed, Mr. Deputy Speaker? Should we take the amendments in numerical order or as a group? Will we take them one by one?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I shall seek to help the hon. Gentleman and the House. We shall follow the normal practice. We do not, except with the leave of the House, put amendments formally as a group. I shall put the Question that has already been proposed on amendment No. 1. Should amendment No. 1 be rejected, I doubt whether I can put to the House any of the amendments that come before amendment No. 5, because they would not be available for proposal. However, if the House rejects amendment No. 1, I should be prepared to consider allowing a Division on amendment No. 5, should the hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) seek to press for one. I hope that I have given some guidance.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I wish to ask the House to divide on amendment Nos. 18 and 5. I shall not seek to divide the House on amendment No. 4.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am advised that the House could divide on amendment No. 18 only if amendment No. 3 were carried, which is dependent on the House approving amendment No. 1—[Interruption.] I apologise. I am advised that amendment No. 3 can be put separately, irrespective of what the House decides on amendment No. 1. Therefore, we had better wait and see what the House decides on amendment No. 1. I shall then give further guidance.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The House proceeded to a Division——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have been advised that the security doors affecting access to the building from the Norman Shaw building are locked. We have made arrangements to have them opened, but I am exercising the discretion that I understand I have to extend the period before calling for the doors to be locked.

The House having divided: Ayes 19, Noes 100.

Clause 3

EXTENSION OF GENERAL EXCEPTIONS

Mr. Wiggin: I beg to move amendment No. 20, in page 2, line 1 at beginning insert—

'( ) In section 8 of the Badgers Act 1973, after subsection (1B), there is inserted—

"(1C) A person shall not be guilty of an offence under section 2(3)(a), (b), (c) or (e) of this Act if he is lawfully engaged in the maintenance or improvement of any existing watercourse or drainage works, or the construction of new works required for the drainage of any land, including works for the purpose of defence against sea water or tidal water.".'.

Mr. Colvin: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) accepted amendment No. 16, and that is not good enough.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When we have worked our way through other amendments, I shall ask the House to agree to that.

12 noon

Mr. Wiggin: In the storms during 1990, a flood bank in my constituency burst under the attack from the sea. More than 1,000 acres of high quality agricultural land were flooded and one domestic property was affected. The clear cause of the breach in the flood bank was a badger sett. Local farmers had drawn the matter to the attention of the National Rivers Authority, and there had been some debate about what should be done to deal with the problem. The delay militated against any action being taken, and the bank burst, with the consequences that I have outlined. A heavily piled repair was required and was costly. I went to inspect the work with local farmers and found that the badgers were at work again, as is often the case.

There should be an exemption under the Badgers Act 1973 so that those engaged in such flood protection work —the various fluvial and tidal flood defences, of which there are a great many in my part of the world—should be allowed priority.

People and property can be placed in danger. I asked the Wessex region of the National Rivers Authority to carry out a review of this matter throughout the region. In a letter dated 10 July 1990, Mr. Nigel Reader, the regional general manager of the Wessex region of the NRA, said:

[Mr. Wiggin]

"I have initiated a survey of all sea, tidal and fluvial flood defences in the Wessex Region, to identify the presence of badger setts. To date, some 10 significant setts have been identified throughout the region together with a smaller number of minor or inactive ones. I agree with your view that it is not in the best interests of safety to allow the matter to continue unchecked. It is for that reason that we are systematically pursuing with the Ministry of Agriculture appropriate methods of dealing with the identified problems, applying one or more of the options outlined earlier to you."

The difficulty is that such consultations, licences and so on take a great deal of time. Responsible bodies are involved in these matters—and they are responsible—and the main one is the National Rivers Authority. However, drainage authorities have responsibility for some areas, and practices differ from one part of the country to another. They should be exempted from the legislation, and my amendment seeks to do that.

There should not be any worry about the welfare of badgers, because it may well be possible to move them from the sites. However, we need legislation to protect people, who are now so conscious of the many ways in which the badger Acts apply that there is an essential nervousness. That was the objective of the legislation, and it has been achieved. I hope that the Bill's promoter will accept this modest amendment in the interests of safety and the countryside. It would in no way affect the welfare of badgers, which we all accept as the paramount purpose of the Bill.

Sir Alan Glyn (Windsor and Maidenhead): My hon. Friend is arguing about the time that it takes to pass the legislation. He is not arguing on a point of principle but on a technicality.

Mr. Wiggin: I am sorry that I have not made myself clear. It is question of time. In the past year or two, my part of the world has suffered from storms. When the wind is in the right direction and spring tides coincide, much of my constituency is threatened by the sea. When it is necessary to proceed, it is perfectly reasonable to say that, if badgers are in the way, they should not be considered. That is the aim of my amendment.

Mr. Roy Hughes: I appreciate the concern of the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Wiggin) on this issue. He expressed similar sentiments on Second Reading. I assure him that drainage works or sea defence works, which are especially relevant in his constituency, are covered by clause 2(2), which states that, where damage caused

"was the incidental result of a lawful operation and could not have been reasonably avoided.", section 8(1A) of the Badgers Act, 1973 makes the amendment unnecessary. Such works are also covered by the Bill's licensing provisions—I refer the hon. Gentleman to clause 4(b). I hope that I have given the hon. Gentleman the assurance that he seeks.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. Gentleman seek leave to withdraw his amendment?

Mr. Wiggin rose——

Mr. Colvin: Do we not come to this in due course, Mr. Deputy Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Question before the House is, That amendment No. 20 be made. Does the hon. Gentleman wish me to put the question or does he wish to withdraw the amendment?

Mr. Wiggin: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 3

EXTENSION OF GENERAL EXCEPTIONS

Sir Charles Morrison: I beg to move amendment No. 6, in page 2, line 3, leave out 'section 2(3)(c)' and insert 'section 2(3)(a), (c) or (e)'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 7, in page 2, line 5, leave out 'that he shall not dig into the tops or sides of the entrances,'.

No. 21, in page 2, line 5, leave out 'shall' and insert 'does'.

No. 22, in page 2, line 6, leave out 'shall not be' and insert 'are not'.

No. 23, in page 2, line 8, leave out 'shall be' and insert 'are'.

No. 8, in page 2, line 9, leave out 'clean'.

No. 9, in page 2, leave out lines 10 and 11 and insert 'or soil, or'.

No. 10, in page 2, line 13, leave out 'clean'.

No. 11, in page 2, line 14, leave out 'loose'.

No. 12, in page 2, leave out line 15 and insert

'and removed within twenty four hours'.

No. 13, in page 2, line 16, leave out 'consent of the landowner' and insert

'authority of the occupier of the land on which the sett is situated.'.

No. 14, in page 2, leave out lines 17 and 18.

No. 15, in page 2, line 18, at end insert—

'(6) A person shall not be guilty of an offence under section 2(3)(a) or (c) or (e) by reason of his hounds marking at a sett, provided they are withdrawn as soon as reasonably practicable.'.

Sir Charles Morrison: The hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) introduced clause 3 into the Bill in Committee. Like other members of the Committee, I thanked him for doing that, because it meets a number of points on earth stopping that have been made by fox hunters and farmers who are concerned with fox control. None the less, I warned him that some amendments would be necessary. These amendments are those which, after consideration, I feel that it is important to make to clause 3. Some of the amendments do no more than correct defective drafting, but some are more substantial. I should emphasise how important earth stopping is for fox hunting and fox control. Without earth stopping, it is almost impossible to undertake fox hunting and to control foxes.

The clause states that a person shall not be guilty of an offence under clause 2(3)(c)—the offence of "obstructing access to or any entrance of a badger sett"

—under certain conditions. However, in stopping a sett, a person could be held to have committed two other offences —disturbing the badgers, an offence set out in clause 1(3)(e) and damaging the sett, the offence set out in clause 1(3)(a). Amendment No. 6 simply allows disturbance to the badger or damage to a sett for the purpose of earth stopping and it removes the two anomalies that I have briefly described. The amendment would not allow wholesale or excessive damage to a sett or serious disturbance to a badger, because clause 3 carefully describes how a sett can be blocked. Conditions such as the use of straw or hay or the removal of bundles within a certain time mean that harmful interference with the sett will be avoided.

Amendment No. 7 is concerned with digging for foxes inside a sett entrance. The act does not harm badgers, but it is not practicable for legislation to insist that every badger sett that is stopped must be stopped with imported material. Earth stoppers are frequently faced with large setts, which may be partly or temporarily disused, and many have 10 or even 20 or more entrances. In those circumstances, the sensible way to stop the earth is to cut into the sides of the entrance to produce a light covering. That would not harm the badger. If cutting into the sides of the entrances were not permitted—the effect of clause 3—stopping would be difficult. Therefore, I hope that amendment No. 7 will be accepted.

The Bill refers to clean straw, but in practice, defining clean straw would be extremely difficult. The hon. Member for Newport, East may be able to define what constitutes clean straw or say when it become dirty so that use of it is a breach of the law, but I feel that it is difficult to distinguish between clean and dirty straw. Those of us who have farmed know full well that, immediately after harvest, quite a lot of the straw is dirty for a variety of reasons. Therefore, it would be reasonable to accept amendments Nos. 8 and 10, which remove the requirement that the straw be clean.

Amendments Nos. 9 and 11 deal with the requirement in clause 3 that the soil used in earth stopping is loose—a requirement which is neither sensible nor practical. It would be hard for the courts to determine whether the soil is loose. It may not be possible for an earth stopper to produce loose soil at a sett, particularly on a wet day when the soil tends to compact. Furthermore, if loose soil is dropped into the entrance of a sett, it will fall further down the hole than is desirable. The Masters of Fox Hounds Association recommends soft earth stopping, which is slightly different to loose soil but just as easy for the badger to remove. Therefore, the amendments remove the requirement that the soil should be loose. The provision for loose soil would seem to be unnecessary because clause 3 already contains the important condition that the soil must not be packed hard into the entrances of setts.

Amendments Nos. 9 and 12 deal with the time when stopping may take place. The provisions in clause 3 as to when setts are stopped and blocks are removed are somewhat confused. The first part of the defence permits stopping with soil and other material if it is placed in the entrances on the day of the hunt. This is unnecessary and impractical. Stopping with soil may be done before hunting, for instance to close up a large number of apparently disused holes. The stopping must be undertaken in accordance with the strict conditions set out and only for the purpose of hunting foxes with hounds, so it makes no difference whether the stopping takes place "on the day of the hunt" or earlier, because, if a badger is present, he will dig himself out. Therefore, amendment No. 9 removes the provision that this form of stopping may take place only "on the day of the hunt".

The second part of the defence permits stopping with various blocks, which must be subsequently removed. The provision specifies removal "on the same day". In general, stopping takes place on the same day as hunting, but there would be complications if stopping took place the day before the hunt, before midnight. The hon. Member for Newport, East will remember that I drew attention to that in Committee. This might occur when an earth stopper has a large number of holes to stop in a single night—a pretty regular event. In this case, the stop would have to be removed as soon as it was put in, because after midnight it would no longer be "the same day". Amendment No. 12 rewords the provision to make it clear that these stops should be removed within 24 hours. The amendment would make no difference to the badger, but it would make clause 3 infinitely more practical and realistic.

Amendments Nos. 13 and 14 deal with the authority of hunt recognised by the Masters of Fox Hounds Association and a register. This point was discussed briefly in Committee. The defence provided by clause 3 insists that earth stoppers must have the consent of land owners and the authority of a hunt recognised by the MFHA, which must keep a register of all earth stoppers.

The requirement that earth stoppers should have the consent of landowners is, in principle, a good one. I have no doubt, however, that a better wording is "authority of the occupier", as that recognises the rights of tenant farmers and other land occupiers and removes the need for any formal consent to be signified. We must be realistic. It is not unknown for land to be owned by institutions or by landowners who are not immediately available. It seems, therefore, that the occupier of the land is a more relevant person than the landowner.

The requirement that the Masters of Fox Hounds Association must recognise hunts and keep a registration of earth stoppers is unacceptable. That is because there are many hunts—these have been referred to by implication already—including fell packs in the Lake District and packs in Wales, which are all vital for fox control but which can hardly go under the term "packs of hounds" because there are perhaps only two, three or four hounds. These "packs" are not recognised by the association but they must be able to stop badger setts. Their purpose is to control foxes. It is asking too much of the association, however, to undertake a major survey to cover many organisations for which it does not bear responsibility and over which it has no control. It is to ask too much of the association also that it should accept responsibility where it has no jurisdiction.

A registration of earth stoppers would be impracticable. First, there is the difficulty that is presented by the small groups of hounds that might go under the heading of fox hunts. I do not know how it would be possible to keep lists of earth stoppers within their ranks through the Masters of Fox Hounds Association or any other organisation. I suspect that the farmers concerned sometimes ask their friends to go out and help them.

Mr. Ron Davies: I make a suggestion that the hon. Gentleman might find helpful. In Scotland, the Fox Destruction Society is registered with the Scottish Office. In Wales, many of the gun packs to which the hon. Gentleman has referred are established as fox destruction societies. Does the hon. Gentleman think that there would be some merit in having a registration system with the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, for England, or with the agriculture department in the Scottish Office for Scotland or with the Welsh Office for Wales? Perhaps it would be possible to introduce the control structure that the hon. Gentleman is suggesting through that registration procedure.

Sir Charles Morrison: That is an idea which could be pursued. I am not sure whether its implementation would be practical. The hon. Gentleman, knows much more about Wales than I do, but I have a feeling that the procedure would be intensely bureaucratic. I suspect that inadvertently people would find themselves quite often in breach of the law, but it is an idea which would be worth considering in more detail.

Mr. Bowis: I understand that the framing of the provisions to which my hon. Friend is referring was based on current practice and not on conjecture. In Committee, our attention was drawn to the byelaw of the New Forest. It has been shown to work effectively and perhaps we can take that to be the position unless my hon. Friend can present evidence to the contrary. The byelaw states:

"All stopping will be undertaken on the morning of the hunting day only. The Joint Masters shall nominate and appoint authorised stoppers, each of whom shall be fully instructed on stopping requirements, and a list of appointees shall be made available to the Forestry Commission prior to the first Meet of the season."

That byelaw has been shown to work in practice. Perhaps it would not do so throughout the country, but it is a useful example.

Sir Charles Morrison: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I was aware of the byelaw. It may be difficult—I would not put it more strongly—to extrapolate from the limited area of the New Forest to embrace the nation as a whole. The matter can be considered further and dealt with, perhaps, in another place at a later stage of the Bill's consideration.

It is important to stress that it is entirely impracticable for the Masters of Fox Hounds Association to keep a register. For example, the association has no control of gun packs. It is probably true to say that there are fairly regular bands of earth stoppers that act on behalf of the many hunts throughout the length and breadth of England, Wales and part of Scotland. On the other hand, I have no doubt that many of the earth stoppers from time to time ask their friends or mates to help them out if they have a lot of work to do on one particular evening. If the provision is allowed to remain in the Bill, it will inadvertently cause people to find themselves in breach of the law. I should prefer the Bill to be amended in the way that I have suggested.

Amendment No. 15 is concerned with marking. The matter was referred to in Committee. Marking occurs when foxes run to ground either in a fox earth or, more relevant in the context of the debate, in a badger sett. When that happens, the hounds will stand on top of the badger sett, scuffle around and bay. They cannot go down the hole because they are too big. They will stand on top, however, until the huntsmen appear. Sometimes they are unable to arrive at the scene for about two minutes after the hounds have arrived, due to difficulties getting across country, for example. The hounds will not do any harm to the sett, but, as I have said, they will stand on top of it until the huntsmen arrive and call them off.

In some circumstances marking will be an offence, whereas in others it will not. If the damage or disturbance to a sett is neither intentional nor reckless, no offence under the Bill will have been committed. Where the master or the huntsmen could not foresee the risk of marking taking place, they would be safe from prosecution. They may also be covered by the terms of the revised offence that is set out in clause 2, which permits interference with a sett if the action was the accidental result of a lawful operation and could not reasonably have been avoided. The burden of proof would be on the master or the huntsman, who would have to show that he could not have reasonably avoided his hounds marking out the sett.

The problem will arise when hunts draw coverts or other places in search of a fox, when they know that badger setts are in the vicinity and they know that it is possible, if not probable, that the fox will run to one of the setts and that the hounds will mark the fox to ground. In those circumstances, an offence would be committed.

I emphasise that in the west country, Wales and other areas where both badgers and foxes are highly numerous, that could happen on every hunting day. If masters were to suspend hunting in every place where there was a risk of marking a fox in a badger sett, fox hunting would come to an end. Of course, under clause 3 hunts may stop up the badger setts to prevent foxes from running to ground in them. Hunts do that to the best of their ability, but badgers dig large numbers of holes and, where they are prolific, earth stoppers simply cannot keep up with them. It is inevitable that the foxes will find some hole to run to, and often they will be unstopped setts. Amendment No. 15 would permit interference with a sett by reason of marking with hounds. Masters and huntsmen would be required to take their hounds away from the sett as soon as reasonably practicable.

I hope that the hon. Member for Newport, East will favourably consider the amendments. None would undermine the fundamental purpose of the Bill, but they would make clause 3 more practical, because it would then take account of reality.

12.30 pm

Mr. Colvin: I shall be brief in supporting my hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Sir C. Morrison). I am pleased that an earth-stopping code has been written into the Bill, even though it is not the code that I want. For what it is worth, the code that has not been written into the Bill—that is, the code used by the Masters of Fox Hounds Association—needed tightening in certain areas. I accept that it is no use those who support fox hunting criticising the Bill if they are not prepared to put their own house in order. That is what the amendments, so expertly introduced by my hon. Friend, would achieve.

On Second Reading, I read out some of the contents of the MFHA code, and the House took the view that it was inadequate because it did not specify in enough detail precisely what people should be allowed or not allowed to do within the provisions of the Badgers Act 1973 or the Bill. In principle, I like the idea of an earth-stopping code being written into the Bill, but in practice I feel that the details have many deficiencies. If the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) is not prepared to accept the amendments, he should have an urgent meeting with the MFHA before the Bill goes to another place. Quite frankly, the only way to reach agreement is to sit around a table talking to the MFHA; it is the only way to find a solution that is workable, practicable and fair under the law.

The suggestion of the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) about an additional register to take in fell packs, gun packs and so on made sense. The Bill's proposal would put too much onus on the MFHA to keep a register. Quite frankly, the idea of a register of earth stoppers is ridiculous. I have been an earth stopper, and most of the workers on my farm are earth stoppers. It would be impossible to keep a register of every earth stopper in the country.

On a day when the hunt is due to come to my farm, the master telephones and asks me to stop the earths. What do I do? Everybody is busy and the farm is under tremendous economic pressure. I grab the first person I see and tell him where to go. That is why it would be good to have a code, and I hope that the MFHA publishes one on a piece of plastic paper that can be distributed to landowners. I could then hand that to the man that I have asked to do the earth stopping and say, "Go and do it George—but you must do it this way or you will be breaking the law." If the Bill can achieve that, it will have done a good job. The hon. Member for Newport, East must accept the impracticability of what he has suggested. If he is prepared to accept the amendments, there will be no problem.

My hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis) mentioned the New Forest and Forestry Commission land. That especially interested me, because the New Forest extends just to my constituency, so I know something about it. In the New Forest and on Forestry Commission land, the conditions for earth stopping are as onerous as those proposed in clause 3. The Forestry Commission's authority to hunt specifies, for example, minimal use of loose soil and that the sides of holes must not be cut or interfered with. However, that is no reason for extending the conditions across the country.

The experience of hunts attempting to meet those conditions has led to concern about the wider implications. Earth stoppers have reported considerable practical difficulties in stopping according to the strict requirements. The most recent occasion on which I stopped a badger's sett on my farm is an example. The sett was situated in chalk, so no soil was available. We need a definition of soil. Is chalk soil? I am not sure. Nothing was available except flintstones. Would they be acceptable under the earth-stopping code? I doubt it. We had a considerable job. We had to journey some distance to get the soil to carry out the earth-stopping job.

The hon. Member for Newport, East must be practical about the implications of his proposals. Perhaps he will accept the amendments. In areas in which setts are far more prolific than in the New Forest, and in which there are many holes, the same stringent regulations would result in many setts being left unstopped. The effect would be a reduction in the ability of hunts to control foxes, with a consequent increase in alternative methods such as snaring, which would be extremely unfortunate for the badger. Badgers can become caught in snares as easily as foxes can. If the fox-hunting control of foxes diminishes, farmers will resort to shooting. That is a most unsuitable way in which to try to control foxes, because it is difficult to shoot a fox with a shotgun.

The Forestry Commission and the New Forest may be able to ensure that alternative methods are not taken up, but that would not be the case elsewhere. It is highly important for the badger that hunting can continue without restrictions. Only hunting ensures that it is only foxes—and not badgers—that are taken. I support the amendment.

Mr. Roy Hughes: We have discussed the amendments at length. The issue of stopping arose in a big way in Committee. Hon. Members will be aware that I made a major concession in Committee and incorporated the code of the Masters of Fox Hounds Association in the Bill. The masters of foxhounds are the experts in the matter, and I was prepared to be guided by them. I appreciate that the hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) now speaks in reasonable terms and that the hon. member for Devizes (Sir C. Morrison) has adopted a persuasive approach.

Mr. Colvin: The hon. Gentleman said that the stopping code of the Masters of Fox Hounds Association had been incorporated in the Bill. Has the hon. Gentleman sat down with the MFHA and talked through the code with it? Is the MFHA in 100 per cent. agreement with what has been incorporated in the Bill? If the hon. Gentleman does not mean that, I hope that he will explain.

Mr. Hughes: I did not intend to be categorical about the matter. The provisions are based on the provisions of the Masters of Fox Hounds Association.

Mr. Colvin: The principle?

Mr. Hughes: Yes, the principle. The provisions were accepted by the Committee.

Amendments Nos. 21 to 23 are essentially technical amendments. We will oppose the other amendments in the group, except amendment No. 15, which we will concede.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Does the hon. Member for Devizes (Sir C. Morrison) wish to move amendment No. 7 formally? I imagine that the answer is no.

Mr. Colvin: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Your hearing is probably better than mine, but am I right in thinking that the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) said that he would accept amendment No. 15? That was certainly my impression.

Mr. Roy Hughes indicated assent.

Mr. Colvin: I see that the hon. Gentleman is nodding.

Mr. Roy Hughes: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We accept amendment No. 15.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman accepts amendment No. 15, but that comes later. The hon. Gentleman is the sponsor of the Bill and has said that amendments Nos. 21, 22 and 23 are technical amendments. If the House agrees, I shall put them together.

Amendments made: No. 21, in page 2, line 5, leave out 'shall' and insert 'does'.

No. 22, in page 2, line 6, leave out 'shall not be' and insert 'are not'.

No. 23, in page 2, line 8, leave out 'shall be' and insert 'are'.—[Mr. Roy Hughes.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand that the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) accepts amendment No. 15.

Mr. Roy Hughes indicated assent.

Amendment made: No. 15, in page 2, line 18, at end insert—

'(6) A person shall not be guilty of an offence under section 2(3)(a) or (c) or (e) by reason of his hounds marking at a sett, provided they are withdrawn as soon as reasonably practicable.'.—[Sir Charles Morrison.]

Clause 4

Amendment of s.9 of Badgers Act 1973

Amendment made: No. 24, in page 2, line 29, leave out 'section 22(1) of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971' and insert

'section 55(1) of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990'.—[Mr. Roy Hughes.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand that the hon. Member for Newport, East accepts amendment No. 16.

Mr. Roy Hughes indicated assent.

Amendment made: No. 16, in page 2, leave out lines 47 and 48.—[Sir C. Morrison.]

Clause 5

Amendment of s.11 of Badgers Act 1973

Sir Charles Morrison: I beg to move amendment No. 17, in page 3, line 12, leave out 'likely occupation or use' and insert 'present occupation'.

We indulged in considerable debate in Committee about the right words to cover what would or would not constitute a breach of the law. The Committee debated two definitions of a badger sett, and, ultimately, the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) was accepted on the basis that we would return to the matter on Report to try to improve the drafting.

As drafted, the Bill will protect badger setts that show signs of "likely occupation or use by a badger."

This should ensure that abandoned setts are no longer protected. However, doubt remains about the position of setts that are neither occupied by a badger nor completely abandoned. In reality, badgers make infrequent use of subsidiary or outlying setts, so many setts are unoccupied throughout the year. The point was covered by the Nature Conservancy Council report, "The Badger in Britain", which divided badger setts into four types. It made the point that the main setts were those of most importance and that the subsidiary setts were steadily decreasing in importance.

I believe that it is not necessary to protect unoccupied setts. The extensive protection that the Bill affords to setts, coupled with severe penalties should any interference occur, is appropriate only for occupied setts. After all, the purpose of the Bill is to protect the badger, not to protect large numbers of empty holes in the ground.

The problem would be dealt with if the hon. Member for Newport, East accepted amendment No. 17. I do not want to take up any more of the House's time, because the point is clear. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be prepared to make a concession, as he has done so generously on previous amendments.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) will not accept the amendment. As the hon. Member for Devizes (Sir C. Morrison) said, this matter was discussed at length in Committee. The amendment would create a further loophole. If the words "likely occupation" were removed and replaced by the words "present occupation", some clever person would say that there was no badger in the sett at the time: the badger might have been out foraging. That is a technical point, but, as we know, a case could turn on a technicality.

Badgers often leave a sett and return to it a considerable time later—perhaps after months or even years. In certain areas, badger setts go back hundreds of years. In other countries, setts are protected as we would protect our stately homes. The badger sett may be the stately home of the badger, and hon. Members should bear that in mind. Such edifices need to be protected, and the amendment would introduce further loopholes which would imperil the badger sett. Therefore, I ask hon. Members to reject the amendment.

Mr. Soames: I do not want to quarrel with the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks); I merely wish to disagree with him. As he will remember, when we considered his Bill this matter was a major point of contention. I should like to quote from a letter to my hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Sir C. Morrison) from Dr. Stephen Harris, who is an important expert on such matters, as the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) knows. It relates to the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West:

"One problem with the Banks Bill was that it tried to protect every possible badger sett, whether it was a single hole either not currently in use, or a massive main sett. This is not practical, since recognising smaller badger setts for what they are can be very difficult. It is also not necessary from a conservation stand point: most small setts are not in regular use, of little biological importance, and as the NCC's survey showed, most digging . . . occurs at main setts."

That is the opinion of a considerable expert. I hope that the hon. Member for Newport, East will bear that in mind when he considers whether to accept the amendment. He has given generous consideration to earlier amendments.

Mr. Roy Hughes: I am sorry to disappoint the hon. Gentleman, but I intend to stick to my original wording and to oppose amendment No. 17. My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) advanced a convincing argument. Badgers often vacate a sett and then return to it later. Without further ado, I invite hon. Members to oppose amendment No. 17.

Sir Charles Morrison: With the permission of the House, may I say a few words in reply to the debate.

I note what the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) has said. In the light of his remarks, I do not intend to press the amendment to a Division. However, the matter will undoubtedly be referred to in the debate in another place, where a solution may be found that is acceptable to both sides. If so, well and good. It is, though, a matter which, as I say, the other House will wish to consider. Therefore, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.—[Mr. Roy Hughes.]

12.49 pm

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I congratulate the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) on having done an extremely good job in bringing the Bill before the House. His attitude throughout has been conciliatory. I am very pleased that we have managed substantially to improve the Bill. Much of the credit for that must go to the hon. Gentleman. Credit must also go to my hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Sir C. Morrison), who worked extremely hard in Committee to improve the Bill which, as it now leaves the House, is in very much better shape.

Some of us have said today that the Bill is by no means perfect. We still have reservations about certain clauses, most notably about those that we sought to amend on Report. However, as it is much better than it was when it originally came before House, we do not intend to oppose it. I have sufficient of my hon. Friends here today for us to have fought the Bill through to 2.30 pm, had we so wished, but in the same spirit of conciliation as that shown by the hon. Member for Newport, East we decided not to do so. It gives me great pleasure, therefore, to congratulate him once again and to wish the Bill a speedy and successful passage through the other place, with a few more amendments, before it reaches the statute book.

Mr. Tony Banks: The hon. Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor) was wise not to pursue the course that he has just described. If he had, there would have been considerable difficulties both for him and others as well as ourselves.

I join the hon. Gentleman—this is one of the few times on which we can agree—in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) on steering the Bill through the House. It is almost a good day for badgers. The hon. Member for Upminster knows that I was not so compromising about the proposals that he and other followers of blood sports put forward. I, too, look for improvements to the Bill. They may not be made in another place, but they will come at another time.

I still do not believe that the Bill gives to the badger sett and, therefore, to the badger the absolute protection that is needed. However, my hon. Friend is to be congratulated on having succeeded where I failed. I am delighted not only for him but, more importantly, for badgers. The Bill is a partial success. We shall no doubt return again to the matter and make it a whole success. That is not only what the majority of hon. Members but, far more importantly, what the majority of the people of this country want.

I hope that those Conservative Members who opposed the various badger protection Bills as they went through the House in order to protect their own vile pastime will at least have been impressed by the weight of public opinion. Public opinion has yet again prevailed in this place. Therefore, I am glad to give the Bill my total support.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): I thoroughly welcome the Bill. It is important, however, to put on record the fact that those of us who have watched the proceedings on badger Bills during the last two years have noted with considerable interest and satisfaction the way in which both sides have moved towards one another. For some it is a highly controversial subject. Last year some tempers began to get frayed. I am a little worried about the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks). He seemed to be about to insert yet another unnecessary element of tension into the argument.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Sir C. Morrison) on the way that he has handled his side of the argument. I congratulate, too, both my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor) on his contribution and the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes), who has piloted the Bill through the House with considerable skill. I wish it well in its final stages.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I join other hon. Members in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) on the Bill and my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) on introducing the Protection of Badger Setts Bill last year, which unfortunately was unsuccessful. They both succeeded in achieving a major reform for the protection of badgers. In that sense, it is a good day for Brock at last.

It is sad that a Bill to protect a creature as beautiful as the badger must be the subject of negotiation with those who pursue disgusting blood sports. I hope—I am sure that it will not be too long—that a Bill will be introduced to end the awful practice of blood sports.

In welcoming the Bill, the House should pay credit where it is due—to the League Against Cruel Sports and others who have campaigned for so long to protect the badger and other creatures and the thousands of people who have taken the trouble to write to Members of Parliament asking them to support the Bill and encouraging so many to attend the debate. A Bill such as this represents considerable progress and is a step towards a more humane attitude to animals.

I last observed badgers in the constituency of the hon. Member for Devizes (Sir C. Morrison). I hope that he will take the opportunity to observe them from the downs above Devizes because he will realise what beautiful creatures they are and why the rest of us want to give them the ultimate protection that other hon. Members seek to deny them because they practise blood sports.

It is a good day for the badger; let us look forward to making it a good day for the fox and hare.

Sir Charles Morrison: It is a pity that the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) was not present for earlier debates, because he would have heard hon. Members emphasising their concern for badgers and their determination to take action that would help to reduce badger baiting.

I warmly thank the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) for his co-operation and for the helpful concessions that he made. I congratulate him on getting his name in the history books. I sympathise with his having being burdened with the Bill this year. If there had been a greater feeling of compromise last year, the Protection of Badger Setts Bill would have become an Act. The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) is still quite a young and likely lad, and as time passes he will realise that, in the House, it is better to be prepared to compromise to achieve the results achieved by the hon. Member for Newport, East.

Ms. Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North): I wish briefly to place on record the thanks of people in Staffordshire to members of the Staffordshire Wildlife Trust, the League Against Cruel Sports, the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals and constituents who have lobbied me to ensure that I support the Bill today.

It was very important that Conservative Members did not resort to wrecking tactics. There has been a long battle to improve legislation on protecting the badger. I should have liked the Bill to be tighter, but none the less I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) on it. People in Staffordshire, constituents at the ICL factory in Kidsgrove, have worked closely with pupils in Staffordshire schools to give wider protection to badgers by developing new computers and software to assist in their protection.

Mr. Bowis: This is a good day for badgers and for Parliament because, for once, we have shown that a measure that does not have universal support and which has been proposed by a Back Bencher can reach its final stage in the House of Commons. That is a great tribute to the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes), and I warmly congratulate him on his stewardship of the Bill.

Some of us have been supporting measures to protect badgers for some time, and to see one achieve success is great news. I also pay tribute to my hon. Friends the Members for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor), for Devizes (Sir C. Morrison), for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) and for Crawley (Mr. Soames), whose concern for the balance of the countryside has led them to reach a compromise on the Bill. I hope that that spirit will be reflected in another place so that, when the Bill is discussed there, it will be speeded to the statute book.

Badgers are beautiful creatures and we wish them well. The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) referred to their stately homes. From my memory of childhood literature, I thought that the stately home was owned by Mr. Toad of Toad Hall, but Mr. Badger is also welcome to one. If every Englishman's home is his castle, from today every English badger's home will be a protected castle in the earth.

Mr. Hardy: The hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis) said that he had been supporting the protection of badgers for a long time. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes), who deserves the congratulations of the House and everyone connected with and interested in conservation. It is a pity that it has taken the House 18 years, since the Badgers Act 1973, to introduce such a measure. That Act was revised during the 1974-75 Session and then had to be improved further in the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 and again when my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) was fortunate in the ballot and devoted his measure to improving the 1981 Act.

However, against the great weight of public opinion, badger baiting continues in the most obscene and sadistic way. If the Bill fails this time, I shall present another to seek to deny those who perpetrate such brutal acts the benefits of anaesthesia, should they require treatment or surgery under the national health service. They deserve a harsh penalty. An obvious further step would be to interpret existing legislation to allow the courts to order the confiscation of the motor vehicles that take them to the setts where they perpetrate their brutal crimes.

The whole House has been involved in the Bill. Although some Conservative Members have expressed reservations about the risk of menace to their activities, I appreciate the fact that they recognise that badgers must be protected further, and the conservation organisations and I are grateful that they have enabled the measure to pass through the House.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East will be long remembered for his contribution to the survival of one of Britain's most attractive species. Hon. Members can go away today feeling that they have done a very good job.

1.4 pm

Mr. Colvin: Anyone witnessing this debate could be forgiven for suddenly wondering whether we had lost our senses. Peace and good will seem to be breaking out all over. It is almost like the time when, during the first world war, the combatants came out of their trenches on Christmas day and, instead of firing bullets at one another, started playing football. Throughout the passage of the Bill we have been playing football. In the best possible spirit, we have joined the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) in trying to find a solution to the legitimate concerns of people engaged in activities in the countryside, including farmers, foresters and field sportsmen. We have gone a long way to finding compromises, but that is largely to the credit of the hon. Member for Newport, East.

Many hon. Members have congratulated the hon. Gentleman on successfully steering his Bill through Parliament. He has succeeded in bringing the Bill to its fifth stage, Third Reading, which I trust the House will give it. But it is only at its fifth stage; it has still to encounter the other place and then return to this place. If we are to believe what we read in the newspapers about the possibility of a summer election, perhaps all the good work that has been done so far will have been in vain. However, I do not believe that, even were that to happen, the work will have been in vain because our debates and the work that goes into them produce a greater understanding of the issues involved. Anyone who reads reports of this morning's debates will understand more about the problems of the countryside and the difficulties faced by those who seek to give the badger the greater protection that it needs. Those problems must be overcome without impairing other perfectly legitimate activities.

As I sat downstairs signing my letters half an hour ago, I saw on the annunciator that the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) was on his feet. I thought, "Trouble has arrived." For a moment I thought that we were back to the acrimonious debates that we had during the passage of his Bill. It is sad that, at the end of a thoroughly good-natured and constructive debate, the hon. Members for Newham, North-West and for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn), who took no part in today's debates on Report, should come into the Chamber and spoil it. They have added a little bit of sourness to what is otherwise a happy conclusion.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Newport, East on his achievement and I hope that we shall see his Bill back here in a satisfactory state to discuss any amendments passed in the other place and to give it our final good wishes on its way to Royal Assent.

1.7 pm

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): I join others in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) on having the patience and persistence to steer the Bill through the House, and the shrewd sense to accept one or two amendments in order to achieve a compromise to allow the Bill to succeed. He has performed a balancing act and obtained the best form of Bill rather than seeing it talked out this morning.

Fridays are valuable for private Members. They provide opportunities for presenting and passing useful legislation. I understand that some yuppie tendencies in various parties in this place have been talking about working until 5.30 pm on weekdays, finishing on Thursday night, and getting home on Friday, which is a nonsensical suggestion. Our debates on the Bill have demonstrated how we can make good use of Friday mornings.

Even in 1973, when the first Badgers Bill was passed, and shortly before I entered the House in 1974 as Member for Keighley, people made representations to me to the effect that there were loopholes in the 1973 Act. Attempts to remedy them failed. When I re-entered the House, with great pleasure, as Member for Bradford, South in 1987 a new group of people repeated the same anxieties to me. Some, if not all, of them supported the League Against Cruel Sports, which has consistently provided information about and campaigned on this issue. Its pressure outside must be recognised as a factor in the successful passage of this Bill.

This legislation has been so important in West Yorkshire that some animal care and preservation societies have suggested that if it had not got through today badgers might well have become extinct in West Yorkshire. The contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East has been first rate——

Mr. Colvin: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cryer: I would rather not. Several other hon. Members want to speak.

This has been a satisfactory morning, and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East on the Bill. Most of all, I congratulate the badgers of West Yorkshire on preserving their lives.

1.11 pm

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Gedling): I hope that, as one of the sponsors of the Bill, I may make a few brief comments.

I am delighted that today has been such a good day for badgers. I must slightly chastise the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) for the tone that he injected into the debate, but he did the House one service by showing how genuinely difficult it is, with a wide variety of different beliefs about and angles on the subject, to achieve the consensus arrived at today. That, above all, is the measure of the success of the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes).

Secondly, not only is today a good day for badgers but, if the House sees fit, next week will be yet another good week for badgers, as the hon. Member for Mansfield (Mr. Meale) and I intend to introduce a Bill known as the Badgers (Further Protection) Bill which I hope will receive its First Reading next Wednesday and go through all its other stages, if the House sees fit, on Friday.

Our Bill should command all-party consent. Its other sponsors include such diverse personalities as my hon. Friends the Members for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor) and for Devizes (Sir C. Morrison) and the hon. Members for Newport, East and for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks). With a cast of supporters like that, the Bill, I feel sure, will win the consent and favour of both Houses of Parliament——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. I have allowed the hon. Gentleman to give us a preview of his later Bill, but he must now return to Third Reading of this Bill.

Mr. Mitchell: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for reminding me of that.

I hope that the Bill will appear next week. In the meantime, I warmly commend the promoter of today's Bill and congratulate him on his success.

1.13 pm

Ms. Mildred Gordon (Bow and Poplar): I represent an inner-city area and I have had many letters from constituents in support of this Bill. I grew up in the east end, as did my son. Although we made many trips to the Northaw woods to look at badger setts in the hope of seeing a badger, we never had the luck to see one in the wild. I have no doubt that many of the people who have written to me in support of the Bill have never seen a badger either. In some ways it is even more important to them that these beautiful animals should exist in this country, that they should be protected and that men with dogs—fortunately, it is not women who do this—should not be allowed to hunt them in a bloodthirsty fashion that was likely to exterminate them.

I congratulate my hon. Friends the Members for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) and for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) on the work that has been done over the years leading to this Bill. I congratulate all who have worked together for the Bill. I congratulate my hon. Friends on bringing the Bill through to its fifth stage, and I hope that it will proceed through its remaining stages and be enacted to protect an important part of the wildlife of our country.

Mr. Soames: I join in the general spirit of harmony and pleasure in the House and warmly congratulate the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) on his Bill. The House should also congratulate the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) who for many years has been a leading expert on this matter not only in the House but in the country. His opinions have been widely sought on both sides of the debate, and he has made a notable and important contribution. His approval of the Bill will give further pleasure to the hon. Member for Newport, East.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Mr. Mitchell) that the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) injected a sour and rather pointless note into our proceedings. The great achievement of the hon. Member for Newport, East and his supporters in all parts of the House was the ability to recognise the desire for such legislation. There was a vigorous and important public lobbying effort about the importance of seeing the badger further and properly protected. Some hon. Members sought to confuse that issue with the issue of field sports, about which my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis) spoke.

I commend to the House an admirable article by Dr. Roger Scruton in The Sunday Telegraph. I shall quote from the article and direct it especially to the hon. Member for Islington, North. The article states:

"The real motive behind the proposals is not a love for the animal kingdom but a hatred for a particular part, the part that goes by the name of England. This is the ruling passion of today's Labour Party. Field sports involve a blatant assertion of English values, manners, ceremony, heirarchy, easy courtesy, boldness and display, and above all the natural harmony between people from all backgrounds which is so fundamentally obnoxious to those brought up in the belief that the classes are truly at war. No polytechnic-bred lout can witness the pink coats and prancing horses without feeling the urge to pull down the symbols of authority and spit on a piece of England."

Opposition Members may laugh. However, the hon. Member for Newport, East managed to dissociate himself from that perilous, ghastly riff-raff whose interest is not the protection of the badger or anything else. He allied himself firmly and honourably on the side of an animal which deserves and has achieved further protection and enhancement of its habitat. I wish the Bill every success.

1.17 pm

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): I warmly congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) on persevering with the Bill and on finding ways to get it to the stage at which it goes to another place. I thank him for being kind enough to allow me to be among the Bill's all-party sponsors.

It is a tragedy that the badger is one of those rare animals whose only known enemy is man. I say "man" because to my knowledge its enemies do not include women. When I was with friends in Sussex I was fortunate enough to be within 3 ft to 4 ft of a badger and one of her young and I watched them having supper. It was muesli with apples and they seemed to thrive on it.

I hope that the hon. Members for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin), for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor) and for Crawley (Mr. Soames) and others who have been so keen to reach a consensus on this Bill will, next Wednesday, bring that spirit to the Committee considering the Hare Coursing Bill, which is being promoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen). I also hope that, after the next general election, when the Labour Government introduce a Bill to abolish all forms of hunting with hounds, on a free vote, those hon. Members will again strive for consensus.

As has already been said, the Bill is, regrettably, neither the end of the matter of adequate protection of badgers nor of animal welfare and wildlife matters. I hope that the one thing on which we can all agree, and on which we can all send a message to the other place as it considers the Bill, is that we need to build on this until we can truly say that we properly treat the animals with which we share this planet.

1.20 pm

Mr. Gale: The hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) is right to say that many other animal welfare matters will require our consideration. I have the honour to be the vice-chairman of the all-party animal welfare group, which concerns itself deeply with, for example, the export of live horses and with whaling. On both those matters, Her Majesty's Government have taken a strong and correct stand.

It gives me pleasure to see the passage of the Bill, because the all-party group has given the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) support throughout the stages of the Bill. I know that the chairman of the group, my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake (Dame J. Fookes) and all its members wish him well as the Bill completes its stages. It is also appropriate for me, on behalf of the group, to thank the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals and its officers for the advice and help that they have given us in reaching a consensus. The officers of the National Farmers Union have been similarly helpful.

It saddens me that a note of acrimony was introduced into the debate. It is easy to criticise, but those of us who listened to the articulate debate can only have been impressed by the knowledge of the countryside shown by those of my hon. Friends who have not supported the cause that we have supported. We should not forget that many of those engaged in farming or, as my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) pointed out, in forestry and other country pursuits do a great deal for the conservation of the countryside. It is easy to be hypocritical about such matters. Often, when those who shout the loudest about animal welfare from the town move into constituencies such as mine, they do infinitely more harm to animal welfare, through either negligence or vandalism, than do those whom they have been criticising. I have never hunted or wanted to hunt and there is no likelihood that I ever will, but I recognise, and the House should recognise, and not deride, the strongly held beliefs expressed this morning.

My hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside made it clear that this is but the fifth stage of the Bill. I hope that today will be seen as a good day for badgers, but the Bill has to complete its stages in another place and come back here. I trust that, when all those stages have been completed, we shall be able to say that we have afforded badgers more protection.

Mr. Roy Hughes: This is a happy day for me. It has been a privilege to promote a Bill which will protect these wonderful creatures. My thanks are due to all those right hon. and hon. Members who have supported me. My thanks are also due to those who, in opposing some of the provisions of the Bill, made their arguments lucidly. This is, after all, a democratic institution.

My gratitude and thanks are due especially to animal welfare organisations, including the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, the Nature Conservancy Council, the World Wildlife Foundation, the National Federation of Badger Groups and the League Against Cruel Sports. They have been enthusiastic throughout and unstinting in their efforts.

Arguments have been advanced throughout our discussions and they have been answered. Certain concessions have been made and now the Bill is to go to another place. I hope that efforts will be made speedily to ensure that the Bill can soon be put on the statute book.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mrs. Angela Rumbold): As the House will know, on occasions such as this the Government always maintain a strictly neutral stance. That has been the position that I have held during the Bill's passage and its consideration on the Floor of the House and in Committee. It would not be right, however, at this stage of its progress to allow the Bill to go forward without offering to the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) my congratulations on the way in which he has skilfully drawn the arguments together and taken the Bill—privately, I am happy to see it reach its present stage —through the House.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House have co-operated with and participated in an important measure. I am happy to have had the opportunity to express my personal position. I look forward to the advance of the Bill that my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Mr. Mitchell) has announced that he and the hon. Member for Mansfield (Mr. Meale) will be bringing forward further to help and support badgers.

Sir Alan Glyn (Windsor and Maidenhead): I join in the congratulations to the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) on the passage of the Bill. It is an example of the compromise that can be reached on the Floor of the House. It is the result of a great deal of work behind the scenes in which, I am sure, the representatives of both sides of the argument have participated. They have succeeded in reaching agreement.

The hon. Member for Newport, East said that the badger has no enemies in this place. I am sure that many of us have received more letters about badgers than about the Gulf war. It is clear that the country is behind the Bill —I am certainly behind it—and I am glad that we have reached this stage in its consideration. Let us hope that its progress will not be stopped by a general election and that it will be brought to a successful conclusion. Certain small amendments may have to be made to it in another place during its constitutional passage, but I am sure that we shall support any improvement that can be made to the Bill.

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): I join all hon. Members in congratulating the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) on the passage of the Bill, I extend some credit to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), who I know was disappointed by the failure of his Bill last year. I am sure that he will be extremely pleased by the progress so far of the Bill before us.

Throughout the eight years that I have been an hon. Member we have seemed to spend many hours discussing the welfare of badgers. We have now arrived at a splendid Bill which I hope will shortly receive its Third Reading. I know that some of my colleagues have reservations about the precise details of the measure, and I have no doubt that those in another place will, in their wisdom, ensure that all the concerns which have been expressed during our consideration of the Bill are met.

Many of my constituents love badgers. Tonight, I shall be joining the badgers at the bottom of my garden in celebrating the passage of the Bill. The toast will be, "The hon. Member for Newport, East."

1.29 pm

Mr. Alan Meale (Mansfield): I am delighted to add thanks to my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) for the hard work that he has undertaken in seeing the Bill through to its final stage here before it goes to another place. I add my thanks to those that have been expressed by the hon. Member for Gedling (Mr. Mitchell) to those who have worked extremely hard on another Bill that is shortly to come before the House. The measure is intended further to help and support badgers. I thank the Minister of State for the sign that she has given that it will receive Government support when it comes before the House next week. I hope that it will complete all its stages.

I congratulate all those who have been involved in the Bill, from both sides of the House. Like all those who remained in London today to try to help the Bill through its last stages, I think that we have gained a tremendous boost for those in British society who care about the animal kingdom. Such Bills as this can only be good for the whole of society.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill read the Third time, and passed.

Gaming (Amendment) Bill [Lords]

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

Clause 1

AMENDMENT OF SECTION 31 OF THE GAMING ACT 1968

Amendment proposed: No. 1 in page 1, line 11, after 'premises'. insert

'(other than bingo club premises as defined in section 20 of this Act)'.—[Mr. Favell.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this we may discuss the following amendments: No. 2, in page 1, line 14, leave out 'three' and insert 'two'.

No. 3, in title, line 3, after 'on', insert 'certain'.

No. 4, in title, line 4, leave out from 'Act' to end.

1.30 pm

Mr. John Watts (Slough): The Committee that considered the Bill did some very good work in improving its provisions. I am sorry that my hon. Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Favell) now seeks to undo that good work. The amendments that were carried in Committee were modest in their impact. They would allow working men's clubs and social clubs to have three jackpot machines instead of two, as under existing law, and commercial bingo clubs to have four instead of two.

Those of us who voted for the amendments in Committee believe that what is sauce for the goose should be sauce for the gander. We wholeheartedly rejected the assertion of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary that jackpot machines were part of hard gaming and that if members of our working men's clubs put 20p in a slot in the hope of winning the princely sum of £150, they were going down the slippery slope to hard gambling. We thought it a nonsense then, and we think it a nonsense now.

I am sorry that the Home Office appears to have taken the rather prickly view that, because it did not agree in advance that further provisions should be included in the Bill, it will resist them. I should be sorry if, as a result of that, the changes in respect of casinos—which my hon. Friend the Member for Stockport supports—must be rejected by the House.

Speaking for myself and for the clubs that I represent as joint chairman of the all-party group on non-profit-making members' clubs, I cannot accept the amendments that my hon. Friend is trying to make to the Bill, as amended. I hope that right hon. and hon. Members will join me in the Lobby to defeat them.

Mr. Peter Fry (Wellingborough): I wish first to declare my interest as consultant to the Bingo Association of Great Britain.

The amendments counter the two amendments that were passed in Committee. One of the problems is that the whole area of gambling was set out in legislation by a previous Government, and any attempts to amend it have been left to private Members of each House. We all know the difficulties of conducting private Members' business through both Houses.

It became clear in Committee that the Government have, quite correctly, very strong views and that they feel that the Bill touches on fundamental matters. I ask the Government to appreciate that if they take such a strong hand, the time will come when they must consider legislation on gaming as a whole so that the provisions can be put together. It is not entirely satisfactory that we have to rely on the luck of the draw for private Member's legislation, with all the perils of its passage through the House, when the Government take a firm line and have a clear policy.

The bingo industry has no wish to wreck the Bill. The industry accepts that the casinos are perfectly entitled to put forward their arguments—which we have not heard this afternoon—about why the number of gaming machines or one-armed bandits should be increased. However, it is important that other sections that are affected by the legislation should also reconsider their position. The Bingo Association of Great Britain initially felt on balance that, although it would have liked an increase in the number of machines, it did not want to object to the Bill.

However, because we believe that it is important to work closely with all the others affected, we talked to the representatives of the clubs. It was decided that if the clubs were likely to seek to increase the number of machines in their premises, the Bingo Association should reassess its view. I am entirely in favour of the clubs supporting such an amendment. They are right to do so in their own interests. In some clubs, the pressure on the two gaming machines is intense and income from the machines may be important to the survival of the club.

I find it difficult to understand why we seem to get on the hook of believing that it is perfectly moral to have two machines, but immoral to have three or four. I know that it could be argued that once there are three or four, one can then increase the numbers. We do not ask for that. The amendments tabled in Committee were specific. They sought one extra machine for clubs and two extra for bingo halls.

I also made the point in Committee that, funnily enough, the increase in the number of machines would bring little benefit to the larger clubs owned by big groups such as Bass Leisure or Rank. The vast majority of those clubs prefer to use an alternative machine whose numbers can be increased by an application to the local magistrates.

Mr. Terry Dicks (Hayes and Harlington): I have listened carefully to what my hon. Friend has said. There seems to be a working-class versus middle-class approach. If one is an Arab, or one has a bow tie or a long frock on —Opposition Members know my views on this—one goes to a gaming club in central London where there are many one-armed bandits. It is different if one belongs to a bingo club or to a working men's club, as people do in my constituency. What is the thinking behind that? What sort of nonsensical attitude are the Government showing on the issue yet again? Surely they should say that we are all equal or, better still, they should give more facilities to people in working men's clubs and bingo halls who are ordinary working-class people. The Government should say to the people with bow ties or long frocks in the gaming clubs in central London that they do not need all the machines because they have more money to use on the gaming tables instead.

Mr. Fry: My hon. Friend, as usual, puts his point of view graphically and I agree with most of what he says. However, his question should be addressed to our right hon. Friend the Minister rather than to me.

After the amendments had been agreed in Committee, the Bill would have increased the number of gaming machines in bingo halls. That would not have been taken up in the large halls and by the most prosperous companies in the industry.

The section of the industry that is concerned is that which is most at risk. I refer to the small clubs, often in small country towns where there may not be any alternative entertainment or relaxation for people who like to go to bingo halls, and who do not like to go to pubs on their own. That especially applies to ladies who are over 40 years of age and who enjoy a flutter in a bingo hall. Various studies have demonstrated the social value of bingo halls to that section of the community. When the Government accepted my Gaming (Amendment) Act 1987, which established the National Game a few years ago, they recognised that point.

If the clubs that are at most risk financially are not given some form of extra encouragement, they will tend to go out of business, and this type of social activity will disappear in some areas. The Bingo Association of Great Britain merely wants a level and fair playing field. I hope that the Government recognise the differences between the various sectors of gambling. If they do not and they state that they are all the same and that the law will not be revised, they should not be surprised when amendments such as those accepted in Committee are tabled.

It is perfectly proper for the casinos to make their proposals and for the clubs to do likewise. If those proposals are accepted, the bingo industry is fully entitled to ask for equal treatment. That was the basis of our amendment in Committee and that is why it was accepted.

I do not wish to wreck the Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Favell), but I hope that he understands that I cannot support his amendments. Having won the argument in Committee, I should at least stand by the amendment that I tabled then.

Mr. Dennis Turner (Wolverhampton, South-East): I declare my interest as a member of the all-party clubs group.

The amendments tabled in Committee were generous to the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Favell). As has been already stated, all that we sought from the Government was fair and non-discriminatory treatment between the clubs, bingo halls and casinos. It is incomprehensible that the Government could not accept those amendments, which were tabled in good faith and accepted by a substantial majority in Committee, as the hon. Member for Stockport would concede. The Government's reasoning in Committee seemed fallacious—that the casinos should be treated differently from clubs and bingo halls for no apparent or justifiable reason. The Minister argued that the recommendations came from the Gaming Board and that the board was prepared to accept an increase in the number of one-arm bandits in casinos.

On behalf of the clubs committee, we registered the majority of our clubs under the Industrial and Providence Society. If it is argued that the Gaming Board supports the application for an increase in the number of one-arm bandits in casinos, we could argue that the Industrial and Providence Society would equally like an increase in the number of one-arm bandits in clubs. They should be given equal status.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): A classless society.

Mr. Turner: Exactly. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point, as did the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks). Discrimination exists, and working men's clubs, as well as Conservative, Liberal and Labour clubs and bingo halls where people go for a little pleasure—who can deny them that—should be treated equally so that they can have the facilities that they want.

Even at this late stage, I hope that the Minister will tell us that the Government are prepared to treat all those important entertainment institutions with equity, so that the legislation can be passed to benefit all the interests that we have mentioned. I hope that the Minister will tell us that the Government have relented and want to treat everyone fairly. We can then get the legislation through and help the important institutions that we support.

1.45 pm

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): May I say at the outset that I have no interest in the British Casino Association. The Bill was introduced by Lord Lisle in another place, and that is why I am dealing with the matter here. Like many punters in casinos, bingo halls and clubs, I am in a no win situation. I have much sympathy with the views of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. Turner), and those of my hon. Friends the Members for Slough (Mr. Watts), for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry) and for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks). He made a sensible intervention, as usual.

I have been to casinos—although I do not think that I have ever won—and they are not confined to the nobs. I have seen people from all walks of life playing blackjack and even baccarat, and other games the rules of which I do not understand Casinos are the only places in which people can indulge in hard gaming. There are only about 100 in the United Kingdom. That is why the Gaming Board for Great Britain does not object to an increase in the number of fruit machines in gaming casinos.

The Gaming Board was set up by the Government when the Gaming Act 1968 was first introduced. It has carried out its functions extremely well. It was feared that the Mafia could come into the country if gaming remained underground or was not supervised properly. I have never heard any criticism of the Gaming Board and the way in which it discharges its functions. Therefore, the Home Office is bound to take its advice seriously.

The Minister will no doubt confirm that the advice of the Gaming Board is that it is all right for people to engage in hard gaming in a gaming casino. These days, the jackpot from a fruit machine is £250, which is not peanuts. It believes that elsewhere they should be restricted to the present numbers, because otherwise young people and others might be drawn into gambling. I am not an expert on this matter, but the Gaming Board is, and that is its view.

I am obliged to introduce the amendments to reverse the changes made in Committee, not because I do not have sympathy with what has been said, but simply because the Bill will fail otherwise. I have seen Home Office Ministers on a number of occasions and it has been made clear to me that either we accept two more fruit machines in the gaming casinos and no more elsewhere or the Bill will fail. It is as simple as that. Let us have half a loaf, which is better than none. I ask my hon. Friends to come back next year with amendments to deal with premises that are not devoted to hard gaming to see whether they can persuade the Home Office and the Gaming Board.

Mr. Turner: The argument about young people playing the machines was not advanced in Committee. The Government would not have used that argument because they would have been perfectly aware that if one wants to become a member of a club of the kind that we are talking about, one has to be 18 or over. Therefore, the argument about youngsters playing the machines is irrelevant.

Mr. Favell: I take the hon. Gentleman's point. I am not an expert. He may be right, but one goes into a gaming casino for one reason only—to indulge in hard gaming. When one joins a cricket, golf, working men's or even a Labour party club the main reason for doing so is not, I hope, to play the fruit machines or to indulge in gambling.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mrs. Angela Rumbold): The Government very much welcome the amendments proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Favell). He is absolutely right when he says that the Gaming Board for Great Britain was set up under the Gaming Act 1968 to consider such proposals as the increase in the number of jackpot machines. What is in question here is gaming machines. It is, therefore, right that the Gaming Board's role should come into play.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry) asked about how strongly the Government feel about the matter. He also said that if the Government feel so strongly about the amendments that he tabled in Committee, they should reconsider their stance on gaming. That may be a reasonable request, but at present we are considering this Bill. Therefore, the Government are simply putting forward the view that to amend the gaming laws in this way would be unsatisfactory.

Mr. Fry: I trust that the Government would take a similarly sympathetic view about sensible moves to reform the gaming legislation if a private Member's Bill should be introduced.

Mrs. Rumbold: It would be up to my hon. Friend to bring forward such suggestion, if he so wished. I do not intend to pre-empt the view of any future Government, but I am sure that they would look carefully at such proposals, if they were made.

As for the point made by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. Turner), the argument that the Government advance is that which influenced the Rothschild royal commission on betting and gaming when it considered the question of casinos versus working men's clubs, bingo clubs and Conservative party clubs. It is not a question of having one set of rules for one type of person and another set for another type of person. The fact is that casinos are different and should be treated differently from bingo and other registered clubs. That fact is underlined by the different regulations, which provide, appropriately, for a different allocation of jackpot machines.

Mr. Turner: I accept the contention that casinos are different, in the sense that hard gambling takes place on roulette tables, but I do not see how one can make the case that they are different in terms of one-armed bandits. All one-armed bandits are identical, whether they stand in a casino, a bingo hall or other club. The people who go into casinos do not put their money into one-armed bandits. They go in for the hard gambling on the roulette tables. I repeat, however, that the one-armed bandit is the same, wherever it stands. That is the best argument, therefore, for treating them all in the same way.

Mrs. Rumbold: I disagree with the hon. Gentleman. Casinos in Las Vegas have serried ranks of jackpot machines for hard gambling, whereas people use clubs for different reasons—possibly to take their children or to meet friends—but not for the sole purpose of hard gambling. Jackpot machines in those clubs are restricted, but their principal purpose is not an attraction but very much an aside.

Mr. Turner: The machines are identical—they all take 10p coins. One does not spend £5 on a machine in a casino but only 10p in a club. It is wrong, therefore, to differentiate between machines. I have never been to Las Vegas, but the cost of playing machines there may be graded. If a machine in a casino cost £5 to play but only 10p in a club, I could understand the Minister making a distinction, but that does not arise. The machines are the same and the cost is the same, so why not treat them the same?

Mrs. Rumbold: The Gaming Act 1968 provides for two types of gaming machine—jackpots and amusements with prizes. The latter, with their low stake and maximum cash prize of £2·40p or non-monetary prizes of £4·80p, are much more appropriate for clubs and bingo clubs. The maximum prize on jackpot machines is £150. That is hard gaming. There is a difference between clubs and casinos. Bingo is a comparatively soft form of gambling, but there is no doubt what people do at a casino, which is different from the kind of clubs that the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-East is talking about. One cannot make a comparison; nor can one say that there is discrimination because people can choose where they wish to go.

Therefore, the Government welcome the amendments tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Stockport to reinstate the original provisions of the Bill, whereby casinos will be allowed four jackpot machines instead of two and clubs such as bingo halls and other working men's clubs will be restricted to two.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): I am afraid—I think that the House will share this view—that the Minister is wholly unconvincing. The Government are right to be cautious about increasing people's ability to gamble. I acknowledge the special problem of gambling addiction among extremely young people.

The so-called amusement arcades in many high streets are not members of an association or federation and are badly supervised. I wish that local authorities had far more powers to refuse or to refuse to renew licences.

The point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. Turner)—he insists on calling his constituency Bilston, which describes it more accurately—goes to the nub of the problem. He said that fruit machines are the same wherever they are. I accept the Minister's distinction between bingo halls and casinos. Like her, I do not frequent casinos—I may have been in one or two in my life when I have been on holiday—but I cannot believe that someone who crosses the threshold of a casino does so merely to play on a fruit machine. As the Minister said, people go there for hard gambling. They may not use the machines while they are there, but that is not the point of the amendment.

2 pm

The Minister overlooked the fact that supervision in bingo halls and clubs is not just good but fierce. My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-East has great experience of that, as do some other hon. Members. I do not mean to criticise that supervision. In my constituency there is an ex-service men's club. I wish that it was a club for everyone who has been in the services, but that is another matter. The security at the entrance to that club is first class. It not only has cameras, but somebody is always on the door to ensure that only members are allowed in. No one could quarrel with the fact that that club is well supervised. I have no doubt that, if youngsters were seen spending a long time and a lot of money on fruit machines—their parents might have gone for a quick snorter so that the children were not properly supervised —responsible members of the club's committee would intervene and talk to the parents.

Although it would not usually be wrong for the House to overturn decisions taken at Committee stage, it would be so in the case of this Bill. Although I was not party to it, there was an extensive debate aimed at achieving equality of treatment for different gambling places. We have not persuaded the Minister about that. I never thought that I would agree with the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) and he doubtless reciprocates that feeling, but he is dead right on this matter. It may be an accident of history—the Act went on the statute book in 1968—but behind the Gaming Board for Great Britain is a hint of suspicion that we are legislating against working people who cannot be trusted as much as the sheikhs who can be found in casinos tonight while Kuwait burns and whose standard of living has not changed a jot or tittle since the dreadful invasion of that country. Gambling places should be treated equally and I am sorry that the Minister denies that. I hope that the House will not support the amendments.

Mr. Dicks: I find myself in a strange position. We are almost back to the philosophy behind my speech during the arts debate.

The Home Office Ministers and those who advise them have probably never been in a working men's club or sat in a bingo hall. I have been to many such clubs, including the Conservative club in Hayes and Harlington, and, many years ago, I was a bingo caller. Those who go to such places are average people.

Mr. Turner: The hon. Gentleman is in good company because I too used to be a bingo caller—clickety click, 66.

Mr. Favell: I have also been a bingo caller.

Mr. Dicks: I was going to say, "Legs 11, two little ducks —quack, quack."

This is a serious matter for all our friends in the clubs and bingo halls. Why cannot ordinary people who go to bingo halls to play bingo, and who might want a break between one game and another, spend a couple of bob trying to win £250? The same should apply in working men's clubs. It annoys me greatly that my right hon. Friend the Minister does not seem to realise that the people in their bow ties and long skirts do not go to play machines in casinos, but for hard gambling. The machines are just an afterthought, along with the coffee and double Scotch that they have when they cannot get a table.

Knowing that the Prime Minister talks of a classless society—we all accept that—how can my right hon. Friend the Minister give us a class-ridden argument? Why can the Arabs and everybody else go to the best parts of London such as Mayfair and gamble to their hearts' content, but a little old lady who spends £1 to go in and play bingo cannot put another 50p into a one-armed bandit machine?

Mr. Watts: 20p.

Mr. Dicks: As my hon. Friend says, why cannot that little old lady spend 20p? Why cannot those who use the Hayes and Harlington conservative club have the same opportunity as those using casinos? Why do they have to wait?

If my right hon. Friend the Minister is going to argue, she should talk with knowledge and understanding of the position and bear in mind that we are not all from the middle and upper classes. We do not all have first class degrees from Oxbridge and sit in the Home Office giving advice; we are ordinary, working people. We are talking about ordinary, working people—the Prime Minister is an ordinary, working chap. He talks about the classless society. My right hon. Friend the Minister should listen, accept what is happening and allow the ordinary clubs the same facilities and consideration.

Mr. Fry: Does my hon. Friend accept that the argument put forward by my right hon. Friend the Minister about Las Vegas can hardly apply to working men's clubs and bingo halls when we are talking about an increase of only one or two machines? The position is slightly different.

Mr. Dicks: I agree that there can be no comparison. When my right hon. Friend the Minister mentioned that issue I wondered where she had gone in the United States and whether she could name a bingo hall or a working men's club in America. The advice that my right hon. Friend the Minister has received is bad advice. Her comments to the House have been uninformed and class ridden, and I hope that she will reconsider.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): I should like to jump on the same bandwagon as the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks). I am little upset by some of this morning's suggestions relating to amendments, particularly those made by the Minister. How many times are examples given in this pace of what is done in Europe, Japan and America? I am bothered about what we do here. That should be our first consideration. Other places have the same problem. My hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) mentioned clip joints. I have never been into one of them, but I have heard about the goings on in them.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) talked about security in some places and having to look after this, that and the other, and ensure that everything is all right. But the bandwagon of the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington is the correct one. The Prime Minister stood at the Dispatch Box and talked about a classless society. The measure creates a two-tier society—with one thing for the workers and one thing for the big nobs.

Mr. Skinner: This is all about opted-out one-armed bandits.

Mr. Haynes: My hon. Friend can always come up with the right suggestion or comment straight off the top of his head.

I am surprised that the Prime Minister talked about a classless society not all that many days ago, and then the Minister stood here this afternoon and went in a different direction. It would seem that the Government are not together——

Mr. Corbett: Another split.

Mr. Haynes: Quite right. One half of the Cabinet wants to go to the country, the other half does not. One half wants one-armed bandits in the Cabinet room, the other half does not. They do not know where they are going, do they? But we are here to put them right.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-East. Members served on the Committee and did all that hard work and now, in a few moments, the Government are trying to destroy it. We are not going to have it. We will vote on this one——

Mr. Skinner: My hon. Friend knows only too well that if there were a couple of one-armed bandits in the House of Commons on a Friday they would not make a deal of money.

Mr. Haynes: I hope that the Minister will not take up that idea. They are talking about having televisions sets in different rooms. If that happens, no one will come in here, and if one-armed bandits are installed Members will not come in even on a Thursday, let alone a Friday. Some of us, such as my hon. Friends the Members for Bolsover and for Wolverhampton, South-East, try to come here regularly, but other hon. Members will be spending their time on the one-armed bandits. We cannot have that. I hope that the Minister will ignore that suggestion and will listen to our serious suggestions. I even hope that she will go into the Lobby with us now.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

2.21 pm

Mrs. Rumbold: It may be helpful if I put the Government's view on the Bill. We saw the proposal in the Bill, as originally drafted, to increase, from two to four, the number of jackpot machines permitted in casinos as a modest one which fits well within the established framework of gambling in this country.

I may be helpful if I set out briefly the provisions on gaming machines. These machines are regulated by part III of the Gaming Act 1968. The Act provides for two types of gaming machine—jackpot machines, which are the subject of this Bill, and amusement-with-prizes machines, that is, the common fruit machine. As their name suggests, amusement-with-prizes machines are primarily intended for amusement, not for gambling, and are therefore widely available, for example, in pubs, amusement arcades and cafes. In fact, there are some 193,000 such machines, the majority of which are located in pubs, as most hon. Members will know. The emphasis on amusement is reflected in the modest prize that may be won—£2·40 in cash or £4·80 in tokens—the low stake-prize ration which is only 1:12 in the case of the cash prize, and in the prize structure, which deliberately provides for a non-monetary prize significantly greater in value than the cash prize.

Jackpot machines, on the other hand, provide for a much harder form of gambling and are therefore confined to casinos, licensed bingo clubs and members' clubs and miners' welfare institutes registered under the Gaming Act 1986, and anything else registered under the Act. In each case, the Act limits the number of machines to two. There are some 40,000 jackpot machines in circulation—240 in casinos, 400 to 500 in bingo clubs and some 39,000 in registered clubs. Confining these machines to members' clubs, where the public do not have direct access, reflects the nature of the machines. The character of the machines as hard gaming machines is also reflected in the size of the prize—that is £150—which serves to encourage play, the high stake-prize ration of 1:750, the rapidity of play and the absence of any restraints on the length of play. Indeed, although the maximum stake is only 20p, many machines accept a £1 coin for five games, so it is possible to spend relatively large amounts of money in a short time. As many hon. Members will know, it is also possible to become addicted to this form of gambling.

As long ago as 1978, the Rothschild royal commission on gambling concluded that it was anomalous for premises expressly set aside for hard gaming to be treated on an equal footing with, for example, a village cricket club. By way of remedy, the commission adopted the proposal put forward by the British Casino Association that a casino's entitlement to jackpot machines be linked to the number of gaming tables, and recommended a ratio of one machine for every two tables. Such an arrangement is, in our view, no longer practicable.

Mr. Turner: Will the Minister tell the House whether it is the Government's intention to talk the Bill out and not allow us to vote on Third Reading?

Mrs. Rumbold: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be interested in the Government's reasons for wishing to support the Bill in its original form. If the hon. Gentleman does not mind, I should prefer to continue with what I have to say.

Mr. Haynes: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. This is disgraceful. My hon. Friend the member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. Turner) asked the Minister whether she was talking the Bill out on behalf of the Government. We can see and we know what is going on. The Minister did not have the decency to say yes or no to my hon. Friend. I think, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you should challenge the Minister to answer the question. It is an extremely important Bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): The Minister is in order, and that is the sole concern of the Chair.

Mr. Skinner: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is normal on Fridays for private Members' Bills to be enacted. Back-Bench Members bring Bills before the House, of their own accord, to be passed. Sometimes, as we all know, Bills can be talked out, especially on a Friday, but it is unusual for the Government to use Ministers to stop Bills. There have been many occasions when Back-Bench Members have done that, but it has not been done by Ministers. Today, it seems that the Government are intervening to prevent the progress of a Bill that they supported. They do not like it because they have been defeated in a Division, and they have the cheek to talk about democracy. The Bill was considered in Committee and it was reported. The Government wanted to change the Bill—it must be remembered that this is a private Member's Bill—and, because they cannot get their own way, they have decided, it seems, to talk it out. It is an unusual practice.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Points of order are taking up time. It would be better if the Minister were able to get on with her speech.

Mrs. Rumbold: It is important that I explain to the House why the Government feel relatively strongly about the Bill.

The royal commission's recommendation was made when gaming duty was assessed partly on the number of gaming tables, and casino proprietors were under no obligation to notify changes in the number to Customs and Excise. Duty is no longer assessed on that basis. Since 1984, it has instead been assessed on the basis of a casino's gross gaming yield, that is, the amount staked less winnings. Subject only to the available gaming area or any undertaking given the licensing justices, there are now no controls on the number of gaming tables; as a result, entitlement to jackpot machines could vary without notice as a casino proprietor increased or decreased his complement of gaming tables.

The solution adopted by the British Casino Association, to increase the entitlement to four machines per casino, overcomes this difficulty. Furthermore, by maintaining a reasonable upper limit on the number of machines, the Bill avoids the Las Vegas-style serried ranks of jackpot machines, which were opposed by both the Rothschild royal commission and by the Gaming Board for Great Britain, as alien to the character and atmosphere of casinos in this country.

The Bill, as originally drafted, quite rightly in our view, maintains the existing limit of two machines for premises other than casinos which are permitted to use jackpot machines. I am referring, of course, to licensed bingo clubs and registered clubs. Such premises are not intended primarily for hard gaming, and so are in many respects less tightly regulated than are casinos. This is particularly true of registered clubs and miners' welfare institutes as I was at pains to point out earlier today. Indeed, a case can be made for removing members' clubs' entitlement to jackpot machines on the grounds that the 1968 Act provides inadequate controls of these clubs. To obtain a licence under the Act, the proprietor must first undergo searching scrutiny by the Gaming Board; the licence is up for renewal annually and there is year-round supervision by the board inspectorate, paid for through a substantial renewal fee.

Registered clubs have no such regime. The grounds for refusal of registration are closely circumscribed, and registration lasts for five years. That relative absence of control on registered clubs opens up the possibility of fiddling. The Rothschild royal commission identified three possible means of fiddling:

> "(i) The mechanism of the machine may be interfered with to give a lower rate of return than that specified by the manufacturer; or to give an increased rate of return for a short time to stimulate play. Alternatively, a symbol on a reel may just be altered to decrease the chance of a player winning a prize. Those 'adjustments' are not difficult to make but very difficult at present for a player to detect."

Women (Labour Market)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Nicholas Baker.]

2.34 pm

Ms. Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North): I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for having the opportunity to raise the most important issue of women returning to work. Women throughout the country will be aware of the irony that, on the day when most hon. Members return from work to their homes, it is necessary for me to delay going home for a further day to raise the most important issue of how women can play their full part in the working environment.

It is also a timely occasion on which to raise the subject because the Prime Minister is about to make a speech—and may already have done so—on a charter for citizens. To what extent has the whole issue of women's rights been incorporated in the Prime Minister's charter?

In a week in which we have heard from an ex-Prime Minister that

"Home is where you come to when you have nothing better to do", this is a timely occasion on which to raise the issue of women returning to the labour market. I suspect that many women, like myself, want to do their full duty to their children, to their families generally and to their homes and at the same time want an opportunity to continue to work or to return to work with the full rights and benefits that are achieved by our counterparts in other European countries. The issue must be given greater political priority.

It is also a timely occasion on which to raise the issue because on Tuesday I had the great privilege officially to open an exhibition that was organised by the equal opportunities advisory sub-committee of Staffordshire county council in partnership with the training and enterprise council in Staffordshire and Stoke-on-Trent city council. It was an absolutely magnificent initiative, taken by the Labour-controlled council on behalf of women in Staffordshire. The point of the two-day exhibition, which was called "New Directions", was to encourage women to start to take back their places in the work force.

I have nothing but praise for the chair of that sub-committee, Councillor Pauline Brownless, because of the way in which she, together with her partners, organised the two-day exhibition. Just as she is asking women in Staffordshire to take on new directions, it is only right that I, as a woman representative of Staffordshire, should raise the issue. Now is the time to say that we have good representation by women in Staffordshire. I am thinking especially of my hon. Friends the Members for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mrs. Golding) and for Mid-Staffordshire (Mrs. Heal). If the county council, despite cuts in local authority services, is raising the issue, it is time that the Government gave the highest political priority to women returning to work. What is done in Staffordshire can be done only with the full backing of Government.

The issue is important in terms not only of women wanting to achieve their full potential by returning to work or to avoid living in poverty, but of the current demographic trend. We have information from the National Economic Development Office which shows that, by 1995, 80 per cent. of those returning to work will be women. There will be a net increase of 80 per cent. in women returning to work. The current recession may create some slight delay to that trend. In Staffordshire, the current recession has caused many people to be thrown back on to the unemployment queues. None the less, it is important that the county council did not abandon the two-day exhibition because of the recession. The county council recognises that, despite the recession, we have to plan long term for the needs of women.

I will outline for the Minister's benefit what Staffordshire council and its partners, the TEC and the city council, did. It had a two-day exhibition which was well supported by local industry, by local businesses, by local voluntary organisations and, not least, by the services of Staffordshire county council, such as the fire services, and by the environmental health department of the city council. All those departments give women their full part in terms of higher management positions. They do not merely keep them doing menial, low-paid tasks.

Child care was available for the women who went to the exhibition, which included seminars, information and advice on training, enterprise and employment throughout the day. Flexible opening hours meant that it was possible for women to fit attending the exhibition into their schedules whether they were at home or at work. Every woman with a child at school in the city received an invitation to the event. It was advertised on a huge scale.

If more women are to become involved in public life and in the workplace, the first thing is to recognise that we must convince ourselves—and this includes female hon. Members—that we have the confidence to take the next step forward, whatever that may be. The exhibition was therefore about confidence-building for women.

It was not a two-day exhibition which, once held, would never be heard of again; there is to be a follow-up. The county council is to evaluate fully the issues that arose. Having brought together leading people from industry, local authorities and local voluntary groups, there will now be a group of people to monitor and assess the needs of women locally to improve the desperately needed facilities. That co-ordination to ensure that whatever is needed is provided does not exist at Government level.

In Staffordshire, we wish to press forward with a number of issues. We want flexible working hours, job-sharing schemes, work-break schemes and term-time contracts. Any woman who holds down a job knows that that is difficult when the children go to school because half-term holidays, school holidays and so-called "Baker days" make nonsense of any arrangements that might have been made. We want child care centres for the under-fives and—the Government referred to this some time ago but, to my knowledge, little came of it—a facility whereby children can stay in the school buildings and be properly looked after until their parents finish work. The initiative of the North Staffordshire health authority is a good example. It has a scheme for children who are on holiday which fits in with their parents' shifts in the hospitals. That makes a great difference to women who want to return to work and a great deal of economic sense bearing in mind the shortage of and the difficulties in recruiting women back to the work force.

We also wish training to be improved. Our adult training budget in Stoke-on-Trent is completely inadequate for the needs not just of the city but of the whole of Staffordshire. I was distressed to receive a letter from the Staffordshire training and enterprise council, which stated that it would be failing in its responsibilities to the local community if it did not set out the implications for its adult programme of the reductions in the budget that it receives from the Government. About 600 training places have been terminated and people who had been taken on to conduct those training responsibilities have been made redundant. That is not the way to get women back to work.

I should also like to draw attention to the booklet produced by the Minister's Department, "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1991-92 to 1993-94". One has to search the document very hard to find any reference to gender. I could not find any direct reference to gender or equal opportunities or any help for women wishing to return to work.

Not only far-sighted Labour-controlled authorities and the local partners who joined in Staffordshire county council's venture have women's interests at heart. It is clear to me from my limited research that some companies assist women who wish to return to work. One such company is ICL, in Kidsgrove in my constituency, which has a large manufacturing plant producing mainframe computers. It has issued a policy statement, "Women's Employment in ICL", and it recognises that the development and retention of existing skills within the work force is important.

Many professional associations, such as the Royal Pharmaceutical Society, have published booklets and given advice and information to women to encourage them to return to work. Many trade unions, such as the Ceramic and Allied Trade Union in Stoke-on-Trent, have women's officers to encourage women who are returning to the work force.

By contrast, the Government's commitment and proven track record is worrying. There is still no woman in the Cabinet. Britain has the worst maternity pay rights in Europe. There is no reference to gender in the statement from the Department of Education and Science, or in the Government's expenditure plans for the Department of Employment. The Minister should tell us why there is no concerted, co-ordinated attempt to ensure that women's interests are properly taken into account when policies are made.

This problem applies to all Departments. The Department of Health is rightly being criticised at the moment. Rather than just giving advice on retainer schemes in the public sector, it should have required such schemes to be introduced. I tabled questions at the beginning of the week to find out the Government's view. It was inconvenient because I had to go from one Department to another, not knowing which one had responsibility for what. I wonder how we can find out who is monitoring and evaluating the introduction of retainer schemes in not only the public sector but the private sector.

Many issues need to be raised, such as part-time work, maternity rights and minimum wage protection. It is scandalous that some women work for only £1·25 per hour as contract clearners and 52p an hour as homeworkers. The Government cut training instead of planning a strategy to enable women to top up their skills and return to work. There is fragmentation and a lack of a coherent strategy.

There is still a clear distinction between girls' subjects, boys' subjects and integrated subjects in schools.

Discrimination, no matter how inadvertent, begins at school and may affect future career decisions and act against women.

The women in Staffordshire who sampled the huge feast of opportunity that was laid on by a partnership of local authorities need Government backing to be able to return to work. The educational and training needs of women are linked with those of the economy. A woman should not be forced to choose between the children whom she loves and the work that she would like to do. In contrast to the Government, the Labour party has a charter for working women. Only when those women who attended the New Directions fair return to work with equal rights, pay and opportunities, and help with child care and looking after dependent relatives, will we have a Government who are prepared to equal the commitment made by Staffordshire county council.

We do not want decision makers who are out of touch and who pay lip service to women's hopes of fulfilment. We want a co-ordinated strategy and a full charter for women who, as citizens, make up more than 50 per cent. of the population. In the absence of a combined Government strategy, I look forward to hearing from the Minister exactly how he believes that the hopes, aims and ambitions of women in north Staffordshire can be achieved.

2.49 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Robert Jackson): I congratulate the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms. Walley) on raising this important issue. I think that she will find that there is common ground between the parties in all parts of the House about its significance. She made a wide-ranging speech. I may not succeed in doing so, but I shall try to take up all her points.

Women make a crucial contribution to this country's economic wealth. More and more women are, as we know, entering the labour market or, just as importantly—this was one of the themes to which the hon. Lady referred—rejoining it after having had families.

Let me start with a few simple facts. The hon. Lady mentioned the European Community context. Britain has the second highest participation rate for women in work in the EC, at 61·7 per cent. Only Denmark outranks us, with 75·2 per cent. of their women being economically active. There are, however, more women in employment in the United Kingdom than in any other European Community state. In fact, 44 per cent. of our labour force are women. There are 12 million women in Great Britain who are economically active, and a quarter of small business owners are women. That is a very impressive set of facts. The hon. Lady was inclined on some points to be somewhat critical of the Government's record and of our achievements in Britain, but those facts suggest that we cannot be doing so badly if we compare them with the performance of other countries.

Why has Britain done relatively well in encouraging the employment of women? The most important factors are, I believe, economic. They have to do with the operation of the market and market forces. That will be the main theme of what I have to say. In fairness to ourselves, however, we must recognise that both local and central Government have played their part in this achievement. I am very happy to join the hon. Lady in congratulating Staffordshire county council on what sounds like an excellent and interesting initiative, which I wish well.

The Government's view, however, is that the most important factor in achieving progress for women's employment lies in the creation and development of a competitive economic environment that encourages job creation. That has been the main thrust of Government policy over the last 10 years. Women have taken full advantage of it. In fact, two thirds of the growth in the size of the labour force between 1984 and 1990 was accounted for by married women. We believe that one of the most important features of the past 10 years has been the growth of enterprise in the United Kingdom, which has led to a significant culture change in the role and participation of women in the economic life of the country.

We think that self-employment, which has grown enormously under this Government, has a particular appeal for women who want to combine financial independence and career satisfaction while responding—as the hon. Lady said that they should and must—to the ever-changing needs of their families. There has been a vast growth in the numbers of women choosing the self-employed option over the last 10 years. In 1979, there were 373,000 women in that category. In 1990, there were more than 800,000. Women now comprise a quarter of all self-employed people, with more than 200,000 having staff of their own.

The hon. Lady may think that this is an excessively economist interpretation of the way that progress can be made in female employment. I can assure her that the Government believe that political and legislative action has its place, though I think that there may be some difference between the parties on the importance of political and legislative action. The hon. Lady may, I believe, attach exaggerated weight to the concepts of co-ordination and strategic planning and to the development of political and governmental machinery. I am not sure that that is the way forward for women.

The hon. Lady recommended that the Government accept the concept of the minimum wage, but that would be detrimental to female employment. She must accept that if she imposes burdens on employers in relation to certain categories of employees, employers may not give them jobs. She may set out with the best of intentions, but their effect may be to damage people's opportunities.

The Government are fully committed to the principle of equal opportunities employment and to the legislation that gives effect to it. We have continued to work in that spirit. We removed, in the Sex Discrimination Act 1986 and the Employment Act 1989, the outdated restrictions on the hours that women can work and on the work that they can do. They are free to compete equally with men for higher paid jobs, including shift work.

The hon. Lady referred to training, in which it is important that Government play an active part. More than 60,000 women are being trained under employment training. The hon. Lady was fairly critical of developments in employment training. I have corresponded with her and she understands the shift that we have been trying to make between employment training measures and employment service measures to help unemployed people through the job clubs and the job interview guaranteee scheme. However, those 60,000 women being trained on ET are much more than was achieved by the previous Labour Government. In 1979, only 24,000 women were trained under TOPs. Although adjustments are being made, they are from a much higher base than the Labour party achieved in government. More than 350,000 women have been trained since the launch of ET in September 1988, and a higher proportion of new trainees are women than when it began.

Ms. Walley: Many issues have been raised, but the Minister is overlooking my point about the importance of ensuring that women are able to participate in projects that enable them to get back to work. In 1989, Mrs. Kay Jackson, who was married with three children, was offered a place on employment training but was unable to take it because her allowance and her husband's salary would not have covered the costs of child care. The Government changed the Employment Protection Act 1975, and a case of discrimination that was upheld was subsequently reversed because of that change. That leads me to think that their commitment to equal opportunities is not as straightforward as the Minister suggests.

Mr. Jackson: The hon. Lady knows that there is a time limit on the debate and that responding to her intervention will make it more difficult for me to respond to her speech. I was about to deal with the role of the training and enterprise councils and their flexibility in, for example, payment of child care allowances.

One of the most important developments in training has been the creation of the training and enterprise councils. I am glad that the hon. Lady mentioned them favourably and that there is co-operation between Staffordshire county council and the TEC to which she referred. We have given TECs a clear message in our strategic guidance about the growing importance of women in the work force. The plans of TECs show awareness of that, not only in their main training programmes but in the enterprise allowance scheme, whereby more than a third of enterprise allowance scheme support is given to women, and that has doubled since 1982.

Staffordshire TEC runs a course, mainly for women, to help to inform career choices. It is running short courses for women returners, often with creches, it has contributed to returners' day exhibitions and it has applied for funds for returners from the European social fund, which is rather innovative. There are several other examples of what TECs are doing, such as the issuing of women returners' newsletters, the setting up of returners' units by Essex TEC, action in Thames Valley TEC for retraining women in sales and marketing and action by Tyneside TEC, East Lancashire TEC, the Heart of England TEC and the Hertfordshire TEC.

A great deal is being done by TECs in different ways to promote the opportunity for women to return to work. However, as I said in response to the hon. Lady's intervention, the Government are setting a flexible framework for TECs to decide the real needs of women returning to work in their areas. We are allowing for women returners to enter employment training, even though they may not have been registered as unemployed. That is an element of flexibility. We are allowing part-time training and have given TECs greater flexibility in the payment of child care allowances while retaining the principle that child care allowances are mandatory for the long-term unemployed who need it under the Government's guarantee.

Another crucial subject to which the hon. Lady referred was working practices. Ultimately, the question of the opportunity for women to return to work will be largely determined by what happens in the workplace, particularly employers' policies. The hon. Lady mentioned many ways in which employers can adapt working practices to make it easier for employees—men as well as women—to combine work and family responsibilities, such as job sharing, career breaks, part-time work, using new technology, and so on. I am happy to join her in paying tribute to ICL in that context.

The Government believe that it is for employers to judge what best suits their circumstances. Many employers are taking a lead in adopting flexible working practices. For example, the civil service , which is a major employer, is setting a good example by spreading good practice. My Department will shortly publish a booklet that will illustrate working examples of innovative schemes and the benefits that they have brought to employees and their families.

I note what the hon. Lady said about child care. The Government believe that employers should be encouraged to recognise that child care assistance for their employees is an important way to recruit and retain the staff that they need. That is best done by voluntary action to ensure that employers find an appropriate way to match their needs with parents' requirements for child care. The Government's role is primarily regulatory to ensure higher standards, but we have been encouraging additional provision for good quality child care—for example, through the concession in the 1990 budget to exempt employer-provided nurseries from tax. That exemption goes wider than is often appreciated. It extends beyond the workplace—a fact which is often misunderstood—to nurseries run by employers at the workplace or elsewhere, and to nurseries run by employers jointly with other employers, voluntary bodies or local authorities. The provision is flexible and should be more widely taken up.

Comparisons are often made between this country's performance on child care and that of other countries in the European Community. We have a different pattern of child care provision, with a greater mixture of private, public and voluntary sector provision for children of all ages, and we do not do too badly. The strength of our variety is reflected in the fact that about 86 per cent. of three and four-year-olds in Britain are in education and day care, which places us near the top of the European league table of comparisons.

I hope that the hon. Lady referred to part-time work, because it is one of the most important areas of opportunity for women returners. Its growth was one of the most striking phenomena in the 1980s. It has increased by 34 per cent. since 1983 and is often a welcome form of flexible work for women who want to combine work with family responsibilities. It will be an increasingly important option in the 1990s. Research by the Confederation of British Industry suggests that 80 per cent. of women who wish to return to work in the next five years will look for part-time work. The labour force survey that my Department conducts shows that a high proportion of women who work part time do not want a full-time job.

Indeed, only 7 per cent. said that they did. The evidence shows that the vast majority of part-time workers work part time because they prefer to do so.

The hon. Lady did not mention the European Community's part-time and temporary work directives, which fall under the heading of some of the well-intentioned political and legislative actions that can be detrimental and damaging. They would increase the financial and administrative burdens on businesses, especially small ones, which is why we are resisting those proposals——

The motion having been made after half-past Two o'clock, and the debate having continued for half an hour, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Local Government Finance

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table showing reconciliations for England, Scotland and Wales between local authority current expenditure as in table 5.8 of Cm. 1520 and the respective aggregate expenditure for grant purposes in successive revenue/(rate) support grant orders.

Mr. Mellor: Following the changes to the local authority finance system, data are no longer held in a form which makes it possible to provide the information requested, except at disproportionate cost. For most years, figures for current expenditure have changed only very slightly from those given to the hon. Member in response to the similar question he asked on 20 July 1990.

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report an analysis for the years 1984-85 to 1993-94, in as far as practicable in the same format as table 5.1 of Cm. 1520 of aggregate external finance of local authorities, showing (a) changes between table 21.4.3 of Cm. 1021 and table 5.3 of Cm. 1520 and (b) changes between table 5.3 of Cm. 1520 and the "Financial Report and Budget Statement" 1991-92.

Mr. Mellor: The information is set out in the table below. It is on the same basis as the information on differences from Cm. 1021 presented in the statistical supplement to the 1990 autumn statement—that is, it excludes differences arising from changes in the way expenditure is recorded (classification changes) or from transfers between departments or sectors (for example, switching responsibility for expenditure from central Government to local authorities). Figures for 1985-86 and 1986-87 are unchanged. Corresponding analyses of differences between the supplement and the "Financial Statement and Budget Report" are not available. Details of changes since the supplement arising from the community charge reduction scheme and the measures announced on 17 January to reduce the levels of community charges are set out in table 5.2 of the "Financial Statement and Budget Report".

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report an analysis using the economic categories of table 5.6 of Cm. 1520 of the differences in the years 1984-85 to 1993-94 between the levels of local authority self-financed expenditure underlying (a) table 21.4.11 of Cm 1021 and table 5.11 of Cm. 1520 and (b) table 5.11. of Cm. 1520 and the "Financial Report and Budget Statement" 1991-92.

Mr. Mellor: Local authority self-financed expenditure is simply the residual between the level of local authority expenditure (and projections for future years) and the level of central Government support for local authorities (plans for future years). Differences in the levels of local authority self-financed expenditure therefore simply depend on changes in local authority expenditure itself, and in central Government support. Levels of local authority expenditure are shown in table 21.4.6 of Cm. 1021, and table 5.6 of Cm. 1520; differences in the level of central Government support are set out in a previous answer to the hon. Member on 18 April 1991 at column 259.

Retail Prices

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish a table showing for the period since 1 January 1986 and for the decades 1980-90, 1970-1980 and 1960-1970, the average annual percentage increase in the retail prices of (a) goods other than food and fuel, (b) other goods and services and (c) housing.

Mr. Mellor: The following table gives the available information.

Retail Prices Index

	Average annual percentage increase
	January 1986 to March 1991	January 1980 to January 1990	January 1970 to January 1980	January 1960 to January 1970

[1] Includes vehicle maintenance, tax and insurance prior to 1974.
[2] Including the cost of meals out since 1968.

Manufacturing Investment

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish a table showing (a) the amount invested by United Kingdom manufacturing industry in plant and machinery in 1970, 1973, 1979, 1985 and 1989 at 1985 prices, (b) the amount invested per person employed in manufacturing industry in each of those years and (c) the nearest comparable figures for France, Germany, Italy and the United States of America in each case.

Mr. Mellor: The following table provides the available information for the United Kingdom, from the annual census of production. In this case, net capital expenditure means capital purchases net of sales.

Investment figures derived from the annual census of production differ slightly from those published in the United Kingdom national accounts because of differences in definition and coverage.

There are no directly comparable data available for other countries. OECD publishes comparisons of investment incurred by industry groups, but not for plant and machinery alone.

Net capital expenditure in plant and machinery in manufacturing industry at 1985 prices in the United Kingdom

	Total £ million	£ per person employed
1970	7,903·7	983·9

Notes:
1. Orders III to XIX of SIC(68) up to 1979. Divisions 2-4 of SIC(80) for later years.
2. The latest available census year is 1988.
3. From 1988, in line with accounting practice, assets leased on a finance leasing basis are included as assets by the lessee rather than by the lessor. This is estimated to have increased total United Kingdom capital expenditure in 1988 by up to 8 per cent.

Tobacco

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer by how much he expects imports of each tobacco product to increase as a result of the changes in tobacco taxation he announced in his Budget Statement; and if he will show the increases by percentage and by value for each manufactured product and indicate the country of origin by percentage and value.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The aims of the increases in tobacco taxation announced in the Budget statement include an overall fall in tobacco comsumption, both of United Kingdom manufactured and imported tobacco products to which the increases equally apply. It is too early yet to predict the impact of the tax changes on individual classes of tobacco products, let alone by country of origin.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer by how much he expects the sale of each home-produced tobacco product to decline as a result of the changes in taxation of tobacco products he announced in his Budget statement; and how many jobs he expects will be lost in each of the counties of the United Kingdom as a result in the present financial year.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: It is estimated that consumption of tobacco products will be about 4 per cent. lower in 1991-92 as a result of the increase in taxation of tobacco products announced in the Budget statement. Reliable estimates are not available for individual products. I cannot predict the impact of these tax changes on jobs in the tobacco industry; this will depend on a wide range of other factors.

Manufactures

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the balance of trade with the rest of the European Community in manufactures, including erratics, on a balance of payments at current prices for 1989 and 1990.

Mr. Mellor: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 24 April at column 468.

Management Consultants

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total sum paid out in fees by the Central Office of Information to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Maples: Details of fees paid by the Central Office of Information to management consultants for years 1979-80 to 1988-89 were given in the answer at column 168 on 13 March 1990. Figures for the years 1989-90 to 1991-92 are as follows:

1990-91	[1]Nil
1991-92	[2]Nil

[1] Estimate.
[2] Budget.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in the Treasury; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information is as follows (budgeted complement given in brackets):

Staff in statistical divisions[1]

Unified grade 5[2]	2(2)	2(2)	2(2)	2(2)

AO/AA	13(13)	15(13)	14(14)	13(13)
Total	46(47)	44(47)	47(47)	45(46)

Notes: Consistent information, in the form required, is not available before 1988-89 and could only be produced at disproportionate cost.

[1] Defined as divisions headed by grade 5 chief statistician and employed mainly on statistical work. There are other statisticians posts in Her Majesty's Treasury which are not included in the above figures.

[2] At the senior levels of the service, where management forms a major component of most jobs, there are service-wide common pay and grading arrangements. These unified grades 1 to 7 are known as the open structure and cover grades from permanent secretary level to grade 7 level. Within the unified grades there are no formal barriers to movement between former occupational groups, eg scientists, administrators, statisticians etc.; each post should be filled by the person best equipped in terms of skills, ability and experience.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in the Central Office of Information; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

Mr. Maples: The Central Office of Information has not had statistical divisions or staff in statistical posts for the years in question. There are no proposals for any such appointments in 1991-92.

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total expenditure by the Central Office of Information on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Maples: Details of the cost of the press office of the Central Office of Information for 1979-80 to 1988-89 were given at column 166 on 13 March 1990. The costs for 1989-90 are as follows:

1989-90	46,612
1990-91	[1]57,240
1991-92	[2]54,740

ENERGY

Departmental Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in his Department; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

Mr. Wakeham: I refer the hon. Member to the replies given on 21 July 1988, 13 March 1989 and 12 March 1990 (at columns 833-36, 19 and 4 respectively) for the information relating to 1979, 1984, 1988, 1989 and 1990. I regret that information about complements and for staff in post in the intervening years is not available; the position as at 1 April 1991 when there were no vacancies is:

THE ARTS

Items in Lieu of Tax

Mr. Faulds: To ask the Minister for the Arts whether he will list the objects and property accepted in satisfaction of inheritence tax during the financial year ended 31 March; if, in listing these, he will specify (a) the amount of tax satisfied in each case, (b) whether any offers of objects carried conditions as to destination, (c) the dates in each case of the recommendations received by him from the Museums and Galleries Commission for the acceptance of objects, (d) the total for the financial year of the tax thus satisfied and (e) how much of this total was covered in the public accounts by means of resort to the Reserve in accordance with Government policy as announced on 26 July 1985, Official Report, column 779; and whether a press notice will be issued by the Office of Arts and Libraries making available the complete list of acceptances during the financial year which is covered in his reply.

Mr. Renton: The information the hon. Member requests is as follows:

Item	Tax satisfied £	Date MGC recommendations received
*Beachey painting[1]	360	—

[1] Additional payments for offer accepted in 1989-90.

Notes:

Those offers marked* carried conditions as to their destinations.

The total tax satisfied in the financial year 1990-91 was £1,252,646·80. There was no recourse to the Contingency Reserve for acceptance in lieu in 1990-91.

Press notices have already been issued announcing the acceptance of all these items except for the portrait attributed to Reynolds. An announcement on this will be made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, in due course.

TRANSPORT

Motorways (Lighting)

Mr. Snape: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what would be the cost of lighting all Britain's motorway network.

Mr. Chope: The estimated capital cost of lighting the present network in England is in excess of £250 million. The estimated running costs in energy and maintenance would be approximately £30 million per annum.

Drink Driving

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what progress is being made in reducing drink driving (a) generally and (b) among what were the prime target groups.

Mr. Chope: Considerable progress has been made in our continuing campaign against drinking and driving in changing public attitudes and so reducing the number of road accidents caused by those who drink and drive. In 1980, 32 per cent. of drivers and riders killed in road accidents, whose blood alcohol level was known, were above the legal limit. By 1989 this had fallen to 19 per cent. Among the target groups over the same period this proportion fell from 25 per cent. to 11 per cent. for the 16-to-19 age group and from 41 per cent. to 24 per cent. for the 20-to-29 age group. The reduction has been less marked for older drivers and our campaign has been broadened to address drivers in their early middle age.

HGV Speed Limiters

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what incentives he intends giving to road hauliers to fit speed limiters to heavy goods vehicles on a retrospective basis.

Mr. Chope: None. Many operators have voluntarily fitted speed limiters so as to save fuel and reduce maintenance costs and have found this investment to be well worth while.

LRT

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the authorised capital investment for London Regional Transport in each of the past 15 years.

Mr. Freeman: For the six years 1985-86 to 1990-91, the information is as follows:

Authorised level of capital investment

	£ million cash
1985-86	184
1986-87	273
1987-88	305
1988-89	365
1990-91	580

We have no comparable data for prior years, when London Transport was under GLC control. Actual capital investment in those years was as follows:

LT Investment/Capital Expenditure

	£ million cash
1976	74
1977	64
1978	66
1979	100
1980	123

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 24 April to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central, what are the technical difficulties relating to the day trains for direct services from the channel tunnel to cities north of London; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: I understand from British Rail that there are two main problems. One is the need to avoid the risk of electrical currents from the locomotives interfering with the signalling. The other is the adaptation of the inter-capital train sets, which are too long for stations north of Peterborough and Rugby, so that they have a driving cab in the middle of the train and can be split to operate as two separate trains, while preserving the other characteristics of the train sets. British Rail is investigating with the manufacturers how best to overcome these difficulties and will seek the earliest possible delivery date. As an interim measure, British Rail is examining the possibility of running a few InterCity services from Scotland and the north of England direct to Waterloo to provide a better connection with the inter-capital trains.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Government Finance

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will publish an analysis showing (i) for the years 1981-82 to 1989-90 grant-related expenditure analysed by standard region; (ii) for the years 1990-91 and 1991-92 total standard spending and standard spending assessments analysed by standard region (iii) for the years 1981-82 to 1991-92 aggregate Exchequer finance analysed by standard region and (iv) for the years 1981-82 to 1991-92 central Government support analysed by standard region; indicating whether this analysis is consistent with section 5 of Cm. 1520;

(2) if he will publish tables showing (a) an updated version of the then Secretary of State's written answer of 30 November 1987, Official Report, columns 417-18, concerning the scale of inter-regional transfers through resources equalisation for the years 1981-82 to 1991-92, but identifying separately the contribution of the domestic and non-domestic sectors; and (b) a parallel inter-regional analysis of needs equalisation measured against a benchmark of equal per capita distribution;

(3) if he will publish an analysis, consistent with the totals for England and Wales in table 5.2 of Command 1520, showing (i) an analysis by class of local authority within standard region of the 1990-91 community charge safety net (ii) an analysis by class of authority within standard region of the low rateable value areas grant/area protection grant for the years 1990-91 to 1993-94 and (iii) an analysis by class of authority within standard region of transitional relief for the years 1990-91 to 1993-94.

Mr. Portillo: I will write to the hon. Gentleman and place the associated tables in the Library.

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each year from 1967-68 to 1991-92 the aggregate grant percentage for rate revenue support grant;

(2) if he will publish in the Official Report an analysis for the years 1990-91 and 1991-92 for each county and district council, London borough and for England as a whole (a) the total standard spending and standard spending assessment, (b) the total standard spending and standard spending assessment expressed as pounds per capita, pounds per adult and pounds per community charge unit, (c) the community charge required to be levied to finance standard spending assessment, (d) the "long-run" community charge required to be levied to finance standard spending assessment, (e) the "long-run" community charge required to be levied to finance expenditure 1-5 and 10 per cent. below and 1-5 and 10 per cent. above standard spending assessment, (f) the proportion of total expenditure which would be financed by government grant at each of the spending levels specified in (e) above, (g) that level of expenditure as a percentage of standard spending assessment which would require a zero community charge and (h) that level of expenditure as a percentage of standard spending assessment which would require a zero "long-run" community charge;

(3) if he will publish in the Official Report an analysis showing for each English local authority, for each class of local authority, for each standard region and for England as a whole (a) grant-related expenditure in 1989-90, expressed in pounds and pounds per capita, (b) standard spending assessment in 1990-91 and 1991-92, expressed in pounds and pounds per capita, (c) the difference between grant-related expenditure in 1989-90 and standard spending assessment in 1990-91, expressed in pounds and pounds per capita and (d) the "long-run" cost of the difference in (c) above in pounds to be met by community charge payers and the effect in pence on the community charge.

(4) if he will publish in the Official Report an analysis for the years 1966-67 to 1990-91, as far as is practicable consistent with table 1.1 of "Welsh Local Government Financial Statistics No. 14, 1990", of rate fund services revenue account but which also distinguishes (a) non-domestic rate revenue from domestic rate revenue and (b) gross rates, net rates and rate rebate grants.

Mr. Portillo: I will write to the hon. Gentleman and place the associated tables in the Library.

Speech Therapy

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much money was spent by local authorities on the provision of speech therapy in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Key: The vast majority of spending on speech therapy is carried out by health authorities. The relatively small amount of spending by local authorities is not separately identified on their returns submitted to the Department of the Environment.

Local Government Boundaries

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in the Official Report the statements or speeches made by, or on behalf of, Ministers of the Crown (a) prior to July 1987 and (b) since covering any major review of the functional organisation of boundaries of local government.

Mr. Key: Over the 158 years since the setting up of the Royal Commission on Municipal Corporations of 1833, which can be regarded as the first major review of the functional organisations and boundaries of local government, many speeches and statements have been made by, and on behalf of, Ministers of the Crown. The most relevant to the current situation are the statements made by my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for the Environment, for Wales and for Scotland on 21 March and 22 April at columns 401 and 901.

Electricity Pylons

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what research his Department has commissioned or published in the last 10 years in respect of the effect on health of electromagnetic radiation from electricity pylons.

Mr. Baldry: Matters relating to the possible health hazards from environmental radiation are the concern of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health. However, my Department maintains close liaison with the Department of Health on these issues.

Residuary Bodies

Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total capital sum realised from the abolition of the metropolitan county councils and the winding up of the residuary bodies.

Mr. Key: One hundred and seventeen million pounds of capital receipts realised from the sale of surplus property and other assets were distributed by the metropolitan residuary bodies, excluding London, to local authorities.

Quarries (Waste Disposal)

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the number and sites of quarries in County Durham used for waste disposal from industrial and domestic sources.

Mr. Baldry: The Department does not have information on the number of quarries which are used for waste disposal. Durham county council, as waste disposal authority, should be able to provide the information on waste disposal sites in its area.

Rural Development

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he has taken to promote the achievements of Rural Development Commission projects in the rural development areas, in particular those using funds provided from central Government.

Mr. Baldry: My colleagues and I take every opportunity to publicise the achievements of the Rural Development Commission, as does the commission itself. For example, on 19 April my hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Countryside launched a project in Rossendale, Lancashire, which is part of a new partnership between the Rural Development Commission and Help the Aged aimed at addressing the needs of elderly people in rural areas.

Article 4 Direction

Mr. Robert Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will now give a decision in response to the application by the Caradon district council for an article 4 direction in respect of land at St. Veep which the hon. Member for Cornwall, South-East first referred to his office on 22 August 1990.

Mr. Yeo: I have written to my hon. Friend explaining that delay has been caused by awaiting additional supporting evidence which the district council has offered to provide. Officials in my Department have written to the council about this again on 15 April. I assure my hon. Friend that once this additional evidence has been received, or the council confirms that it does not intend to submit anything further, we will issue a prompt decision on the article 4 direction.

Council Tax

Mr. Trotter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what the aggregate external finance will be for each local authority under the illustrative council tax and what is the AEF in payment for 1991-92.

Mr. Key: With the council tax, grant and business will be paid directly to each tier of local authority. It is therefore not possible to make direct comparisons with external finance in 1991-92 which is paid to the collection fund in each area.

Mr. Trotter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish for each local authority the average illustrative council tax bill per household; showing the average community charge bill per thousand in 1991-92.

Mr. Key: The Government issued on 23 April full information on the illustrative effect on household bills had the council tax been fully in place in 1991-92.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, further to his statement to the House on 23 April, Official Report, column 901-3, what is his policy towards the removal or otherwise of the safety net from those local authorities which will attract more Government grant than at present as a result of the proposals outlined by him on that occasion.

Mr. Key: The illustrative figures published on 23 April assume that the present area protection grant will be distributed in the same way as the remainder of AEF.

The Government propose that there will be transitional relief to ensure that no household will face an unreasonable increase in its bill from one year to another as a result of the introduction of the new system. There will therefore be no need for transitional arrangements applying to whole local authorities.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the figures and calculations which result in Grimsby's local government tax bills in each column of his illustrative tables being among the 10 highest in the country.

Mr. Key: The illustrative figures are calculated on the basis of a distribution of grant and non-domestic rate income which allows local authorities in all areas to set a council tax of £400 for a band D property occupied by two or more people, if they provide a standard level of service. The corresponding figures are £267 for a band A property and £668 for a band G property.

All spending above the standard level falls upon the council tax. Humberside county council spends 4 per cent. above its standard spending assessment and Great Grimsby spends 32 per cent. above its SSA, leading to higher bills in the area than those for standard spending.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the correlation in his illustrative bills table in the new council tax between the percentage over standard spending assessment and size of charge in each band.

Mr. Key: All revenue in excess of standard spending assessment will fall to be raised by the council tax for the local authority concerned. Within the area of an authority, the increase in bill for a band G property will be two and a half times that for a band A property. The size of increase required for a 1 per cent. increase in spending will depend on the SSA for the authority and the proportion of properties in each band.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, further to his statement to the House on 23 April, Official Report, columns 901-903, if his review of local government will include the metropolitan districts.

Mr. Key: I refer the hon. Member to the statement made by my right hon. Friend to the House on 23 April at column 901, in which he said that the Government intend no significant changes in the structure of local government in London or the metropolitan areas. However, they are seeking views on how arrangements for some services, such as grants to the voluntary sector and the arts, might be improved in these areas.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate the full cost of calculating the Government's council tax figures and the cost of publishing the documentation outlining the Government's proposed system of local government finance.

Mr. Key: No additional expense was incurred in calculating the illustrative council tax figures, as these were compiled from data held by the Department on existing computer systems.

The estimated cost of publishing the documents outlining the Government's finance proposals was some £20,000.

Drinking Water Inspectorate

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many technical employees on the drinking water inspectorate were (a) previously employed by his Department and (b) previously employed by a water company, statutory water company or water authority or otherwise in the water industry.

Mr. Trippier: Seven members of the professional staff of the drinking water inspectorate were previously employed by my Department, and two by other Government Departments. Four joined the inspectorate from water companies and one from a public analyst. Another was employed by a firm of consultants. Two people are on secondment from the water research centre.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is the total number of days that staff of the drinking water inspectorate have spent on water company premises;

(2) how many site inspections have been carried out by staff of the drinking water inspectorate;

(3) what is the total number of inspections carried out by drinking water inspectorate staff and the total number carried out by others; what is the proportion of drinking water inspections which are sub-contracted out to consultants; and what is the name of each firm of consultants employed by the drinking water inspectorate and the value of the contract awarded in each case;

(4) what is the average amount of notice given to a water company before an inspection takes place;

(5) if he will list each water company inspection that has been carried out so far in each water company; and if he will give the date of each visit and the conclusions of the inspection.

Mr. Trippier: Since the drinking water inspectorate was established on 2 January 1990, inspectorate staff have spent about 120 days on water company premises. These staff have inspected 15 of the 39 water companies in England and Wales. Two firms of consultants, Watson Hawksley Ltd, and Rofe, Kennard and Lapworth were engaged by the inspectorate to make 24 inspections. For commercial reasons it would not be appropriate to give the value of the contracts.

Inspections were made between June 1990 and February 1991 and, in general, water companies were given five weeks' notice. All inspections, except three, included site visits. The conclusions from the inspections will be summarised in the first annual report from the chief inspector of the drinking water inspectorate which is due to be published in July.

Cryptosporidia Outbreak, Hull

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will take action against Yorkshire Water for the outbreak of cryptosporidia in Hull in 1990.

Mr. Trippier: The final report of the outbreak control team was delivered recently to the drinking water inspectorate which is investigating the incident. The inspectorate will make recommendations to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment in due course upon any action to be taken.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Metropolitan Police

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total sum paid out in fees by the Metropolitan police to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand from the deputy commissioner that payments by the Metropolitan police to management and computer consultants, in each financial year since 1984-85, estimated expenditure for 1990-91 and budget estimate for 1991-92 are as follows:

1984-85	346,000
1985-86	433,000
1986-87	558,000
1987-88	702,000
1988-89	742,000
1989-90	939,000
[1]1990-91	1,538,000
[2]1991-92	911,000

[2] Budget estimate.

I understand that information on spending on management consultants only, and for the years prior to 1984-85, is not available.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total expenditure by the Metropolitan police on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The deputy commissioner has told me that expenditure on staff and accommodation costs of the directorate of public affairs, and on recruitment and other advertising and other promotional literature, in each financial year since 1985-86, estimated expenditure for 1990-91 and budget estimate for 1991-92 are as follows:

1985-86	3,622,861
1986-87	4,444,103
1987-88	4,555,000
1988-89	5,475,000
1989-90	5,366,000
[1]1990-91	5,916,000
[2]1991-92	6,390,000

[2] Budget Estimate.

Information for the years prior to 1985-86 is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in the Metropolitan police; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The deputy commissioner tells me that the complement and staff in post in the Metropolitan police statistics branch is shown in the table.

2. Only the Grade 7 post is filled by a statistician, the remaining posts being filled by executive, administrative and support grades staff, who undertake a mixture of statistical and support duties. An additional Grade 7 post is located in the Management Support Department.

Police Forces (Restructure)

93. Mr. George: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to introduce primary legislation to restructure the police forces of England and Wales.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We have no plans for primary legislation, but we are considering what further improvements in the service delivered by the police can be achieved by developments within the present constitutional framework.

Trevi Group

94. Mr. George: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish details of any representations the Government have made to the Trevi group regarding combating terrorism after 1992.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The Government continue to press in Trevi for the closest possible co-operation against terrorism, which we regard as an essential objective in its own right. We have also continued to make clear to our Community partners our intention to maintain necessary checks at United Kingdom ports and airports after 1992.

Kurdish Asylum-Seekers

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Kurdish asylum-seekers are required to report to police stations on a weekly basis; how many of them are aged (a) under 18 years and (b) under 10 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information requested is not available centrally.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in his Department; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The information available is as follows. Staff in post on 1 April in each of the relevant years in the statistical divisions of the Home Office are set out in the following table:

	Statisticians	Other grades	Total
1979-80	24	127·5	151·5
1980-81	25	127	152
1981-82	24	125	149

1990-91	28	158·5	186·5
1991-92	31·5	168·5	200

The number of vacancies, if any, varies from week to week and no separate record is maintained.

Northumbria Police

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Northumbria as to how many hours' overtime were on average worked by a police constable in his force (a) in 1979 and (b) in 1990.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand from the chief constable of Northumbria that the average amount of overtime worked per officer in the federated ranks in Northumbria in 1990 was 185·37 hours. Figures for 1979 are no longer available and the other detailed information requested would be obtainable only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Northumbria as to how many (a) constables, (b) inspectors, (c) chief inspectors, (d) superintendents and (e) chief superintendents there were in his force (i) in 1979 and (ii) in 1990.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information requested is set out in the table.

Constables	2,529	2,680
Inspectors	190	193
Chief Inspectors	60	63
Superintendents	51	50
Chief Superintendents	13	13

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Northumbria as to the number of (a) police officers, (b) police cars and (c) motor cyclists who were on hand at Newcastle airport for the recent visit of the Duke and Duchess of Kent; and what was the cost of policing the Kents' visit to Northumbria.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The level of policing for particular events is a matter of operational judgment for the chief constable concerned. I understand from the chief constable of the Northumbria police that a total of 30 officers were on hand at Newcastle airport for the visit by their Royal Highnesses on 10 April. Of these, 12 were drivers, 14 were motor cyclists, and four officers were deployed from territorial divisional duties. The use of motor cyclists in particular resulted in significant reductions in the level of police resources needed during the visits subsequently made by their Royal Highnesses to seven different venues in the county of Northumberland and Tyne and Wear. The additional cost to the Northumbria police was about £2,000.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Northumbria as to the total real cost of policing in Northumbria for each year since 1979.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No. This is a matter for the police authority.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Northumbria as to the number of officers (a) stationed and (b) residing at Ponteland; and what are their duties.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: My right hon. Friend has no plans to call for a report; nor is the information centrally held.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Northumbria as to the number of serving officers for each year since 1979.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The number of officers on the strength of the Northumbria police at 31 December for each year since 1979 is as follows:

	Police strength
1979	3,339
1980	3,340
1981	3,331
1982	3,329
1983	3,337
1984	3,344
1985	3,368
1986	3,361
1987	3,478
1988	3,460
1989	3,526
1990	3,528

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Northumbria as to the total cost, including manpower, of the force helicopter for each year since it was acquired.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Northumbria police air support unit became operational in November 1989. I understand from the chief constable that the cost of the first year of operation was £656,320, including police manpower costs of £165,670.

Police Incomes

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the gross income of (a) a police constable, (b) a sergeant, (c) an inspector, (d) a chief inspector, (e) a superintendent and (f) a chief superintendent in a provincial force in (i) 1979 and (ii) 1990.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Minimum and maximum basic salaries for the years in question are as follows:

	June 1979		September 1990
	Minimum	Maximum	Minimum	Maximum
Constable	3,600	5,700	10,866	18,132
Sergeant	5,450	6,250	17,346	20,896
Inspector	6,250	7,440	19,896	22,590
Chief Inspector	7,100	8,235	22,590	25,128
Superintendent	9,800	10,710	30,729	33,369
Chief Superintendent	10,800	11,775	34,167	36,276

All other entitlements depend on the individual circumstances of the officer in question and are set out in the Police Regulations 1987, copies of which are available in the Library.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Financial Assistance

32. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, representing the Church Commissioners, how much financial help the Church Commissioners have provided to churches, abbeys and cathedrals in each of the past three years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alison: The commissioners' primary responsibility is the support of the clergy and their funds are not generally available for churches. However, they provided approximately £900,000 in 1987, £1·8 million in 1988 and £2·5 million in 1989 towards church buildings, either under specific legislative authority or to meet legal obligations to do with land ownership.

Canterbury Cathedral

33. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, representing the Church Commissioners, how much was spent by the Church Commissioners in payment to the staff of Canterbury cathedral in 1990-91.

Mr. Alison: A total of £54,650.

Church Residential Property

34. Ms. Abbott: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, representing the Church Commissioners, what account the commissioners take of the housing shortage in London in respect of their policies on management of their residential property holdings.

Mr. Alison: The commissioners' prime responsibility in the management of all their assets, including residential property, is to provide support for the clergy of the Church of England. Within this overall policy, the commissioners' Octavia Hill estates help meet a social need by providing rented accommodation for over 1,500 families on lower incomes who would otherwise look to local authorities for their housing.

Commissioners' Assets

35. Mr. Dickens: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, representing the Church Commissioners, what is the value of the current assets of the Church Commissioners.

Mr. Alison: The latest published figure, at 31 December 1989, was £3·1 billion.

LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Parliamentary Employees

44. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Lord President of the Council how many people are currently employed in the Palace of Westminster; how many were employed five, 10 and 15 years ago; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: The House of Commons Commission employs 1,032 staff. A further 1,100 are employed by Members. In addition 7,976 photo identity pass holders are currently entitled to access to the House. These include police and security staff, Department of the Environment personnel, Government Department officials, and others.

Comparative figures for five, 10 and 15 years ago in respect of House of Commons staff are 964, 879 and 550 respectively. Meaningful figures for the other categories of pass holders for those years are not readily available.

Televising of House

45. Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will make a statement on televising the House on cable systems.

Mr. MacGregor: In its recent report, the Select Committee on Broadcasting reiterated its belief in the desirability of establishing a television channel dedicated to continuous coverage of parliamentary proceedings. Of the three proposals submitted to it, the Committee concluded that the scheme put forward by United Artists was "the most thoroughly worked out and immediately practicable". The United Artists service, which is expected to begin in the autumn, will be available, without any extra charge to subscribers, to any home or other building served by a local cable network. In addition, it is hoped, subject to the outcome of discussions involving the Independent Television Commission, that the service might also be transmitted via one of the spare transponders on the Marco Polo satellite, for the time being at least by BSkyB.

Kuwait (Oil fires)

46. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will set up a Select Committee to consider Her Majesty's Government's aid to British contractors involved in trying to extinguish Kuwait oil fires.

Mr. MacGregor: No.

European Community (Communications)

47. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Lord President of the Council whether he will make a further statement about the introduction of free telephone calls to European institutions.

Mr. MacGregor: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes).

Palace of Westminster (Restoration)

48. Mr. Janner: To ask the Lord President of the Council when he expects that part of the Ibbs report which will bring responsibility for the restoration of the Palace of Westminster within his responsibilities to be implemented.

Mr. MacGregor: The report on House of Commons services, by the team led by Sir Robin Ibbs, recommended among other things that responsibility for the parliamentary works budget should pass from the Secretary of State for the Environment to the House of Commons Commission. The House of Lords has subsequently agreed to accept responsibility for its share of the cost of the services provided under this budget, which include routine maintenance and refurbishment, and the provision of new buildings, as well as the restoration of the fabric of the Palace of Westminster. The Ibbs report envisaged that the transfer of responsibility for these services might take place as early as the beginning of the 1992-93 financial year, subject to the introduction of other organisational changes in the House of Commons service. It is too early to say whether that target will be achieved. There are no proposals to transfer responsibility for these matters to the Leader of the House.

Parliamentary Procedures

49. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Lord President of the Council whether he is now able to announce the plans for changes in procedures for the House; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: I have nothing to add to the reply I gave to a similar question from the hon. Member on 25 March at column 607.

Telephone Services

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he has any plans to improve the telephone services in the Palace of Westminster.

Mr. MacGregor: It is planned to upgrade the software in the Palace of Westminster telephone exchange within the next 12 months. This will enable the automatic routing of outgoing calls by the cheapest means. During the same period it is hoped to modernise the equipment in use in the Members' Message Bureau in order to provide a more efficient message-taking service for Members and the general public.

Resettlement Grants

Sir Anthony Grant: To ask the Lord President of the Council when the TSRB report on resettlement grants will be published.

Mr. MacGregor: During Second Reading of the Ministerial and Other Pensions and Salaries Bill on 31 January I announced the Government's intention to invite the TSRB to review resettlement grants. Copies of the report have today been placed in the Library of the House and are available from the Vote Office. It will be published as an appendix to the TSRB's report on parliamentary pensions.

Subject to the views of the House, the Government are minded to accept the TSRB's recommendation that resettlement grants should be extended to all Members aged 65 and over on a tapered basis according to length of service and age. This will require a resolution of the House, and I intend to bring this forward at an early opportunity.

HOUSE OF COMMONS COMMISSION

Parliamentary Procedures

38. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, representing the House of Commons Commission, what plans the Commission has to undertake a fundamental review to improve the way Parliament operates and to ensure that value for money is obtained.

Mr. Beith: The Ibbs report on House of Commons services was published on 28 November and was given a generally positive welcome by the House in the debate on 17 January. Steps to implement the report are now in train. The whole thrust of the Ibbs report was in the direction of better accountability and value for money in the delivery of services for the House. A further review was not seen to be required.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Family Conciliation Services

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on the public funding of family conciliation services.

The Attorney-General: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to the question from my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) on 18 April 1991 at column 221.

Rape

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Attorney-General what consideration the DPP gives to the need for corroborative evidence when deciding whether to proceed with prosecutions for alleged rape; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: Corroborative evidence is not demanded as a matter of law for a charge of rape to be capable of being proved. The CPS assesses the available evidence in accordance with the criteria contained in the code for Crown prosecutors, bearing in mind the legal requirement that a judge shall warn a jury that it is dangerous to convict of rape without some corroboration. Only if the Crown prosecutor considers that there is a realistic prospect of a conviction, and that a prosecution is required in the public interest, will the case proceed to court.

Management Consultants

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Attorney-General what was the total sum paid out in fees by the Lord Chancellor's Department to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year: and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

The Attorney-General: On the information available, the cost to the Lord Chancellor's Department of employing management consultants for each financial year from 1984-85 to date is as follows.

1984-85	Nil
1985-86	221,000
1986-87	473,837
1987-88	134,255
1988-89	205,882
1989-90	178,500

[1] Forecast.

The figures exclude computer consultancy. Figures for 1979-80 and 1983-84 could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Attorney-General if he will give, for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in the Lord Chancellor's Department; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

The Attorney-General: The information that is readily available on the number of staff and complement by grade in the statistics branch of the Lord Chancellor's Department is shown in the tables:

Grade of staff	In post January 1980	Complement

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Attorney-General what was the total expenditure by the Lord Chancellor's Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

The Attorney General: Total expenditure on press and public relations excluding staff costs is as follows:

1984-85	5,180
1985-86	13,253
1986-87	23,282
1987-88	34,500
1988-89	34,159
1989-90	33,616
1990-91	29,113

The amounts spent for previous years can be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

The budget for 1991-92 is £73,000.

Conveyancers

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Attorney-General when the Lord Chancellor intends to publish for consultation his proposals for regulations on the competence and conduct of authorised practitioners, the new class of conveyancer, to be made under section 40 of the Courts and Legal Service Act 1990.

The Attorney-General: My noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor is issuing these today. Copies of the draft regulations and explanatory consultation document will be placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Foreign Debts

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the estimates of outstanding debt for (a) Sudan, (b) Zimbabwe, (c) Ghana, (d) Zambia and (e) Uganda.

Mrs. Chalker: According to the World bank debt tables 1990-91, the total external debts outstanding for the five countries listed are as follows:

	Total external Debt (US$ millions)
Sudan	12,965
Zimbabwe	3,088
Ghana	3,087
Zambia	6,874
Uganda	1,808

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what concessions have been given to (a) Sudan, (b) Zimbabwe, (c) Ghana, (d) Zambia and (e) Uganda in respect of repayment of debt to bankers and the Government during the last three years.

Mrs. Chalker: For Ghana, Sudan and Uganda during the last three years Her Majesty's Government have cancelled old aid loans worth £10·4 million, £1·3 million and £1·3 million respectively, under their scheme for retrospective terms adjustment. Zimbabwe and Ghana have strong records of servicing their debts and have avoided the need for rescheduling. Uganda and Zambia have received concessional reschedulings of their official debts to Government creditors under Toronto terms during the last three years: Uganda in January 1989 and Zambia in July 1990. Sudan has been unable to reach agreement with her creditors and has allowed substantial debt arrears to accumulate. None of the countries listed has reached debt relief agreements with its commercial bank creditors during the last three years.

Iraqi Refugees

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what estimate the Government have made of (a) the aid requirements of the Iraqi refugees over the next six months and (b) the United Kingdom's contribution to this; and from which budget the United Kingdom's funds will come.

Mrs. Chalker: No such estimates have been made. The appeals launched by the international agencies alone total over US$620 million. So far, the United Kingdom has made available £21 million for refugee assistance, as well as the aid share of the costs of the airbridge and Operation Haven. These costs are being met from the overseas aid programme.

Peru

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance is being given to Peru to contain cholera.

Mrs. Chalker: In response to a request from the Peruvian Government, the Overseas Development Administration made an immediate cash contribution in February of US$20,000 through the Pan American Health Organisation, which is co-ordinating the relief effort. In March we contributed a further £100,000 through PAHO in response to the rapidly increasing scale of the epidemic. In addition, we are providing some £180,000 as Britain's share of the European Community's emergency aid.

Iraq

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the total number of United Kingdom flights of relief supplies for Iraqi refugees to (a) Turkey and (b) Iran to date.

Mrs. Chalker: I refer the hon. Lady to the answer I gave on 25 April to the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes). As of 26 April, the Overseas Development Administration has sent seven flights of relief supplies to Iran and 20 to Turkey. More will follow.

Chile

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was, for each year since 1970, the amount of funds given to Chile by Her Majesty's Government under bilateral technical co-operation agreements in 1991 money.

Mrs. Chalker: Gross bilateral technical co-operation expenditure for Chile from 1970 to 1989, the latest year for which figures are available, was:

Year	Current prices	Constant (1990) prices
1970	233	1,604
1971	232	1,460
1972	324	1,886
1973	507	2,756
1974	382	1,807
1975	306	1,138
1976	939	3,032
1977	2,073	5,876
1978	1,079	2,747
1979	2,131	4,742
1980	2,021	3,764
1981	1,452	2,427
1982	675	1,049
1983	442	653
1984	257	363
1985	256	342
1986	202	260
1987	236	2.0
1988	241	2.7
1989	267	287

The figures in the first column include amounts, totalling over £11 million in current prices, spent since 1973 in support of various World University Service programmes for Chilean refugee students.

Aid and Trade Provision

Mr. Dover: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will consider increasing the level of aid and trade provision for the current 12 months.

Mrs. Chalker: No. Additional resources are not available within the aid programme for this purpose.

Mr. Dover: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the actual level of aid and trade provision for each of the past five years and the official forecast for the next two years in monetary terms and as a percentage of total aid.

Mrs. Chalker: As a percentage of the overseas aid budget, expenditure on aid and trade provision over the last five financial years was:

£ million

	Aid and trade provision expenditure	Expenditure as a percentage of aid budget
1986-87	81	6·3
1987-88	48	3·7
1988-89	59	4·0
1989-90	62	3·9
1990-91	[1]94	[1]5·8

[1] Provisional.

The aid and trade provision budget for 1991-92 is £97 million out of a total overseas aid budget of £1,720 million. The budget for 1992-93 will be set following the outcome of the annual public expenditure survey.

PRIME MINISTER

St. John Ambulance Brigade

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make facilities available to staff in his office to contribute to the appeal that has been launched for people with the name of John to help raise £5 million for the St. John Ambulance Brigade.

The Prime Minister: Arrangements exist for officials to contribute by deduction from pay to charities of their choice. The decision by members of my office about which charitable appeals to support must be a matter for them.

Drink Driving

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Prime Minister if he, with his colleagues responsible for transport in England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland, will consider consultations on ways to let the public know whether a driver killed in a road crash had consumed alcohol.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply he received from my hon. Friend the Member for Fareham (Mr. Lloyd) on 22 April 1991 at columns 350-51.

Management Consultants

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Prime Minister what was the total sum paid out in fees by the Prime Minister's office to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

The Prime Minister: There has been no expenditure by my office on fees to management consultants since 1979-80, and none is planned for 1991-92.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Prime Minister what was the total sum paid out in fees by the Cabinet Office to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

The Prime Minister: The expenditure by the Cabinet Office, including from its creation on 1 October 1987, the Office of the Minister of the Civil Service, on management and computer consultancies, including certain consultancies relating to the civil service as a whole, in the financial years from 1983-84 is as follows:

Year	£
1983-84	152,000
1984-85	423,818
1985-86	329,334
1986-87	505,092
1987-88	417,778

The figures for each year since then, which exclude the cost of computer consultants, are as follows:

Year	£
1988-89	70,608
1989-90	51,500
1990-91	[1]182,000
1991-92	[2]242,735

[1] Estimate.
[2] Budget.

Note:
The figures for 1990-91 and 1991-92 reflect increases in management consultancies undertaken by the Cabinet Office for the civil service generally.

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Prime Minister what was the total expenditure by the Cabinet Office on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

The Prime Minister: Expenditure on press and public relations by the Cabinet Office was:

1984-85	247,495
1985-86	232,980
1986-87	224,813
1987-88	215,925
1988-89	201,837
1989-90	205,650

The latest estimate for 1990-91 is £165,088 and the budget for 1991-92 is £213,323.

Similar information is not available for the years prior to 1984-85.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Prime Minister what was the total expenditure by the Prime Minister's office on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

The Prime Minister: Expenditure by my office on press and public relations was not recorded separately before 1987-88. The total expenditure for each year since then and the budget for 1991-92 are as follows:

1987-88	377,987
1988-89	419,326
1989-90	427,802
1990-91	[1]553,010
1991-92	[2]554,748

[1] Estimate.
[2] Budget.
Note: The figures for 1990-91 and 1991-92 include notional superannuation costs which are excluded from the figures for earlier years.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Prime Minister if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in the Cabinet Office; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

The Prime Minister: The number of staff, by grade, employed on 1 April in each of the years from 1982 in the statistical divisions of the Cabinet Office, differentiated between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts, were:

Grade	Staff in post, with in brackets, where different, total complement Members of Statistician Group	Members of Administration and other groups[1]	Total

[1] Includes all other non statistician group staff.

Figures for the years prior to 1982 are no longer available, and information on the numbers of staff by grade is not readily available for the years 1982 to 1986 and cannot be obtained except at disproportionate cost.

Since July 1989, when the Central Statistical Office became a separate department, the Cabinet Office has had no statistical divisions.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Prime Minister if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in the Prime Minister's office; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

The Prime Minister: During the period in question, there has been no statistical division within my office. There are no statisticians in post or on the staff complement, and there are no plans to create any such posts.

Iraqi Refugees

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Prime Minister whether he has any plans to increase the financial year 1991-92 budget of the Overseas Development Administration to cover the costs of emergency relief for Iraqi refugees.

The Prime Minister: Additions to the overseas aid programme totalling up to £30 million have been agreed to fund the Government's further efforts to relieve the suffering of Iraqi refugees.

Within this total, up to £20 million will be provided to continue the airbridge operation, to provide urgently needed supplies, and to finance the immediately foreseeable costs falling to the aid budget of the United Kingdom's participation in Operation Haven inside Iraq. The balance of £10 million represents the Government's contribution to the Kurdish refugee appeal announced on Thursday 25 April.

These additions will enable the ODA to maintain its planned development activities, and to continue to provide substantial humanitarian assistance to help relieve famine in Africa.

North Sea

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Prime Minister if he will set up a high-level task force combining all the Departments of state concerned, all industries involved and all interested parties to bring forward proposals to secure continued viability of all uses and the well-being of the North sea, once gas and oil structures are decommissioned; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Departments maintain regular contact with a wide range of organisations with an interest in many aspects of the North sea. I see no advantage in establishing an additional forum.

Consideration of an abandonment programme by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy under the provisions of the Petroleum Act 1987 will take account of consultations with organisations concerned with other uses of the sea including fishing, and with environmental interests. The abandonment of offshore installations will be performed in such a way as to cause no significant adverse effects upon navigation or the marine environment, in accordance with our international obligations.

Opposition Parties (Access to Civil Service)

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Prime Minister whether he will consider allowing opposition parties equal access to civil servants and publicity budgets to enable them to prepare and publicise their own policies.

The Prime Minister: No. By long-standing convention, civil service time and Government publicity budgets are not used for party political purposes.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Prime Minister what discussions he has had with the civil service trade unions regarding the effectiveness of the rules set out in the Armstrong memorandum of December 1987 on the propriety of publishing party political material using civil servants' time.

The Prime Minister: None.

Arms Trade

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister what proposals he has for an international register of arms sales.

The Prime Minister: At the special European Council in Luxembourg on 8 April, I proposed a register of arms sales at the United Nations to monitor the scale of arms build-up in any one country. We are taking every opportunity to urge others to support the idea of such a register. Our ambassador at the United Nations is also taking this forward in New York.

First Division Association

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister how many of the demands of the First Division Association code of civil service ethics have been incorporated into official regulations.

The Prime Minister: The Government's position is set out in the note by the former head of the home civil service on the duties and responsibilities of civil servants in relation to Ministers, issued in December 1987, subject to the further points contained in the Government's responses to the fifth report of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee for the 1989-90 Session.

Iraqi Arms Disposal

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister what proposals he has put to the United Nations for a commission to monitor Iraqi arms disposal.

The Prime Minister: United Nations Security Council resolution 687 requires the Secretary-General to establish a special commission to oversee the elimination of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction and ballistic missiles. We hope that the special commission will start work as soon as possible, and we shall co-operate with it fully.

Members' Letters

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 22 April, Official Report, columns 293-94, to the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes), whether he will make it his aim to provide responses to Members' letters to Ministers which are as full and as helpful as possible, on a time scale similar to that for a response to a parliamentary question.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) on 12 February at column 393. I have nothing further to add.

South Africa

Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Prime Minister whether he raised with Mr. de Klerk at their meeting on 22 April the failure of the South African Government to release all political prisoners by the target date of 28 February 1991, as agreed in the Pretoria minute of 6 August 1990.

The Prime Minister [holding answer 26 April 1991]: No, not least because the target date of 30 April has not yet been reached.

DEFENCE

US Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will obtain for his departmental library a copy of the recently published report "US Nuclear Weapons: Safety Implications for the United Kingdom," released by the British American Security Information Council.

Mr. Alan Clark: Yes.

The Gulf

Mr. George: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much and what equipment that returned from the Gulf has subsequently been sent back to the region.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The following major equipments are undertaking Operation Haven tasks; three Hercules C-130 aircraft and 12 Chinook helicopters. Eight of the Chinook helicopters were transferred direct from Operation Granby tasks.

Submarines (Z-berths)

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if it is his intention to proceed with plans to establish Z-berths for submarines at Swansea.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Yes.

Kurdish Refugees

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the average cost of a flight of (a) Hercules aircraft and (b) Chinook helicopters involved in the operation to relieve Kurds on the borders of Iraq; what is the cost of other relief work undertaken by United Kingdom forces; and what proportion of costs incurred by the armed forces in the operation to relieve Iraqi Kurds will fall on the Overseas Development Administration budget.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It is too early to give an estimate of the cost of MOD assistance to the Overseas Development Administration in support of its programme of humanitarian relief to the Kurds. The charges to the ODA will cover mainly the deployment of aircraft, goods supplied and in-theatre flying for the air drop, as well as the cost of building and supplying camps. Charges to the ODA for aircraft used in the relief operation will be based on an estimated average cost per flying hour of £2,020 for a Hercules and £2,445 for a Chinook.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in his Department; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

Mr. Alan Clark: I regret that not all the information requested is available. However, the staff complements by grade, and the associated number of vacancies, in Ministry of Defence statistical divisions for the years 1989, 1990 and 1991 are as follows:

Grade/Year	1 April 1989		1 April 1990		1 April 1991

Chieftain Tank

Mr. Clelland: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the suitability of French-manufactured tanks as a replacement for Chieftain tanks.

Mr. Alan Clark: My Department is making a full assessment of the suitability of the French Leclerc tank equipment for our future main battle tank fleet.

Armed Forces Personnel

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the latest figures for home ownership for married personnel in the armed forces by service.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The latest survey which included information on home ownership of personnel in the armed forces was conducted in 1987-88. The following figures show the level of home ownership of personnel who were married, widowed, divorced or separated (figures for married personnel only are not available):

Armed Forces	Percentage
Royal Navy/Royal Marines	75
Army	26
Royal Air Force	49

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will supply hon. Members with the latest Army personnel research establishment reports on (a) any continuous attitude survey for both officers and soldiers, (b) any premature voluntary release survey relating to officers and soldiers and (c) the proposed report on housing attitudes when it is ready.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces will write to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the value of the gratuity-terminal grant for (a) a sergeant with 22 years' service and (b) a major aged 50 years.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: A sergeant with 22 years reckonable service would receive a tax-free terminal grant of £16,050; a major aged 50 (assuming 29 years reckonable service from age 21) would receive £37,932.

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the figures for premature voluntary release from the armed forces for the last two years by quarter.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The information requested is as follows:

	Number
1989
January to March	2,693
April to June	3,010
July to September	3,014
October to December	2,685
1990
January to March	2,567
April to June	2,794
July to September	2,942
October to December	2,350

The figures include both officers and other ranks.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Michael Ashcroft

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if any form of diplomatic status has been (a) sought and (b) conferred on Michael Ashcroft, chairman of ADT, to cover his present stay in the United Kingdom in respect of his duties as roving trade ambassador for Belize.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: No.

Sri Lanka

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has received any representations from Amnesty International on disappearances, deaths in custody, torture and judicial killings in Sri Lanka since 1983; and if he will review Britain's aid to Sri Lanka with regard to the promotion of peace, political settlement and human rights.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We are in regular contact with Amnesty International about Sri Lanka, and have frequently raised our concerns about human rights issues with the Sri Lankan Government. Both bilaterally and with our European partners, we have make it clear that future decisions on development aid will be affected by the Government's performance on human rights.

Albatrosses

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the actions of his Environment, Science and Energy Department in preventing mortality of albatrosses through long fishing lines.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: At the general assembly of the International Union for the Conservation of Nature and Natural Resources, in Perth, Australia, last December an official from the Department discussed with his Australian counterparts the problem of the incidental mortality of albatrosses through long-line fishing, about which we share the hon. Member's concern. Since then, the Department has kept in touch with Mr. Nigel Brothers of the Tasmanian Department of Parks, Wildlife and Heritage, who is conducting excellent research into this problem. We will continue to keep the hon. Member informed of developments.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in his Department; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Staff in statistical and administrative posts are employed in the Overseas Development Administration but not in the diplomatic wing of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. Figures are available only for the period 1984-85 to 1991-92, as follows:

	1984-85		1985-86		1986-87		1987-88		1988-89		1989-90		1990-91		1991-92

Peru

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what advice is being given to British travellers about travel to areas of Peru at risk from cholera.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We advise travellers that there is a risk from cholera in the coastal and interior regions of Peru, particularly in the poorer townships where hygiene and sanitation standards are inadequate. Travellers should avoid food vendors and cheap restaurants, observe strict personal hygiene, ensure they are vaccinated against the disease and carry a valid vaccination certificate.

Environmental Protection

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what initiatives in regard to fiscal and trade incentives to assist in protecting the environment were discussed in the meeting between the EC Foreign Affairs Ministers and the Foreign Ministers from Brazil, Argentina, Chile, Bolivia, Columbia, Ecuador and Mexico in Luxembourg on 25 April.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The Ministers of the Community and the Rio group, meeting in Luxembourg on 26 and 27 April, discussed extending co-operation in a wide range of areas including trade, investment and the environment, in the context of the institutional framework established between the European Community and the Rio group. I will place a copy of the meeting's communiqué in the Library.

Nuclear Non-proliferation

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he raised the issue of Brazil and Argentina signing the nuclear non-proliferation treaty during his meetings with his respective Brazilian and Argentine counterparts in Luxembourg on 25 April.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, attended the EC-Rio group meeting in Luxembourg on 26-28 April. At the meeting, Ministers noted with interest the initiative by Argentina and Brazil to set up a joint system of accounting and verification, applicable to all nuclear installations in both countries, and to negotiate an agreement with the International Atomic Energy Agency. A copy of the communiqué will be placed in the Library of the House.

Iraq

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will propose to the United Nations Security Council a resolution relating to the discussions which have taken place between the Kurdish leadership and the Iraqi Government.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Any agreement between the Kurdish groups and the Iraqi Government is an internal Iraqi matter, but, if requested to do so, the international community will wish to consider what further reassurance it can give to the Kurdish peoples. The United Nations has signed a memorandum of understanding with the Iraqi Government on the conduct of relief operations in Iraq based on the personal safety of the refugees and the normalisation of their lives in their places of origin.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action is being taken by Her Majesty's Government to provide substantial humanitarian aid to Shias in southern Iraq; if he will make it his policy that British and other coalition forces should remain on the southern Iraq-Kuwait border until an orderly replacement by United Nation's peace-keeping forces has taken place; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave on 25 April to the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn), at column 521-22.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has about the Iraqi authorities offering rewards for Kurdish men and women handed over to Iraqi Ba'athist forces, including police; what estimates he has received about how many such people have been handed over as a result; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Although we regularly receive information from a number of sources about conditions in the Kurdish areas in Iraq, we have seen no reports of the activities described by the hon. Member.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consideration is being given to the establishment of safe havens on the Iraq-Iran border; what assessment has been made of the numbers of Kurds and others inside Iraq and inside Iran in need of humanitarian aid; how many air strips are being built on the Iran-Iraq border; what accessibility Hariri airport offers to humanitarian aid flights; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Safe havens will be established where they are needed. The most recent estimates we have of the number of refugees is almost 1 million on the Iranian side of the border and nearly half a million on the Iraqi side of the border. Our first priority has been to provide immediate humanitarian assistance using the existing infrastructure. Where necessary, helicopters are being used to fly supplies to inaccessible areas. We and non-Government agencies are considering the use of all facilities in the area for extending relief operations.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations are being made to Iraq to ensure no Iraqi forces, including all categories of Iraqi police, are permitted to occupy areas in close proximity to safe havens and other areas occupied by Kurds and Shias; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Representations have been made to local Iraqi commanders and to Iraq's permanent representative at the United Nations. Following these representations most of the armed Iraqis have now left the area where the safe camp is being established.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Departmental Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in his Department; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

Mr. Curry: The information requested is as follows:

Sugar

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what evaluation he has made of the impact of the 1991-92 agriculture price proposals concerning sugar prices on export revenues of African, Caribbean and Pacific countries.

Mr. Curry: The Commission's 1991-92 price proposals include a 5 per cent. cut in EC sugar prices. Any cut agreed would lead to a reduction in the value of the EC's export refunds for sugar. In turn, this should improve the world market, to the benefit of those ACP (and other) countries which sell sugar on it. The price to be offered to the ACP for sugar sent to the EC in 1991-92 under the Lomé sugar protocol—currently over twice the world market price—must be linked to EC prices, but is not negotiated with the ACP until after the price fixing.

HEALTH

Sight Tests

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) when he expects to launch an information campaign about the availability of free sight tests;

(2) what steps his Department has taken to promote eye care in Britain.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Between 35 and 40 per cent. of the population are still entitled to free NHS sight tests. This includes all children and people who are entitled on either medical or low income grounds. My noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State and I launched a publicity campaign this February to draw attention to those groups entitled to free NHS sight tests. There are also local publicity initiatives, such as the eye care week organised by Derbyshire family health services authority which took place between 15 and 20 April.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he plans to review the policy of charges for national health service sight tests; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: It is Government policy that those who are able to pay for sight tests should do so, provided that vulnerable groups are protected. In June 1990 we published a report by an independent market research company—NOP—of the number of adults who had had sight tests during the first quarter of 1990. The results indicated that demand for sight tests was returning to normal after an initial drop when entitlement to NHS sight tests was restricted in April 1989. We will be monitoring sight test uptake by questions in the general household survey.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the current fee paid to an ophthalmic optician for carrying out a national health service sight test.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The fee paid to an ophthalmic optician for carrying out a national health service sight test is £12·15 from 1 April 1991.

Hearing Aid Services

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Don Valley (Mr. Redmond) of 6 February, Official Report, column 156, on pilot projects to reduce waiting times for hearing aid services, if he will outline the different ways of reducing waiting times which are being tested by the projects, the length of time for which the projects will run and the parameters on which the projects are to be evaluated.

Mr. Dorrell: Information about the precise arrangements within each individual project is not held centrally. Detailed information about the design of the projects and the parameters for the evaluation is set out in "Provisions of Hearing Aid Services Under the NHS", a consultation paper issued by the Department in April 1990, a copy of which is available in the Library. A copy of a recently published paper "Hearing Aid Services: Evaluation of Pilot Projects (RDD 198/0765)" about the evaluation is also available in the Library. The Department is funding the projects for 12 months.

Evening Primrose Oil

Mr. Jopling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will list the occasions when the advisory committee on borderline substances has considered the efficiency of evening primrose oil over the last five years; when it next intends to consider it; and what applications he has received asking that it be permitted to be prescribed at national health service expense;

(2) how much public money has been spent on assessing the value of evening primrose oil with a view to allowing it to be prescribed at national health service expense.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The advisory committee on borderline substances considered evening primrose oil products in November 1986, September 1987, May 1990, November 1990 and March 1991, and will do so again when it considers appropriate. Over the past year, the Department has received 16 letters on this subject. The Department has not funded research into the efficacy of evening primrose oil.

Disabled People

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what is the estimated number of people with (a) mental handicap, (b) mental illness, (c) physical disability and (d) sensory impairment who would need an authorised representative under the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986;

(2) what is the estimated number of authorised representatives necessary to implement sections 1 and 2 of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986;

(3) what figure for the number of disabled people was used to estimate the cost of £18 million to implement sections 1 and 2 of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986;

(4) what is the estimated cost for one authorised representative over one year acting under the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986.

Mr. Dorrell: The local authority associations' estimates of the potential costs of sections 1 and 2 of the Act are based on detailed work undertaken independently by two contrasting local authorities. The estimates assume that authorised representatives might have been appointed for approximately 144,000 disabled people annually, on a one-to-one basis. Around a quarter of this number would be people with a mental handicap, with the remainder largely attributable to those suffering from mental illness, including dementia; a minimal proportion of the total would be people with physical disability or sensory impairment only. The estimates of the costs of an authorised representative for one year range from around £40 for administration, to about £215 if expenses and fees were also to be payable.

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his estimate of the costs of carrying out procedures under the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990 to give representation to disabled people.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The involvement of disabled people and those who care for them in decisions about the services they need is central to the Government's policy for community care. However, it is not possible to say how many procedures under the National Health Service and Community Care Act, for example in relation to complaints and assessment, will involve individual disabled people being represented, and it is therefore not possible to estimate the costs arising.

Air Pollution

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has (a) commissioned and (b) published since 1979 on the subject of air pollution and human health; which studies were specifically concerned with (i) children and (ii) the elderly; which were undertaken on (x) a national, (y) a regional and (z) a local basis; which studies related specifically to (1) vehicle emissions and (2) tropospheric ozone; and what research is currently being undertaken into these areas.

Mr. Dorrell: Research on biomedical aspects of the effects of air pollution on health lies within the remit of the Medical Research Council

The Department continues to support the social medicine and health services research unit at St. Thomas's hospital in its long-term national study of health and growth among children, in which air pollution has featured as one factor.

Further support has been given to the St. Thomas's unit during this period for regional and local studies on indoor air pollution in relation to respiratory illnesses among children. Reports of all these studies are published in the scientific literature.

The small area health statistics unit at the London school of hygiene and tropical medicine, which is jointly funded by this and other Government Departments, is investigating mortality and cancer rates in communities which may be exposed to air pollution from industrial installations.

In 1990, the Department established an independent expert advisory group to assess, on the basis of national and international research data, the impact of air pollution episodes on health. The group's advice will relate to effects on the general public, although special attention will be given to sensitive groups such as the elderly and children. The group is currently completing its assessment of the effects of tropospheric ozone, and will next consider sulphur dioxide and related pollutants. Its reports will be published.

Canada (NHS Arrangements)

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he will seek reciprocal national health service arrangements for patients with the Government of Canada.

Mr. Dorrell: Talks with the Canadian authorities in 1982 indicated that a reciprocal agreement was unlikely to be concluded because of the legislative difficulties which it would cause the Canadian Government. We see no scope for reopening the matter at present.

Medicine Imports

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what analysis is being made in the knowledge of or by his Department into the quality and chemical composition of batches of medicines imported from (a) eastern Europe, (b) Greece and (c) Belgium; and what study is being considered of the effects of medicines imported from eastern Europe into the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Medicines Control Agency, which is part of the Department of Health, operates a medicines testing scheme which analytically monitors the quality and chemical composition of a statistically significant sample of medicinal products marketed in the United Kingdom.

The medicines testing scheme includes imported medicines from Belgium, Greece and eastern Europe. During the period April 1990 to March 1991, 45 medicinal products imported from Belgium and 12 medicinal products sourced from Greece were examined. No products from eastern Europe were analysed in this period.

Hairdressers

Sir John Hunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those local authorities which have registered hairdressing establishments within their areas under section 77 of the Public Health Act 1961.

Mr. Dorrell: There is no requirement under section 77 of the Public Health Act 1961 or any other general legislation for the registration of hairdressing establishments.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in his Department; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

Mr. Dorrell: The information readily available is shown in the tables. Staff in post figures for the periods prior to 1 April 1987 could be provided only at disproportionate cost. Staff complements as such are no longer used, since expenditure is controlled by financial rather than manpower limits.

Health Education Authority

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what was the total sum paid out in fees by the Health Education Authority/Health Education Council to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92;

(2) if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in the Health Education Authority/Health Education Council; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts;

(3) what was the total expenditure by the Health Education Authority/Health Education Council on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Dorrell: This information is not held centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact Sir Donald Maitland, the chairman of the Health Education Authority, for details.

Charges

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish a table showing prescription, dental and optical charges in April 1979 and April 1991 in current and constant prices showing both the cash and real increase for each charge.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The table sets out the latest available information in relation to prescription and dental charges. No comparable figures for optical charges are available because the supply of NHS spectacles ceased in July 1986. Information relates to financial years.

Catherine Murphy

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will instigate an independent inquiry into the circumstances surrounding the case of Catherine Murphy, whose family were wrongly informed of her death;

(2) when he expects to be able to reply to Councillor Neil Cardwell regarding the case of Catherine Murphy, who is at present an in-patient of Rainhill hospital, Rainhill, Merseyside.

Mr. Dorrell: The St. Helens and Knowsley health authority has apologised unreservedly to Miss Murphy's relatives and is conducting an urgent inquiry. I have asked it to keep me informed. I am writing to Councillor Cardwell today.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

St. John Ambulance Brigade

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what facilities he is providing to staff in his Department to contribute to the appeal that has been launched for people with the name of John to help raise £5 million for the St. John Ambulance Brigade.

Mr. Leigh: "Give as you Earn" facilities are available within the Department for staff to contribute to this, as with any other appeal, and as they feel appropriate.

Bakery Industry

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assistance has been given to Golden West Foods in respect of investment in a bakery and distribution centre in Rochdale.

Mr. Leigh: All applications for assistance by companies from my Department are treated in strictest confidence. However, a press release on 14 January 1991 announced with the consent of the company that a grant of £1·5 million under the regional selective assistance programme had been offered to Golden West Foods Ltd. for a bakery development at Heywood industrial park, Rochdale.

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the criteria for assistance to the bakery industry; whether that industry is assessed to be in balance between sales and productive capacity; and what steps are being taken to monitor the creation of projected extra jobs.

Mr. Leigh: Neither my Department nor the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has schemes for assistance specifically tailored to the bakery industry. In common with the rest of industry, the bakery trade may be eligible for regional selective assistance where a project meets the criteria of the scheme. Projects must create or safeguard jobs and satisfy other criteria such as viability, the need for assistance and benefits to the national and regional economy. The advice of MAFF would be sought as to prevailing conditions in the market at the time of any application. My Department monitors the creation of extra jobs in the industry, arising from new capital investment which has received support under RSA, in accordance with the conditions of the grant.

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what reasons underlie the rejection of the application for aid by Warburton's Ltd. for their new bakery in Newburn, and for a second investment in that bakery.

Mr. Leigh: It is not normal practice to provide details of individual cases where these have been supplied in confidence by a business to the Department. I should be happy to look into the matter if the hon. Member would like to write to me with further details.

Northern Development Corporation

Mr. Jopling: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what grants are made available to the Northern development corporation; and whether he has discussed with it the case for devoting more interest and attention to Cumbria.

Mr. Leigh: The Northern Development Company has been offered a grant of £1·33 million in the current financial year for its inward investment promotion activities in the north-west of England. DTI funding for inward investment in the north-east, including Cumbria, is provided through INWARD, which receives a grant of £990,000. NDC also carries out general economic development activities in Cumbria, but this does not receive DTI funding. The NDC is already increasing its activities in Cumbria. My Department has discussed this on several occasions with the company.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in his Department; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

Mr. Leigh: The tables show the available information. The Department's statistical services have been subject to a number of organisational and machinery of government changes which need to be taken into account when comparing the data for different years. In particular, a major part of the Department's statistical work and associated staff (including the business statistics office) were transferred to the Central Statistical Office on 31 July 1989.

Table A shows the information for the business statistics office for each year from 1 April 1980 to 1 April 1989. Tables B and C show the information for the Department's two central statistical divisions from 1 April 1981 to 1 April 1989. On 1 April 1980, the central statistical divisions were part of the Department's economics and statistics divisions, and table D shows the staff in post for these as at 1 April 1980. Following the transfer of statistical work to the Central Statistical Office, the remaining statistical work was distributed among a number of divisions within the Department in 1989-90. A further departmental reorganisation combined the statistical work of the Department to form part of the economics, market intelligence and statistics division in 1990-91. The information from 1 April 1990 is shown in table E. Detailed allocations have not yet been finalised for April 1992.

The following points should also be noted in reading the tables:

1. The staff in post figures count part-time staff as half and exclude casual staff.

2. The allocation of posts to grade is not available for April 1980.

3. With the introduction of unified grading, the chief statistical and statistician grades were absorbed into grades 5 and 7 respectively.

4. Following the creation of the economics, market intelligence and statistics division in 1990-91, some administrative staff work for both economists and statisticians. The figures for 1 April 1991 only include that proportion of time spent supporting statisticians.

Insolvency Cases

Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what targets he has set the Insolvency Service executive agency for 1991-92.

Mr. Redwood: I expect the insolvency service to continue to bring proceedings for the disqualification of directors of failed companies, and to submit prosecution reports where there is evidence of criminal behaviour in all appropriate cases. In addition I have set it output targets of completing the administration of at least 14,500 cases in 1991-92, while examining in detail one in 20 of all bankruptcy and liquidation accounts received from independent insolvency practitioners.

The quality of service targets for 1991-92 are: to report to creditors on assets and liabilities within nine weeks in at least 75 per cent. of cases; to hold the initial meeting of creditors within 12 weeks on at least 90 per cent. of all cases; to check and action at least 93 per cent. of payment requisitions within 10 days or by the due date; to submit reports within 10 months in at least 80 per cent. of cases identified for investigation.

I would like to congratulate the chief executive and his staff on their success in improving quality of service last year while significantly increasing their efficiency. For 1991-92. I have asked the chief executive to secure a further 5 per cent. increase in productivity in case administration, as measured by both the initial handling of cases and their closure. I have also toughened the target for a reduction in real terms for the average unit cost of the initial stage of bankruptcies and liquidations, so that it is now a 37 per cent. reduction over the period 1990-91 to 1992-93.

Environment Conferences

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) whether his Department (a) received an invitation to attend and (b) had any participation in the second world industry conference on environmental management held in Rotterdam on 9 to 12 April;

(2) when his Department received a copy of the recommendations made to Governments contained in the final declaration of the second world industry conference on environmental management dated 12 April.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 22 April 1991]: An official from the Department's environment unit attended this conference as a delegate. Like other delegates he received a copy of the final declaration, including the recommendations to Governments at the final session of the conference on 12 April.

Cornish Tin Mining

Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) when the Department received an official response from Carnon Holdings to his Department's decision to withdraw funding from the Cornish tin mining industry;

(2) what was the response of Carnon Holdings to his Department's decision to withdraw funding from the Cornish tin mining industry;

(3) when his Department officially notified Carnon Holdings of the decision to cease funding for its tin mining operations; and what prior discussions with the company had taken place;

(4) when his Department took the decision to withdraw funding from the tin mining industry.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 22 April 1991]: Numerous discussions and other contacts have taken place since early 1990 on the question of the viability of Carnon Holdings Ltd.'s tin mining project, a precondition for advances of DTI loan money. The decision not to advance any further money to Carnon was made and conveyed orally to the company on 22 February 1991. It was confirmed in writing on 25 February. Carnon replied to the Department on 25 February enclosing its press release of the same date announcing its response to the decision.

Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the reasons for his Department's non-payment of the first instalment of £1·7 million to Carnon Holdings Ltd. to finance Cornish tin mining operations.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 25 April 1991]: I refer the hon. Member to my speech in the Adjournment debate on 6 March at colums 431-438. I explained inter alia that the Government had come to the conclusion that the tin mining project was not viable in the longer term. The rules of financial and parliamentary accountability then meant that we could not make any further payments under the loan.

Appledore Shipbuilders

Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and industry if he will make a statement on his Department's involvement in the efforts of Appledore Shipbuilders Ltd. to secure an order from A. P. Moller for platform supply vessels.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 24 April 1991]: Since this is a commercial matter, I regret that I am unable to make a statement.

Cumbria (Assisted Areas)

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he intends to designate any new assisted areas in Cumbria; which districts will be affected; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 24 April 1991]: I do not anticipate further changes to the assisted areas map during this Parliament.

Kuwait (Oil Fires)

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to the reply of the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 18 April, if he will make bulldozers and other relevant equipment available to the Government of Kuwait to assist in fighting the oil fires; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 23 April 1991]: It is for the firefighting contractors selected by the Kuwaitis to determine and make available the necessary equipment. As yet, British companies are not directly involved in firefighting, but the Government are actively supporting proposals from British groups to provide a wide range of services which are needed to deal with the oil fires.

Building Work

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will list the number and location of all new buildings or extensions commissioned by his Department in each of the past five years which (a) had contracts worth between £3 million and £5 million and (b) had contracts worth more than £5 million.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 25 April 1991]: Before 1 April 1988, my Department had no responsibility for funding major new buildings or extensions on the Government's civil estate. My Department has since commissioned one project covered by the question. This was for a new building at Newport in Gwent in the more than £5 million category, started in 1988-89.

Advertising

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give separate figures for the spending of his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 25 April 1991]: I refer to the answer given to the hon. Member on 13 March 1990 columns 173-74. Expenditure from the Department's central publicity budget over the past two years was as follows:

£000s

	1989-90	1990-91[2]
Television advertising	5,084	3,938
Radio advertising	540	141
Press advertising	3,506	1,801
Other promotional materials[1]	4,037	3,867

[1] Publication, Audio-visual materials and posters.
[2] Estimated.

Precise media allocations for the current year are not available, but expenditure is likely to be within the 1990-91 total.

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of his Department.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 26 April 1991]: Separate figures for the years before 1987-88 are not readily available. The complement of the Department's press office on 1 April over the past five years has been as follows, with the number of staff in post shown in parenthesis:

Year
1987-88	51	(51)
1988-89	51	(51)
1989-90	41	(37)
1990-91	39	(37)
1991-92	39	(38)

The current total includes 16 clerical and other support posts.

WALES

Council Housing

14. Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many new houses were completed by district councils in Wales during 1991; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The number of dwellings completed by district councils in January and February 1991 was 16; in 1990 a total of 551 dwellings was completed. Some 544 dwellings were under construction by district councils at the end of February 1991.

Foreign-owned Companies

15. Mr. Grist: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many employees in Wales work for (a) EC-owned firms and (b) other foreign-owned firms.

Mr. David Hunt: Some 63,000 people are currently employed at overseas-owned manufacturing plants in Wales. Of these, 14,000 are employed at plants in the ownership of EC countries other than the United Kingdom and 49,000 at other overseas-owned plants.

Special Treatment Centres

17. Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will extend beyond April 1992 the funding by his Department of the special treatment centres for hip and knee replacements at Rhydlafar hospital, for hernias and varicose veins at Bridgend general hospital and for cataract surgery at Ysbyty Gwynedd, Bangor.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The existing treatment centres are already proving successful in providing speedy treatment for patients with key disabling complaints and are expected to remain an effective source of treatment under the recently introduced contracting arrangements. Decisions on future funding will be taken in the light of experience during 1991-92, but it is not intended that central funding should continue indefinitely.

Training Organisations

18. Mr. Ray Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if, during his discussions with the chairmen of TECs in Wales on 7 May, he will include advice on the advisability of ensuring that chief executive officers and monitoring officers are not only experienced but qualified to determine whether approved training organisation status should be awarded to training organisations.

Sir Wyn Roberts: All TEC chairmen in Wales are aware of their responsibility to ensure that all staff are adequately qualified to perform the duties assigned to them.

Local Government Reform

19. Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proposals he has for another tier of local government in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: None.

21. Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many representations he has received on local government and constitutional reform in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: Several, some in favour of reform and some against.

26. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the conclusions he has reached in relation to the reorganisation of local government in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: I have reached no conclusions. I propose to issue, early in the summer, a consultation paper identifying the factors which would need to be borne in mind in considering any reorganisation.

Local Government Finance

20. Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he last met leaders of local authorities in Wales to discuss local government finance.

Mr. David Hunt: On 23 April, to explain the Government's proposals for a new council tax to replace the community charge.

27. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what are the relative percentages of revenue raised for local government expenditure from charge payers, business rate payers and central Government grant.

Mr. David Hunt: The overall effect of the local government finance settlement for 1991-92, taken together with the community charge reduction schemes that I have introduced this year, is that the average community charge payable in Wales will be around £92 before taking account of community charge benefit. This means that community charge payers are expected to contribute 8 per cent. towards budgeted spending with 21 per cent. being financed from non-domestic rates and the rest coming from a range of central Government grants.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of local government expenditure in Wales is currently raised by the poll tax.

Mr. David Hunt: Eight per cent.

Employment Training

22. Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate for (a) Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney and (b) Mid Glamorgan of employment training expenditure in 1990-91 and 1991-92, respectively.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The employment training budget now administered by the Mid Glamorgan training and enterprise council for the financial year 1991-92 is £5·6 million. Comparative figures for 1990-91 are not available. Figures for the areas of Merthyr and Rhymney are not produced.

Prince of Wales Hospital, Rhydlafar

23. Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what provision he proposes to make to enable in-patients at St. Nicholas ward, Prince of Wales orthopaedic hospital, Rhydlafar, to remain there after its proposed closure date of 30 April to complete their in-patient treatment.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave him on Friday 19 April 1991 at column 276.

As the implementation of approved service changes is a matter for health authorities, I have not discussed the timing of the transfer of the children's orthopaedic service in South Glamorgan with the chairman of the district health authority. Nor do I have plans to issue any general guidance on this particular aspect of service planning.

Information Technology

24. Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the growth of the information technology industry in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: The information technology sector in Wales has grown from a limited base in the late 1970s into a substantial sector now. For example, in the electronic sector alone employment grew by 89 per cent. between 1978 and 1990.

Abattoirs

25. Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the initiatives he intends to take to increase the number of EC-approved abattoirs in Wales by 1992.

Mr. David Hunt: Responsibility for complying with the EC measures to harmonise standards for abattoirs by 1

January 1993 rests with the industry. The Government consider that the abattoir industry should plan for this urgently, and I have taken every opportunity to encourage those involved to take the necessary steps to ensure that they comply with the new standards.

New Hospital, Neath

28. Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he intends to make an announcement about the building of the new hospital for Neath.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: My right hon. Friend has today announced his decision approving the proposal of West Glamorgan health authority to build a new district general hospital for Neath and Port Talbot at Baglan moors, Port Talbot.

Inward Investment

29. Mr. Dickens: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the level of inward investment into Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: Inward investment has made a very significant contribution to the transformation of the Welsh economy in recent years, a contribution that is being maintained at very high levels. The financial year 1990-91 was again a record year for inward investment to Wales, with 147 projects secured promising nearly 15,000 jobs.

Further Education

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many representations he has received concerning the proposed change in funding and management of the further education sector in Wales.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The Department has received three representations on this matter.

Severn Estuary (Birds)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proposals he has to designate as a special protection area under the 1979 EEC wild birds directive the inter-tidal mudflats on the Welsh side of the Severn estuary so far proposed for designation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given to him on Thursday 25 April by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

School Nurses

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will take steps to bring schools into line with workplace law which stipulates that there must be a person on the premises with first aid qualifications for every 150 employees; and whether he will give consideration to appointing fully qualified nurses in schools with over 500 pupils.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Local authorities have duties, as employers, to provide first aid facilities for all their employees, including those in schools. These duties are set out in the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 and more specifically in the Health and Safety (Training for Employment) Regulations 1981 made under that Act. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment has no plans for extending these duties to cover non-employees.

However, the Health and Safety Commission's approved code of practice on first aid at work recognises that employers, such as local education authorities, whose premises are regularly attended by non-employees may wish to make some provision for them. The recommendation of both the Welsh Office and HSE is that such employers may consider, among other matters, the total number of people on a site when assessing first aid needs. In the case of schools, the responsibility for making such an assessment rests with the employer.

All local education authorities in Wales were sent the code of practice in February and asked to review the situation at the schools and colleges for which they have a general health and safety responsibility and to determine what practical measures needed to be given priority in order to reach or maintain the recommended minimum standards for first aid.

The appointment of qualified nurses in schools is a matter for determination locally.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in his Department; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

Mr. David Hunt: The information is as follows:

Accidents in Children's Play Areas

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has about accidents in children's play areas; and what steps he intends to take to make them safer.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The Department of Trade and Industry compiles statistics relating to accidents in a wide range of recreational environments including playgrounds. A copy of its 12th annual report of home accident surveillance systems, that for 1988, is in the Library of the House. Table LASS 2, page 46 presents accidents in playgrounds split by age. Information on playground accidents is also held by the Health and Safety Executive. I expect that a joint Department of Education and Science and Welsh Office advice on safety in school play areas will be issued to local authorities later this year.

Expenditure in Schools

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table showing the expenditure per pupil on (i) books and (ii) equipment in (a) primary schools and (b) secondary schools in cash and real terms since 1976.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Local authority expenditure per pupil on text books, library books, educational equipment, stationery and materials in primary and secondary schools since 1976-77 is shown in the table. Reliable information on text books and equipment is not separately available.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Head Teachers (Appraisal)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what are his plans for the appraisal of head teachers.

Mr. Fallon: My right hon. and learned Friend's plans are set out in the drafts of the regulations he proposes to make on school teacher appraisal and of the associated departmental circular. The drafts were sent out for consultation to representatives of the employers, teacher associations and others on 23 April 1991: copies have also been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Special Schools (London)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the number of places in special schools in each local authority in London by category (a) as at 1 April 1990 and (b) as at 1 April 1991.

Mr. Fallon: Information on the number of special school places is not available centrally. The number of pupils in maintained special schools within the London boroughs is given in the table. These figures reflect the position as at January 1990, the latest date for which information is available.

Youth Service (London)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will set out the amount of money spent in (a) Greater London, (b) inner London and (c) Southwark on the youth service in each of the financial years from 1979 to 1991 inclusive; and what was the amount budgeted in each of the same areas for 1991-92, both absolutely and as a proportion of the total education budget.

Mr. Atkins: The available information is shown in the table. The latest year for which information on actual spending is available is 1988-89. This information is taken from local education authorities' spending returns and is not collected for particular areas within a local education authority. The information requested on amounts budgeted is not collected.

Pupil Numbers (Southwark)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the projection of population of all residents, residents under 11 years, pupils between 11 and 18 years and pupils under 11 years on which his Department is working for each of the years 1990-91 to 2000-1 inclusive in (a) Southwark and (b) each of the parliamentary constituencies within the London borough of Southwark.

Mr. Fallon: The Department does not engage in the planning of educational services at local education authority or constituency level. This is a matter for the individual authorities concerned.

Special Educational Needs

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many pupils are awaiting assessment of their special educational needs in each London local education authority at the latest date for which figures are available; what is the average delay between requests for and issuing of statements; what additional financial and human provision is made in each case to ensure statementing as soon as possible; what proposals he has for speeding up the procedure; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fallon: This information is not collected centrally. The responsibility for carrying out assessments of special educational needs rests with the local education authorities. Advice and guidance in relation to the procedures for assessments and statements made under the Education Act 1981 is given in circular 22/89, which was issued jointly by the Department of Education and Science and the Department of Health in September 1989.

Southwark (Official Visits)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list all official visits made by Ministers, in each case with the name of the Minister and the date, to schools or institutions of education in the London borough of Southwark in each year from 1979 to 1991 inclusive.

Mr. Fallon: Records of ministerial visits are not available as far back as 1979. However, in the last two years DES Ministers have visited a number of schools and colleges in inner London boroughs, including Southwark. The then Minister of State visited Sumner nursery and Surrey Square junior and infants schools in Southwark on 23 January 1990. Earlier this year, on 26 March, my hon. Friend the present Minister of State visited the London Nautical School.

Tuition Fees

Mr. Peter Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will list the information he has available on the names of those local authorities which have not made full payment of tuition fees to institutions of higher education for the current academic year; and if he will indicate the amounts of the sums unpaid;

(2) what information he has on the percentage of fee payments due to institutions of higher education from local authorities for the autumn term 1990 and the spring term 1991 which remains unpaid;

(3) if he will take steps to ensure that those local authorities which have not paid in full the tuition fees owed to institutions of higher education for the first two terms of the current academic year do so.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The Education (Mandatory Awards) Regulations 1990 require local education authorities to pay tuition fees promptly to academic institutions on behalf of their mandatory award holders. I understand that a significant proportion of the autumn term 1990 fee instalments remained unpaid at the end of that term and that there were delays in paying the spring term 1991 instalments, but that the majority of both instalments have now been paid. I am awaiting further information from the bodies representing universities and polytechnics on the amounts still outstanding and the individual local authorities at fault. I deplore unnecessary delays in payment. The Department issued clear guidance last year on good practice deadlines for fee payment. All authorities have recently been reminded again of this guidance and the statutory requirements, and urged to settle outstanding fees. The Department is taking action with any individual authorities found to have substantial payments still overdue. Measures are being developed to improve the processing of fee payments for the coming academic year.

Women Scientists

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what study he has made of the census, why more women are not doing scientific and technical work since August 1990; and what action Her Majesty's Government are taking to convince girls and young women that such opportunities for physicists are open to all, in the light of demographic changes.

Mr. Eggar: The employers concerned have the prime responsibility for making scientific and technical careers attractive to women. Nevertheless, this Government's education reforms include some relevant initiatives. The science component of the national curriculum will reinforce that aspect of the education of pupils to age 16, both boys and girls. This will help to ensure that pupils will be less likely to have career options prematurely closed to them and will be better placed to make informed choices about whether to follow a career in a scientific discipline.

The Women into Science and Engineering campaign (WISE) fosters equal opportunity links between education and industry and stresses the importance of eliminating and stereotyping in option choice and careers advice. The WISE campaign has continued to be promoted and five WISE buses, sponsored and maintained by industry, and with support from the Government, continue to give careers advice to girls.

For mature students, there are available some access courses which cater exclusively for women; for example, in micro-electronics, engineering, and information and industrial technology.

Teacher Training

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the initial teacher training courses upon which the Council for the Accreditation of Teacher Education has made recommendations to him, categorised according to whether (a) all relevant criteria are satisfied, so that he was recommended to approve the course under schedule 5 to the Education (Teachers) Regulations Act 1982, (b) a recommendation for schedule 5 approval was made conditional upon further progress within a specific timetable, (c) no recommendation was made and (d) he was recommended to withhold or to withdraw approval; and in each case whether he has accepted the Council for Accreditation of Teacher Education recommendation.

Mr. Fallon: Since 1 January 1990, when the Council for the Accreditation of Teacher Education was reconstituted, the Secretary of State has approved on its advice the courses listed in the table. He has also withdrawn aproval on the council's advice from work and the urban environment as a main subject specialism in the BEd (Hons) primary course at the polytechnic of North London. There are no courses where approval has been given subject to conditions.

My right hon. and learned Friend is currently considering advice from the council on 17 further courses.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the reports completed since 1983 by Her Majesty's inspectorate on institutions responsible for teacher education and training and indicate the date of publication of the report and, for university departments of education, which opted not to publish their reports.

Mr. Fallon: The reports issued by Her Majesty's inspectorate since 1983 on institutions responsible for teacher education and training are listed in the table.

Reports on the university of Nottingham and the university of Newcastle, available in 1985 and 1988 respectively, were not published.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many courses of initial teacher education and training have been considered by the central Council for Accreditation of Teacher Education; how many are pending; how many have been accepted; and how many have been rejected.

Mr. Fallon: Since 1 January 1990, when the Council for the Accreditation of Teacher Education was reconstituted, 94 courses have been submitted to it for consideration. Of these, 37 so far have been the subject of advice to the Secretary of State.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list by local education authority the number of (a) primary and (b) secondary schools taking placement of trainee teachers (i) as part of their course and (ii) for their induction year.

Mr. Fallon: This information is not held centrally.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to complete the formal approval procedure for postgraduate certificate of education and B.Ed. teacher training courses presently operating under temporary approval.

Mr. Fallon: My right hon. and learned Friend will complete the accreditation process as soon as he is satisfied that all the courses presently operating under temporary approval fully meet the criteria.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many courses of initial teacher education and training have been scrutinised by local Council for Accreditation of Teacher Education committees; and, of these, how many have been accepted and how many rejected.

Mr. Fallon: Since 1 April 1990, when the new local committees came into being, they have considered a total of 80 courses. Of these, 75 have been put forward to the Council for the Accreditation of Teacher Education, and five courses have been referred back to the institutions concerned.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the colleges of teacher education and training and university and polytechnic departments of education visited by Education Ministers in the last six months.

Mr. Fallon: The college of Ripon and York St. John and the Roehampton institute.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what advice he has issued during the last five years to local education authorities and schools in the induction of newly trained teachers.

Mr. Fallon: Advice on the induction of newly trained teachers is contained in administrative memorandum No. 1/90, "The Treatment and Assessment of Probationary Teachers".

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he plans to publish the next Her Majesty's inspectorate report on the "New Teacher in School".

Mr. Fallon: Her Majesty's inspectors expect to undertake an inspection in the summer of 1992 of those newly trained teachers who took up their first appointments in September 1991. A report will then go to my right hon. and learned Friend for him to consider publication.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he collects on the operation and cost of the system of teacher induction.

Mr. Fallon: Under the programme of grants for education support and training, we collect information from the local education authorities which are claiming support for induction training. In the current financial year, over 70 per cent. of authorities are planning to claim support specifically for provision in this area.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in his Department; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

Mr. Eggar: Copies of tables containing the available information have been placed in the Library.

Student Grants

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science, further to his answer to the hon. Member for Oxford, East of 22 April in relation to total spending on higher education student support in the form of mandatory awards, if he will provide the information on cash expenditure, real expenditure with 1978-79 = 100, and expenditure per student, disaggregated between expenditure on fees and expenditure on maintenance.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The data requested are given in the table and cover expenditure made by local education authorities in England and Wales in bestowing mandatory awards under the Education (Mandatory Awards) Regulations.

Academic year	Expenditure (cash £m) fees	maintenance	Expenditure (real index) fees	maintenance	Expenditure per student (£) fees	maintenance
1978-89	197·1	271·9	100	100	616	850
1979-80	217·8	332·2	95	105	675	1,030
1980-81	281·1	398·2	106	108	840	1,190
1981-82	340·0	443·3	115	108	959	1,250
1982-83	208·6	472·0	66	108	563	1,274
1983-84	217·1	502·1	65	109	564	1,306
1984-85	226·4	480·2	65	99	573	1,215
1985-86	238·4	457·7	64	89	611	1,173
1986-87	245·1	479·6	64	91	622	1,216
1987-88	262·3	503·1	66	92	649	1,244
1988-89	278·7	547·0	66	94	671	1,317

The real index has been calculated using the retail prices index. In 1982-83, expenditure on fees is affected by a reduction in the rate set for first degrees and diplomas from £900 to £480 with compensating increases in the direct funds paid to institutions.

Antarctica

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has had about the presence in the Antarctic of debris from British research programmes; and what action is being taken to clear up such debris.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Apart from two parliamentary questions from the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) on 9 May 1990, Official Report, column 184, the Secretary of State has received no representations.

The British Antarctic Survey has now formulated and is implementing its up-to-date environmental management policy covering the disposal of debris and wastes. This phased programme is intended to comply fully with recommendation XV-3 of the XVth Antarctic treaty consultative meeting held in October 1989. All waste, other than human waste and scrap food, will be removed from Antarctica.

Abandoned bases are being surveyed prior to the development of a programme of remedial work. Clean-up activities took place at Deception island, Winter island and Halley base during the 1990-91 season.

Colleges of Further Education

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether the provisions of the Education Reform Act in respect of opting-out are to be made applicable to colleges of further education.

Mr. Eggar: No. As my right hon. and learned Friend made clear in his statement to the House on 21 March 1991, Official Report, columns 432-48, the Government propose to introduce new legislation to take all further education colleges out of local authority control.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what limit he sets in the extent of delegated powers relevant to the running of such an institution that may be delegated to the governing body of a further education college by the relevant local education authority;

(2) if he will list the powers which may be delegated to a governing body under local management of schools to colleges.

Mr. Eggar: The local education authority, in consultation with the governing body, is responsible for determining, in accordance with the scheme of delegation drawn up by the local education authority under section 139 of the Education Reform Act 1988, the general educational character of a college and its place in the local education system. The governing body is responsible, in accordance with the scheme, for the general direction of the college.

The powers which may be delegated to college governing bodies are listed in paragraph 4.11 of DES circular 9/88 "Education Reform Act 1988: Local Management of Further and Higher Education Colleges: Planning and Delegation Schemes and Articles of Government", a copy of which is held in the Library.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the limit of the extent of control over capital building and revenue maintenance programmes that can be assumed by a further education college.

Mr. Fallon: Control of the major capital building programme currently rests with local education authorities. Responsibility for minor capital works, structural repairs and maintenance can be split between local education authorities and their colleges, according to the scheme of delegation. Responsibility for minor repairs and maintenance rests with the colleges.

Foundation for Sport and the Arts

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what calculations were involved in arriving at the estimate given by the Minister for Sport at a press conference at the Queen Elizabeth conference centre on 23 April that the total amount of money that would go to the proposed Foundation for Sport and the Arts would be £75 million.

Mr. Atkins: I gave illustrative figures. Under the proposals announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, the reduction in pool betting levy from 40 per cent. to 37·5 per cent. would on present estimates channel about £20 million a year into the foundation. A further £40 million or so would be given by the pools promoters. If turnover increased the yield could be greater.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science on how many occasions he has intervened to prevent a local education authority from delegating functions to a further education college.

Mr. Eggar: None.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science which ad hoc budgets not subject to formula funding may be delegated to a further education college for administration, with the approval of the education authority.

Mr. Eggar: If the local education authority wishes, all funds for administration services can be delegated to a college. In most approved schemes local education authorities were permitted to earmark funds for certain services and to require colleges to use those sums to buy the services from their local education authority. Local authorities were required, however, to ensure that over a three-year period colleges were given increased discretion, particularly over services provided to support colleges.

School Meals

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish the results from the 1990 school meal census showing the numbers and proportions of children taking (i) paid school meals, (ii) free school meals and (iii) making their own arrangements in (a) primary schools, (b) secondary schools, (c) special schools and (d) in all three.

Mr. Fallon: This information is available in "Statistics of Education: Schools 1990", pages 137 to 145, which was published on 23 April 1991. Copies are being placed in the Library.

Expenditure in Schools

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish a table showing the expenditure per pupil on (i) books and (ii) equipment in (a) primary schools and (b) secondary schools in cash and real terms since 1976.

Mr. Fallon: Figures returned by local education authorities for spending on books and equipment separately need to be treated with caution because of differing local authority practices in classifying spending between the two items. The table therefore shows, for each year for which information is available, spending figures per pupil for books and equipment together as well as for books and equipment separately.

[1] The figures are based on local education authority returns to DOE and pupil number returns to DES.
[2] The cash figures for earlier years have been repriced to 1988-89 prices using the Gross Domestic Product (Market Prices) deflator.
[3] Figures for nursery schools and for primary schools are not collected separately.

Play Areas (Accidents)

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has about accidents in children's play areas; and what steps he intends to take to make them safer.

Mr. Atkins: The Department of Trade and Industry's accident statistics cover a range of recreational environments including playgrounds. A copy of the 12th annual report of the home accident surveillance system has been placed in the House of Commons Library. Certain accidents must also be reported to the Health and Safety Executive under the Reporting of Injuries, Diseases and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1985.

The Government are concerned to ensure that children's playgrounds are as safe as possible. At this Department's request, the National Children's Play and Recreation Unit is preparing a booklet on playground safety for distribution to local authorities and other operators. A complementary departmental guidance booklet on school playgrounds and related safety issues is in preparation.

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will publish a table showing for 1970, 1973, 1979, 1985 and the latest available date the numbers employed in each of the industries by maximum and sub-division in which import penetration or export proportion now exceeds 20 per cent.

Mr. Jackson: Employment statistics for these periods for the United Kingdom are not available below the two digit level of standard industrial classification. The available information is as follows:

Employees in employment in those manufacturing industries where import penetration or export proportion exceeded 20 per cent. at June 1989[1]

[2] The earliest date for which figures are available on a consistent basis.
[3] The calculation of import/export proportion ratios is not appropriate for class 21 (extraction and preparation of metalliferous ores). However, it is not possible to separate estimates of employees in employment in this class from those in classes 22 and 23, both of which have import penetration or export proportion ratios of over 20 per cent.

Training (South-east London)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list all those organisations and individuals who have made representations to him about cuts in training for the year 1991-92 so far announced for south-east London.

Mr. Jackson: I receive many representations from a variety of organisations and individuals on a wide range of issues.

Separate records of each of these issues are not maintained.

Sheltered Housing Staff

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to establish a mandatory system of national training qualifications for sheltered housing staff.

Mr. Jackson: I have no plans to introduce a mandatory system of national training qualifications for sheltered housing staff. However, under the programme to develop national vocational qualifications for all occupations the housing lead body is currently developing national vocational qualifications for those employed in housing activities. The development of NVQs for sheltered housing staff is part of that programme, and I am confident that relevant qualifications will be available by mid-1992, in line with Government targets.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many 16 and 17-year-olds were registered unemployed in each of the past 18 months in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) Scotland.

Mr. Jackson: The information can be obtained from the NOMIS database in the House of Commons Library.

Management Consultants

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the total sum paid out in fees by the Training Agency/Manpower Services Commission to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Jackson: Expenditure by the Training Agency, and its predecessors, the Training Commission and the Manpower Services Commission, on management consultancy for the years 1984-85 to 1989-90 was as follows:

	£ thousands
1984-85	128
1985-86	191
1986-87	403
1987-88	238
1988-89	215
1989-90	28

The estimated outturn for 1990-91 is around £150,000. Following recent reorganisation of the Employment Department, the former Training Agency is now an integral part of the Department's headquarters. The Department's management consultancy budget for 1991-92 will be reported to the House in due course. Information for the periods 1979-80 to 1983-84 could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, (1) in the statistical divisions in his Department; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts;

(2) in the statistical divisions in the Training Agency/MSC; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

Mr. Jackson: The numbers of staff, by grade, employed on 1 April 1991 in statistical divisions in the Department of Employment headquarters—including statistical sections previously in the Training Agency—the Employment Service Agency and the Health and Safety Executive are as in the table below. The number of permanent staff included is close to the current complement. The complement of casual administrative staff varies over time. More such staff will be employed as necessary to process the 1991 "New Earnings Survey" and the 1991 census of employment.

The information readily available for earlier years has already been given, in replies to the hon. Member on 15 March 1990, 15 March 1989 and 21 July 1988.

Earnings, Northumberland

Mr. Jack Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of women manual and non-manual workers in Northumberland earned less than £120 per week in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Jackson: It is estimated from the "New Earnings Survey" that in April 1990, 36·5 per cent. of manual and 19·1 per cent. of non-manual full-time female employees on adult rates in Northumberland, whose pay for the survey pay period was not affected by absence, had gross weekly earnings less than £120.

Mr. Jack Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the figure below which the lowest paid 10 per cent. of manual and non-manual women workers earned in the county of Northumberland, in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Jackson: It is estimated from the "New Earnings Survey" that in April 1990, the figures below which 10 per cent. of female manual and non-manual employees earned in Northumberland were £96·70 and £105·60 respectively, for full-time female employees on adult rates, whose pay for the survey pay period was not affected by absence.

Mr. Jack Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what are the average earnings for manual and non-manual women workers in the county of Northumberland in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Jackson: It is estimated from the "New Earnings Survey" that in April 1990, average gross weekly earnings in Northumberland were £140·40 for manual and £183·90 for non-manual full-time female employees on adult rates, whose pay for the survey pay period was not affected by absence.

NOW Initiative

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether the Government intend to take part in the National Operations for Women initiative to promote equal opportunities for employment and vocational training for women, launched by the European Community on 31 January; when he intends to appoint a co-ordinator; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: On 19 April the European Commission notified the amount of funding available to the United Kingdom for NOW. My Department is now in a position to compile the overall operational programme that has to be submitted to the Commission by the end of June. Further details will be announced as soon as possible.

Temporary Employment Scheme

Mrs. Maureen Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what proposals he has for a temporary employment scheme for the unemployed.

Mr. Jackson: There are already a wide range of measures available to help unemployed people get back to work. I have no current plans to introduce a temporary employment scheme.

SCOTLAND

Potatoes

Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland who is responsible for ensuring that Scottish seed potatoes comply with the Seed Potato Regulations 1984; and how the scheme of certification is administered.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Producers and subsequent sellers of seed potatoes are responsible for ensuring that their product complies with the regulations.

The seed potato classification and labelling schemes are administered and enforced by the Scottish Office Agriculture and Fisheries Department under the Seed Potatoes Regulations 1984. Certificates of classification are issued by the Department provided that the growing crop is found on at least two visual inspections to meet the standards prescribed.

Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what legal recourse, under the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland certification scheme, a potato farmer from outside Scotland has against either the merchant supplier, or the Scottish grower, of virus-infected Scottish seed potatoes supplied.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Seed Potatoes Regulations 1984, which govern the marketing of seed potatoes in Great Britain, and under which the Scottish Office Agriculture and Fisheries Department, formerly DAFS, administers the seed potato classification and labelling schemes, do not provide for any form of restitution to purchasers of seed potatoes. Such matters must be pursued through the normal commercial channels. Any purchaser who is not satisfied with goods delivered to him, including seed potatoes, may initiate civil legal proceedings under the Sale of Goods Act.

Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland takes immediately to inform all merchants and farmers who have taken seed from a Scottish grower in cases where it has firm evidence that a batch of Scottish seed potatoes from that grower has high levels of virus infection; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Scottish Office Agriculture and Fisheries Department, formerly DAFS, has no legal responsibility to notify industry bodies in such circumstances.

However, in cases where the Department was in possession of facts which clearly gave rise to concern about the presence of virus it would as a matter of course conduct a full investigation. I understand that my noble Friend the Minister with responsibility for these matters is writing to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Moss: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what legal penalties are available to the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland to prosecute growers and merchants who supply Scottish seed potatoes which are found at a subsequent date not to comply with the regulations of certification; and how many prosecutions of Scottish seed potato suppliers for faulty seed there have been in each year for the last 10 years.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Under the Plant Varieties and Seeds Act 1964, any person who contravenes any provision contained in the seeds regulations may be prosecuted and by summary conviction would be liable to a fine not exceeding £2,000.

There have been two successful prosecutions by the Secretary of State for Scotland in respect of the marketing of seed potatoes in Great Britain under the Seed Potatoes Regulations 1984; one in 1988, the other in 1989.

Drinking Water

Mr. Graham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what further resources he has allocated to local authorities to bring standards of drinking water up to EC recommended levels; and when he expects all drinking water to comply with EC standards.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Improvements to drinking water quality form part of the water and sewerage capital expenditure programme. For 1991-92 programme provision has been set at more than £169 million, rising to £238 million for 1993-94. The figure for 1993-94 is two thirds higher than the provision for 1990-91 and more than double the level for 1988-89. Authorities may also fund additional capital expenditure from revenue.

The EC standards for drinking water have been incorporated into the Water Supply (Water Quality) (Scotland) Regulations 1990. Almost all drinking water put into public supply and which is not subject to relaxation of specific standards as authorised under the regulations is expected to comply with the EC standards by 1995. Private water supplies which require improvement to comply with the standards are to be the subject of programmes, on which it is planned to issue further guidance later this year.

Local Government Review

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if, in his review of local government, he will give consideration to the establishment of an independent commission similar to that being proposed for local government south of the border.

Mr. Lang: I have, of course, given very careful consideration to this matter. I have concluded that the establishment of a commission of the kind which my right hon. Friend has in mind would not be the best or most appropriate way forward for Scotland, where we have a local government system which is less diverse and more coherent, where the scale of the task is very different, and where we already have 16 years' experience of unitary authorities in the islands.

My right hon. Friend proposes a commission which will advise him on changes in different parts of England, on a rolling programme: I do not see a need for a commission working in that way in Scotland. The absence of a commission will not, however, mean a less thorough consultative process in Scotland. We intend to start the consultative process within the next few weeks, by consulting on the broad principles which will underpin the new system.

Water Pollution

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, further to his answer of 15 April, Official Report, column 118, what are the arrangements for specific pollution incidents or other significant water quality failures.

Lord James Douglas Hamilton: The Water Supply (Water Quality) (Scotland) Regulations 1990 require a water authority to notify appropriate district or islands councils and health boards of any event affecting drinking water quality which may give rise to a significant risk to public health. The "Guidance on Safeguarding the Quality of Public Water Supplies in Scotland", issued in April 1990, sets out in detail the actions that the water authority should take. These include notifying the Scottish Office Environment Department of any significant water quality failure. A procedure has been agreed whereby the water authority reports initial details of any such incident as soon as possible after its occurrence. The information is updated as the event progresses, until normal water quality is restored.

Mr. Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the reported cases of water pollution in Scotland in each year since 1975.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The full range of information is not available centrally. River purification boards, however, maintain records of water pollution incidents and publish details of these in their annual reports.

Community Care

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland to what extent the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990 has been implemented in Scotland with reference to community care.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I refer the hon. Member to the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990 (Commencement No. 5 and Revocation) (Scotland) Order 1990—SI1990 No. 2510 c65 S212—and to Scottish Office circular SW2/1991, copies of which are in the Library.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the current and estimated costs of providing community care in (a) 1990, (b) 1991 and (c) 1992.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I regret that the information is not available in the form requested. Community care extends over a wide range of different services and expenditure on it is not separately classified as such. The Government have recognised the costs of the new community care arrangements to local authorities by taking £10 million into account in setting the level of aggregate external finance for 1991-92. Further costs will be considered in the course of future annual settlements of local government finance.

Assisted Reproductive Service

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects the Scottish Home and Health Department's national acute services advisory group's review on an assisted reproductive service for Scotland will be complete; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I expect this review to be completed by the autumn of this year and I shall make a statement then.

Lothian Health Board

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many operations were cancelled or postponed by Lothian health board in each month from January 1990 to March 1991.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The latest available information is set out in the table.

MV Antares

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if a date has been set for the fatal accident inquiry into the sinking of the Antares; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Investigations are continuing into the deaths of the crew of the MFV Antares. The date and location of the fatal accident inquiry have yet to be fixed.

Dentists

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many dentists were registered with the national health service in Scotland on (a) 1 October 1988, (b) 1 October 1989, (c) 1 October 1990 and (d) 1 April 1991.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The number of dentists registered with the national health service in Scotland on each of the dates in question is as follows:—

	Number of Dentists
(a) 1st October 1988	1,572
(b) 1st October 1989	1,652
(c) 1st October 1990	1,694
(d) 1st April 1991	1,719

Electricity Privatisation

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what advertising for the Scottish electricity privatisation has been placed in the Northern Ireland press or television; and on what basis the level of advertising there was fixed.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The two Scottish electricity companies share offers are being advertised in Northern Ireland using the national press and business magazines. This is the approach which has been adopted for use in most of the United Kingdom. In Scotland, however, a broader marketing is aimed at the companies' customers.

Press and Public Relations Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of his Department.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 26 April 1991]: The number of staff in the information officer grades employed in the Scottish Office Information Directorate and the number of vacant posts as at 1 April each year from 1979-80 to 1991-92 is set out in the table:

	Number of staff	Vacancies

1981	20	1

Listed Buildings (Demolition)

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State For Scotland how many listed buildings have been demolished in (a) Strathclyde and (b) Scotland as a whole in the past five years; what information he has concerning the circumstances of such demolitions; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 26 April 1991]: Information is not readily available in the form the hon. Member has requested. The table shows the number of listed building consent applications notified to the Secretary of State in the period in question which involved demolition, either total or partial, and which were cleared for his interest.

Year (1April-31 March	Strathclyde	Scotland

Information is not gathered on the action taken following the granting of consents. Such information could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Nursery Education

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the number of local authority nursery school places provided by each of the education authorities, expressed as a percentage of the eligible children in each area.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 26 April 1991]: The table gives, for each education authority, the number of three and four-year-old children attending education authority nursery schools at September 1990 as a percentage of the 1990 mid-year estimate of the total three and four-year-old population, the range which is the relevant age group for nursery education.

Figures for numbers of pupils attending nursery schools have been used because there are no reliable figures for the number of places and because many children attend nursery school part-time.

Food Hygiene

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to complete consultations with interested bodies concerning proposed food hygiene regulations for Scotland; which bodies will be consulted; when draft legislation will be published; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 26 April 1991]: Comments have been invited by 20 May on our proposals to amend the Food Hygiene (Scotland) Regulations 1959. Following consideration of the results of the consultation, the new regulations will be laid before Parliament; it is proposed that these will come into force from 1 October 1991. Local Government Finance

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the grant element used for each local authority in Scotland in calculating the tax liability for a house with two or more adults in that authority area in 1991-92 for the purposes of tables 1 and 2 in the annex to the consultation paper, "A New Tax for Local Government".

Mr. Lang [holding answer 26 April 1991]: The illustrative figures were calculated at district level, and for this purpose regional community charge income was apportioned to districts in proportion to the community charge tax base. With grant similarly apportioned to districts, the grant amounts assumed for the purposes of the calculation are set out in the table. The figures allow for revenue support grant, community charge grant and grant under the personal community charge reduction scheme.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Fraud

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many cases of alleged fraud were detected in relation to (a) income support and (b) social fraud, which were considered for civil legal proceedings in England, Scotland and Wales in 1989-90 and 1990-91.

Mr. Jack: The Department does not collect information on the number of cases considered for civil legal proceedings which relate to alleged fraud involving social security payments. A case is accepted for proceedings on the basis that a debt exists, with no distinction being made between fraudulent and non-fraudulent cases. Proceedings will be considered in all cases where the overpayment is £300 or more after other attempts to recover the debt have been exhausted.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in his Department; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

Miss Widdecombe: The Department of Social Security holds no records to show the numbers of statisticians in DHSS before the split of the Department in 1989. Figures for the years since 1989 are shown in the table and give the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the analytical services division of DSS. The figures are not strictly comparable between years because of reorganisation of the Department's analytical services.

Mortgage Interest Payments

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will bring forward proposals to regulate the amount which can be claimed to pay mortgage interest payments on homes.

Miss Widdecombe: Regulations exist to limit the amount which can be paid for mortgage interest through income support where payments are excessive. This is where:

- The accommodation is too large; or
- The accommodation is situated in an unnecessarily expensive area; or
- The outgoings are higher than those on suitable alternative accommodation in the same area.

The restriction—to the amount that the claimant would need to obtain suitable alternative accommodation—applies from the outset of the claim if the claimant could not afford the financial commitment when it was entered into, provided it is reasonable to expect the claimant and family to move. Its application my be deferred for 26 weeks where the commitment was affordable and for up to a further 26 weeks if the claimant is using his best endeavours to obtain cheaper accommodation.

This regulation is, like all social security legislation, kept under careful review.

Benefits

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the number of people in the constituency of Argyll and Bute receiving (a) retirement pension, (b) widow's benefit, including death benefit, (c) invalidity benefit, (d) invalid care allowance, (e) severe disablement allowance, (f) unemployability supplement and (g) child benefit; how many of those in (a) to (f) also receive child benefit; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: Information relating to these benefits is not available for individual constituencies.

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the number of people in Scotland receiving (a) retirement pension, (b) widow's benefit, including death benefit, (c) invalidity benefit, (d) invalid care allowance, (e) severe disablement allowance, (f) unemployability supplement and (g) child benefit; how many of those in (a) to (f) also receive child benefit; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: The table shows the latest available figures:

Benefit	Number receiving in Scotland	Date to which information relates
Retirement Pension	809,490	30 September 1990
Widows Benefit	38,510	31 March 1990
Invalidity Benefit	169,300	31 March 1990
Severe Disablement Allowance	33,600	31 March 1990
Child Benefit	609,000	21 February 1991

Widow's payment, which is a lump sum payment of £1,000, may be payable for those women who were widowed after April 1988. Information relating to the number of widows receiving a widow's payment is not available for Scotland.

Information relating to the number of people receiving invalid care allowance and unemployability supplement is not available for Scotland.

Information relating to the number of benefit recipients also receiving child benefit is not available centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the total amount paid out in state benefits, including mortgage interest relief, to people earning more than (a) the national average wage and (b) two thirds of national average wage at the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Jack: The latest available information on benefit payments is for 1987; the closest corresponding period for which information on mortgage tax relief is available is the financial year 1987-88. On this basis, the estimated benefit payments to family units with total gross earnings of more than the specified levels, based on average male earnings, were:

(a) about £6·7 billion;

(b) about £9·7 billion.

Child benefit represents around two thirds of those benefit payments.

Resettlement Unit

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when the business plan of the Resettlement Unit executive agency for 1991-92 will be published.

Miss Widdecombe: The 1991-92 business plan has today been placed in the Library.

Written Answers to Questions

TRANSPORT

Aviation Fires

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what reliable biological testing has been undertaken of the sprinkler systems proposed for use in passenger transport aircraft at time of aviation fires.

Mr. McLoughlin: The statutory responsibility for the safety regulation of United Kingdom civil aviation rests with the Civil Aviation Authority. As the answer requires detailed technical information, I have drawn the hon. Member's question to the attention of the Civil Aviation Authority, asking it to write to the hon. Member.

Central Transport Consultative Committee

Mr. Snape: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has received any representations from the Central Transport Consultative Committee on the ministerial direction issued in 1988 to British Rail concerning the maintenance of railway passenger services under the Railways Act 1974; and if he proposes to revise it.

Mr. Freeman: Yes; no.

Drink Driving

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what evidence he has on the effectiveness of random mass alcohol testing of drivers in securing continuing reductions in drink driving after any one-off drop.

Mr. Chope: The best evidence we have on the effect of random breath testing come from New South Wales. The table below shows its effectiveness in reducing the proportion of drivers and riders killed who were over the limit since its introduction in 1982. Following the effect of an "on-off" drop that might be attributed to the introduction of such a measure, levels have remained largely unchanged.

Proportion of drivers and riders killed, whose alcohol level was known, over the legal limit

	New South Wales per cent.	Great Britain per cent.
1982	40	33
1983	36	28
1984	33	26
1985	33	26
1986	34	24
1987	32	23
1988	31	21
1989	33	[1]19

[1] Provisional.

A comparison with the proportional fall in Britain shows that our approach, of seeking to change public attitudes through a carefully targeted campaign, has been more successful.

The legal limit in New South Wales is 50 milligrammes of alcohol per millilitre of blood, compared with 80 in Great Britain.

Crash Casualties

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many people die on average in (a) motorway fog crashes each year and (b) in urban crashes each day.

Mr. Chope: During the five-year period 1985 to 1989, the most recent for which figures are available, there were on average five deaths in Great Britain each year resulting from motorway accidents in fog. Over the same period there were on average seven deaths each day on built-up roads.

Railway Services

Mr. Snape: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received about the statutory compliance of railway services with his direction of March 1988 under the Railways Act 1974.

Mr. Freeman: The central transport consultative committee has made a representation about reductions in specific services since March 1988, while at the same time observing that the majority of services provide the same or a better level of frequency. I receive other representations from time to time.

Railway Investment

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if investment in new railway carriages for the services on the Eltham and New Eltham lines has been authorised.

Mr. McLoughlin: Four hundred class 465 Networker vehicles were approved in August 1989. The first of these is due to be delivered to British Rail in September this year. The new trains will begin to come into service on Kent Link routes, which include Eltham and New Eltham, from May 1992. The Department is currently considering an investment submission for further orders totalling 274 vehicles. We will respond as soon as possible.

Cars (Anti-Theft Measures)

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he intends introducing higher specifications and standards for the design of motor vehicles to make them less susceptible to theft.

Mr. Chope: There is already a British standard on vehicle security BS AU 209, which, if complied with by vehicle manufacturers, should make their motor vehicles less susceptible to theft.

My Department has therefore presented proposals to the European Commission for the amendment of the EC directive on vehicle security, based on the requirements contained in the British standard.

These proposals have so far been resisted by some other member states; but with the co-operation of the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders we intend to submit revised proposals and press for their introduction at the earliest possible opportunity.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by his Department in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. McLoughlin: The total sums paid out by my Department in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation are as follows:

£000s

Privatisation	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86	1986-87	1987-88	1988-89	1989-90	1990-91	[1]1991-92

[1] Estimate.

No expenditure was incurred before 1981-82.

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. McLoughlin: The total expenditure on the Department's press and public relations office since 1984-85 is as follows:

1984-85	339,426
1985-86	354,393
1986-87	363,446
1987-88	389,473
1988-89	437,950
1989-90	451,214
1990-91[1]	517,905
1991-92[2]	558,301

[1] Estimate.
[2] Budget.

These figures cover the overall costs of running the press office, calculated using the ready reckoner for staff-related costs.

Before 1984-85 the information division was a common service of the Departments of Transport, Environment and Property Services Agency.

Road Inquiries

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many public inquiries into major new road proposals have been initiated by his Department since 1979; in how many cases the inspector's report was published (1) prior to and (2) simultaneously with the announcement of his directions; and what considerations governed the timing of the publication of the Inspector's report and the announcement of his direction.

Mr. Chope: Figures for the number of public inquiries initiated since 1979 could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Reports are invariably published in the event of a decision being taken, and at the same time as the decision is announced. Prior publication would undermine the value of the inquiry and the report. It would not be appropriate to initiate another round of consultations, or to accept further representations, on the inspector's report after the inquiry has given all interested parties an equal opportunity to express their views. Sometimes a provisional decision is announced; the report is published with that provisional decision, and following it an inquiry may be reopened.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport in how many cases, following a public inquiry into a major road proposal, he has decided to adopt proposals that differed significantly from the recommendations made in the inspector's report; and what restrictions there are on his freedom to disregard the recommendations of an inspector.

Mr. Chope: The Secretary of State for Transport makes decisions relating to his own highway proposals acting jointly with the Secretary of State for the Environment. While precise figures are not collected, it is very rare for the Secretaries of State to make decisions which differ substantially from an inspector's recommendation. If the Secretaries of State differ from an inspector on a finding of fact or take into account evidence which was not before the inquiry and by reason of this are disposed to disagree with the inspector's recommendation, they will almost invariably reopen the inquiry, and in certain circumstances they will be required to do so by rule 15 of the Highways (Inquiries Procedures) Rules 1976.

Medals

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will arrange to amend the rules concerning the issuing of medals and replacement medals to include grandchildren of the person entitled to such medals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin [holding answer Friday 26 April 1991]: The issue of campaign medals by my Department for services in the Merchant Navy is made in accordance with the rules agreed between the Central Chancery, Orders of Knighthood, and the Ministry of Defence on 21 May 1973. Under these, replacement medals are issued only to the first generation of legal beneficiaries which would exclude grandchildren.

There appears to be no reason to depart from these rules in the case of medals for merchant seamen, about which I have corresponded with the hon. Member.

Light Dues

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many fishing boats in the United Kingdom failed to pay light dues in 1990.

Mr. McLoughlin [holding answer Friday 26 April 1991]: These figures are not available for the calendar year 1990. Payments of light dues for which they are liable have not yet been made in respect of about 450 fishing vessels for the year beginning 1 April 1990.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in his Department; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

Mr. McLoughlin [holding answer Monday 29 April 1991]: The tables give the information requested for the complements and permanent staff employed in the directorate of statistics of the Department of Transport. The complement table shows details as at 1 April 1979 and annually from 1 April 1982; the staff in post figures are at 1 April 1979, and, thereafter annually from 1 April 1984. Data for the intervening years on each table are not available. The principal scientific officer between 1984 and 1990 and the economic adviser in 1990 were filling statistical posts.

Shipping Accident

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the circumstances which resulted in the loss of the trawler Wilhelmina J when in collision with the Cypriot cargo vessel Zulfikar on 10 April; and what actions his Department took subsequently.

Mr. McLoughlin [holding answer 29 April 1991]: The trawler Wilhelmina J collided with the Cypriot registered cargo ship Zulfikar during the early hours of 10 April in the English Channel. The Zulfikar, although aware of the collision, failed to stop. The Wilhelmina J sank with the tragic loss of all six persons on board.

Investigations were begun by both the Cypriot authorities and the marine accident investigation branch (MAIB).

Both MAIB and the Cypriot authorities made immediate and sustained efforts to have the Zulfikar diverted to enable inspectors to interview the master and crew. After initial rejection, the ship's managers agreed on 12 April to divert to a position off Lisbon, where on 14 April an official from the Cypriot High Commission accompanied by inspectors from MAIB boarded the vessel by helicopter to pursue their investigations.

An interim inspector's report has been submitted to the Secretary of State, and a bulletin giving the facts so far established will shortly be issued: a copy will be placed in the Library.

The inspectors have had the full co-operation of the flag state (Cyprus) and as the Zulfikar was manned by Indian nationals, an appropriate report has been sent to the Indian High Commission in London.

The investigation, which has the status of an inspector's inquiry under the Merchant Shipping (Accident Investigation) Regulations, is continuing. I cannot discuss the circumstances of the accident further at this stage. A full report will be produced when the inquiry is completed, and the inspector's findings will be published unless a formal investigation is ordered.

EMPLOYMENT

Single Mothers

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many single mothers are currently in (a) full-time and (b) part-time employment, respectively.

Mr. Jackson: Preliminary estimates from the GB labour force survey for spring 1990 indicate that there were 170,000 single mothers in full-time work and 213,000 in part-time work.

Child Care

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of firms provide child care facilities, on or off-site, for their employees; and what percentage of (a) all employees and (b) single mothers in employment work for firms which provide child care facilities.

Mr. Forth: This information is not collected, but indications are that the provision of such facilities is growing.

Advertising

11. Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give separate figures for the spending by the Training Agency or Manpower Services Commission on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

Mr. Jackson: The information requested is given in the table.

The total budget for 1991-92 excluding HSE and ACAS is £17·4 million. Detailed decisions on allocation by media as requested have not yet been taken.

From 1991-92, and following the abolition of the Training Agency in November 1990, the Department's advertising and publicity budget, excluding HSE and ACAS, is to be held centrally.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by his Department in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Jackson: There are fees paid to organisations in furtherance of privatisation by the Employment Department Group—including the former Training Agency and Manpower Services Commission—in the financial period from 1979-80 to 1987-88 inclusive.

Fees to the value of £525,000 were incurred in 1988-89, to the value of £613,000 in 1989-90, and the value of £622,000 in 1990-91. These figures are inclusive of expenses plus VAT.

There is no current privatisation being undertaken, though an outstanding invoice for £30,000 will be paid in the current financial year.

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Jackson: The information requested is given in the table.

Expenditure levels for 1991-92 are in the process of being set.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the total expenditure by the Training Agency/MSC on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish a table showing the total number of employees in employment in the northern region in the following categories (a) male full-time, (b) male part-time, (c) female full-time, (d) female part-time, (e) total male and (f) total female, indicating in each case an estimate of the number of such employees paying national insurance contributions.

Mr. Jackson: There is no information relating to national insurance contributions at regional level or on a full-time and part-time basis. The available information is in the table.

ACAS

Mr. Cran: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when he expects to receive the annual report of the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service.

Mr. Howard: I have received the ACAS report for 1990, which has been laid before both Houses of Parliament today. The report is also published today and copies are available from the Vote Office.

Disabled People (Training)

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what criteria are used in deciding if registered disabled persons would benefit from two-year employment training; and how many people had such extended training in the last period for which figures are available.

Mr. Jackson [holding answer 29 April 1991]: Before 1991 the normal period of training for ET was a maximum of one year. People with disabilities for whom extended training would substantially enhance chances of obtaining suitable employment could be offered up to a further year of training.

As from April 1991, all fixed limits on the duration of ET training were removed. From April 1991 trainees are entitled to a reasonable duration of training having regard to the nature and level of the intended qualification or credits, and to the training needs and prior learning of the trainee. Information about the numbers of people with disabilities who had extended training is not held centrally and could only be provided at disproportionate costs.

ENERGY

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Wakeham: The estimated expenditure in 1990-91 is £657,000. This figure includes:

(i) forecast expenditure by the press office;

(ii) staff costs (salaries, accommodation and common services) for all permanent information service and support staff in the press office, including the speech writing unit, at 31 March 1991.

The corresponding expenditure for previous years is as follows:

1989-90	615,000
1988-89	475,000
1987-88	460,000
1986-87	293,000

Expenditure for the years prior to 1986-87 is not available on a comparable basis.

Currently proposed expenditure for 1991-92 is £677,000.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by his Department in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Wakeham: Total expenditure on fees paid to outside organisations in relation to the privatisation of Amersham International, Britoil and Enterprise Oil could not be provided without incurring disproportionate costs. Fees paid to outside organisations in the case of the privatisation of British Gas and of the regional electricity companies and the electricity generating companies in England and Wales are as follows:

	British Gas £ million	Electricity industry £ million
1985-86	1·4	—
1986-87	162·4	—
1987-88	10·5	0·8
1988-89	11·1	5·5
1989-90	2·2	12·1

The remaining costs resulting from the privatisation of British Gas and of the regional electricity companies and electricity generating companies, including fees paid to advisers, will be published in due course.

WALES

Epilepsy Unit, Cardiff

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when the epilepsy unit at University College Cardiff was closed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The epilepsy unit is independently funded—largely, I understand, by the pharmaceutical industry to facilitate the development and trial of new drugs. It is not an NHS facility. I understand that the unit is to continue to function on a more limited scale. It is the responsibility of health authorities and general medical practitioners to secure the services they regard as necessary for local residents with epilepsy, as for all other conditions.

Specialist Treatment Centres

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will take steps to ensure that there is no geographical quota which discriminates in favour of any area health authority being able to benefit disproportionately from the three specialist treatment centres for: hip and knee replacement at Rhydlafar hospital, hernias and varicose vein surgery at Bridgend general hospital and cataract surgery at Ysbyty Gwynedd, Bangor.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The targets set for each of the treatment centres reflect local waiting lists but otherwise do not discriminate in favour of the host authority.

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will ensure that general practitioners throughout Wales can refer their patients direct to the specialist treatment centre funded by his Department for cataract surgery at Ysbyty Gwynedd, Bangor.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The right of general medical practitioners to directly to refer patients to the three treatment centres is ensured by the contractual agreements negotiated between the Welsh Office and the centres.

Opticians

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many opticians were registered in Wales in March 1989.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: There were 478 opticians on contract to Welsh FHSAs on 31 December 1989. Of these, 435 were ophthalmic opticians and 43 ophthalmic medical practitioners.

"Social Care Plans"

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will place in the Library a copy of the first draft of "Social Care Plans".

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: It is for each social services authority in Wales to decide the distribution of drafts of social care plans. Authorities are required by statute to publish the final version of the first social care plans by 1 April 1992.

Family Health Services Authorities

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if all family health services authorities have now been connected to the all-Wales telecommunications network and the English family health services network.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: As a result of changes to the timetable South Glamorgan is currently the only FHSA in Wales connected to the English FHS and the all-Wales telecommunications networks. Arrangements are in hand to connect the remaining seven Welsh FHSAs to both networks during the period 13 to 17 May 1991.

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will arrange for the quarterly reports on the performance monitoring of family health services authorities' plans to be placed in the Library.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The performance monitoring of FHSA business plans, indicated in the "NHS Wales: Agenda for Action 1991-93", will not be the subject of separate report documents but will be part of the continuing management discussions between the NHS directorate of the Welsh Office and FHSAs.

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will place a copy of all family health services authorities' business plans in the Library.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Yes.

District Health Authorities (Telecommunications)

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list those district health authorities that have not yet submitted their telecommunications strategies for approval and funding.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: All nine Welsh district health authorities have submitted their telecommunications strategies for approval and funding. Funding has been approved for eight authorities. However, further information has been requested from Pembrokeshire health authority.

Trunk Road Improvements

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his latest estimate of his Department's spending on trunk road improvements in Wales for each of the next three years, together with the outturn for 1990-91, and the current planned spending for 1991-92 for such purposes.

Sir Wyn Roberts: As indicated in the Welsh Office departmental report (Cm. 1516), provisional net outturn for motorway and trunk road new construction and improvement in Wales in 1990-91 is £163 million; planned net expenditure in 1991-92 is £147 million. No firm decisions have been taken on the Secretary of State's allocation of block resources for 1992-93 to 1994-95, though provision for the motorway and trunk road programme in Wales is expected to exceed £550 million during this period.

Environmentally Sensitive Areas

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list for each environmentally sensitive area in Wales and for each year of each scheme's existence the number of applicants for entry, the number of applicants accepted for entry, and the number of unsuccessful applicants who have subsequently withdrawn from each scheme.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The information is as follows:

	Applications received	Applications accepted	Successful applications withdrawn
Cambrian Mountains Original Area
1987	[1]293	34	Nil
1988		71
1989		27
1990		23	—
Cambrian Mountains Extension
1988	[1]367	46	Nil
1989		90
1990	162	48
Lleyn Peninsula
1988	210	84	Nil
1989	101	180
1990	57	42

[1] No separate figures available.

Outstanding applications continue to be processed.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total amount paid to farmers under the environmentally sensitive areas scheme in each of the designated areas for the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. David Hunt: Participants in the ESA schemes in the Cambrian mountains original area, Cambrian mountains extended area, and Lleyn peninsula received £477,000, £121,000 and £284,000 respectively in the year ended 31 March 1991.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by his Department in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. David Hunt: No expenditure was incurred by my Department on privatisation prior to 1988-89.

Subsequently, sums were paid in respect of water privatisation. The total sums paid to outside organisations on water privatisation in 1989-90 and 1990-91 were £13·3 million and £0·8 million respectively. Costs incurred in 1991-92 will be reported to Parliament in the usual way.

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. David Hunt: Figures for expenditure by the Department's information division, including staff and press cutting service but excluding media advertising and promotional material, cannot readily be disaggregated for the years 1979-80 to 1987-88.

Figures for the succeeding years are:

1988-89	469,000
1989-90	487,000
1990-91	481,000

Estimated budget for 1991-92 is £529,880.

CIVIL SERVICE

"Next Steps" Agencies

38. Mr. Rowe: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service, if he will make a statement on the progress so far achieved by "Next Steps" agencies.

Mr. Renton [pursuant to his reply, 15 April, 1991, c. 37-39]: Good progress is being made in setting up "Next Steps" agencies. This month the number of agencies reached 50 and there are now over 200,000 staff working on "Next Steps" lines. Announced candidates for agency status total 23 covering over 20,000 further staff. On top of this, the Inland Revenue will establish by April 1992 33 executive offices with nearly 60,000 staff working along "Next Steps" lines. By then I expect half the civil service to be working fully on "Next Steps" lines. The tables attached set out the existing agencies and announced candidates.

"Next Steps" places great importance on improving the delivery of Government services for all customers. The benefits of the programme can be seen from the numbers of improvements and initiatives which agencies are introducing to enable them to provide their customers with a better, more flexible, service. Agencies are increasingly consulting customers about their needs and where possible tailoring services to meet those needs. Each agency publishes its own annual report describing targets set, providing financial information and setting out what has been achieved. Last October the first annual review of "Next Steps" was published (Cm 1261) giving details of the achievements and improved performance of the agencies then established. I will ensure that this year a further review will be published to bring together for the benefit of the House information from these reports on all the agencies and what they are doing to meet the aims of "Next Steps".

Demanding financial and quality of service targets are being set and delivered for each agency. They demonstrate very clearly that the initiative is succeeding.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Passport Control Checks

Mr. George: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what passport control checks will be applied to EC nationals entering the United Kingdom after 1992.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We intend to retain immigration controls on non-EC nationals. In order to ensure that these controls are effective, we believe that it will be necessary to require EC nationals to show their passports or other identity documents.

Regional Scientific Advisers

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list for each civil defence region (a) the number of regional scientific advisers other than the chief regional scientific adviser, (b) the number of regional scientific adviser appointments that are currently vacant, (c) the average age of the regional scientific advisers other than the chief regional scientific adviser and (d) the amounts paid to regional scientific advisers other than the chief regional scientific adviser in each of the last five years in the form of salary, retainer and expenses.

Mr. John Patten: The Home Office has responsibility for appointing regional scientific advisers (RSAs) for the nine home defence regions in England and Wales. The Scottish Home and Health Department and Northern Ireland Office have similar responsibilities for their own home defence regions.

RSAs are not paid either a salary or a retainer as part of their civil defence duties. They are paid expenses in the form of professional lecturing fees together with costs for travel and subsistence in the course of their civil defence activities. With the exception of No. 5 region, each of the regions in England and Wales has a wartime operational scientific establishment of four RSAs. No. 5 region has only three. There are currently 43 RSAs appointed by the Home Office who in time of war could be assigned to any of the Home Defence regions; there are no vacancies for the wartime operational establishment.

The average ages of RSAs by region are given in table A. Aggregated figures for lecturing fees, subsistence and travel over the past five years are given in table B. Figures for individual regions and RSAs could be obtained only at disproportionate costs.

Police Time (Witnesses)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if any consideration has been given to transferring the cost of police time spent on duty as witnesses in court proceedings from the Home Office vote to the vote of the Lord Chancellor's office; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No. A police officer giving evidence in court is acting in pursuance of the general duty of the police to preserve law and order. We have no plans to alter the present arrangements.

Animal Experiments

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will make it his policy to remove the exemptions which are currently allowed as part of the January 1990 regulations to oblige laboratories to buy only specifically bred cats and dogs from registered suppliers.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Where animals of a species specified in schedule 2 to the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986, which includes cats and dogs, are not obtainable from designated sources, requests to obtain such animals from non-designated sources will continue to be considered on a case-by-case basis.

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, further to his answer to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Pollok (Mr. Dunnachie) of 11 March, Official Report, column 335, what evidence he has received from the Medical Research Council on alleged deliberate breaches of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: We received a number of documents on 16 April from the Medical Research Council and we are now considering them.

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will instruct inspectors not to allow any dispensation from the requirements of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986, in the light of the Medical Research Council report on Professor Feldberg; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The Medical Research Council inquiry report alleged that a dispensation was agreed at the National Institute for Medical Research, with the approval of the Home Office inspector, which allowed Professor Feldberg and Mr. Stean to leave anaesthetised animals undergoing procedures unattended for short periods.

We have been assured by the director of NIMR that it was at the time and remains NIMR policy that under no circumstances must such animals be left unattended. The inspectorate did not give any dispensation to override these local instructions, nor would such a dispensation be given at any establishment.

Advertising

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give separate figures for the spending by the Metropolitan Police on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand from the deputy commissioner that expenditure by the Metropolitan police on all forms of recruitment and other advertising and other promotional material in each financial year since 1979-80 is as follows—it is not possible to give separate spending figures for the years prior to 1987-88:

1979-80	759,000
1980-81	967,000
1981-82	1,062,000
1982-83	1,028,000
1983-84	1,675,000
1984-85	1,747,000
1985-86	1,868,000

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The full cost of staff, accommodation and administration for the Home Office press office from 1979-80 to 1989-90 was:

1979-80	283,140
1980-81	392,532
1981-82	381,799
1982-83	424,290
1983-84	516,362
1984-85	560,512
1985-86	606,996
1986-87	548,136
1987-88	599,282
1988-89	674,945
1989-90	715,646

Notes:
The estimated cost for 1990-91 is £786,519.
The budget for 1991-92 is £882,582.
1. Figures supplied before 1986-87 were the costs estimated by the Treasury. After devolved budgeting in 1986 the estimates are based on Home Office costs.
2. Press office figures include the costs for staff, accommodation and administration costs.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by his Department in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: For information up to 1989-90, I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given by the then Home Secretary on 15 March 1990, at column 358. In 1990-91 payments in respect of expenses in furtherance of privatisation of the Independent Broadcasting Authority transmission system are expected to be £767,000. The costs of the current privatisation of the IBA, including fees paid to advisers, will be reported to Parliament after the sale is completed.

Victim Support Schemes

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide financial support to victim support schemes in Manchester, after June; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Home Office grant for local victim support schemes will rise to £5·4 million this year from £4·5 million last year, an increase of 20 per cent. Last year's grant of £328,910 to schemes in Greater Manchester area, mainly for co-ordinators' salaries, is also expected to increase. In addition, the criteria under which grants are administered have been changed for this year to allow running costs as well as salaries to be funded in schemes which would otherwise be at risk of closure because of withdrawal of local authority funding.

HEALTH

Dentures

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will now disclose the full findings relating solely to the supply of dentures to the public reported to the then Minister for Health following the inquiry carried out by the Office of Fair Trading from 1983 to 1985.

Mr. Dorrell: The Director General of Fair Trading wrote to my right hon. and learned Friend the then Minister for Health on 20 June 1985 following allegations by the Association for Denture Prosthesis that dentists were abusing their monopoly through high prices and profits from the supply of private dentures and that the quality of treatment would improve if dental technicians were allowed to take impressions and fit dentures—a practice called "denturism". In his letter the director general said:

"Denturism appears to have reduced the cost of dentures, including those provided by dentists, in countries without a National Health Service. However, in the United Kingdom the office's survey suggests that dentures can be obtained readily on the NHS although it may be necessary to change dentists, especially in London and the South East, in order to do this. The price is closely controlled by the DHSS and there is no evidence that dentists are making monopoly profits on providing them. It seems unlikely that denturists providing facilities to see patients could provide them much more cheaply. Against any savings would need to be set the cost of additional training for denturists if this was provided at public expense.

In general therefore I am reasonably satisfied that the NHS provides a competitive alternative to private treatment, and I see little justification for the introduction of denturism on economic grounds. We did not assess the arguments about health care and quality of service but found little to suggest they would strengthen the case for denturism in the United Kingdom in present circumstances."

NHS (Highest Paid Employees)

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list in order the top 10 highest paid employees within the national health service, stating the name of the health authority and the salary in each case.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No. Details of payments awarded to individual NHS employees are a confidential matter between employer and employee.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by his Department in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No expenditure prior to 1986-87 has been identified. Expenditure in 1986-87 and subsequent years has been incurred for work by professional advisors on the sale of the General Practice Finance Corporation. The expenditure for each year is as follows:

1986-87	23,000
1987-88	37,800
1988-89	174,621
1989-90	414,000
1990-91	Nil

All expenditure up to and including 1988-89 has been from a joint health and social security budget.

There are no plans for any expenditure in 1991-92.

Advertising

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give separate figures for the spending by the HEA/HEC on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

Mr. Dorrell: This information is not held centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact Sir Donald Maitland, the chairman of the Health Education Authority, for details.

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Functions which are commonly associated with press and public relations are carried out by the Department's information division, the manpower and running costs of which are:

	£'000s
1989-90
Expenditure	890
1990-91
Estimated expenditure	1,279
1991-92
Budget	1,527

Information for the years 1979-80 to 1987-88 is not available in the form requested.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the salaries and pension entitlements of (a) the chairpersons, (b) the deputy chairpersons, (c) the chief executive or manager, (d) the other executive directors and (e) the non-executive directors of each national health service self-governing trust in the period to 31 March 1991 and in the year 1991-92.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: On the question of the remuneration of NHS trust chairmen, I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) on 25 January at column 356. All other non executive directors of NHS trusts are remunerated at a standard rate of £5,000 per annum. Remuneration is taxable and subject to national insurance contributions, but is not pensionable.

The salaries and pension entitlements of NHS trust chief executives and other executive directors are matters for the individual trust boards.

Health Authorities (VAT Increase)

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what will be the cost to health authorities in 1991-92 of the increase in the rate of VAT to 17·5 per cent.

Mr. Dorrell: Health authorities have been asked to provide information to enable us to estimate additional costs following the increase in the standard rate of VAT. Adjustments will be made to health authority provision to reflect these costs.

General Practitioner Fundholders

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the total sum of money paid out in start-up and preparation costs for general practitioner fundholders in the financial year 1990-91; and if he will provide such estimates for each of the NHS regions.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The table provides the estimated expenditure, during 1990-91, on GP fundholding preparatory allowance broken down by regional health authority. Information on other payments made to potential fundholders is not available as it is not separately identifiable.

Region	Estimated total expenditure 1990-91

Total	4,372,387

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what would be the cost of making financial transactions internal to the NHS as a result of contracts and general practitioner budgets subject to VAT at the standard rate; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: The information requested is not available.

Grove Park Children's Home

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will publish the report of the social services inspectorate into Grove Park children's home, Southwark; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The social services inspectorate report into residential child care services in Southwark has been received by the Department and is being considered. It is expected that the report will be published shortly.

Inter-Authority Comparisons and Consultancy

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether the full report of the Inter-Authority Comparisons and Consultancy is now available for 1990-91; whether this consultancy is to continue in 1991-92, what estimate has been made of the cost; and what is its programme of work for 1991-92.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Inter-Authority Comparisons and Consultancy (IACC) expects to publish its full report in the summer. A copy will be placed in the Library. In 1991-92 IACC will be working on the reduction of waiting time in the West Midlands region. As announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on 27 February, we have engaged Qa Business Services to carry forward studies of 80 of the worst lists in 1991-92; £9 million will be available from the waiting list fund to finance the team's recommendations.

Waiting List Initiative

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list all the schemes agreed for funding from the waiting list initiative fund from the £12 million reserved for Inter-Authority Comparisons and Consultancy recommendations.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The districts and specialties examined by Inter-Authority Comparisons and Consultancy and the funding allocated from the waiting list fund is given in the table.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he proposes to produce a detailed report on the expenditures from the waiting list initiative showing each project approved, together with its outcome.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We do not intend to publish a detailed report on all the projects which have received funding under the waiting time initiative. Allocations from the waiting list fund are made to regional health authorities (RHAs) which use the funds in a variety of ways, with the common objective of reducing the number of patients who wait over one year for hospital treatment. Allocations to RHAs for 1990-91 are shown in the table. In the first half of that year, the total number of patients waiting over one year fell by 2½ per cent. and the number waiting over two years fell by 12 per cent. Provisional figures indicate a further fall in the five months to February 1991 of 12 per cent. in the number waiting over one year and 21 per cent. in the number waiting over two years.

Auditing of Accounts

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health who has the responsibility for the audit of national health service self-governing trusts and general practitioner fundholders accounts; and whether these accounts will be available to hon. Members.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Audit Commission has the responsibility for appointing the auditors of the accounts of general practitioner fundholders. A summary of these accounts is included in family health services authority's accounts which are submitted to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. There has never been a requirement that these should be published and we do not propose to introduce such a change.

The Audit Commission is also responsible for appointing the auditors of the accounts of national health service trusts. NHS trusts are required to present their annual reports, audited accounts and any report on those accounts made by the auditor at a public meeting which the trust is required to hold in every calendar year except the year in which it becomes operational. These reports will also be available to hon. Members.

Anti-cancer Drugs

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the cost per head of population in 1990 in each standard health region of general practitioner prescribed anti-cancer drugs such as boplatin and interleukin; and what were the hospital allocations of such drugs in each national health service health region in 1990-91.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Information is not held centrally on the hospital allocations of such drugs. Information on the cost of general practitioner prescribed anti-cancer drugs could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance has been given to purchasing authorities about making provision for the cost of anti-cancer drugs in placing contracts; and what agency is responsible for monitoring the results of any such guidance.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Guidance about contracts has not been given to purchasing authorities in that level of detail.

Child Cancer

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what conclusions he has reached, and what research is being undertaken, on the possibility of links between water supply from ground and river sources and the increased incidence of child cancer.

Mr. Dorrell: The numerous published studies of cancer rates in relation to the type of source of drinking water do not point to an association for childhood cancers.

The Department is not aware of any current or proposed research in the United Kingdom on this hypothesis.

Inter-Authority Comparisons and Consultancy

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which of the recommendations of Inter-Authority Comparisons and Consultancy with regard to the Newcastle plastic surgery waiting list have been acted on; with what result; and at what cost.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: As recommended by Inter-Authority Comparisons and Consultancy (IACC), Newcastle district health authority employed a locum consultant in plastic surgery for nine months in 1990-91 to undertake additional in-patient, day case and out-patient sessions. This scheme received an allocation of £143,000 from the £12 million reserved for problem lists from the waiting list fund. The district has met the requirements of its contract with IACC. Between April 1990 and March 1991 it reduced the numbers waiting over a year for in-patient and day case plastic surgery by 565 and has treated an additional 422 in-patients and day cases, and 400 out-patients.

Health Authorities (Discharge Procedures)

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he will arrange for the reports of health authorities on their discharge procedures as per HC(89)5 together with the subsequent comments and action of regional health authorities and his own Department to be placed in the Library.

Mr. Dorrell: Information about action taken by district health authorities is not available centrally, since they were asked to report to their regional health authorities. Action by special health authorities is being followed up through the quality control and business planning process. Business plans will be published in due course.

Work-related Health Problems

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has on the number of health authorities who have staff in post specifically to advise, instruct and inform on preventable work-related health problems such as repetitive strain injury; what guidance his Department offers health authorities on this point; and what steps he is taking to review the results of the guidance he has given.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Each health authority is responsible for ensuring the health, safety and welfare of its employees at work and will be guided by particular advice issued by the Health and Safety Executive. The Department has issued guidance on the establishment of occupational health services generally, but does not collect information on the number of health authority staff deployed on such services.

Abortion

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health in how many cases of breaches of the Abortion Act 1967 and regulations relating to abortion his Department has referred the cases to the legal authorities in the last 12 months; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: None.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many forms relating to abortion were submitted late by King's College hospital, London, in relation to the regulations governing abortion in the last 12 months.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: It is not the Department's practice to disclose detailed information relating to terminations of pregnancy carried out at individual places.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what action his Department takes in relation to forms concerning abortion submitted to the chief medical officer without being dated or signed by the doctors concerned; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what action his Department takes in relation to forms concerning abortion submitted to the chief medical officer which breach the regulations concerning the notification of abortions.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: All of the notification forms sent to the chief medical officer are scrutinised by staff authorised by him. Any incomplete forms are returned to the notifying doctor for completion and breaches of the regulations are taken up as appropriate.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Monopolies and Mergers Commission

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will ask the Monopolies and Mergers Commission to review its 1978 report on the supply of national newspapers and periodicals (Cmnd. 7214).

Mr. Redwood: The Director General of Fair Trading is currently conducting a review of a number of issues concerning the distribution of newspapers and periodicals. The director general will decide in the light of this review whether further action under the competition legislation for which he is responsible is required. It would not be appropriate for me to comment in advance of the completion of the director general's review.

Policy Holders Protection Board

Mr. Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will list the current members of the Policy Holders Protection Board and give the relevant experience of each member; how many of the commission are women; and what percentage of the total membership they comprise.

Mr. Redwood: The Policyholders Protection Act 1975 provides that the Policyholders Protection Board comprises five members. The Act requires that at least three members shall be directors, chief executives or managers of authorised insurance companies and at least one member shall be qualified to represent the interests of policyholders. The information requested on the current members of the board is as follows:

Colin North Smith CBE (Chairman)
Former senior partner in Peat Marwick McLintock and former chairman of the insurance sub-committee of the Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales.

Anthony Brend
Chief executive of Commercial Union Assurance Company.

Charles O'Brien
Director of the M & G Assurance Group. Former general manager and actuary of the Royal National Pension Fund for Nurses and currently a member of its council. President of the Institute of Actuaries 1976-78.

Nigel Proddow
Former director and chief general manager of Pearl Assurance plc.

Rosemary McRobert OBE
Currently a director of the investors compensation scheme. Former deputy director of the Consumers Association and director of the Retail Trading Standards Association.

Women comprise 20 per cent. of the board's membership.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by his Department in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Leigh: The total sums paid out by my Department in fees to outside organisations in furtherance of privatisation since 1979 are shown below. As far as possible, the sums paid have been broken down by year, and between fees and commissions.

The costs of current privatisations, including fees paid to advisers, will be reported to Parliament after the sale is completed.

Year	Fees £ million	Commissions £ million
1981-82	2·6	3·0
1984-85	74·6	94·4
1985-86	[1]10·6	—
1986-87	[1]7·9	—

1989-90	1·7	0·1
1990-91	[1]0·1	—

[1] Includes commissions, if any.

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Leigh: I refer to the answer given to the hon. Member on 13 March 1990, at column 172. Expenditure in the past two years was as follows:

	£000
1989-90	2,287
[1]1990-91	2,297

[1]Estimated.

The figures include regional press officer and other support services. Activity in this area during the current year is expected to remain at broadly the same level as in 1990-91.

Departmental Objectives

Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what are the objectives of his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lilley: I am publishing revised objectives of my Department. They are as follows:

The aim of the Department of Trade and Industry is to foster a market environment which results in satisfied customers and prosperous producers.

To this end the DTI works to ensure that markets at home and abroad are open, fair and competitive; to see that UK business is best placed to take full advantage of market opportunities; and to champion all those involved in wealth creation.

The DTI will

- work for trade liberalisation worldwide, and the completion of the single European market;
- promote exports of UK goods and services;
- stimulate innovation in industry by encouraging research, the transfer of technologies, the spread of technical skills and closer links between business and the science base;
- improve the provision of information to business about new methods, opportunities and management skills;
- encourage competition by tackling restrictive practices, cartels and monopolies, and by extending privatisation and contracting out;
- foster the integrity of markets so that customers, creditors and investors benefit from a well targeted system of protection and a light but effective regulatory framework allowing informed choices to be made;
- encourage a positive attitude towards wealth creation;
- reduce burdens on business by simplifying regulation and scrutinising the compliance costs which regulation brings;
- listen to the concerns of business and consumers and ensure that these are taken into account in the development of Government policies;
- ensure that policies respond to the needs of different regions and areas with special difficulties.

In order to achieve these objectives, the DTI is committed to managing and developing the people who work within it, to enable them to provide a professional, high quality, accessible and responsive service to business and the community.

Development Management

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will review the work done by the United Nations centre on transnational corporations in regard to the establishment of criteria for sustainable development management.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 22 April 1991]: The Government have kept the centre's work on criteria for sustainable development management under close review and will continue to do so.

Matrix Churchill

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what were the grades and official responsibilities at that time of the officials of his Department who visited the offices of Matrix Churchill in Coventry at 11.15 am on 24 April 1989, 3.51 pm on 11 September 1989, 3.10 pm on 27 October 1989, 9.35 am on 1 December 1989, 9.35 am on 26 March 1990, 9.35 am on 20 April 1990 and 1.17 pm on 26 April 1990.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 29 April 1991]: In the light of the fact that criminal proceedings have been instituted against three individuals, it would not be right to provide this information.

Stock Exchange Council of America

Mr. Dover: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if his Department has now taken all necessary action arising from the contents of the memorandum of understanding with the Stock Exchange Council of America, with particular reference to the evidence provided by Ivan Boesky.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 29 April 1991]: For reasons of international comity, the Secretary of State declines to comment on exchanges of information which may or may not have taken place between international regulators.

NORTHERN IRELAND

St. John Ambulance Brigade

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what facilities he has made available to staff in his Department to contribute to the appeal that has been launched for people with the name of John to help raise £5 million for the St. John Ambulance Brigade.

Dr. Mawhinney: Prior to the tabling of this question, no request for assistance with the appeal had been received. There is scope for arrangements to be made to draw it to the attention of staff.

Environment

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the response of the Government to the Environment Select Committee's report on Northern Ireland environmental issues.

Mr. Needham: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given to the hon. Member for Pendle (Mr. Lee) on 26 March 1991, at column 366-68.

Education and Library Boards

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether the Northern Ireland Department of Education will take action to remedy the division of the South Eastern education and library board into four different locations in the city of Belfast.

Dr. Mawhinney: The Department of Education for Northern Ireland is considering proposals by the board for a single site headquarters and has sought clarification on some aspects of the proposals.

Building Work

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will list the number and location of all new buildings or extensions commissioned by his Department in each of the past five years which (a) had contracts worth between £3 million and £5 million and (b) had contracts worth more than £5 million.

Dr. Mawhinney [holding answer 25 April 1991]: The information is as follows:

Year	£3 to £5 million	Location	Over £5 million	Location
1986-87	—	—	1	Antrim
1987-88	2	Armagh Maze	2	Newry
1988-89	9	Antrim Dungannon Greater Belfast Londonderry Omagh Warrenpoint	[1]4	Banbridge Newtownards
1989-90	[1]8	Ballyclare Belfast Hillsborough Londonderry	[1]3	Antrim Belfast
1990-91	6	Belfast Dromore Enniskillen Larne Limavady Londonderry	[1]6	Bangor Belfast Carrickfergus Londonderry

[1] These figures include building and accommodation needs of the Royal Ulster Constabulary and a civil defence centre. The locations of the buildings have not been divulged for security reasons.

Housing, Newry

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give details of any improvement or renovation schemes scheduled to be undertaken by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive at properties in North street, Newry, over the next three years.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 29 April 1991]: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive but I have been advised by the chief executive that no improvement/renovation works are proposed for North street, Newry, within the next three years.

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what improvement or renovation schemes have been carried out by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive to properties at North street, Newry, in each of the past five years; and what was the cost of each scheme.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 29 April 1991]: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, but I have been advised by the chief executive that two improvements/renovation schemes were carried out in North street, Newry, during the past five years. They are as follows:

1. North street phase 1

Improvement scheme (103 dwellings). Completed in February 1986 at a cost of £408,800, which comprised of the following works:

(a) fire regulation compliance
(b) upgrading of entrance hall and access galleries
(c) provision of audio/visual entry system.

2. North street phase 2

Improvement scheme 2

Improvement scheme (18 dwellings). Completed in February 1987 at a cost of £129,337, which comprised the following works:

(a) fire regulation compliance
(b) upgrading of entrance hall and accesses
(c) provision of audio/visual entry system
(d) general repairs including kitchen fittings
(e) re-roofing
(f) re-wiring and installation of Economy 7.

Local Government Finance

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what changes will occur in Northern Ireland's rates arising from the new Government proposals for local government financing in Great Britain;

(2) if he will make a statement on local government finances in Northern Ireland.

Dr. Mawhinney [holding answer 29 April 1991]: The application in Northern Ireland of the reduction announced in the Budget is a good outcome for the Province's domestic ratepayers. They will contribute, on average, 36 per cent. less towards the cost of local authority-type services, which is in line with the switch to contral funding of 36 per cent. of the amount charge payers contribute to local authority expenditure in Great Britain.

The Government's review of the community charge did not extend to Northern Ireland, which has different arrangements for financing local government services and continues to operate a rates system. Some 90 per cent. of expenditure on these services is administered by central Government in Northern Ireland, to which the ratepayers contribute through the regional rate, while district rates contribute towards the remaining 10 per cent. of services which the district councils administer. Rate relevent expenditure on the services administered by Northern Ireland departments or their agencies, to which the regional rate contributes, is determined through the public expenditure survey system and as such is subject to the full scrutiny of Parliament. This expenditure is supported by central Government at a rate of 81 per cent. which indicates the Government's continued commitment to tackling the high level of need in the Province.

Ministers in Northern Ireland will, however, be examining the proposals in the recent Green Paper and will consider any implications they may have for Northern Ireland.

Expenditure in Schools

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a table showing the expenditure per pupil on (i) books and (ii) equipment in (a) primary schools and (b) secondary schools in cash and real terms since 1976.

Dr. Mawhinney [holding answer 29 April 1991]: Total expenditure on books and equipment is as follows—separate figures not available. Figures are not available prior to the 1978-79 financial year.

	Primary schools		Secondary schools
	Cash £	Real terms £	Cash £	Real terms £

PRIME MINISTER

Prisoners (Visits)

Mr. Alton: To ask the Prime Minister if he will co-ordinate policy on the allocation of prisoners so that persons convicted in either England and Wales, Scotland or Northern Ireland may serve their sentences at a convenient establishment for regular visits from their families.

The Prime Minister: The allocation of prisoners in England and Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland is a matter for the respective prison authorities. Nearness to home is one of the factors which is taken into account, along with other matters, in deciding a prisoner's allocation. There is provision in the Criminal Justice Act 1961 for the transfer of prisoners between United Kingdom jurisdictions.

Engagements

Mr. Soames: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for 30 April.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Advertising

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Prime Minister if he will give separate figures for the spending by the Prime Minister's office on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

The Prime Minister: My office has incurred no expenditure on advertising or promotional material, and there are no plans for any such expenditure in 1991-92.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Prime Minister if he will give separate figures for the spending by the Cabinet Office on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

The Prime Minister: The Cabinet Office has not incurred and does not expect to incur any expenditure on promotional advertising on television, radio or in newspapers in the years 1979-92.

Information on other promotional material is not available for the years 1979 to 1987. Expenditure on such material from 1987-88 was:

1987-88	19,306
1988-89	9,500
1989-90	14,833

The estimate for 1990-91 is £1,000.

The Cabinet Office does not expect to incur any expenditure on other promotional material in 1991-92.

Matrix Churchill

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Prime Minister if he will name the Government Department to which a Crown servant calling himself Balson and visiting the offices of Matrix Churchill in Coventry at 11.15 am on 24 April 1989, 3.51 pm on 11 September 1989, 3.10 pm on 27 October 1989, 9.35 am on 1 December 1989, 9.35 am on 26 March 1990, 9.35 am on 20 April 1990 and 1.17 pm on 26 April 1990 was attached between 1 April 1989 and 30 April 1990; what was his grade; and what were his official responsibilities.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him today by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and industry.

Arms Trade

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister which proposals he has to allow international advance warning of arms' build-up by a particular country.

The Prime Minister [holding reply 29 April 1991]: On 8 April I proposed the establishment of a United Nations register of arms sales to enable the international community to monitor and control any excessive build-up of arms by a particular country. The proposal was endorsed by our European partners. We are now pursuing it in discussions with the other permanent members of the Security Council and the United Nations secretariat.

ENVIRONMENT

Immingham Port Development

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what protection is intended for communities living near, or en route to, power stations in the east midlands who will be adversley effected by coal lorry traffic resulting from the use of the new port development at Immingham.

Mr. Baldry: I am advised that the Secretary of State for Transport has no proposals to improve the trunk road network or to carry out other measures as a consequence of the Immingham lorry traffic. However, he intends to keep the situation under review.

Community Charge

Mr. Michael Spicer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if, in his consideration of the relative weight to be given to people and to property in his replacement of the community charge, (1) he will make it his policy to avoid creating a deterrent to home improvement if rental values are to be used;

(2) he will make it his policy (a) to avoid unfairness due to changes in capital values which are caused by factors extraneous to the property itself and (b) to avoid subjective and variable valuation procedures;

(3) he will make it his policy to identify property values in the taxes paid by tenants of councils and housing associations;

(4) he will make it his policy that (a) residents in areas served by inefficient councils should pay more than those being served by efficient councils, (b) that the principle of local accountability is maintained and (c) that local taxes paid should reflect the services used;

(5) he will make it his policy to distinguish between nominal property values and the ability to pay.

Mr. Portillo: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced on 23 April our proposals for the new council tax. The proposal is to place each property in one of the seven bands by value.

There will be no need either for precise valuations or for regular general revaluations. Paragraph 2.30 of the consultation paper explains that "because the tax is to be based on broad bands improvements to a property would not necessarily lead to a change in its appropriate band. One option would be to take alterations into account only when a property changed hands".

The highest band property will pay about two and a half times as much as the lowest in an area. Each household will receive a single bill on the assumption that it consists of two people. There will be a 25 per cent. discount for one-adult households. The level of council tax will be higher than the standard level where an authority spends more than is necessary to provide a standard level of service, and lower in more efficient authorities. People on low incomes will receive rebates of up to 100 per cent. of the council tax.

Tombs

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any plans to amend or vary the appropriate regulations on conservation areas to prevent the demolition of tombs which are less than 115 cu m in size and which have an important historical interest.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend has no plans to amend the direction in paragraph 97 of circular 8/87 which exempts from conservation area controls any building with a total cubic content not exceeding 115 cu m.

If a building in a conservation area smaller than 115 cu m is of sufficient architectural or historic interest it can be listed and will then be subject to the more extensive listed building controls.

Environmental Protection Agency

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received in favour of establishing an environmental protection agency for the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: My right hon. Friend has received from a variety of sources proposals for the creation of environmental protection agencies of various kinds. The Government's views on the institutions required for environmental protection were set out in chapter 18 of the White Paper "This Common Inheritance" (Cm. 1200) published in September 1990.

Litter

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the names of the officers appointed by each local authority in England with responsibility for issuing £10 fixed penalty fines for dropping litter under the terms of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 and the number of such notices issued since 13 February.

Mr. Baldry: This information is not held by my Department. However, I understand that a number of local authorities, including Bath, Darlington, Chorley and Warrington councils, have made use of the power under section 88 of the Act and have adopted the fixed penalty scheme in their areas.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment on what percentage poll tax collection rate the reduction of £140 in respect of each poll tax payer in Lambeth will be paid.

Mr. Key: Entitlement to community charge grant, which will compensate authorities for the income from community charges forgone under the Community Charges (General Reduction Act) 1991, will be based on the rate of charge collection actually achieved by each authority in 1991-92; except that, where the charge is reduced to zero as a result of the Act, entitlement will be based on the authority's original estimate of its rate of collection, disregarding the effect of the Act.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the sums added to or subtracted from Grimsby's standard spending assessment under his new system of resource allocation under his new system of local government finance.

Mr. Key: The consultation paper about the proposed new council tax issued on 23 April states that the Government do not propose any major changes to standard spending assessments.

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set out those local authorities which have been rate-capped or charge-capped during each of the years in which the capping system has operated.

Mr. Key [holding answer 29 April 1991]: Listed in the table are those authorities which were selected for rate limitation in each of the years between 1985-86 and 1989-90, and for community charge limitation in 1990-91 and 1991-92. In addition for 1986-87, 1987-88 and 1988-89, the three years following abolition of the metropolitan county councils and the Greater London council, the Local Government Act 1985 designated for precept limitation the Inner London education authority, the London Fire and Civil Defence Authority, the Northumbria police authority, the metropolitan county police authorities, the metropolitan county fire and civil defence authorities, and the metropolitan county passenger transport authorities.

Authorities designated for selective rate limitation.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate (a) the cost of establishing and maintaining community charge registers in the financial years 1989-90 and 1990-91 and (b) the cost of central Government publicity and information, including staff costs, to promote and support the establishment and maintenance of community charge registers in the financial years 1989-90 and 1990-91.

Mr. Key: The costs of establishing and maintaining community charge registers are not separately identifiable. The Government have not undertaken specific publicity on the establishment and maintenance of community charge registers. We have, however, produced a series of community charge practice notes, jointly with the local authority associations. Practice note No. 3 dealt with compiling the community charge register; No. 8 dealt with the canvass; No. 9 dealt with sole or main residence; and No. 24 dealt with maintaining the community charges register. We estimate that the total cost of printing these practice notes was £17,400. Copies were placed in the Library.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate (a) the direct cost to local authorities of collection, and the enforcement of collection, of the community charge in 1990-91, (b) the indirect cost to local authorities of loss of cash flow arising from delays in payment of the community charge in 1990-91 and (c) the payments shortfall and the national non-collection rate of the community charge in its first year of operation in England.

Mr. Key: English local authorities budgeted to spend £440 million on the collection of community charges in 1990-91. Estimates of the cost resulting from delays in collection cannot be made from the information collected from authorities; and information on arrears and bad debts at 31 March 1991 is not yet available.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate the cost of community charge transitional relief in 1990-91 (a) in total and (b) for each standard region.

Mr. Key: We shall be in a position to publish a final figure for the amount of relief given in 1990-91 when local authorities submit their final grant claims later this year. The total amount of relief grant claimed by authorities in their initial claims for 1990-91 is £259,881,592. The amount for each region in England is as follows.

North West	47,854,631
North	22,451,448
Yorkshire and Humberside	36,023,883
West Midlands	21,353,472
East Midlands	26,830,977
East Anglia	11,137,309
South East	68,733,298
South West	25,496,574

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the cost of re-billing the community charge for 1991-92.

Mr. Key: My Department is discussing with the local authority associations what additional administrative costs local authorities are incurring as a result of the Community Charges (General Reduction) Act and of the accompanying changes in the community charge reduction scheme, and how these should be reimbursed. Our preliminary estimate is that these costs will be in the range of £50 to £60 million in England.

Local Government Officials

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will tabulate in league order the top 10 highest paid officials in local government stating the employing authority in each case, and the amount of each salary.

Mr. Key: This information is not collected by my Department.

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Heseltine: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 25 April, Official Report, Volume 189, column 492.

Government Buildings

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the future use of Norfolk house, East Kilbride.

Mr. Yeo: The future of Norfolk house will depend on the outcome of tripartite negotiations currently in progress between the Department as tenant, the Department's landlord, East Kilbride development corporation, and the head landlord, the Norwich Union Insurance Group. These negotiations aim to establish agreement on the complex issue of legal liability for the defects which have made Norfolk house unusable.

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those Government properties, owned, leased or rented, which are currently subject to structural investigation.

Mr. Yeo: A wide range of structural investigations are taking place at any given time, varying from cases where options from repair to renewal are explicitly under consideration through full-scale inspections prior to lease renewals and down to routine inspections to anticipate problems and establish future maintenance requirements. In addition, responsibility for maintenance of Government property lies with a wide range of Government Departments. It is not therefore practicable to provide the information in the form requested.

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the structural investigation currently being undertaken into Centre 1, East Kilbride.

Mr. Yeo: Investigations have shown that Centre 1 requires considerable repair and refurbishment. My Department has appointed Hugh Martin Partnership, assisted by the Property Services Agency, to compare the long-run value for money of effecting the necessary remedial work with the alternative of developing a new building elsewhere in East Kilbride.

Gulf Coral Atolls

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many experts work for his Department on the protection of fragile coral atolls in the northern Gulf; what contact he has had with Dr. Nigel Downing, formerly of the Kuwaiti scientific service, on the damage to fish larvae; and how many civilians working on the ecological consequences of the Gulf war have been flown to Kuwait at Her Majesty's Government's expense.

Mr. Baldry: The protection of coral atolls in the northern Gulf lies outside the direct responsibilities of my Department. On the action that we have taken to pass Dr. Downing's concerns to the Government of Kuwait, I refer the hon. Member to my answer to him on 21 March 1991, Official Report, Vol. 188, column 171. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs met the transport cost of a team of three officials of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, who flew to the Gulf in response to a specific request from the Government of Saudi Arabia.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in his Department; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

Mr. Heseltine [holding answer 29 April 1991]: The numbers and grades of staff and complement in the statistical divisions[1] of DOE (Central) are set out in the table.

[1] The statistical divisions in DOE (Central) comprise housing data statistics, finance local authority statistics, land and general statistics, environmental protection statistics, and construction industry statistics.

There are also statisticians employed throughout the Department in posts of a largely administrative nature: these numbered 10 at 1 April 1991.

We do not have readily available historical data for each year back to 1 April 1979, but I have provided staff in post data for various dates within the 1979-80 to 1991-92 period in my replies to questions dated 21 July 1988, 13 March 1989 and 6 March 1990.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

St. Helena

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will ensure that extra aid will be provided for St. Helena to cover the whole costs of the current drugs case on the island.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Financial provision has been made by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office for all the costs of this case.

Cartagena Convention

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the United Kingdom Government or its representative will be supporting the listing of sea turtles on annex II of the protocol as proposed by the ad hoc meeting of experts for the development of annexes in November 1990 concerning specially protected areas and wildlife under the convention for the protection and development of the marine environment of the wider Caribbean region, Cartagena convention.

Mr. Garel-Jones: We are considering the implications for the dependent territories of all the proposed listings on the annexes of the protocol concerning specially protected areas and wildlife under the Cartagena convention.

Correspondence Unit

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the volume of correspondence (i) coming in and (ii) being sent out by the Members of Parliament's correspondence unit of the Foreign Office for each month in 1990.

Mr. Garel-Jones: It is not possible to put a figure to the volume of all correspondence addressed to the Secretary of State and Ministers of State at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. However, 14,275 letters were received from Members of Parliament in 1990. It is our policy to reply to all such letters.

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Following is the reply:

Total expenditure by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office on press and public relations from 1983-84 to 1989-90, latest estimates for 1990-91 and budget provisions for 1991-92 (£ million)

	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86	1986-87	1987-88	1988-89	1989-90	1990-91	1991-92

Figures for the period before 1983-84 are not available on a comparable basis.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by his Department in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: No such fees have been paid for the period in question and there is no expenditure planned.

Prince Ranariddh Cambodia

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the Ministers and officials of his Department who met Prince Ranariddh of Cambodia during his recent visit; and what was discussed.

Mr. Garel-Jones: My noble Friend the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, supported by officials of the South-East Asian department of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, met Prince Ranariddh on 24 April to discuss the Cambodian peace process and related matters.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Advertising

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Attorney-General if he will give separate figures for the spending by the Lord Chancellor's Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

The Attorney-General: The figures for the Lord Chancellor's Department, excluding staff costs, are as follows:

	1988-89 £	1989-90 £	1990-91 £	[1] 1991-92 £
Television advertising	Nil	Nil	Nil	Nil
Radio advertising	Nil	Nil	Nil	Nil
Newspaper advertising	15,000	3,967	50,242	5,975
Other promotional material	32,500	31,208	77,968	82,000

[1] Forecast.

The breakdown of the amounts spent on respective areas and the amounts spent for the previous years can be obtained only at disproportionate cost, but the total expenditure, including staff costs, was:

1984-85	135,730
1985-86	176,613
1986-87	148,020
1987-88	137,001

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

School Budgets

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will list those London education authorities which have delegated the whole of their school budgets;

(2) if he will list those London education authorities which have delegated the budget for educational psychological services.

Mr. Fallon: No local education authority has delegated all its potential schools budget to schools. Nor has any local education authority delegated all the budget for education psychology services.

The proportions of their potential schools budgets which local education authorities are delegating to schools are listed in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes) on 21 February, Official Report, columns 235-36, together with the pursuant reply of 22 March, Official Report, column 236.

Education, Eltham

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many reports by Her Majesty's inspectors have been produced on education in Eltham during the past 10 years; and what arrangements have been made for these reports to be seen by the public.

Mr. Eggar: Since 1983, when reports were first published, Her Majesty's inspectorate has produced four reports on education provided for the constituents of Eltham. All four reports were published. Three were institutional inspection reports and one was a survey report on science education in years one to three of some secondary schools in Greenwich.

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Eggar: The expenditure figures for press and public relations by this Department for the financial year 1984-85 to 1990-91 are provided in the table. Figures for 1979 to 1983-84 are not available on a comparable basis. The 1990-91 figure is provisional. The 1991-92 estimate is £2,778·0.

Year	£000s
1984-85	788·8
1985-86	1,026·3
1986-87	1,937·8
1987-88	2,313·6
1988-89	2,336·2
1989-90	2,596·0
1990-91	2,281·5

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by his Department in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Eggar: In the privatisation of the National Seed Development Organisation Ltd. and assets of the Plant Breeding Institute, the fees and other sale expenses in 1987-88 totalled about £0·6 million as stated in the published appropriation account for class XII, vote 13. In 1986 fees amounted to only £48,000, as stated in the published appropriation account for class XII, vote 4 for 1986-87. This is the only privatisation conducted by this Department in the period referred to.

Disability and Equal Opportunities

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what consideration he has given to the document "Guidelines on Disability and Equal Opportunities Issues" drawn up by a working party including disabled teachers and published by the National Union of Teachers; if there is any action he has taken or will be taking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fallon: My right hon. and learned Friend understands that the National Union of Teachers will be writing to him about the recommendations in its document, "Guidelines on Disability".

Southwark

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the cost to public funds to date of Bacon's city technology college, Southwark, in each of the financial years since its announcement; what is the latest projected cost up to and including completion; and what proportion of capital moneys expended by his Department in (a) Southwark and (b) the parliamentary constituency of Southwark and Bermondsey on (i) secondary schools, (ii) all schools and (iii) in total this comprises in each of the years in question.

Mr. Eggar: Capital expenditure by the Department on the Bacon's city technology college was £1·799 million in 1989-90 and £5·671 million in 1990-91. The building programme is expected to conclude in 1991-92 and the forecast spend is £3·956 million. Information on capital expenditure by the London borough of Southwark since it took over educational responsibilities from ILEA is not yet available. Southwark local education authority's annual capital guideline for 1991-92 was £1·258 million, of which the notional schools' component was £1·220 million. The comparable figures for 1990-91 were £1·429 million, £1·367 million of which was for schools. Southwark's allocation for capital works at voluntary aided schools in 1991-92 was £0·861 million and in 1990-91 was £1·186 million.

Newcastle upon Tyne Polytechnic

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what rating the Newcastle upon Tyne polytechnic has been given by Her Majesty's inspectors as regards quality of provision of teaching; and whether he has had any discussions with the Polytechnics and Colleges Funding Council as to how this will be reflected in its funding decisions.

Mr. Alan Howarth: HMI offers advice to the PCFC programme advisory groups on subject areas, not whole institutions. That advice is used by PCFC in judging claims made for outstanding quality by institutions in their bids for funds. The PCFC programme advisory group accepted Newcastle polytechnic's claims for outstanding quality in six of the nine PCFC programme areas. HMI judgments, subject by subject, are always made known to the institution.

My right hon. and learned Friend has not had discussions of how these gradings for Newcastle polytechnic will be reflected in its funding decisions. He would not regard it as appropriate to do so and he is satisfied with the arrangements adopted by PCFC to reward outstanding quality.

Free School Meals

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will estimate the cost in the financial year 1991-92 of restoring entitlement to free school meals to (a) the children of parents on family credit and (b) all others who lost entitlement to free school meals as a result of the Social Security Act 1986, giving figures for Great Britain and the United Kingdom.

Mr. Fallon: It is not possible to estimate the cost of reintroducing the wide variety of discretionary schemes which existed prior to the implementation of the Social Security Act 1986.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Pension Fund Surpluses

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will consider reviewing the permissibility of the practice of companies capitalising on pension fund surpluses to obtain higher rating and funding.

Mr. Maples: I have no plans to review accounting treatment for pension fund surpluses as set out in the Companies act 1985 and statement of standard accounting practice (SSAP) 24.

Tampons

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the effect on Treasury revenues in 1991-92 and in a full year of zero-rating VAT on sanitary towels and tampons.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Information is not available on which to base an estimate.

Accident Prevention Equipment

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of loss of revenue if items of home safety equipment were all sold at zero VAT.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Information is not available on which to base an estimate.

Advertising

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give separate figures for the spending by the Central Office of Information on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotion material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

Mr. Maples: Figures for the Central Office of Information on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material for the years 1979-80 to 1985-86 were given in the answer at columns 240-42 on 25 November 1986. Figures for the years 1986-87 to 1988-89 were given in the answer at columns 167-68 on 13 March 1990. Figures for the years 1989-90 and 1990-91 are listed in the table below:

	1989-90 £000s	[1] 1990-91 £000s
Television advertising	45,460	48,100
Radio advertising	2,770	1,800
Press advertising	40,880	39,800
Other promotional material	33,000	33,700

[1] Estimate

Detailed decisions on estimated expenditure on advertising through the Central Office of Information on behalf of other Government Departments for 1991-92 are for departmental Ministers.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by the Treasury in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Maude: The total sums paid by Her Majesty's Treasury in fees and commissions to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation since 1979-80 is shown in the table. Where the split between fees and commissions is known this has been shown.

The costs of the forthcoming secondary sale of BT shares, including total fees paid to advisers, will be reported to Parliament after the sale is completed.

Year	Fees £ million	Commissions £ million	Total £ million

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total expenditure by the Treasury on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Her Majesty's Treasury press and public relations expenditure is as follows:

1988-89	548,264
1989-90	564,691
1990-91	510,489
1991-92	[1]560,989

[1] Estimate.

Comparable figures on press and public relations from 1979-80 to 1987-88 are unavailable and could be produced only at disproportionate cost.

Top Rate Taxpayers

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate for the total number of top rate taxpayers after the Budget changes in 1991-92.

Mr. Maude: About 1·7 million taxpayers are estimated to be liable to pay tax at the higher rate in 1991-92.

VAT

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate for 1991-92 the additional revenue that would be generated by an increase of 5 per cent. in the rate of value added tax levied on those products which were historically subject to a 25 per cent. purchase tax.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Around £2·5 billion in a full year.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the total burden to commerce and industry of re-programming computers, reprinting brochures, changing notices and other indirect costs arising from the change in the rate of value added tax.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: It is accepted that the change in rate will involve some additional and unavoidable compliance costs for business, but there is no readily available means of estimating them. However, these one-off costs should be viewed against the impact of the Budget as a whole, which is to reduce the burden which the tax system imposes on business.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will give the average extra cost per person per year of the extra 2·5 per cent. VAT announced in the Budget to (a) people in the Glanford and Scunthorpe constituency and (b) the national average.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 29 April 1991]: Information is not available that would permit us to estimate the extra cost per person in the Glanford and Scunthorpe constituency.

The extra yield in a full year of the VAT increase is £5·5 billion and the population is around 57 million—this suggests an average cost of £96 per person.

Tax Allowances

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the number of individuals in 1991-92 claiming (a) the additional personal allowance and (b) the widow's bereavement allowance.

Mr. Maude: In 1991-92 the number of individuals claiming the additional personal allowance is estimated to be 480,000. The corresponding figure for the widow's bereavement allowance is 130,000.

Earnings

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate for 1991-92 the numbers of men and women with earnings below (a) the tax threshold and (b) the national insurance contribution threshold.

Mr. Maude: Provisional estimates for 1991-92, based on projections from the 1988 and 1989 family expenditure surveys, are as follows:

	Women	Men
Numbers (millions) with earnings below
Tax threshold	2·9	1·0
National insurance lower earnings limit	2·25	0·75

National Savings

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he plans to change the aims of national savings.

Mr. Maples: Yes. I have decided that the following national savings aims should apply for 1991-92:

To attract personal saving as required by the Government's funding policy.

To encourage the saving habit among a wide range of people.

To give our customers a good, prompt and friendly service.

To market a range of products, with particular emphasis on encouraging longer-term saving.

Staff are to meet these aims within resource levels decided by Ministers and with the continuing objective of improving economy, efficiency and effectiveness.

Coinage

Mr. Higgins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the new copper-coated steel 1p and 2p pieces to be introduced in 1992 will, if magnetised, affect the operation of credit cards; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 29 April 1991]: The Royal Mint has advised that it is not aware of any such problems in countries that have been using low carbon mild steel issues.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Independent Radio News

Sir Robert McCrindle: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will make a statement on the provision made to accommodate Independent Radio News within the Palace of Westminster.

Mr. MacGregor [holding answer 22 April 1991]: I understand IRN currently occupies space in No. 1 Bridge street, a building in the charge of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

DEFENCE

Air Defence Operations

16. Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received about the grading of air electronic operations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The decision to reduce the pay banding of master and flight sergeant air electronic operator with effect from 1 October 1989 has generated about 35 representations.

Downbanding was implemented after three job evaluations over a period of six years had shown it to be justified. In accordance with normal practice, no one suffered a cut in pay; personnel affected kept their existing pay rates on a mark-time basis.

Helicopters

18. Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many helicopters of the British armed forces have been used in (a) the Gulf war and (b) assisting Kurdish refugees.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Some 100 British armed forces' helicopters were used in the Gulf war. On 30 April there were 12 RAF Chinook helicopters based in Turkey undertaking relief operations.

Peace Dividend

19. Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current estimated saving arising out of the peace dividend.

Mr. Tom King: Since 1985, United Kingdom defence spending has reduced in real terms by over 10 per cent. —excluding the cost of the Gulf conflict. Figures for coming years are set out in the public expenditure White Paper.

NATO

20. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with other Defence Ministers regarding the future of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tom King: I am in regular contact with my alliance colleagues on a range of defence issues, including the future evolution of NATO in the light of the London declaration.

Army (Current Enlistment)

21. Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many persons are currently enlisted in the Army; and how many of these are based (a) in Wales, (b) in the United Kingdom and (c) abroad.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: As at 1 March, there were 131,643 other ranks enlisted in the Army. Of these, 973 were based in Wales, 70,047 in the rest of the United Kingdom and 60,623 abroad.

"Options for Change"

22. Mr. Duffy: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to complete the "Options for Change" inquiry.

28. Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to publish his revised "Options for Change" policy statement.

Mr. Tom King: As the hon. Member and my hon. Friend will be aware, we are continuing to study the proposals in "Options for Change" which I announced last July. When we are in a position to take decisions on the final size and shape of the armed forces, I shall of course report further to the House.

The Gulf

23. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the current and future employment of British forces in the Gulf.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current level of United Kingdom deployment of armed services in the Gulf region.

Mr. Tom King: I refer my hon. Friend and the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Leith (Mr. Brown).

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many members of the volunteer forces took part in the Gulf operation.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: A total of 877 members of the volunteer forces were called out in support of British operations in the Gulf.

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether the speed of advance of the allied forces in the Gulf war has been assessed to have any strategic implications in the European theatre.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We are considering the outcome of the campaign and the conclusions to be drawn from it, but it is too early to say how the results of this work might be made public.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much was estimated to have been spent on the Gulf war by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) on 24 April 1991, at column 483.

27. Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether a decision has yet been reached on the issuing of a campaign medal to those members of Her Majesty's forces who served in the war for the liberation of Kuwait.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister stated in a written answer to my hon. Friend the Member for East Hampshire (Mr. Mates) on 22 March, Her Majesty the Queen has approved the award of a medal for those who served in the Gulf. Further details about the medal will be announced in due course.

Territorial Army

24. Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has for strengthening the Territorial Army.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: It is not possible to say what the future strength of the TA will be until the future size and shape of the Regular Army has been decided.

Unused Airfields

25. Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many unused airfields are owned by his Department; what is the total acreage they cover; and what is his estimate of their value if sold on the open market.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The only unused airfield currently owned by the Ministry of Defence is RAF Bishopscourt in Northern Ireland, consisting of some 577 acres, which is currently being offered for sale on the open market. It is not our policy to disclose our estimate of the value of property in the process of disposal.

UN Forces

26. Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he intends to contribute United Kingdom troops to a United Nations force to protect refugees from Iraqi troops; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We hope that the United Nations will take over the running of the camps for Kurdish refugees as soon as possible. Any requests from the United Nations for United Kingdom military assistance would be considered in the light of the circumstances prevailing at the time. No such request has yet been made.

Oilfield Fires (Kuwait)

29. Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what military or administrative assistance his Department is giving to those attempting to extinguish the Kuwaiti oilfield fires; and what military lessons his Department has drawn from this environmental disaster.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Assistance and advice has been provided on the disposal of unexploded ordnance by Royal Engineers personnel in Kuwait. In addition, the Royal Engineers have given safety briefings and have produced maps showing danger areas and leaflets giving safety advice. As for the lessons learnt, all aspects of the Gulf conflict are currently being investigated.

Chieftain Tank

Mr. Clelland: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the lessons of the Gulf conflict have now enabled him to decide on the most suitable replacement for Chieftain tanks; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: We hope that a decision will not have to be delayed too long.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by his Department in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The only privatisation my Department has undertaken since 1979 was the sale of Royal Ordnance plc, following an open competition, to British Aerospace plc in April 1987. The fees paid out in respect of that privatisation amounted to £1·9 million for work carried out between 1 January 1985 and completion of the sale.

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The earliest year for which figures are available is 1982-83. Figures for the period 1982-83 to 1989-90 are as follows:

	£ million
1982-83	5·1
1983-84	6·3
1984-85	6·8
1985-86	6·7
1986-87	7·3
1987-88	7·0
1988-89	7·1
1989-90	8·0

The estimated expenditure figure for 1990-91 is £8·2 million and for 1991-92 £9·2 million.

Figures for 1979-80, 1980-81 and 1981-82 are not available.

The figures provided include staff costs and expenditure on films, exhibitions, publications and equipment.

Nimrod (Airframes)

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Nimrod airframes have been purchased; at what cost; and how many such airframes are in current active service.

Mr. Alan Clark: Forty-nine Nimrod airframes were purchased and 36 are in current active service. The original cost of these airframes is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate expense.

AWACS

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many AWACS aircraft have been ordered from the United States; and at what cost.

Mr. Alan Clark: Seven E-3D AWACS aircraft have been ordered from the United States at a cost of £990 million.

Al Yamamah Contract

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects the Al Yamamah contract with Saudi Arabia to be completed.

Mr. Alan Clark: The formal understandings between Her Majesty's Government and the Saudi Arabian Government specify no date for completion.

Military Training (Fatalities)

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the practice when fatalities among military personnel occur during training, with respect to whether a coroner's court conducts the post mortem; and whether the arrangements differ for regular and territorial personnel, and for domestic and overseas exercises.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I assume that the question relates to coroners' inquests. Should a sudden, violent or unnatural death occur in England or Wales, the coroner for the area concerned is obliged to conduct an inquest in accordance with the Coroners Act 1988. This applies to all service personnel whether of the regular or reserve forces. Coroners are also obliged to investigate the sudden or unnatural death of a person abroad if the body is brought back to England or Wales. Deaths in Scotland or bodies returned to Scotland including those of service personnel are dealt with under the Fatal Accidents and Sudden Death Inquiries Act 1976 which allows the relevant procurator fiscal to decide whether a fatal accident inquiry should be held or not.

Management Strategy

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence who will be the budget holders for territorial units under the new management strategy; who will have the power to dismiss unsatisfactory clerical and stores staff in territorial units; and who will have the power to replace clerical staff in territorial units with contracted-out services.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The general officer commanding the district in which the unit is located is the budget holder for all funds other than those administered by TAVRAs. Powers of dismissal are held under delegated authority by commanding officers not below the rank of colonel in respect of stores grades with less than five years service, and clerical staff during their probation period. Outside these categories, dismissal may be approved at major general or equivalent level only on the advice of personnel management staff at grade 7 level or above. District headquarters exercise the appropriate powers to replace clerical staff in territorial units with contracted-out services.

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many individuals (a) civilian and (b) military were employed by his Department wholly or mainly on accounting and budget management duties in (a) 1980, (b) 1985 and (c) 1990; how many persons his Department envisages employing once the new management strategy is in place; and how many of these were concerned wholly or mainly on duties in connection with volunteer forces.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: I will write to the hon. Member.

TA 2000

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is TA 2000; when its terms of reference were published; if he will place a copy in the Library; whether an interim progress report has been published; and what is its relationship to the study referred to in the debate of 21 February, Official Report, column 546.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: TA 2000 was the name given to an internal aide memoire prepared in the Ministry of Defence in 1989 which listed the current and future improvements then being considered for the TA. It was purely an internal management document to help co-ordination in the Ministry of Defence and is not appropriate for placing in the Library. It covered a wide range of activities including training. The study I referred to on 21 February is considering the organisation of training in order to make the best use of training time. This work was foreseen in TA 2000.

Bloodhound Missile

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the intended service life of the Bloodhound missile when it first came into service.

Mr. Alan Clark: Ten years, although this has been progressively extended through a variety of modifications.

RAF Personnel

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many RAF personnel left the service from (a) armament engineering, (b) mechanical engineering, (c) electrical engineering and (d) electronic engineering, in each year since 1979.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The numbers of ground airmen, including airwomen, in engineering trades who left the service each year since 1979 are as follows:

	Armaments	Mechanical	Electrical	Electronic
1980	100	610	155	433
1981	120	635	208	522
1982	157	729	217	606
1983	128	688	212	585
1984	139	660	213	551
1985	161	858	247	676
1986	147	921	258	702
1987	122	850	208	571
1988	170	1,005	310	808
1989	253	1,372	432	1,152
1990	170	1,157	330	808

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many RAF personnel became qualified to serve in (a) armament engineering, (b) mechanical engineering, (c) electrical engineering and (d) electronic engineering, in each year since 1979.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The numbers of ground airmen, including airwomen, who became qualified to serve in engineering trades are as follows:

	Armaments	Mechanical	Electrical	Electronic
CY 80	360	1,680	405	987
CY 81	371	1,552	397	833
CY 82	72	301	198	802
CY 83	276	153	324	571
CY 84	260	1,569	338	817
CY 85	222	1,075	252	942
CY 86	153	523	292	876
CY 87	152	632	224	739
CY 88	275	572	246	381
CY 89	248	794	169	516
CY 90	108	835	235	565

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many trained fast jet pilots (a) took premature voluntary retirement and (b) requested premature voluntary retirement in 1989-90.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The number of fast jet pilots who took premature voluntary retirement in financial year 1989-90 was 47. The number who applied for voluntary retirement was 64.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many RAF personnel served in (a) armament engineering, (b) mechanical engineering, (c) electrical engineering and (d) electronic engineering, in each year since 1979.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The numbers of ground airmen, including airwomen, who were employed on engineering duties in the RAF in each of the years after 1979 are as follows:

	Armaments	Mechanical	Electrical	Electronic
1 April 1980	2,493	14,346	3,727	9,633
1 April 1981	2,753	15,416	3,977	10,187

1 April 1991	3,323	14,543	4,006	10,253

Prince Ranariddh (Visit)

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the Ministers and officials of his Department who met with Prince Ranariddh of Cambodia during his recent visit; and what was discussed.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: None.

Tornado Aircraft

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Tornado aircraft are currently in storage.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Fourteen Tornado aircraft are currently in storage.

SCOTLAND

Civil Marriages

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has on the response of local authorities to the Registrar-General's request that schemes should be submitted to him for providing improved facilities for civil marriages within their areas.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Registrar-General has received interim responses from three of the 12 Scottish local registration authorities. As his letter of November 1990 suggested that authorities should undertake any local consultation procedures about terms and conditions of service of staff before submitting schemes to him, it was anticipated that full responses would take some time to prepare.

Public Appointments

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report all the paid appointments within his patronage and the annual remuneration paid to each one.

Mr. Lang: Table 1 shows the information requested as at 1 July 1990. Table 2 provides information in respect of those appointments for which I am jointly responsible with other Ministers. I have made appointments to four major new bodies since July. Scottish Enterprise has a chairman, salary £43,000, and 10 members, salary £6,000; Highlands and Islands Enterprise has a chairman, salary £57,105, one member with a salary of £52,650 and eight members with salaries of £6,000; the Health Education Board for Scotland has a chairman, salary £13,500, and 10 members, salary £2,000; and the Nature Conservancy Council for Scotland has a chairman, salary £20,000, four members with salaries of £8,616 and three members with salaries of £5,385.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by his Department in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Lang: The total sums paid out by my Department in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation since 1979-80 are shown in the following table.

Year	£ million
1987-88	0·616
1988-89	2·246
1989-90	4·001
1990-91	[1]5·126

[1] Estimated outturn.

The total costs of the current privatisation of Scottish Power, Scottish Hydro-Electric and the Scottish Bus Group, including fees paid to advisers, will be reported to Parliament after the sales have been completed.

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Lang: The running costs of the Scottish Office information directorate for each year from 1985-86 are as follows:

Year	£ million
1985-86	0·9
1986-87	1·0
1987-88	1·1
1988-89	1·2
1989-90	1·4
1990-91	1·7
[1]1991-92	1·9

[1] Plans.
These figures exclude expenditure on information campaigns.

Directly comparable figures for years prior to the introduction of new Scottish Office budgetary arrangements in 1985-86 are not available.

Expenditure

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will break down the expenditure on industry, energy, trade and employment, excluding Scottish Enterprise and Highlands and Islands Enterprise, in every year since 1986-87 and include plans for 1991-92.

Mr. Allan Stewart [holding answer 22 April 1991]: The information requested is shown in the table below. The figures for 1986-87 to 1989-90 are taken from the appropriation accounts. The figures for 1990-91 are consistent with those shown in the main estimates for 1991-92.

Total[3]	323·6	238·6	234·8	231·9	246·2	[4]118·9

Notes:

[1]Figures have been rounded to the nearest £0·1 million and totals may, in consequence, not add up.

[2]Prior to 1 April 1991 TVEI in Scotland was the responsibility of the Department of Employment.

[3]These are net figures. Total expenditure is higher when receipts are taken into account.

[4]Including Scottish Enterprise and Highlands and Islands Enterprise the total for 1991-92 would be £572·1 million. This figure includes provision for training.

Building Work

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will list the number and location of all new buildings or extensions commissioned by his Department in each of the past five years which (a) had contracts worth between £3 million and £5 million and (b) had contracts worth more than £5 million.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 25 April 1991]: My Department has commissioned buildings as follows:

	£3 million to £5 million		Over £5 million
	Number	Locations	Number	Locations
1986-87	—	—	two	Glasgow sheriff court Kilmarnock sheriff court
1987-88	—	—	—	—

Sand Eels

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the results of his monitoring of the sand-eel situation in Scottish waters.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 29 April 1991]: The Scottish Office announced on 6 March that the sand-eel fishery in waters around Shetland would remain closed until spawning stock levels recover. This followed receipt of scientific advice that the downward trend in spawning stock levels had continued and that recruitment continued to be poor. The scientific advice on the fishery in the west of Scotland indicates that the stock is in a reasonable condition but that significant diversion of effort into the fishery would be undesirable. A consultation paper was therefore issued on 16 April proposing that effort limitation arrangements similar to those in force in 1990 should apply this year. Comments on the paper have been sought by 1 May and it is hoped that a final announcement on the management arrangements can be made shortly after that date.

Forestry Commission Land

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether it is the practice that all Forestry Commission land is advertised in the Estates Gazette when it is up for sale; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 29 April 1991]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 14 March, Official Report, column 689.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Child Benefit

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he has any plans to introduce a child benefit for grandparents who care for a grandchild in the absence of the mother; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: A grandparent who is responsible for bringing up a grandchild can claim child benefit under the existing rules.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the full-year cost of raising child benefit in October to £9·55 a week for all children, assuming a corresponding increase in income-related benefit allowances for children and in child dependency increases paid with national insurance benefits, giving figures for Great Britain and the United Kingdom.

Mr. Jack: The cost for Great Britain over that of next October's actual benefit increases would be £695 million. Information relating to Northern Ireland is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Benefit (Young Persons)

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor) of 26 July 1990, Official Report, columns 494-95, when he now expects to publish the results of research into the way in which benefit provision for 16 and 17-year-olds is working.

Mr. Jack: We expect to publish a report later in the spring.

Community Charge Benefit

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many community charge payers in Lambeth were in receipt of community charge benefit at the last period for which figures are available to his Department based on claims for refunds.

Miss Widdecombe: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 14 February 1991 at column 578.

Mr. Doran: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the number of persons in each local authority area in Scotland in receipt of (a) full rebate of 80 per cent. of their community charge and (b) exemption from payment of 80 per cent. of their community charge.

Miss Widdecombe: The information is as follows:

Regional councils	Persons in receipt of maximum 80 per cent. community charge benefit with income support as at November 1990	Persons exempt from payment of the community charge as at July 1990
Borders	5,000	410
Central	22,000	4,080
Dumfries and Galloway	10,000	800
Fife	26,000	1,760
Grampian	24,000	3,400
Highland	11,000	780
Lothian	35,000	4,400
Strathclyde	274,000	35,110
Tayside	30,000	2,060
Orkney	1,000	320
Shetland	[1]1,000	260
Western Isles	4,000	140
Total Scotland	443,000	53,520

[1] Estimated.

In addition to the above exemptions there were, in July 1990, 99,460 students in Scotland who were liable to pay only 20 per cent. of the full community charge.

The number of people receiving maximum community charge benefit is slightly underestimated because a small number of people not in receipt of income support also receive the maximum benefit.

Cold Weather Payments

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps he has taken to publicise the arrangements and closing date for applications for claiming the special cold weather payments in respect of the February cold snap.

Mr. Scott: Advertisements placed in national and local newspapers at the time of the cold snap explained how to claim and advised that claims would be accepted up to three months after the period of cold weather. Local radio stations broadcast information and posters and leaflets were also distributed by local offices.

Single Payments (Appeals)

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will state, for the number of appeals made against the refusal of single payments needing supplementary benefit appeal tribunals in 1985-86, 1986-87 and 1987-88, what proportion were successful (a) where neither claimants nor representatives attended, (b) where the claimant attended but was unrepresented and (c) where the claimant attended with a representative.

Mr. Scott: The information requested is in the table.

	1985-86 Per cent.	1986-87 Per cent.	1987-88 Per cent.
(a) Neither appellant nor representative attended	4·63	4·31	4·62
(b) Appellant only attended	10·95	9·67	9·25
(c) Appellant and representative attended	9·50	7·92	8·26

Housing Benefit

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many council tenants were in receipt of housing benefit at the end of the last period for which figures are available to his Department based on claims for refund of housing benefit by his Department to Lambeth.

Miss Widdecombe: As at 30 November 1990, the housing benefit rent rebate case load in the London borough of Lambeth was 20,931.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by his Department in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Jack: No such fees have been identified, and no such expenditure is planned for 1991-92.

Pensions (Increases)

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the cost in 1991-92 of raising the single pension by £5 a week and the married pension by £8 a week above current levels (a) assuming a similar increase in income-related benefits and (b) net of income-related benefits, giving figures for Great Britain and the United Kingdom.

Miss Widdecombe: The net additional cost of increasing the basic retirement pension in this way for pensioners in Great Britain would be (a) around £2·5 billion with a corresponding increase in income-related benefits and (b) around £1·6 billion with no such corresponding increase. Information relating to Northern Ireland is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Budgeting and Crisis Loans

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security in respect of his Bradford east office how many applications were received in 1990-91 for (a) budgeting loans and (b) crisis loans; and how many refusals there were in each category.

Mr. Scott: The administration of the social fund is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member and copies will be placed in the Library and the Public Information Office.

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what allocations there were in 1988-89, 1989-90 and for 1991-92 in respect of (a) community care grants, (b) budgeting loans and (c) crisis loans for each of the Bradford offices.

Mr. Scott: Information on allocations for all offices is available in the Library.

National Insurance Contributions

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the effect on Treasury revenues in 1991-92 of extending liability to national insurance contributions on (a) company cars and (b) free fuel to employees earning over £8,500 a year.

Miss Widdecombe: The Government's proposal to extend employers' national insurance contribution liability to the benefit gained from cars and fuel provided by them will have no effect on Treasury revenues in 1991-92. It is estimated that these proposals will yield an extra £550 million in respect of cars, and £60 million in respect of fuel, for the 1991-92 year. However the payment to be made by employers in respect of the 1991-92 year will not be made until early in 1992-93. These amounts will be apportioned between the national insurance fund and the national health service. There will be no added liability on employees.

Tax paying employers will be able to claim corporation tax or income tax relief, which will reduce income to the Consolidated Fund by about £200 million in a full year.

Invalid Care Allowance

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the cost in the financial year 1991-92 of raising the invalid care allowance to the level of the category A retirement pension, giving figures for Great Britain and the United Kingdom.

Mr. Scott: The estimated gross cost for Great Britain is £116·6 million. The estimate is based on the public expenditure plans contained in the current Departmental Report (Cm. 1514). Information relating to Northern Ireland is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Social Fund

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the cost in the financial year 1991-92 of converting all social fund loans into grants, giving figures for Great Britain and the United Kingdom.

Mr. Scott: The level of loan recoveries in 1991-92 assumed in determining the gross discretionary budget for Great Britain is £128 million—from past loans, as well as those made in 1991-92. This is not necessarily a valid estimate of the cost of converting all discretionary loans into grants, as the latter would fundamentally change the nature of the scheme.

Information relating to Northern Ireland is a matter for my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish figures on social fund and single payment expenditure on the same basis as those provided to the hon. Member for Nottingham, North on 19 April, Official Report, column 270, excluding any expenditure on maternity and funeral payments.

Mr. Scott: Direct comparisons between expenditure on single payments in 1987-88 and social fund expenditure in 1990-91 are misleading, given the very different scope of the two schemes.

The information requested is shown in the table. The figures exclude help with maternity expenses and assistance provided with the cost of funerals.

Single payments
1987-88:	£214 million (cash)	£263 million (at 1990-91 prices[1])
Social fund
1990-91 (provisional):	£232 million	12 per cent. (percentage reduction)

[1] Calculated using the estimated gross domestic product deflator.

Income Support

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the cost in the financial year 1991-92 of restoring entitlement to income support for all 16 and 17-year-olds at (a) the current benefit rate for under-25s and (b) the current benefit rate for people 25 and over, giving figures for Great Britain and the United Kingdom.

Mr. Jack: I refer the hon. Member to the reply to him on 12 December 1990 at column 424 which quoted figures for Great Britain. Information relating to Northern Ireland is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the cost in the financial year 1991-92 of raising the income support personal allowance for people aged 18 to 24 years to the level of the personal allowance for those aged 25 and over, giving figures for Great Britain and the United Kingdom.

Miss Widdecombe: The cost in the financial year 1991-92 of raising the income support personal allowance for people aged 18 to 24 years in Great Britain to the level of the personal allowance for those aged 25 and over would be around £185 million. There would be additional costs due to increased expenditure on housing benefit and community charge benefit.

Information relating to Northern Ireland is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Source: Modelled using data drawn from the 1986-7-8 family expenditure surveys and the 1989 ASE uprated to 1991-92 price and benefit levels.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Horticultural Wholesalers

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many horticultural wholesalers have gone out of business in England in the last 12 months.

Mr. Curry: I regret that the information is not available.

Meat and Livestock Commission

Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the current members of the Meat and Livestock Commission, and give the relevant experience of each member; how many members of the commission are females; and what percentage of the total membership they comprise.

Mr. Maclean: The members of the Meat and Livestock Commission and their relevant interests are as follows. There are 13 commissioners, one of whom is a woman. This comprises 8 per cent. of the membership.

Mr. G. John—Chairman. Has a wide experience of the food industry, is non-executive Chairman of Dairy Crest Ltd. and serves on the Council of Food From Britain.

Mr. Werner Mattes—Deputy Chairman and founder member of Matteson's Meat Ltd.

Mrs. E. Rose—Chairman of Consumers' Committee of the MLC. Past Chairman of the Institute of Home Economics.

Mr. G. Adams—Extensive interests in fresh meat wholesaling, slaughtering and distribution of meat.

Mr. J. Baker—Joint Managing Director of the Baker Group of companies which includes Midland Meat Packers. A former President of the Federation of Fresh Meat Wholesalers.

Mr. D. Curry—Hill farmer.

Mr. A. Mason—Chairman of Buchan Meats a farmer co-operative meat company.

Mr. Meuric Rees—Farmer.

Mr. P. Redshaw—Arable and livestock farmer. A member of the NFU Pigs Committee.

Mr. J. Royan—Retail butcher and past President of the Scottish Federation of Meat Traders.

Mr. A. Roxburgh—Past President of the Scottish Association of Meat Wholesalers.

Mr. C. Smith—Meat Trading Director of Tesco Stores Ltd.

Mr. J. Steer—Managing Director of British Beef Co. Ltd.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the number and incidence by year and county of confirmed bovine spongiform encephalopathy cases known to have been born to bovine spongiform encephalopathy infected dams.

Mr. Maclean: There have been 27 such cases, of which 26 were born before the ban on the feeding of ruminant protein to ruminant animals in July 1988. The breakdown is as follows:

County	Year in which BSE in offspring confirmed	Number
Avon	1990	2

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish a table showing the incidence of bovine spongiform encephalopathy in each county of England and Wales for the four-week periods ended 17 March and 17 April, respectively.

Mr. Maclean: The information for England and Wales is as follows:

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has concerning the location of the live progeny of bovine spongiform encephalopathy cows.

Mr. Maclean: Information on offspring is recorded as part of the epidemiological inquiry. In addition, since 15 October 1990, farmers have been required to maintain breeding records for cattle; and to keep both these and movement records for 10 years. The offspring of confirmed cases can therefore be traced if necessary.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his estimate of the current number of live cattle which are the offspring of cows confirmed as suffering from bovine spongiform encephalopathy.

Mr. Maclean: Up to 12 April 1991, the number of offspring recorded as live at the time that epidemiological inquiries were made into each case is 20,694. A number of these will have subsequently been slaughtered or died.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what research he has undertaken to ascertain whether confirmed bovine spongiform encephalopathy cases born to confirmed bovine spongiform encephalopathy dams had suffered vertical transmission of the disease;

(2) if he has any proposals to restrict the use for breeding purposes of cattle which are themselves the progeny of bovine spongiform encephalopathy cows;

(3) if he will publish the latest information he has concerning the possible vertical transmission of bovine spongiform encephalopathy.

Mr. Maclean: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) on 27 March 1991 at columns 471-74.

Farm Water Supplies

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representation he has received from farming businesses over the National River Authority's proposals to charge (a) for discharge consents and (b) for the monitoring of pure water supplies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: Prior to the National Rivers Authority issuing its formal proposals on charges for discharge consents, the Department received representations from individuals and organisations in the fish farming industry, a watercress grower and the Country Landowners Association. These were conveyed to the authority, which took them into account in formulating its proposals. The authority does not have plans to charge for the monitoring of pure water supplies. Earlier this year, the Government issued a consultation paper on private water supplies, which contained details of a proposed local authority charging regime for monitoring. The comments received are being considered by the Departments concerned.

Cattle (Illegal Hormones)

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what representations he has received alleging unfair competition from the giving of illegal hormones to cattle in other EC countries; whether he has raised this matter with the European Commission; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what representations he has received urging the desirability of increasing the number of tests on imported beef for hormones and clenbuterol; and if he will make a statement on measures to protect both producers and consumers in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Maclean: We have received a number of representations recently about veterinary drug abuse in the European Community and the testing which is carried out. Under the residues directive 86/469, EC member states are required to carry out a programme of monitoring for residues of veterinary drugs, including hormones and other illegal growth promoters. The Ministry also has in place a programme of surveillance specifically directed at veterinary drug residues in imported meat, including hormones and clenbuterol.

Surveillance for clenbuterol is being stepped up in 1991, both in terms of the number of animals tested and the range of cattle covered. The position is under continuing review, and if there is evidence of a particular problem, urgent consideration will be given to further increases in the level of monitoring.

We have not raised this matter with the European Commission although we have discussed the situation with the Irish Minister of Agriculture, and offered him our full support in the steps he is taking against illegal clenbuterol use in the Irish Republic.

Agricultural Products

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Norfolk, North, 26 March, Official Report, column 378, what was the degree of self-sufficiency in the United Kingdom, European Community, United States of America, Canada and the Cairns group countries of all agricultural products in the years 1979, 1985 and the latest year available.

Mr. Curry: United Kingdom self-sufficiency in all food and feed was as follows: 1979, 53·1 per cent.; 1985, 57·7 per cent.; 1990 (provisional) 56·4 per cent. Corresponding information for the other countries referred to is not readily available.

Environmentally Sensitive Areas

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list for each of the environmentally-sensitive areas established in England and for each year of each scheme's existence, the number of applicants for entry, the number of applicants accepted for entry and the numbers of successful applicants who have subsequently withdrawn from each scheme.

Mr. Curry: The table shows the number of applications in each of the 10 ESAs in England, together with the number of agreements reached for each year of the schemes operations. No agreement holders have subsequently withdrawn.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when, pursuant to his answer of 31 January, Official Report, column 634, he expects to announce the result of his review of environmentally sensitive areas policy.

Mr. Curry: As soon as we have completed our deliberations.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if, pursuant to his answer of 31 January, Official Report, column 634, he will publish the studies conducted for him on the costs and savings of his environmentally sensitive areas policy; and what are the conclusions of his evaluation of these studies.

Mr. Curry: We intend to publish reports summarising the results of the economic and environmental monitoring of the five environmentally sensitive areas designated in 1987. The conclusions drawn from our evaluation will be clear when we announce the results of our review of ESA policy.

Hill Livestock Compensatory Allowances

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list those organisations which he has consulted during his review of hill livestock compensatory allowances.

Mr. Curry: I have nothing to add to the reply I gave the hon. Member on 15 April at column 41.

GATT and Codex Alimentarius Commission

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will outline his policy on the selection of United Kingdom representatives to GATT.

Mr. Curry: The European Commission negotiates in GATT on behalf of member states and in consultation with them. Attendance of Ministers or officials at any meeting is determined in accordance with the nature of the meeting and the subjects under discussion.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are his Department's procedures for giving formal advice to the United Kingdom delegations to GATT, the Codex Alimentarius Commission, and their respective committees.

Mr. Curry: The European Commission negotiates in GATT on behalf of the member States, and in close consultation with their representatives. My officials prepare negotiating briefs for the United Kingdom permanent delegates to GATT which take into account the wide range of United Kingdom interests in the subjects under discussion, and attend important meetings with them. In the codex, the Commission negotiates on matters within Community competence, while on others member States speak individually. The United Kingdom delegation to codex meetings includes officials from my Department when appropriate and may include industry or consumer representatives who can be consulted in the course of discussion.

Meetings

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list those organisations with which he has had formal meetings regarding the United Kingdom's position on the GATT negotiations; and how often he has met representatives of (a) the National Farmers Union, (b) the TGWU agricultural workers section, (c) the National Consumer Council, (d) the Consumers Association, (e) the National Food Alliance, (f) Oxfam, (g) the National Office of Animal Health, (h) the Catholic Institute for International Relations, (i) Christian Aid, (j) the Retail Consortium, (k) the CBI, (l) UKASTA and (m) the Fertiliser Manufacturers Association, to discuss the United Kingdom's position in those negotiations.

Mr. Curry: The United Kingdom has played a leading part in development of the Community approach to the agriculture negotiations in GATT. We have discussed the issues and United Kingdom interests with a wide range of organisations on many occasions. To provide precise details of these frequent consultations could only be done at disproportionate cost to public funds.

Wheat and Grain

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Minister of Ariculture, Fisheries and Food what is the level of intervention stock of (a) wheat and (b) grain estimated for July 1991 in the United Kingdom; and how many days' supply this represents.

Mr. Curry: Current estimates of wheat and grain likely to be in intervention stores in the United Kingdom at the end of the 1990-91 marketing year on 30 June 1991, and the days' supply these represent, are as follows:

	Million tonnes	Days' supply
Grain	0·67	12

Banana Regime

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about the future of the EC's banana regime post-1991.

Mr. Curry: The European Commission is currently considering arrangements to apply to bananas in the single European market post-1992, but has not yet come forward with proposals. We are making it clear to the Commission and other member states that any new arrangements must fulfil our commitments to Commonwealth Caribbean suppliers and that they should take account of consumer interests, budgetary discipline, trade policy considerations and the competition and efficiency objectives of the single market initiative.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by his Department in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Curry: The Department has not paid any sums to outside organisations for the furtherance of privatisation in the period 1979-80 to 1989-90. We keep continually under review the contribution that the Department might make to the Government's privatisation policy.

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Curry: The information required for the financial years 1979-80 to 1983-84 could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

The figures for the subsequent years are as follows:

	£ million
1984-85	3·2
1985-86	3·5
1986-87	3·0
1987-88	0·6
1988-89	0·8
1989-90	1·1
1990-91	0·5

Figures for the years 1984-85 to 1986-87 refer to the total cost of press services and paid publicity which could be separated to show expenditure on press services only at disproportionate cost. Figures for 1987-88 to 1989-90 relate to press services alone. The estimated budget for press services for 1991-92 is £0·6 million.

Sweeteners in Food Directive

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what estimate he has made of the loss of sales and jobs which will accrue from the exclusion of snack foods from the sweeteners in food directive 8745/90;

(2) if he will seek to clarify the reasons why Mr. Bangemann, the European Commissioner, decided on 15 April that snack foods should not be covered by the sweeteners in food directive 8745/90;

(3) if he will explain the reasons for his confidence that snack food would be covered by the sweeteners in food directive 8745/90; and why he prepared the explanatory papers for Standing Committee A on the basis that they would be so covered;

(4) if he is aware of any specific health hazards which would accrue from the inclusion of snack food within the terms of the sweeteners in food directive 8745/90.

Mr. Curry: Consideration of sweeteners by the United Kingdom's independent expert advisory committees, following official surveys to monitor sweetener intakes, has revealed no health hazard from the current inclusion of these substances in snack foods. We are not aware that the matter has been reviewed by any other expert body. Accordingly, we see no health grounds why the draft EC sweeteners in food directive should not provide for the continuation of this existing practice. We are urgently seeking to clarify why the EC Commission's attitude on this matter appears to have changed since the preparation of the explanatory memorandum for Standing Committee A on the proposals.

It is the industry's view that sales of £70 million a year would be jeopardised if snack foods did not appear in the Directive. Whether jobs would be lost would depend on the industry's ability to reformulate the flavours concerned or divert resources to other products.

We aim to highlight identified problem areas in the explanatory memorandum prepared for Standing Committee A. Our expectation, after long negotiations, was that no difficulty existed and that this existing use could be continued. All the indications given by the Commission staff to this officials were that matters would be arranged so as to facilitate this. Industry representatives and Members of the European Parliament who could discuss the matter with Commission officials met the same response. We are urgently seeking to clarify why the Commission's attitude on this matter has since changed.

European Standing Committees

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will take steps to ensure that explanatory notes submitted to European Standing Committees are based on the terms of the directive; and if he will make it his policy to disregard in such notes expectations by his Department that changes might be permitted by the European Commission.

Mr. Curry: Explanatory memoranda are the means by which Parliament is kept in touch with, and is able to comment on, draft EC legislation. All Government explanatory memoranda follow a standard format. This provides for a factual account of the documents under consideration, but it also allows for the inclusion of additional information, which may depart from the official text. The sole purpose is to keep Parliament as fully informed as possible, and we believe that this is generally welcomed by members of this House. We will try to ensure that all relevant information is included in such documents.

Written Answers to Questions

Wednesday 1 May 1991

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Wales and Chester Circuit

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Attorney-General if he has any proposals for additional combined Crown and county court centres on the Wales and Chester circuit; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: It is the Lord Chancellor's policy to create combined court centres wherever it is possible to do so. There are at present two combined court centres on the Wales and Chester circuit, at Merthyr Tydfil and Warrington. The creation of an additional combined court centre at Caernarfon is under consideration.

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Attorney-General if he will give details of current proposals to improve and construct Crown and county court accommodation on the Wales and Chester circuit; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: There is an annual programme of planned building maintenance covering all Crown and county court buildings on the Wales and Chester circuit, which comprise 52 properties including 11 listed buildings. In addition, the circuit uses 27 courtrooms hired when needed from local authorities.

Funds have been made available in 1991-92 for major building improvements to the law courts at Cathays park, Cardiff, and maintenance improvements to the Guildhall in Swansea.

The current court building programme comprises:

Schemes currently in construction
- Crown court at Chester
- Crown court at Newport (Gwent)
- Warrington combined court centre

Schemes at the planning or design stage
- Cardiff county court
- Crown court at Cardiff (adaptation)
- Neath and Port Talbot county court
- Pontypool county court
- Pontypridd county court

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Attorney-General if he has any proposals to improve the co-ordination of courts listing centres and Crown court centres and combined centres on the Wales and Chester circuit; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: The courts have already taken steps to improve listing for both civil and criminal work on all circuits. Greater co-ordination has already been achieved with the emergence of more combined courts and county court trial centres. The practice of allowing listing officers to develop an expertise by remaining sufficiently long in post should ensure that the improvements continue. All listing arrangements are kept under regular review.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Home Office Domestic Properties

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number of Home Office domestic properties there are in the City of Durham constituency; how many of these properties since 1985 have been unoccupied at any time for (a) over six months, (b) one year, (c) two years or (d) longer; and how many are unoccupied at the present time.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The total number of domestic properties owned by the Home Office in the City of Durham constituency, which includes the prison establishments of Durham, Frankland and Low Newton, is 79, of which 28 are at present unoccupied. Of these 28 properties, 23 are currently on the market for sale and five are retained for re-allocation.

Accurate figures as to the length of time properties have been vacant since 1985 are not readily available, but of the 28 properties at present vacant, four have been unoccupied for over six months, two for one year, two for two years and 19 for longer than two years.

Drink Driving

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer on 22 April, Official Report, column 350, if there is any reason or issue of public policy which requires the factual information about whether a driver killed in a road crash had consumed alcohol to be kept secret until a court case or coroner's inquest.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The sub judice rule applies to both criminal proceedings and coroner's inquests. In the case of an inquest, it is entirely a matter for the coroner, who is an independent judicial officer, to decide in the light of the circumstances of a particular case, what information he may properly release in advance of the hearing.

Northern Ireland Prisoners (Transfers)

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what procedure is followed when a prisoner from Northern Ireland who is imprisoned in England requests a transfer to a Northern Ireland prison.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The general procedure for handling prisoners' requests and complaints is set out in Prison Standing Order 5C, a copy of which is in the Library. Requests for transfers to Northern Ireland are considered in consultation with the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland under criteria announced by the then Home Secretary on 23 June 1989 at column 265.

Civil Protection Co-ordination Group

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was discussed at his meeting with the civil protection co-ordination group on 24 April; if he will place a note of the meeting in the Library; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The meeting was held at the request of the civil protection co-ordination group to give the group the opportunity to put to my right hon. Friend its views on the need to maintain a civil defence capability; on the future of planning for civil emergencies in peacetime; and on the case for a new Civil Protection Act. It is not our practice to publish the notes of such meetings.

Polling Stations (Disabled Access)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any plans to publish guidelines to district councils concerning the physical accessibility of polling stations and the need to inform disabled people in advance of the physical accessibility of a polling station.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Existing Home Office guidelines to district and London borough councils in England and Wales emphasise their statutory obligation to designate as polling places, so far as is practicable, only places which are accessible to disabled people. We shall discuss with representatives of local authorities whether there are other ways of making it easier for disabled people to exercise their right to vote.

Management Consultants (Fees)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total sum paid out in fees by his Department to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: For information before 1989-90, I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by the then Home Secretary on 15 March 1990 at column 360.

The equivalent estimate of payments made for the financial year 1989-90 is £1,566,000; the latest estimated expenditure for 1990-91 is £2,909,000 and the budget for 1991-92 is £1,100,000.

Data Protection Registrar (Staff)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in the Office of the Data Protection Registrar; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I understand that the office of the Data Protection Registrar does not have a specialist statistical division or staff. Statistics are produced and analysed by his staff as part of their normal duties.

Asylum

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidance he has issued with regard to the amount of bail to be lodged in respect of asylum seekers released after detention; and what is the average amount of bail demanded in (a) December 1990 and (b) April 1991.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: None. The grant of bail is a judicial decision for the individual adjudicator. The other information requested is not recorded centrally.

Animal Experiments

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has concerning the percentage of all licensed animal experiments in the latest year for which figures are available which were carried out for the development of cosmetics and toiletries.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The only statistics collected on cosmetics and toiletries relate to procedures carried out in safety evaluation. In 1989 less than 0·4 per cent. of all procedures started in Great Britain were concerned with the safety testing of cosmetics and toiletries.

Paul Alexander Cleeland (Trial)

Mr. John Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will ensure that the Home Office document on Paul Alexander Cleeland's trial, dated February 1987, which has been deposited in the Library, is corrected to reflect accurately the courts transcript of Mr. Justice Lane's summing up concerning Mr. McGafferty's forensic evidence; and if he will make an authoritative statement to establish the truth on this matter.

Mr. John Patten: We will make arrangements for the necessary amendment to be made to the Home Office memorandum on the case of Mr. Paul Cleeland and for a copy of the revised document to be placed in the Library. My right hon. Friend, the Home Secretary will take account of the significance of this error in considering whether there are grounds to intervene in Mr. Cleeland's conviction.

Police Forces (Costs)

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of the total costs of provincial police forces will be met from all central sources of funding, direct and indirect, in the current financial year; and what percentage will be raised locally.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Specific grant will be paid at the rate of 51 per cent. on all provincial police forces' revenue expenditure and on approved capital expenditure. A proportion of the remaining 49 per cent. is provided by central Government through revenue support grant, redistributed business rates and community charge grant. Support other than specific grant is not hypothecated to particular services, and decisions on what portion of this other support should go to meet police expenditure are at the discretion of the local authority concerned. We estimate that, overall, some 90 per cent. of police expenditure is met directly or indirectly through central funding, including revenue support grant redistributed business rates and community charge grant.

Drug-related Offences

Ms. Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many people have been charged, over the last five years, for drug-related offences in the Stoke Newington division of the Metropolitan police district; and what is the rate of such charges in Stoke Newington relative to other Metropolitan police district divisions;

(2) what is the average length of sentence for those charged and convicted for drug-related offences in the

Hackney division of the Metropolitan police district in the last five years; and what is the national average for offences in the same category;

(3) how many of those charged with drug-related offences as a result of the activities of the Stoke Newington division of the Metropolitan police have been found guilty in the last five years;

(4) how many drug-related arrests were made by the Stoke Newington division of the Metropolitan police in the last five years; and what is the rate of such arrests in Stoke Newington relative to other Metropolitan police district divisions.

Mr. John Patten [holding answer 18 April 1991]: The information requested, which relates to the Stoke Newington division of the Metropolitan Police district, is contained in the tables below.

TRANSPORT

London Docklands

Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will supply figures for each financial year since 1981 for the amount of public expenditure by his Department on (a) public transport infrastructure and (b) road infrastructure that is either in the London docklands urban development area or will serve it.

Mr. Roger Freeman: The Department of Transport makes grants to British Rail and, since 1984, to London Regional Transport—LRT. It is the responsibility of those two organisations to provide public transport infrastructure to and within docklands. Capital expenditure on the Docklands light railway by LRT, including contributions from developers, has been as follows:

	£ million
1984-85	26
1985-86	33
1986-87	16
1987-88	61
1988-89	51
1989-90	93
1990-91	153

Information on expenditure by London Buses, London Underground and Network SouthEast on infrastructure serving docklands is not readily available.

The Government have made a grant of £500,000 to the consortium responsible for the riverbus service.

The following schemes in the national road programme which serve the London Docklands area were completed or under construction during this period:

A2 Rochester Way Relief Road
A13 Leamouth Road
A13 West India Dock Road
A406 South Woodford-Barking Relief Road
East London Traffic Control System

Expenditure on these schemes was:

	£ million
Up to 1987-88	119
1988-89	11
1989-90	10
1990-91	15

The Department is also responsible for maintenance and minor improvements to trunk roads in this area, and for the operation of the Woolwich ferry. Expenditure was as follows. Detailed figures for years prior to 1987-88 are not readily available.

	£ million
1987-88	3
1988-89	6
1989-90	8
1990-91	12

British Rail (Investment)

Mr. Doran: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what investment has been approved for repairing and improving the British Rail track signalling systems (a) in England and Wales and (b) in Scotland.

Mr. Freeman: Approvals of this kind are generally a matter for British Rail. I understand from British Rail that some £358·4 million, at 1990-91 prices, of investment has been authorised so far on signalling and track schemes over the next five years. This includes £8·5 million for the Scottish region. Figures are not available for minor repair work that is not classified as investment.

The Minch (Fishing Boat Incidents)

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish details of the number of recorded incidents involving fishing boats and oil tankers in the Minch for each of the past 10 years.

Mr. McLoughlin: Numerous incidents off north-west Scotland have been recorded by the coastguard during the period but it is not possible to isolate those involving fishing vessels in the Minches. Two minor incidents involving tankers in the Minches have been identified, one in 1981 and one in 1984, neither of which involved any other vessel.

Management Consultants (Fees)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the total sum paid out in fees by his Department to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. McLoughlin: The latest figures for fees paid by the Department to management consultants are as follows:

1984-85	250,000
1985-86	272,000
1986-87	218,000
1987-88	371,000
1988-89	604,000
1989-90	734,000
1990-91	[1]843,000
1991-92	[2]580,000

[1] Latest estimate.
[2] Budget.
This excludes fees on computing consultancies.

Information for earlier years could be provided only at a disproportionate cost.

Railway Crossings

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how many manually controlled gated railway crossings are still operational in (a) Scotland and (b) the United Kingdom;

(2) if he will list the level crossings in (a) Scotland and (b) the United Kingdom which are protected by wooden gates; and which of those have been listed;

(3) if he will list in the Official Report the locations of the remaining manually controlled gated railway crossings in (a) Scotland and (b) the United Kingdom.

Mr. McLoughlin: This information is not readily available.

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the average annual cost of a manually controlled gated railway crossing to British Rail; and what specific assistance he provides towards meeting this cost.

Mr. McLoughlin: The average annual cost is about £52,500. A level crossing grant of 50 per cent. is paid by the Government, under EC Regulation 1192/69, towards the cost of maintaining and operating level crossings.

Channel Tunnel Rail Link

Mr. Gerald Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will ensure that hon. Members are given full access to the evidence of the W. S. Atkins review into the channel tunnel rail link;

(2) if he will place in the Library the full report and findings of the W. S. Atkins review into the channel tunnel rail link;

(3) if he will state the terms of reference given to W. S. Atkins for it to make an appraisal of the alternative schemes for the channel tunnel rail link;

(4) what steps he has taken to assure himself that W. S. Atkins was given all information required to make a proper professional appraisal of alternative schemes for the channel tunnel rail link.

Mr. Freeman: An interim report by W. S. Atkins, a copy of which is in the Library, contains the terms of reference for its review of the objectivity of British Rail's study of route options for the rail link. It has been for W. S. Atkins to decide what information it needed. The results of British Rail's study, which I expect to receive shortly, will be accompanied by the final report by W. S. Atkins, which will be published in due course.

Mr. Gerald Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what steps he has taken to satisfy himself that Coopers and Lybrand was given all information required to make a proper professional appraisal of alternative schemes for the channel tunnel rail link;

(2) if he will state the terms of reference given to Coopers and Lybrand for it to make an appraisal of alternative schemes for the channel tunnel rail link;

(3) if he will ensure the full report by Coopers and Lybrand into traffic forecasts for the channel tunnel rail link is placed in the Library.

Mr. Freeman: Coopers and Lybrand Deloitte was commissioned by British Rail to evaluate the benefits for commuter services of alternative routes for a high speed channel tunnel rail link. It has been its responsibility to obtain whatever information it needed. Its evaluation will form part of the report on the rail link project which we expect to receive soon from British Rail, but in advance of our receiving and considering that report I cannot say what specific documents it will consist of and what documents will be published.

Mr. Gerald Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will seek an explanation from British Rail as to the reasons for the delay in publication of the review into the channel tunnel rail link.

Mr. Freeman: British Rail expects to submit its proposals to my right hon. and learned Friend this month.

Mr. Gerald Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will ensure that a full review of the environmental impact of the various channel tunnel rail link projects is made available in the Library.

Mr. Freeman: Environmental considerations will form part of the assessment British Rail are making of the route options for the rail link. They are therefore likely to be included in the material that will in due course be published.

Public Transport

Dr. Dafydd Elis Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will outline the scope and purpose of the public service obligation grant in funding public transport in Wales; what has been the level of grant in Wales in each year since 1985-86; which projects have been assisted; and what is the estimated amount of public service obligation grant to be spent in Wales in 1991-92.

Mr. Freeman: Subsidy is paid by the Government to the British Railways board in the form of the Public Service Obligation grant under EC regulation 1191/69 and section

3 of the Railways Act 1974, which compensates BR for maintaining loss making passenger services. Grant is paid as a total to the board and the Government do not allocate it between sectors or geographical areas. Figures for PSO grant in respect of each of the past five years are given in the table. The figure for 1991-92 has not yet been decided.

LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

The Times

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Lord President of the Council, pursuant to his answer of 24 April, what information he has on whether The Times volunteered to surrender some of its space when it dropped Times Parliamentary Debates in 1897 or its mini-Hansard in 1991.

Mr. MacGregor: I am not aware of any such suggestion from The Times.

Select Committees

Sir Peter Emery: To ask the Lord President of the Council when he will publish the Government's response to the second report of Session 1989-90 from the House of Commons Select Committee on Procedure on the working of the Select Committee system.

Mr. MacGregor: I have today published the Government response and copies have been placed in the Library.

The Government welcome the Procedure Committee's comprehensive report, the first Parliamentary inquiry into the present system since it was set up in 1979. The Select Committee system has been shown to be sound, with no need for major reform. The Committees are making an important contribution to parliamentary scrutiny of the Executive.

The Government welcome and accept most of the recommendations addressed to them by the Procedure Committee. Amendments to standing orders will be brought forward shortly:

—to increase the size of the Education, Science and Arts Committee and empower it to appoint a Sub-Committee to look at science and technology issues;

—to extend select committee scrutiny to matters within the responsibility of the Lord Chancellor's and Law Officers' Departments, including the work of staff provided for the administrative work of courts and tribunals but excluding individual cases and appointments, advice given within government by the Law Officers, and prosecution policy.

The Government welcome the proposed liaison arrangements, aimed at reducing unproductive duplication and overlap between the Public Accounts Committee and the departmental select committees. They accept the recommendations concerning the role of the National Audit Office, subject to understandings designed to ensure that any use made by the departmental select committees of NAO resources does not prejudice the main thrust of the NAO's work for the PAC.

The Government also reaffirm their existing policy to make as much information as possible available to Select Committees. Their approach will continue to be constructive and open within certain well-established conventions which can be justified in the interests of good government.

Lighting (Chamber)

Mr. Page: To ask the Lord President of the Council what arrangements have been made to exhibit prototypes of the proposed new lighting system for the Chamber.

Mr. MacGregor: As is said in paragraph 131 of the First Report of the Select Committee on Broadcasting (HC 11 of Session 1990-91), work has been continuing "to find a suitable design for a new permanent lighting system [for the Chamber] which not only meets the technical specifications for the production of television pictures of broadcastable quality, but which is also aesthetically acceptable".

A suitable design, an illustrative sketch of which was published with the Select Committee's report, has now been produced by the Parliamentary Works Office on the basis of specifications drawn up by the Committee's technical advisers, and, so far as aesthetic considerations are concerned, with the collaboration of English Heritage. Although the latter would have preferred a solution which involved upgrading the existing ceiling lights, detailed camera tests have indicated that such an approach would not have provided illumination of the quality required for broadcasting purposes. English Heritage are, however, content that the proposed design represents an acceptable compromise, given the need, on technical grounds, for some form of suspended lighting.

In order to give the House a proper opportunity to evaluate the appearance of the new lights under operational conditions, it is proposed that a pair of full-size prototypes should be hung in the Chamber from Tuesday 7 May to Friday 17 May inclusive. The prototypes, which will be fully lit for televising purposes, will be accompanied by four of the existing temporary lanterns—the remaining four will be winched up to the ceiling. Trials carried out before the Easter recess have indicated provisionally that it should be possible to achieve the required level of illumination under the permanent system by fitting only six of the proposed new lights.

The points at which the prototypes are hung for demonstration purposes will not necessarily coincide exactly with their eventual permanent positions and there will be some unavoidable asymmetry as between the prototypes and the four existing temporary lights during the two weeks trial period. This will of course be rectified as part of the permanent installation, which, assuming a favourable response to the trial, is expected to take place during the coming summer recess.

The prototypes make use of the most up to date lighting technology, which should provide advantages over the temporary lanterns in two distinct areas. First, the new design allows for the set of tubular strip-lights fitted behind each of the six opaque glass panels forming the hexagonal outer casing of the lamps to be dimmed separately, thus enabling any potential problems of glare for those working in the Galleries to be minimised. Second, the prototypes offer significant gains in energy efficiency, with the result that the total heat output from the six proposed new lights will be only about a quarter of that generated by the eight existing makeshift chandeliers.

Right hon. and hon. Members, and others working within the House, who wish to express a view on the proposed new lights are requested to write to the Clerk of the Select Committee on Broadcasting, Committee Office, House of Commons by 23 May.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Aid Budget

Mr. Wells: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will quantify the contingency reserve within the aid budget for the year April 1991 to March 1992 specifying how much has been allowed and dispensed to date and for what purposes; and if he will give comparable figures for last year's contingency fund referred to in the evidence of the Minister for Overseas Development to the Foreign Affairs Select Committee on 17 April, question 518.

Mrs. Chalker: The contingency reserve within the overseas aid budget for developing countries is part of ODA's internal planning arrangements for the in-year management of the aid programme, and enables the ODA to respond to unforeseen events and changed circumstances. It may be drawn down to augment existing planned development programmes, and supplemented should savings arise. It is also used as necessary to supplement our humanitarian assistance and commence new programmes of development assistance.

For 1991-92, the contingency reserve was initially set at £70 million. Of the total sums committed for Iraqi refugee relief so far this year, totalling £61·5 million, £19·5 million has been drawn from the contingency reserve. Parliamentary approval for expenditure arising from this and other dispositions will be sought as appropriate through the estimates.

For 1990-91, the contingency reserve was initially set at £40 million, of which £14 million was allocated for humanitarian assistance, and £200,000 was allocated to establish a new small enterprise development fund.

Overseas Development Administration (Staff)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in the ODA; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

Mrs. Chalker: I refer the hon. Member to the reply he received from my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State on 29 April.

CIVIL SERVICE

Executive Agencies

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service, pursuant to his answer of 4 December 1990, Official Report, columns 85-86, if he will list in the Official Report, any further units of central Government that are under consideration for agency status, their parent department, and the numbers of staff employed.

Mr. Renton: The current list of activities announced as candidates for agency status, together with their parent departments and staff employed is as follows:

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Management Consultants (Fees)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the total sum paid out in fees by his Department to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The combined expenditure of the diplomatic and aid wings of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office on management consultants in financial years 1986-87 to 1990-91 was as follows:

Year	Amount £
1986-87	68,329
1987-88	257,272
1988-89	62,512
1989-90	182,444
1990-91	115,341

Details for years earlier than 1986-87 are not available.

Budgetary provision for management consultants in 1991-92 is:

Diplomatic wing	41,000
Aid wing	41,200

Chernobyl

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance the Government currently provide to help deal with the aftermath of the 1986 nuclear explosion and fire at the Chernobyl power station; if, in the light of rising projected fatalities, he will increase the technical and medical assistance offered; whether the Government will institute a programme of treating Ukrainian children affected by radiation at United Kingdom facilities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Our ability to offer assistance has been limited by the lack of hard information on the Chernobyl disaster. We hope that the International Atomic Energy Agency report expected soon will clarify matters and provide a basis for effective co-operation: we welcome the appointment by the UN Secretary-General of Miss Joan Anstee as the co-ordinator of UN activity. Meanwhile, we have given some practical help, for example by promoting specialist contacts.

Our reciprocal health agreement with the Soviet Union Government does allow patients from the Soviet Union to be treated here, on the basis of a formal request from the Soviet authorities. So far, they have not approached us over Chernobyl-related cases.

Iraq (Missing Journalists)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has received concerning the three British journalists, Nick Della Casa, Rosanna Della Casa, and Charles Maxwell, who have been reported as missing in Iraq since 23 March.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We are in frequent contact with the families of Mr. and Mrs. Della Casa and Mr. Maxwell and have received numerous inquiries from their many friends and media colleagues, including the BBC.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what action has been taken by his Department in any attempt to trace the three British journalists, Nick Della Casa, Rosanna Della Casa, and Charles Maxwell, who have been reported as missing in Iraq since 23 March;

(2) what information he has concerning the numbers of British journalists, relief workers, or civilians who have been reported as missing in Iraq since the cessation of hostilities; and what action is being taken to trace them.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Since early April, our embassies in the region have been making inquiries about the missing people. We have circulated their descriptions widely, and have asked staff of the Ministry of Defence, relief organisations, British media and the International Committee of the Red Cross to report anything they hear. Iraqi representatives in London and Riyadh have been given their details and asked to check whether their authorities know of their whereabouts.

The only other British national known to be missing is a freelance journalist, Mr. Stephen Paul Kabos, last reported in Jordan. Similar inquiries have been instituted to trace him.

Council of Ministers

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the Official Report a statement of forthcoming business in the European Community Council of Ministers.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The Internal Market Council will meet on 13 May and Ministers will continue discussion of the Commission's proposed programme of work on trans-European networks. There is a possibility of agreement to free outstanding directives on the weights and dimensions of vehicles. Ministers may discuss a draft Directive on insurance company accounts and the second directive on diplomas.

The Foreign Affairs Council will meet on 13-14 May. Ministers will review progress on negotiating a European Economic area with the EFTA countries and may meet their EFTA counterparts in the margins to discuss this. Ministers may consider the Commission's proposals for possible future association arrangements between the Community and its overseas countries and territories, OCTs. Ministers might discuss whether non-European states should participate in the energy charter and review EC-Japan relations including the question of Japanese car exports. Ministers will also consider a report on the possible extension of European Investment bank activities. There will also be a Ministerial session of the inter-governmental conference on political union on 13 and 14 May which will continue examination of the proposals made by the presidency.

The Agriculture Council will meet on 21 and 22 May and Ministers will discuss the 1991 agriculture price fixing proposals, the agricultural aspects of the GATT Uruguay round, bivalve molluscs, and fish hygiene. Ministers may also discuss third country veterinary checks, health rules governing fresh meat, the marketing of EEC accepted plant protection products, milk quotas, food quality designations and organic production standards.

The Development Council will meet on the 27 May and Ministers might discuss the implementation of the pilot phase of the EC investment partners facility for Latin America, Asia and the Mediterranean and consider a Commission proposal for its continuation. Ministers are expected to adopt conclusions on the Community programme for co-financing projects in developing countries with non-governmental organisations and on the use of the counterpart funds resulting from general import programmes and food aid by the governments of developing countries. Ministers may discuss a Commission paper setting out guidelines for the Community and member states concerning the relationship between development cooperation policy, the promotion and defence of human rights, and support for the democratic process in all developing countries.

The Energy Council will meet on 31 May and Ministers are expected to adopt the gas transit directive and will give consideration to proposals on oil crises measures and contingency oil stocks, specific action for vigorous energy efficiency and hot water boilers. Minister may also discuss the proposed energy charter for the development of a pan-European free market in energy.

Diplomatic Immunity

Mr. Michael Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many serious offences were allegedly committed in 1990 by persons entitled to diplomatic immunity; and how many foreign diplomats were withdrawn from their posts in Britain in that year as a result of alleged offences.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Thirty-three alleged serious offences by persons entitled to dipomatic immunity were drawn to the attention of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office in 1990—seven fewer than in 1989. "Serious offences" are defined in accordance with the report to the Foreign Affairs Committee "The Abuse of Diplomatic Immunities and Privileges (1985)" as offences falling into a category which would in certain circumstances attract a maximum penalty of six months or more imprisonment; we are advised that none of the alleged offences would have been likely to attract a custodial sentence. The majority involved drinking and driving and shoplifting.

Six diplomats were withdrawn from their posts in Britain in 1990 following alleged offences, as against 14 in the previous year.

Diplomatic Missions (Parking Fines)

Mr. Michael Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the Official Report the number of unpaid parking fines incurred by each diplomatic mission in London during 1990.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The information is given in the table. The table also includes those international organisations which incurred unpaid fines. The figures may be reduced by late payment.

The total for 1990—6,551—indicates a 16 per cent. reduction over the figure for 1989—7,831—and represents only 6 per cent. of the 1984 figure—108,932, the last to be published before the introduction in May 1985 of the Government's policy on parking by members of diplomatic missions.

We welcome the further reduction in unpaid parking fines that has been achieved during 1990 and appreciate the co-operation of diplomatic missions since the introduction of the parking policy. We shall continue to monitor carefully the level of unpaid fines and bring pressure to bear on diplomatic missions to reduce this still further.

Namibia

Mr. Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking to press the European Commission to resume the protocols with Namibia, suspended following the judgment of the Namibian High Court in respect of Spanish vessels caught illegally fishing in Namibian territorial waters.

Mrs. Chalker: This issue has already been raised in the Committee of Permanent Representatives to the Community at Brussels. We understand that the suspension of talks is only temporary and we look forward to their resumption. I shall pursue in Brussels next week.

WALES

Rail Transport Infrastructure

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what responsibility he has for the rail transport infrastructure in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Rail infrastructure in Wales is the responsibility of British Rail, which operates in accordance with objectives set by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. I maintain close contact with British Rail and with my right hon. and learned Friend on all issues affecting rail services in Wales.

A548

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many times in April 1991 the A548 has been closed between Connah's quay and Queensferry;

(2) when he estimates the Shotton-Connah's quay relief road will be constructed; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he will make a statement on the reasons for the temporary closure of the A548; and what steps are being taken to alleviate the traffic jams;

(4) when he estimates that the A548 Queensferry-Connah's quay trunk road will be open to regular traffic.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The A548 is a county road. These matters are for Clwyd county council as the responsible highway authority.

Health Services (Allocation of Funds)

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what were the funds allocated per head of population for the financial year 1991-92, for each health authority in Wales for (a) contractual health services they will purchase and (b) non-contractual health services, including emergency treatment received by patients outside their resident health authority area.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Revenue allocations to health authorities in 1991-92 are not per capita based nor have they been divided into separate allocations for contractual and non-contractual purposes. Within their overall resources, health authorities have discretion as to the amount they commit to service contracts and the amounts they set aside as contingency reserves to meet the costs of non-contractual referrals and emergencies. It is therefore not possible to provide the information in the form requested.

The 1991-92 revenue allocations represent the first step in the transitional process of moving toward a method of resource allocation to reflect authorities' new roles as purchasers of services for their resident population. They have been funded in 1991-92 on the basis of their residents' use of services—both within and outside their areas. These allocations simply translate the historical distribution of resources from one in which the money flowed direct to service providers, to one in which it flows via district of residence. Eventually, revenue resource allocations will be per capita based, but weighted using a formula taking into account factors such as age, ill health and the cost of providing services in rural areas. The transition is expected to be completed by 1998-99 when each authority will receive its formula share of funds. Details of the new weighted capitation formula and the arrangements for transition were provided in the Secretary of State's reply of 21 March to the hon. Member for Cardiff, North (Mr. Jones).

Health Authorities

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales in which month he will be producing the first annual review of family health services authorities, Welsh Health Common Services Authority and Health Promotion Authority for Wales performance.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Annual reviews of FHSAs, WHCSA, and HPAW performance have been conducted by our officials for some years. In 1991, the FHSA reviews will take place during October and November, and that for HPAW in October. A date for WHCSA's annual review has not yet been fixed.

Health Promotion Authority

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will place in the Library a copy of the approved Health Promotion Authority for Wales plan.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: I have made arrangements to place copies in the Library of the Health Promotion Authority for Wales' plan which I launched on 4 February 1991, entitled "Plans for Action 1 the Way Forward".

Litter

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish the names of the officers appointed by each local authority in Wales with responsibility for issuing £10 fixed penalty fines for dropping litter under the terms of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 and the number of such notices issued since 13 February.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: This information is not held centrally.

Sheep Disease

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many cases of pastrurella haemolytica have been diagnosed among newly born lambs in Wales in each year since 1980;

(2) how many cases of clostordial disease have been diagnosed among unvaccinated sheep in Wales in each year since 1980.

Mr. David Hunt: These diseases are not notifiable and no figures are available for their prevalence.

Management Consultants (Fees)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total sum paid out in fees by his Department to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. David Hunt: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the letter my predecessor sent him on 4 April 1990, a copy of which was placed in the Library of the House. Outturn in 1989-90 is £342,161 and provisional outturn in 1990-91 is £274,629. Budgets for 1991-92 have yet to be finalised.

Welsh Development Agency

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in the Welsh Development Agency; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

Mr. David Hunt: This is an operational matter for the Welsh Development Agency, and I will ask the Chairman to write to the hon. Gentleman.

House Renovation Grants

Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what changes he proposes to make to the test of resources for house renovation grants; and what further guidance he intends to issue to local authorities on the provisions of part VIII of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Regulations uprating the allowances and premiums used to assess the eligibility of applicants for house renovation grants including those to help provide facilities for disabled people came into force today. These changes are in line with the annual uprating applied to other income related benefits on which the test of resources is largely based. The Department's circular 15/91 issued to all local authorities in Wales on 18 April explains the effect of the new regulations and also gives advice on other matters relating to the implementation of the grant regime and area based renovation techniques.

Press and Public Relations Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of his Department.

Mr. David Hunt [holding reply 26 April]: The figures are as follows:

As at 1 April	Complement	Staff in post
1979(-80)	17	15
1980(-81)	17	15
1981(-82)	15	13

1988(-89)	15	13
1989(-90)[1]	17	14
1990(-91)	15	13
1991(-92)	[2]—	15

[1] February.
[2] Since the introduction of delegated budgeting arrangements, the formal complement is no longer the basis for staffing.

Hospital Closures

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list for each health authority in Wales, in respect of (1) mental illness and (2) mental handicap (a) hospitals or wards planned for closure by 1996 for which Welsh Office approval has been given, (b) hospitals or wards for which approval has been sought, (c) hospitals or wards in respect of which closure is projected in the authority's 10-year plan and (d) hospitals or wards in respect of which the authority has otherwise indicated to the Welsh Office that it may seek approval to close, listing in each case the total number of beds available in each hospital or ward and the current level of occupancy.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett [holding answer 29 April]: The William Nicholls home, Cardiff and Llwyn View hospital, Dolgellau are the only proposals for decommissioning with the Secretary of State at this time. The capacity of William Nicholls is 47 beds of which 36 are occupied: the relevant figures for Llwyn View are 32 and 22.

There are no hospitals or wards which have been approved for closure by 1996, which are still open.

As regards future plans, it is envisaged, under the all-Wales mental illness and mental handicap strategies, that more appropriate patterns of local services will continue to be developed over the next decade and more. As a result, some existing wards and hospitals will be closed. However, plans are under development and no further firm plans for closure are before the Secretary of State at this time.

PRIME MINISTER

VAT

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Prime Minister if he will put in hand an assessment of the comparative loss of revenue in the sale of home safety equipment free of value added tax and the costs of the treatment of victims of accidents in the home; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: An official estimate of the value added tax accruing on the sale of home safety equipment is not available. The costs of treatment for all accidents in the home are about £300 million per year. The United Kingdom is not permitted under the EC sixth VAT directive to introduce any new zero rates.

Olympic Games

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Prime Minister what specific steps he and the Government will be taking in support of the Manchester Olympic Committee's bid to stage the Olympic Games; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The Government wish Manchester every success in its attempt to bring the 2000 Olympics to Britain. My hon. Friend the Minister for Sport is ready to discuss with those concerned how best the Government can help to promote the bid.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Education and Library Boards

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the level of funding to each of the five education and library boards in Northern Ireland in each financial year since 1 April 1986.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information is as follows:

Financial allocations to education and library boards

Lough Foyle

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what information he has as to the increase in the surface area of Lough Foyle at high spring tides due to the erosion of land over the last 30 years or such other period for which measurements exist, with special reference to the coastline between Magilligan point and the mouth of the River Roe.

Mr. Hanley: The information is not presently available, except at disproportionate cost.

Health Boards and Councils

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the members of the health and social services boards and the health and social services area councils indicating in respect of each the original nominating person or body; and whether there was consultation at any stage in respect of each such member with the Government of the Irish Republic.

Mr. Hanley: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the replies given to the hon. Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor) on 15 April and 25 April 1991, Official Report, Vol. 189, columns 84-85 and column 528.

It is not normal practice to disclose whether any views have been put forward on the composition of individual public bodies under article 6 of the Anglo-Irish Agreement.

Management Consultants

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the total sum paid out in fees by his Department to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information for 1979-80 to 1983-84 is available throughout Northern Ireland Departments and the Northern Ireland Office only at disproportionate cost. Information for the years 1984-85 to date and the budget for 1991-92 is as follows:

1984-85	2,352,311
1985-86	2,427,200
1986-87	2,742,192
1987-88	3,363,213

Electricity Industry

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland by what means he proposes to change the ownership of the electricity industry in Northern Ireland; what representations he has received opposing such proposals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: Draft legislation to effect the privatisation has been issued for consultation. The White Paper issued previously proposes that the industry's transfer to the private sector will take place in two stages; the sale of the four power stations by competitive tender followed by a flotation of the remainder of Northern Ireland Electricity's business.

I have received representations opposing privatisation from three local authorities, the trade unions and a member of the public.

I believe that the Government's proposals for privatisation will lead to a more efficient electricity industry.

ENERGY

Domestic Energy Consumption

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is the percentage of domestic gas consumption which is used in space heating, refrigeration, water heating, drying and cooking, respectively.

Mr. Wakeham: An estimated breakdown of domestic gas consumption by end use for 1990 is given in the table:

End use	Percentage
Space heating	69
Water heating	22
Cooking	6
Other[1]	3

End use	Percentage
Total	100

[1] Other includes gas fridges, wash boilers, tumble driers, drying cabinets, pokers, boiling rings and lighting.

Electricity Pylons

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what research his Department has commissioned or published in the last 10 years in respect of the health effects of electromagnetic radiation from electricity pylons.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Research into whether electric and magnetic fields at power frequencies—that is, 50 or 60Hz—create a hazard to human health has been going on worldwide for more than 10 years. However, the National Radiological Protection Board has advised that, to date, the findings of such research have been inconclusive.

The National Grid Company funds a substantial portion of the current research in the United Kingdom, much of which has been undertaken by independent laboratories at various universities and a teaching hospital. My Department maintains close liaison with the Department of Health, which takes the lead within government on possible hazards to health from electromagnetic fields. It does not itself commission or publish research into the health effects of electric and magnetic fields.

British Wind Energy Association

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether his Department was represented at the annual conference of the British Wind Energy Association held at University college Swansea between 10 and 12 April.

Mr. Moynihan: Yes. One official from my Department and three from the energy technology support unit, which manages the Department's renewable energy programme, attended. Both the Department and ETSU gave papers and many of the technical papers covered work undertaken within our research and development programme. The Department was one of the sponsors of the conference and had a stand in the exhibition.

Management Consultants

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what was the total sum paid out in fees by his Department to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Wakeham: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to him on 12 March 1990, Official Report, at column 5.

The actual expenditure in 1989-90 and 1990-91 and the estimated expenditure in 1991-92 is in the table.

Financial year	£
1989-90	6,317
1990-91	14,683
1991-92	22,000

British Coal Board

Mr. Eadie: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will state the contract length of the recent appointments approved by Secretary of State to the board of British Coal; if he will list the names of the individuals; and what is their annual salary.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The names and salaries of those recently appointed to the board of British Coal are as follows:

Mr. John Neil Clarke (Chairman)	225,000
Mr. John Henry Northard, CBE	125,000
Mr. Malcolm John Edwards, CBE	95,000
Mr. Albert Wheeler, CBE	95,000
Mr. Michael Howard Butler	90,000
Dr. Kenneth Moses, CBE	90,000
Mr. Kevan Hunt	85,000

All these appointments are for a period of two years except for Mr. Northard's, whose contract is for a year, and the chairman's, which is for a five-year period. Mr. Clarke's salary includes an element in lieu of pension since his appointment is not pensionable.

Rural Electricity Supplies

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the proposals by the chairman of the Rural Development Commission to invite the Department of Energy to consider funding a scheme of assistance for mains electricity connection for households in remote rural areas.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I am considering the Rural Development Commission's proposals in the light of the provisions already made in the Electricity Act 1989 relating to new connections, and expect shortly to respond to the chairman.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Agricultural Support

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will show the overall cost of agricultural support, national and EC, in (a) the United Kingdom as a percentage of gross domestic product of the United Kingdom and (b) the EC as a percentage of gross domestic product of the EC, for each of the years 1961, 1973 and 1990.

Mr. Curry: The information requested for the United Kingdom is as follows. I regret that the corresponding information for the EC is not readily available.

	1961-62	1973-74	1990-91
Expenditure on agricultural support (£ million)	263	392	[1]1,958
Expenditure on agricultural support as a percentage of gross domestic product	1·00	0·52	0·36

[1] Forecast.

Codex Alimentarius Commission

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will outline his policy on the selection of United Kingdom representatives to attend meetings of the Codex Alimentarius Commission and its committees.

Mr. Maclean: Codex Alimentarius Commission meetings are inter-governmental technical discussions and United Kingdom delegations to them are led by officials who have the appropriate responsibilities within Departments. Representatives from other organisations such as industry or consumer organisations are invited where appropriate to join the delegation in an advisory capacity.

Management Consultants (Fees)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total sum paid out in fees by his Department to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Curry: The annual costs of fees paid by the Department to management consultants, excluding computer consultants, since 1984-85 are set out in the table. Data for earlier years can only be provided at disproportionate cost.

Under decentralised budgeting arrangements in MAFF, there is no central provisions for such consultancies in 1991-92 and any which are commissioned will have to be funded from the general running cost allocations of the units concerned. Decisions will therefore be taken as necessary during the year.

Financial year	Expenditure £
1984-85	27,110
1985-86	174,724
1986-87	135,279
1987-88	44,015
1988-89	162,114
1989-90	143,150
1990-91	129,817

Milk Marketing

Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about reform of milk marketing arrangements in England.

Mr. Gummer: I welcome the Milk Marketing Board for England and Wales' decision to seek an early and orderly change to more flexible and competitive milk marketing arrangements. I hope that it will continue to press ahead quickly with proposals for transforming itself to co-operative status and will now bring the dairy trade and other interested parties into its discussions.

The Government share the board's view that change is necessary, but we all agree that such change must be orderly. I must therefore emphasise that until alternative arrangements are agreed and put in place the existing milk marketing scheme continues in force. I will continue to sustain its proper and reliable operation within the present framework of European and domestic law, and will work with the board and the European Commission to prevent its being undermined by artificial contractual arrangements. The growth of such arrangements illustrates the pressures facing the statutory scheme and the need for the modalities of change to be decided quickly. They must not be a means of evading the present legislation to the detriment of the industry as a whole.

Consumer Panel

Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about the work of the consumer panel.

Mr. Maclean: My right hon. Friend announced on 2 November 1989, Official Report, Vol. 159, c. 317-18, that he was setting up the consumer panel in order to improve the dialogue between the Ministry and consumers and to allow consumers the opportunity to play a more effective role in the formulation of food policy. In the period to 31 March 1991, the panel has met five times. The minutes of its meetings and all papers submitted to it are publicly available on request and are routinely circulated to over 100 parties. Its agenda are published before each meeting. Senior officials of both MAFF and the Department of Health have attended its meetings, which I have chaired.

The panel has been anxious to examine the procedures for making sure that food is safe. It has looked at the work of five of the expert committees which assist Departments and has probed the representation of consumer interests on these committees and within MAFF. It has also discussed risk assessment and the Department of Health's food hazard warning system. Research and development has been the theme of one meeting and the panel visited MAFF's food science laboratory to see its work at first hand. The panel has emphasised the need for increased consumer education with information published in readily assimilable form; and for full weight to be given to consumer concerns. This work continues.

It has also been anxious to ensure that as much information as possible should be freely available. This has been a recurrent subject during the panel's discussions as well as being specifically discussed on one occasion. The wide availability of panel papers itself contributes to the information put into the public domain. At a meeting earlier this month, I was able to report a number of changes in procedures intended to make more information publicly available and to make access easier.

In addition, panel members have raised a number of issues causing them concern:

BSE;
food irradiation;
water quality;
the production and regulation of compound animal feeds
the handling of frozen food in retail outlets;
the use of pesticides in potato production in Northern Ireland;
the need to encourage better nutrition;
food safety enforcement standards.

In addition, the panel has discussed matters which were of current interest at the time of meetings such as, the use of cling film, food labelling, the training of food handlers and the so-called "Fourth Hurdle" initiative within the European Parliament.

At its request, the Ministry and the Department of Health have also produced brief notes summarising Departments' aims in relation to food safety.

I have consulted the panel on a number of specific issues on which a consumer input was particularly useful in determining the course to follow:

the labelling of cheese made from unpasteurised milk;
advice to consumers on the use of saccharin;
advice to consumers on the intake of vitamin A;
consumer information programmes.

I am grateful to panel members for the time they have given. Their questioning has led us to re-examine departmental practices and thinking and they have widened the range of views which go into the formulation of policy. I have found these discussions very worthwhile.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Scientific Researchers

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make a statement on the progress made towards modifying career opportunities for scientific researchers following the publication of the first report from the Education, Science and Arts Committee on "Science Policy: the European Dimension" in December 1990.

Mr. Alan Howarth: This report is currently under consideration by the Government and a response will be made as soon as possible.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he next intends to meet representatives of the Association of Researchers in Medicine and Science Ltd. to discuss the career structures of scientific researchers.

Mr. Alan Howarth: I have agreed to meet representatives of this association and my officials are in touch with their representatives with a view to fixing a date.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make it his policy (a) to offer accreditation to scientific researchers with a proven track record and (b) to reallocate funding in accordance with the development of a national career structure for scientific researchers.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The recruitment and career structure of scientific researchers are a matter for the employing institutions and research councils. For its part, the Government have provided substantial funding to the higher education funding councils for restructuring and new appointments of academic staff.

Salaries

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list by university and polytechnic the salaries of each director, principal, rector or vice-chancellor in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Alan Howarth: No. This information is not available to the Department.

Work Placements

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what percentage of (a) university and (b) polytechnic students undertook work placements as part of their academic courses for each year since 1976;

(2) what percentage of students undertook work placements as part of their courses at (a) each university and (b) each polytechnic in the United Kingdom in each year since 1976.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Information on universities is contained in the annual publication "University Statistics—Volume One—Students and Staff" published by the universities' statistical record. The numbers of students in each university and the numbers on sandwich courses for the academic years 1980-81 and 1989-90 are given in table 12. The numbers of sandwich course students in earlier years were published in "Statistics of Education—Volume 6—Universities" published by the University Grants Committee.

The above publications are available in the Library.

The numbers of students on sandwich courses in English polytechnics, as expressed as a proportion of total full-time and sandwich course enrolments, for the years 1976-77 to 1989-90 are shown in table 1 below. Data on the numbers and percentages of students on sandwich courses in each polytechnic in England for the years 1987-88 to 1989-90 are shown in table 2.

Science Teaching

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met representatives from (a) Save British Science and (b) the National Conference of University Professors to discuss the teaching of science within the education system.

Mr. Eggar: I have not met representatives from either of these organisations to discuss the teaching of science within the education system.

Management Consultants (Fees)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the total sum paid out in fees by his Department to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Eggar: The information requested is as follows:

1984-85	[1]40
1985-86	18
1986-87	23
1987-88	255
1988-89	165
1989-90	377
1990-91	[2]464
1991-92	[3]259

[1] Estimated.
[2] Estimate.
[3] Budget.
Note: Information for earlier years could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

Music Teaching

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps he will take to secure the continuity of the provision of music teaching services by local education authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: The Government have no power to direct the way in which local education authorities plan their services within the resources available to them. We do, however, attach great value to the music support services, both for their intrinsic worth and because of their potential to contribute to the delivery of music within the national curriculum.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Income Tax

Mr. Forman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the level of taxable income at which a 50 per cent. rate of income tax would need to be introduced in order to raise £750 million and £1,000 million, respectively.

Mr. Maude: If the tax bands proposed for 1991-92 were amended so that tax was charged at 50 per cent. on taxable income above £90,000, the additional yield of income tax for 1991-92 would be about £750 million. The corresponding level of taxable income for an additional yield of £1 billion would be £69,000. Taxable income is after deducting reliefs and allowances.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the number of taxpayers who have incomes below (a) £3,500 a year, (b) £4,000 a year,

(c) £4,500 a year, (d) £5,000 a year and (e) £5,500 a year, giving figures separately for individuals and married couples.

Mr. Maude: The information requested is as follows:

Estimated numbers of taxpayers 1990-91

Thousands

	Single people	Husbands	Wives
Income below
£3,500	230	0	350
£4,000	620	0	670
£4,500	1,110	0	990
£5,000	1,520	60	1,300
£5,500	1,940	190	1,590

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the effect on tax revenues in 1991-92 and in a full year of the introduction of a reduced rate band of income tax at 23 per cent. on the first (a) £1,000 and (b) £2,000 of taxable income.

Mr. Maude: The direct revenue costs in a full year at 1991-92 levels of income are estimated to be (a) £500 million and (b) £950 million.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the effect on tax revenues in 1992-93 and in a full year of indexing income tax personal allowances in line with earnings rather than prices, based upon current forecasts for earnings and inflation.

Mr. Maude: This will depend on real earnings growth in the period December 1990 to December 1991.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table estimating the tax benefit of the personal use of a company car for a married man with a non-earning wife with earnings of £40,000 per annum, assuming that the car is under four years old and its original market value is £18,000, with average business mileage in 1991-92.

Mr. Maude: For a car with original market value of less than £19,250 and average business mileage, the tax due from a higher rate taxpayer on the car benefit scale charges proposed for 1991-92 are in the table.

Car engine size	Tax (£)
1400cc or less	820
1401 to 2000cc	1,060
2001cc or more	1,700

Income Tax

Mr. Battle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the effect on Treasury revenues in 1991-92 of introducing higher rate bands of income tax equal to 45 per cent. on taxable incomes from £30,200 to £36,700 and 50 per cent. on taxable incomes over £36,700.

Mr. Maude: The yield in a full year at 1991-92 levels of income of introducing the rates of income tax shown in the table is estimated to be about £1 billion.

Taxable income £	Rate percentage
1 to 23,700	25
23,700 to 30,200	40
30,200 to 36,700	45
36,700 and over	50

Taxable income is income subject to tax from all sources after deducting allowances and reliefs. The estimate does not take account of the consequential effect on capital gains tax nor does it allow for any behavioural effects that might result from such an increase.

Married Couple's Allowance

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the effect on tax revenues in 1991-92 and in a full year of allowing all married couples to split the married couple's allowance between them as they choose.

Mr. Maude: About £10 million in a full year at 1991-92 income levels.

Investment Income

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the effect on Treasury revenues in 1991-92 and in a full year of introducing a 9 per cent. surcharge on the investment income of non-pensioners, subject to a £3,000 exemption.

Mr. Maude: Such a surcharge of 9 per cent. on the investment income of individuals aged under 65 would yield about £950 million in a full year at 1991-92 levels of income.

Tax Revenue Ready Reckoner

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will update the tax revenue ready reckoner published in the 1990 autumn statement in the light of Budget changes.

Mr. Maude: Updated estimates are given in the table.

[1] The estimated revenue effects of changes in the basic rate of income tax in the main allowances of 10 per cent. are rounded to the nearest £25 million; other effects over £50 million are rounded to the nearest £5 million; effects of less than £50 million are rerounded to the nearest £1 million. The extent of rounding reflects the desire to avoid undue compounding of its effects when numbers are pro-rated, rather than the accuracy of the estimates. The figures for income tax changes include consequential effects on the yield of capital gains tax. Changes are assumed to take effect from April 1991.
[2] Including the effect of the change on receipts of advance corporation tax and on consequent liability to mainstream corporation tax.
[3] Allowances for those aged 65-74 and those aged 75 and over.
[4] Figures include revenue effects of changing additional personal allowance and widow's bereavement allowance by £100.
[5] Percentage changes are calculated with reference to 1990-91 levels.
[6] Assessment to corporation tax normally related to the preceding year. These estimates are, therefore, the changes to revenue that would occur if the changed rates were applied to incomes from 1 April 1990.
[7] These figures ignore effects arising from the imputation system.

Shareholders

Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the change in the number of shareholders since 1979.

Mr. Maude: The latest Treasury and stock exchange survey carried out in January and February 1991 shows that 25 per cent. of the adult population (over 11 million) now own shares compared with an estimate of 7 per cent. of the adult population owning shares in 1979.

Management Consultants (Fees)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total sum paid out in fees by Her Majesty's Treasury to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: For 1979-80 and each ensuing year up to 1988-89, I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given on 14 March 1990 at column 277, by my hon. Friend the then Economic Secretary. The fees paid in 1989-90 were £2,778,613, in 1990-91 fees paid amounted to £2,715,831, and the budget for 1991-92 is £3,587,516.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has any plans to remove value added tax from sales of contact lenses and spectacles.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: No. This would be contrary to EC law.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list those items which are currently subject to a 17·5 per cent. rate of VAT which were historically subject to the 25 per cent. purchase tax levy.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: A list of the principal goods subject to purchase tax at 25 per cent. (all of which now attract VAT at 17·5 per cent.) can be found in the 64th annual report of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise for the year ending 31 March 1973, pages 120 and 121. A copy is available in the House of Commons library.

Customs and Excise (Staff)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in Her Majesty's Customs and Excise; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The available information on the numbers of staff in the tariff and statistical office of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise is shown in the following schedule. In addition, one statistician, supported by two administrative staff, is employed in the budget and central unit. I regret that detailed historical figures on the latter are not available.

Earnings (Taxation)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list for 1991-92 those ranges of earnings within which the burden of income tax plus national insurance is less than in 1978-79.

Mr. Maude: The burden of income tax plus national insurance will be less in 1991-92 than it was in 1978-79 at all levels of real earnings.

Death Duties

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the cost to the Exchequer in 1991-92 and in a full year of the provision whereby a will may be rewritten after death to minimise tax liability to the estate.

Mr. Maude: Information is not available on which to base an estimate of the total cost to the Exchequer. The cost in 1991-92 for those cases in which property is redirected by an instrument of variation from a tax-paying beneficiary to a surviving spouse, or to a charity or heritage is about £30 million.

Medical Insurance (Tax Relief)

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his forecast for the cost to the Exchequer in 1991-92 and in a full year of tax relief for private medical insurance premiums for persons aged over 60 years.

Mr. Maude: The direct revenue cost in respect of tax liabilities for 1991-92 is estimated to be about £60 million.

Inheritance Tax

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the effect on Treasury revenues in 1991-92 and in a full year of replacing inheritance tax with an indexed regime of capital transfer tax on the same basis as that which preceded the 1986 Budget.

Mr. Maude: It is estimated that replacing inheritance tax with an indexed 1985-86 regime of capital transfer tax would increase Government revenues by:

	£ million
In 1991-92	260
In a full year	710

These estimates are based on the estimated value of taxable estates passing on death in 1991-92 under existing rules and make no allowance for any impact which the indexed 1985-86 regime would have on the level of taxable estates. It has not been possible to estimate the effect of the different ways in which lifetime transfers are taxed under the two regimes.

Uncollected Tax

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish figures showing, for 1989-90 or the most recent available estimate, the amount of tax which remained uncollected by the Inland Revenue at the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 30 April 1991]: These figures are produced for the Inland Revenue's accounting year, to 31 October, rather than on a fiscal year basis.

The Inland Revenue's provisional figure for the amount of tax which remained uncollected at the end of October 1990 is £6·1 billion.

All but a small proportion of the tax uncollected at the end of each account is subsequently collected, much of it with interest added.

Capital Gains Tax

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his forecast for the number of individuals who will be liable to capital gains tax at the higher rate in 1990-91 and 1991-92.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 30 April 1991]: Current estimates of the number of capital gains taxpayers on disposals made in 1990-91 and 1991-92 are 100,000 and 120,000 respectively. Of these figures, about 60 per cent. in both years are estimated to be individuals paying capital gains tax at the higher rate of 40 per cent. on at least part of their taxed gains.

Unleaded Fuel

Dr. Marek: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the latest figures for the percentage of unleaded fuel deliveries to garage forecourts.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 30 April 1991]: At 14 April 1991, 40·27 per cent. of deliveries to garage forecourts were of unleaded petrol.

Personal Equity Plans

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will estimate the effect on Treasury revenues in 1991-92 and in a full year of reducing the investment limit for all new personal equity plans to £3,000;

(2) if he will estimate the cost to the Exchequer in 1991-92 of personal equity plans, giving separately figures for relief at the higher and basic rates of tax.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 30 April 1991]: The cost of income tax relief of personal equity plans is estimated as £45 million in 1991-92. The cost in 1991-92 will depend on take-up. Separate figures for higher rate and basic rate relief are not available.

If the investment limit for new personal equity plans had been limited to £3,000 in 1990-91, the cost would have been lower by about £3 million in that year.

Tax Allowances

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will publish a table showing the yield of restricting (i) the personal tax allowance, (ii) the married couple's allowance, (iii) the age allowances and (iv) the major tax reliefs to the basic rate of tax in 1991-92;

(2) if he will estimate the effect on Treasury revenues in 1991-92 of limiting all tax reliefs and allowances, apart from personal allowances, to the basic rate of tax, where available giving separate figures for different reliefs.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 30 April 1991]: The latest estimates of the direct revenue yields in a full year with the proposed 1991-92 levels of allowances and tax rates are as follows:

	£ million
Personal tax allowances (excluding married couples allowance)	980
Married couple's allowance	340
Age allowances[1]	Nil
Relief on contributions to personal pensions[2]	[3]150
Relief on employee's contributions to occupational pension schemes	250

[1] The higher levels of the age-related personal and married couple's allowances given to those aged 65 and over subject to the income limit.

[2] Including relief for retirement annuity premia and free standing additional voluntary contributions.

[3] This estimate is subject to a wide margin of error.

The direct revenue yield from restricting all reliefs and allowances to the basic rate is likely to be of the order of £2,200 million, somewhat more than the sums of the yields from restricting the reliefs and allowances separately; this is due to the cumulative effect of bringing more people into higher rate tax. No account has been taken of possible behavioural changes resulting from such a restriction.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many additional individuals would be liable to income tax at the higher rate in 1991-92 if all reliefs and allowances, apart from personal tax allowances, were limited to the basic rate of tax.

Mr. Maude: About 200,000 additional individuals would be liable to income tax at the higher rate compared with the number so liable under the Budget proposals.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Telecommunications Equipment

10. Mr. Day: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will make a statement on the value of British exports of telecommunications and radio equipment in 1989 and 1990.

Mr. Sainsbury: British exports of telecommunications and radio equipment as defined by division 76 of the standard international trade classification were £2,223 million in 1989 and £2,687 million in 1990, an increase of 21 per cent.

Source: Division 76 of the Standard International Trade Classification.

Manufacturing Output

16. Mr. Cunliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to boost manufacturing output.

Mr. Redwood: Manufacturing industry will benefit from the reduction in inflation and from the Government's policies to create a climate in which enterprise and wealth creation can flourish, especially through lower business taxation and market opening measures.

Recession

19. Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has recently received from British industry about the recession.

Mr. Lilley: I continue to receive representations from British industry supporting the Government's determination to defeat inflation, thereby creating the conditions for a resumption of sustainable economic growth.

28. Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he next plans to meet representatives of the CBI to discuss the recession in industry in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Lilley: I expect to meet Sir Brian Corby, president of the CBI, on 15 May 1991.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he next plans to meet representatives of the Retail Consortium to discuss the effect of the recession in industry.

Mr. Lilley: I am next due to meet the Retail Consortium in July when I expect a wide range of matters to be discussed. Ministerial colleagues in the Department have also met the consortium in recent weeks.

Kuwait

20. Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what prospects for trade with Kuwait he has identified; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lilley: There are significant opportunities for British exporters in a wide variety of areas in Kuwait, including repair and refurbishment of damaged buildings and infrastructure, the restocking of the distribution system with industrial and consumer items of all kinds, and in the effort to extinguish the burning oil wells and restore oil production.

My Department will continue to do all that it can to assist British companies to secure a substantial share of this business.

Short-Termism

22. Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has any plans to tackle short-termism in British industry.

Mr. Lilley: My views were set out in a speech to the international stock exchange at the Queen Elizabeth II centre on 24 October 1990, a copy of which is in the House of Commons Library.

Multi-Fibre Arrangement

23. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on progress being made to continue the provisions of the multi-fibre arrangement pending resolution of the GATT negotiations.

Mr. Sainsbury: The future of the multi-fibre arrangement pending the conclusion of the Uruguay round is to be addressed by a meeting of the textiles committee in Geneva scheduled for 16 May. The Community has recently begun to discuss the mandate which will guide the Commission in that negotiation.

Holidaymakers (Protection)

24. Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what further protection he is considering giving holidaymakers who pay deposits or full payments in advance of receiving their holiday.

Mr. Leigh: I am currently giving urgent consideration to this matter in the context of the EC package holiday directive, which must be implemented by 31 December 1992. The directive requires, among other things, all tour organisers and/or retailers to show sufficient evidence of security for the refund of consumers' money in the event of insolvency. My Department will be consulting shortly about our proposals for implementing the directive.

Steel Industry (Scotland)

25. Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he last met the chairman of the British Steel Corporation to discuss the company's plans for its Scottish plants.

Mr. Redwood: My right hon. Friend last met the chairman of British Steel on 7 September 1990. Their discussions were confidential.

29. Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any plans to meet the chairman and chief executive of British Steel to discuss the future of steel making in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) in the House earlier today.

Weapons Materials (Export)

26. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what new initiatives he plans to control the export of materials and equipment from Britain that could be used in the manufacture of nuclear, biological and chemical weapons.

Mr. Sainsbury: We continue to work with other like-minded countries to take effective action to prevent the proliferation of chemical, biological and nuclear weapons. Controls on the export of sensitive materials for use for these purposes are kept under continuous review.

Brewing

27. Mr. Crowther: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received about the effect on public house rents of the implementation of the Supply of Beer (Tied Estate) Order 1989.

Mr. Redwood: I have received a large number of representations from pub tenants' associations, individual tenants and Members of Parliament about the effect on public house rents of the Supply of Beer (Tied Estate) Order and other measures introduced by the Government in response to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report on the supply of beer. I recognise that some of the new types of leases being offered by the national brewers may involve higher rents; however, they also offer much greater security of tenure and can provide higher financial rewards as they offer tenants more freedom of choice. The level of rent for individual premises is a matter for commercial negotiation between the brewers and their tenants.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he last met representatives from the National Licensed Victuallers Association to discuss the level of concentration in the brewing industry and non-beer ties between the licensee and the breweries.

Mr. Redwood: I am in regular contact with the National Licensed Victuallers Association. My last meeting with the association was on 9 January this year, when we discussed a range of issues relating to the brewing industry.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make it his policy to ensure that breweries cannot unilaterally extend the scope of their ties with licensees to cover brands not covered at the date when agreements took effect,

Mr. Redwood: Concern about this issue should be made known to the Director General of Fair Trading, who has been given responsibility for monitoring the effectiveness of the measures that the Government have introduced following the Monopolies and Mergers Commission's report on the supply of beer. The director general will also be able to take such concerns into account when he carries out his review of the industry in late 1993 to early 1994.

Telecommunications Policy

30. Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what market response there has been to his statement on telecommunications policy.

Mr. Lilley: Firms have responded positively to the Government's proposals further to liberalise the United Kingdom telecommunications market. A number of firms have expressed their intention to apply for licences to provide significant new telecommunications services, but have not as yet submitted a formal application. Details of applications will shortly be placed on a register for public inspection at the Office of Telecommunications.

Citizens Charter

31. Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress has been made in establishing a citizens' charter for public services.

Mr. Lilley: The revised objectives for my Department which I announced earlier this week commit us to provide a professional, high-quality, accessible and responsive service to business and the community. The executive agencies which cover more than half the staff in the DTI have already been set demanding quality of service targets and we shall be extending this approach wherever possible throughout the Department. Following privatisation and the efforts of OFTEL the quality of telecommunications services is already greatly improved and will improve further as a result of the changes that I announced on 5 March. I attach high priority to the scope for improving the quality of postal services for business and the citizen.

Consumer Products (Safety)

32. Dr. Reid: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he intends to meet trading standards officers to discuss the safety of consumer products.

Mr. Leigh: I have met trading standards officers and members of their representative organisations on several occasions at which safety of consumer products was one of the issues discussed. Officials of my Department keep in regular contact with trading standards officers.

Trade Balance

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will show the crude balance of imports and exports of (a) agriculture overall, (b) cereals and (c) the rest of the non-oil, non-visible trade for the United Kingdom, the European Economic Community, the United States of America, Canada and the Cairns group countries in 1979, 1984 and 1989.

Mr. Sainsbury: The information is in the table. Figures for 1979 are not available.

Crude trade balances in US$ millions

	Agriculture		Cereals		Total visibles excluding oil and agriculture
	1984	1989	1984	1989	1984	1989
United Kingdom	−6,828	−9,002	301	197	−13,507	−37,710
United States of America	16,646	19,082	15,647	14,702	−92,056	−100,869

Management Consultants (Fees)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the total sum paid out in fees by his Department to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Leigh: I refer to the answer which my hon. Friend the former Under-Secretary of State gave to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras on 13 March 1990, at column 173, which covered the years 1979 to 1989. The outturn and provisional outturn figures for 1989-90 and 1990-91 respectively are given in the table:

1989-90	3,168
1990-91	[1]2,771

[1] Provisional.

The budget for management consultancy for 1991-92 has not yet been finalised. These figures do not include fees paid by DTI agencies operating on a net running costs regime.

Defence Exhibition, Birmingham

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the officials from his Department who will be attending the defence component and equipment exhibition at the national exhibition centre, Birmingham, from 14 to 16 May.

Mr. Sainsbury: A number of officials from my Department will be attending the exhibition as part of the normal course of their duties.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assistance the organisers of the defence component and equipment exhibition, due to commence at Birmingham on 14 May, have received from his Department.

Mr. Sainsbury: None, apart from a free entry in the booklet "Trade Fairs in Britain 1991" published jointly by my Department, the British Tourist Authority and the Exhibition Industry Federation. This booklet is circulated widely overseas with a view to attracting overseas buyers to United Kingdom trade fairs.

British Telecom

Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he next intends to meet the chairman of British Telecom to discuss consumer matters.

Mr. Lilley: I have no immediate plans for such a discussion. I do, however, meet the chairman of British Telecom from time to time to discuss a wide range of issues.

Regional Policy

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he intends to propose any new initiatives in the field of regional policy.

Mr. Leigh: No. The Government remain committed to an effective regional policy and we have a range of measures which recognise the special needs of the assisted areas.

ECGD (Short-term Business)

Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what responses he has received to the invitation to tender for the short-term business of the ECGD announced on 5 March.

Mr. Sainsbury: The Government yesterday received responses to the invitation to tender from three companies previously shortlisted to tender for the short-term business of ECGD. The companies are: Assicurazioni Generali, NCM and Trade Indemnity.

There will now be a period of evaluation by the Government and their advisors, with a view to proceeding as quickly as practicable with the sale of the short-term business, subject to the successful passage of the Export and Investment Guarantees Bill through Parliament. Commitment to, and understanding of, the business as well as the financial robustness of the proposed purchaser and the price offered will be among the factors to be taken into account. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State reserves the right to reject any, or all, of the responses and normal competition legislation and procedures will apply to the sale.

Cornish Tin Mining

Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if his Department had any discussions with Carnon Holdings about the effect of the withdrawal of his Department's funds for tin mining on the terms and conditions, including redundancy payments and pension rights, of employees of the company in the consequent run-down and closure of the company's tin mining operations.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 22 April 1991]: The content of the numerous discussions with Carnon Holdings Ltd is confidential. The terms and conditions of employment in Carnon, including redundancy payments and pension rights, are a matter for the company.

ENVIRONMENT

Urban Programme

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will break down the number of projects not approved for the 1991-92 financial year (a) numerically and (b) by cash value for the urban programme in (i) Burnley, (ii) Coventry, (iii) Derby, (iv) Doncaster, (v) Dudley and (vi) the London borough of Greenwich; and what was the percentage of projects not approved for the financial year 1991-92 relating to (1) ethnic minority projects, (2) projects relating to disability, (3) economic developments, and (4) the environment.

Mr. Portillo: I will write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will break down the number of projects not approved for the 1991-92 financial year (a) numerically and (b) by cash value for the urban programme in (i) Kirklees, (ii) Knowsley, (iii) Langbaurgh-on-Tees, (iv) Leeds, (v) Leicester and (vii) Lewisham London borough; and what is the percentage of projects not approved for the financial year 1991-92 relating to (1) ethnic minority projects, (2) projects relating to disability, (3) economic developments and (4) the environment.

Mr. Portillo: I will write to the hon. Member.

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will break down the number of projects not approved for the 1991-92 financial year (a) numerically and (b) by cash value for the urban programme in (i) Rochdale, (ii) Rotherham, (iii) St. Helens, (iv) Sandwell, (v) Sefton and (vi) Sheffield; and what is the percentage of projects not approved for the financial year 1991-92 relating to (1) ethnic minority projects, (2) projects relating to disability, (3) economic developments and (4) the environment.

Mr. Key [holding answer 22 April 1991]: I will write to the hon. Member.

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will break down the number of projects not approved for the 1991-92 financial year (a) numerically and (b) by cash value for the urban programme in (i) Middlesbrough, (ii) the London borough of Newham, (iii) Nottingham, (iv) Oldham, (v) Plymouth and (vi) Preston; and if he will indicate the percentage of projects not approved for the financial year 1991-92 relating to (1) ethnic minority projects, (2) projects relating to disability, (3) economic developments and (4) the environment.

Mr. Key [holding answer 19 April 1991]: I will write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide a breakdown of the number of projects not approved for the 1991-92 financial year (a) numerically and (b) by cash value for the urban programme in (i) Halton, (ii) Hammersmith, (iii) Haringey, (iv) Hartlepool, (v) Kensington and Chelsea and (vi) Kingston upon Hull; and what was the percentage of projects not approved for the financial year 1991-92 relating to (1) ethnic minority projects, (2) projects relating to disability, (3) economic developments and (4) the environment.

Mr. Portillo [holding answer 22 April 1991]: I will write to the hon. Member.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will break down the number of projects not approved for the 1991-92 financial year (a) numerically and (b) by cash value for the urban programme in (i) Wandsworth London borough, (ii) Wigan, (iii) Wirral, (iv) Wolverhampton and (v) The Wrekin; and what is the percentage of projects not approved for the financial year 1991-92 relating to (i) ethnic minority projects, (ii) projects relating to disability, (iii) economic developments and (iv) the environment.

Mr. Portillo: I will write to the hon. Member.

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will break down the number of projects not approved for the 1991-92 financial year (a) numerically and (b) by cash value for the urban programme in (i) South Tyneside, (ii) Southwark London borough, (iii) Stockton-on-Tees, (iv) Sunderland, (v) Tower Hamlets London borough and (vi) Walsall; and what is the percentage of projects not approved for the financial year 1991-92 relating to (1) ethnic projects, (2) projects relating to disability, (3) economic developments and (4) the environment.

Mr. Key: I will write to the hon. Member.

Water Consumption

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the annual consumption of water for industrial, agricultural, and domestic purposes for the past decade; what is the average annual capacity, from all sources, of water reserves in the United Kingdom; and what forecasts there are for future water consumption in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Baldry: The information that is held centrally is published annually for the Government statistical service in the "Digest of Environmental Protection and Water Statistics". The National Rivers Authority's March 1991 report "Demands and Resources of Water Undertakers in England and Wales" is also relevant. Both documents have been placed in the Library of the House.

Conifers

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will make a statement pursuant to his Department's consultation letter of 15 June 1990 entitled "Conifer Planting in the English Uplands-Industrial Pennines."

Mr. Trippier: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Gedling (Mr. Mitchell) on 23 April. [Official Report, columns 390-91].

Unfit Dwellings

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table of the most recent available data showing the number of unfit dwellings in each local authority area in England in the categories (a) unfit local authority properties, (b) unfit housing association properties, (c) unfit public sector properties, other than local authority owned, and (d) unfit private sector properties, other than housing association owned.

Sir George Young: Local authorities report the number of unfit dwellings in their own stock, and estimates of those owned by other public sector bodies, housing association, and privately owned in their annual housing investment programme returns, HIP1. The available figures for 1 April 1990 appear in "1990 HIP1 All Items Print", columns A31, A32, A33, and A34 respectively a copy of which is in the Library.

Management Consultants (Fees)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total sum paid out in fees by his Department to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Heseltine: For the years 1979-80 to 1987-88 I refer the hon. Member to the reply he was given on 13 March 1989, Official Report columns 91-92. Following is the information relating to 1988-89 onwards:

	£ million
1988-89	[1]9·5
1989-90	16·3
1990-91	[2]10·0
1991-92	[3]8·3

[1] Final outturn.
[2] Provisional outturn.
[3] Provisional budget.

The 1991-92 figure excludes PSA services, because its budget has yet to be finalised.

Archaeological Service

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he intends to take to ensure the continued provision of an effective archaeological service to the capital.

Sir George Young: The Department of the Environment's strategy for handling archaeology within the planning system is detailed in the recently published planning policy guidance note 16 "Archaeology and Planning". It describes the role of English Heritage, in advising local planning authorities in London and the important part it plays in protecting important archaeological remains. English Heritage has announced measures to strengthen existing arrangements for providing planning advice to the London boroughs. In addition, the Museum of London has recently announced new arrangements which will enable it to continue to provide a valuable archaeological service, particularly to developers.

I am confident that the strengthened service which English Heritage will provide and the complementary service to be provided by the Museum of London will ensure that an effective archaeological service is provided to the capital.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has had with English Heritage about its plans to withdraw funding from the Museum of London's archaeological service from April 1991.

Sir George Young: I am aware of the discussions which have taken place between English Heritage, and the Museum of London about English Heritage's proposals to change the method of funding the museum's archaeological services. English Heritage intends to convert the establishment grants presently paid to the museum to project funding in line with the project based system of archaeological funding which exists throughout the rest of the country. The conversion of the establishment grants to project funding will take place gradually over a four year period, 1991-95, and English Heritage has offered flexibility in funding during this period to help with any immediate difficulties. English Heritage has indicated to the museum that it anticipates providing funding in excess of £1 million in 1991-92 and approximately £1 million in 1992-93 and 1993-94. These new funding arrangements are designed to provide better value for money from public funds spent on archaeology and to provide continued support for the museum of London's work on archaeology.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has had with English Heritage about its plans to set up an in-house archaeological town planning advice service; and whether English Heritage has sought any additional funding to cover the cost of setting up this service.

Sir George Young: I have been kept informed about the plans of English Heritage to strengthen the provision of archaeological advice which it provides to London boroughs and which reflect the approach which operates very successfully in other parts of the country. English Heritage is continuing discussions with the London boroughs, the museum of London and other interested parties about the operation of the proposed new arrangements.

English Heritage has not sought any additional Government funding in respect of the proposed new arrangements.

Countryside Commission (Staff)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in the Countryside Commission; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

Mr. Trippier: There are no statistical divisions or designated statistical posts in the Countryside Commission.

Nature Conservancy Council (Staff)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in the Nature Conservancy Council; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

Mr. Trippier: There were no statistical divisions in the Nature Conservancy Council nor are there any in the Nature Conservancy Council for England.

Ordnance Survey (Staff)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in the Ordnance Survey; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

Mr. Baldry: The Ordance Survey has no statistical divisions in its organisation, nor does it employ statisticians.

Branch Hill, Hampstead

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received in respect of the proposed development at Branch hill, Hampstead; and if he will call in the various proposals for his determination.

Sir George Young: Some 70 representations have been received from local residents last year and a few this year. An article 14 direction was placed on the site on 10 January 1990 requiring Camden to refer any proposals to the Secretary of State should it be minded to deem itself planning permission. This direction remains in force. Consideration will be given to calling-in the proposals should the council decide to deem itself planning permission.

Home Renovation Grants

Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what changes he proposes to make to the test of resources for house renovation grants; and what further guidance is to be given to local authorities on the provisions of part VIII of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989.

Mr. Yeo: Regulations uprating the allowances and premiums used to assess the eligibility of applicants for house renovation grants, including those to help provide facilities for disabled people, came into force today. These changes are in line with the annual uprating applied to other income related benefits on which the test of resources is based. Departmental circular 5/91, which was published on 24 April, explains the effect of the new regulations and gives advice on other matters relating to the implementation of parts VII and VIII of the 1989 Act.

Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Pollution (Report)

Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will publish the annual report of Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution for 1989-90.

Mr. Trippier: Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution published its third annual report covering 1989-90 yesterday. Copies have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by his Department in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Heseltine [holding answer 30 April]: The total sums paid out by my Department in fees to outside organisations for work resulting in privatisation since 1986-87 are shown below. My Department made no such payments in the years 1979-80 to 1985-86. The costs of the proposed privatisation of PSA services, including fees paid to advisers, will be reported to Parliament after the sale is completed and are not included here.

Year	£ million
1986-87	[1]1·1
1987-88	[1]0·6
1988-89	[1]5·1
1989-90	133·8
1990-91	9·4
1991-92	[2]4·5

[1] Figures for these three years include expenditure on behalf of the Welsh Office which was not accounted for separately.

Biscombe's Lane, Callington

Mr. Robert Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment following the interim reply of the former Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory), of 7 September 1990, to the initial approach of the hon. Member for Cornwall, South-East in August 1990 and the subsequent letters of the hon. Member for Cornwall, South-East on 25 October 1990, 6 November 1990 and 11 February, when he expects to provide a considered reply to the issue of the value of Biscombe's lane, Callington.

Mr. Key [holding answer 30 April 1991]: My noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State has done so today.

Local Authority Housing

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is the difference between the target and the actual management and maintenance allowances set for the London borough of Southwark for 1991-92;

(2) what is the level of the total target management and maintenance allowance for the London borough of Southwark's housing revenue account for 1991-92;

(3) what is the actual figure per property for the London borough of Southwark's management and maintenance allowance for 1991-92;

(4) what is the level of the total management and maintenance allowance set for the London borough of Southwark's housing revenue account for 1991-92.

Mr. Yeo [holding answer 30 April 1991]: For any local housing authority, the allowance made in housing revenue account subsidy for management and maintenance in 1991-92 is determined partly by reference to a score that compares one authority's needs with another and partly by reference to their allowance for the previous year. By this means we are progressively introducing a redistribution, or targeting, of subsidy.

Final figures will depend upon statistics collected at the end of the financial year. The London borough of Southwark estimates that for 1991-92:

(i) the allowance per dwelling would be £1,286·46 if calculated solely by reference to relative scores (£73,328,220 in total)
(ii) the actual allowance per dwelling will be £1,051·27 (£59,922,380 in total), so that
(iii) the difference would be £235·19 per dwelling (£13,405,840 in total).

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list (a) the target and (b) the actual management and maintenance allowances per dwelling set for each of the inner London boroughs' housing revenue accounts for 1991-92.

Mr. Yeo [holding answer 30 April 1991]:

Housing Revenue Account Subsidy 1991-92—M&M Allowances

	Target allowance per dwelling if calculated solely by relative scores	Actual allowance per dwelling after allowing for damping of redistribution
City of London	2,149·87	2,365·30
Camden	1,950·33	1,565·72
Newham	1,232·32	992·14
Hackney	1,459·12	1,200·02
Hammersmith and Fulham	—	—
Islington	1,572·98	1,087·47
Kensington and Chelsea	1,574·10	1,546·49
Lambeth	1,514·96	1,374·47
Lewisham	1,284·00	1,117·39
Southwark	1,286·46	1,051·27
Tower Hamlets	1,370·62	1,451·23
Wandsworth	1,394·51	1,197·93
Westminster	1,774·54	1,735·60

The above data were taken from subsidy claims for 1991-92 submitted by local authorities. The London borough of Hammersmith and Fulham has yet to submit a claim.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the supervision and management element of the target management and maintenance allowance will be based on calculated need rather than on past spend; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo [holding answer 30 April 1991]: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State intends to consult local authorities and their associations later this year on extending the system of targeted management and maintenance allowances to include the supervision and management component from next year.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the recommended figure per dwelling for the London borough of Southwark's management and maintenance allowance contained in his Department's research document "The Appraisal of Local Authority Housing".

Mr. Yeo [holding answer 30 April 1991]: Although the system of targeting the maintenance component of housing revenue account subsidy management and maintenance allowance was based on results of a survey undertaken in 1987-88 into the condition of local authority stock, set out in the appraisal of local authority housing, the results were not specific to any one authority.

Press and Public Relations (Staff)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, in the press and public relations office of his Department.

Mr. Heseltine [holding answer 26 April 1991]: The staff in post and complement figures for the information directorate since 1 April 1989 are as follows:

	Staff in post	Complement
1 April 1989	47	47
1 April 1990	43	49
1 April 1991	45	48
1 April 1992	..	[1]48

[1] Provisional only.

Before 1989, the information directorate of this Department was part of the common services of DOE and the Department of Transport and separate figures for the resources for each Department are not available. Global information for this period is published each year in the form of a management information system for ministers MINIS dating back to 1979 and is available in the House of Commons Library.

EMPLOYMENT

Chainsaws

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish in the Official Report the date when a requirement was made that students of sculpture working in wood required a recognised chainsaw certificate.

Mr. Forth: I am not aware of any such requirement. However, the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 requires that employers must ensure that anyone who uses chainsaws or other dangerous machinery, including students in an educational establishment, should first receive appropriate training and instruction. Where necessary Health and Safety Executive inspectors enforce this requirement at visits to workplaces, including educational establishments.

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what information his Department holds on the number and nature of accidents through the use of chainsaws over each of the past 10 years.

Mr. Forth: Information on the number of injuries caused by persons coming into contact with a chainsaw is in table 1. This information relates to injuries reported to the Health and Safety Executive's factory and agricultural inspectorates under the Reporting of Injuries, Diseases and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1985 for the period 1986-87 to 1989-90. Such injuries were not separately identified in the Health and Safety Executive's database before 1986-87.

Details of the nature of such injuries in 1989-90 are in table 2.

Footnote: Injuries reported to the Factory and Agricultural Inspectorates cover the following sectors: manufacturing, construction, agriculture and forestry, education and some service and leisure activities.

Management Consultants (Fees)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the total sum paid out in fees by his Department to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Jackson: Expenditure on management consultancy in the Employment Department group in each year from 1984-85 to 1988-89 was as follows:

	£ thousands
1984-85	365
1985-86	365
1986-87	1,032
1987-88	653
1988-89	998
1989-90	1,482

The estimated outturn for 1990-91 is around £1,727,000. The budget for 1991-92 will be reported to Parliament in the usual way.

Information for 1979-80 to 1983-84 could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Small Businesses

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many small businesses were started up in the last year; how many were closed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: The best available guide to trends in numbers of businesses comes from VAT data. Early indications are that there was a net increase of around 800 a week in 1990 in the number of businesses registered for VAT. While rather slower than the record rate of increase in 1989, this was nevertheless greater than the average rate of increase during the 1980s.

Enterprise Training

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the level of funding to enterprise training in each year since 1 April 1987.

Mr. Forth: The Department of Employment has supported a number of enterprise programmes over the years in question. Expenditure on these was:

	£ million
1987-88	249
1988-89	257
1989-90	262

The estimated outturn for 1990-91 is £283 million. This information can be obtained from the Government's Expenditure Plans 1991-92 to 1993-94 (Cm. 1506), which can be found in the Library.

British Tourist Authority

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in the British tourist authority; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

Mr. Forth: These matters are the responsibility of the board of the British tourist authority and I am asking the chairman to write directly to the hon. Gentleman.

HIV Testing

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has on how many companies are imposing compulsory HIV testing of their employees; and whether this practice is consistent with the guidelines of the Health and Safety Executive.

Mr. Forth: I am not aware that a significant number of employers carry out HIV testing of employees or potential recruits. Most employers follow the advice given in "AIDS and the Workplace", jointly published by my Department and the Health and Safety Executive last year, that in all ordinary workplace activities the risks of transmission of the virus are negligible and infected individuals do not pose a risk to colleagues, customers or the public. HIV infection does not automatically make someone unfit for work and testing employees and recruits for HIV antibodies is unnecessary. In the case of existing employees, compulsory tests are unlikely to be admissible under most existing contracts of employment.

HEALTH

Electro-magnetic Radiation

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has commissioned or published in the past 10 years in respect of the health effects of electro-magnetic radiation from electricity pylons.

Mr. Dorrell: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien) on 29 November 1990 at columns 475-76. A summary of the results of the National Radiological Protection Board's review of published data has been published in the Journal of Radiological Protection, Volume 11 No. 1, pp 3-62, a copy of which is available in the Library. The full reviews will be published shortly as NRPB reports. In addition, the NRPB has recently announced the establishment of an advisory group on non-ionising radiation which will review work on the biological effects of non-ionising radiation relevant to human health and advise NRPB on research priorities.

Dentists (Prescriptions)

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of dentists charge for issuing a prescription to a patient as distinct from the patient charge per item.

Mr. Dorrell: Information is not available in the form requested. Dentists have been able to claim a fee for the "issue of a prescription only" since 1 October 1990 and, like most dental fees, this is subject to a 75 per cent. patient charge for adult patients who are not exempt from charges. In the period up to 31 December 1990—the latest for which figures are available—the Dental Practice Board scheduled only 16,533 claims for payment of this fee in England and Wales.

Breast Care Nurses

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the budget allocation for (a) the employment of breast care nurses in England and Wales and (b) the training of breast care nurses in England and Wales.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Information on health authorities' budget allocations for the employment of breast care nurses is not held centrally.

The Royal Marsden hospital has received funding from the NHS breast screening programme budget to run courses for breast care nurses since 1987-88:

1987-88	17,000
1988-89	19,000
1989-90	20,000
1990-91	20,000

Arrangements in Wales are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the number of breast care nurses employed in each district health authority.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not held centrally.

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether guidance has been issued from his Department to health authorities on the employment of breast care nurses.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Department of Health guidance, DA(87)14, asked health authorities to establish a breast cancer screening programme on the model set out in the Forrest report on breast cancer screening; copies of both the letter and the report are available in the Library. The guidance stated that "assessment" teams should be supported by a nurse trained in the specialist skills required to care for women who may have cancer. It is for health authorities to decide what further arrangements they wish to make for the employment of breast care nurses.

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether there are one or more full-time breast care nurses employed in each breast cancer assessment centre.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not held centrally.

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he intends to extend the reconstructive breast surgery services in the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: It is a matter for individual health authorities to determine how the resources available should be used.

Lincolnshire Health Authorities

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many doctors were employed by the Sheffield regional health authority (1) to work in the area of the South Lincolnshire health authority in March 1979 and March 1991, respectively;

(2) to work in the area of the North Lincolnshire health authority in March 1979 and March 1991, respectively;

(3) how many consultants were employed by the Sheffield regional health authority to work in the area of the South Lincolnshire health authority in March 1979 and March 1991, respectively.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not held centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact Sir Michael Carlisle, the chairman of Trent regional health authority, for details.

Immunisation

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of children are immunised against diphtheria, whooping cough and measles in Eltham and Greenwich together with the corresponding figures for the south-east Thames region, England and the World Health Organisation's target percentage.

Mr. Dorrell: Provisional information for the financial year 1989-90 is shown in the table. This is the latest year for which figures are available.

Childhood Immunisation

	Diphtheria	Whooping cough	Measles[1]
England	89	78	84
South East Thames RHA	89	80	82
Greenwich DHA	78	68	69

[1] A combination vaccine against measles mumps and rubella (MMR) replaced measles—only vaccine from 1 October 1988.
The World Health Organisation's target for its European region was 90 per cent. coverage by 1990. More recent estimates by the COVER—Cover of Vaccination Evaluated Rapidly—programme managed by the communicable disease surveillance centre, show that by February 1991 the percentages for England had reached 90 for diphtheria, and tetanus and polio, 89 for MMR and 85 for whooping cough.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of general practitioners in Eltham and Greenwich have achieved their targets for child immunisation, pre-school boosters and cervical cytology in respect of their achievements on 1 October 1990.

Mr. Dorrell: The information is not available in the form requested. The percentages of GPs in the Greenwich and Bexley family health services authority area who received payments in respect of their achievements at 1 April 1990 are as follows:

Percentages of GPs receiving target payments

	Per cent.
Childhood immunisations	60
Pre-school booster	53
Cervical cytology	79

National Health Service Patients (Treatment)

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many NHS patients have received treatment in (a) Germany, (b) France and (c) elsewhere outside the United Kingdom at NHS expense in each year since 1979.

Mr. Dorrell: Under the European Community Social Security Regulations the United Kingdom is responsible for the health care costs of EC nationals resident here who travel elsewhere in the Community. Following are numbers of United Kingdom residents authorised to receive specific treatment in other EC countries:

Year	Germany	France	Elsewhere
1979	3	20	1
1980	6	16	4
1981	6	27	4
1982	8	14	9
1983	11	27	7
1984	15	20	13
1985	13	36	8
1986	17	28	13
1987	23	26	9
1988	17	40	23
1989	44	61	30
1990	69	118	72
[1]1991	18	42	23

[1] To date.

The EC regulations also cover immediately necessary treatment for conditions arising during a temporary visit. No precise data exists on numbers of United Kingdom residents given such treatment, nor on the number of NHS patients who have been treated in those non-EC countries with which the United Kingdom has bilateral reciprocal health agreements.

Abortion (RU486 Pill)

Mrs. Maureen Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will take measures to ensure that the RU486 abortion pill is not marketed in the United Kingdom, in the light of recent additional evidence.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Before the granting of a licence for a new drug in the United Kingdom the applicant must satisfy the licensing authority as to the safety, quality and efficacy of the drug as set out in the Medicines Act and in European directives.

All relevant information, whether or not it is favourable to the application, must be made available to the licensing authority by the applicant as soon as it becomes available.

It is for the manufacturer of any drug to decide whether or not, once a product licence has been granted under the Medicines Act, to market the drug in this country.

European Seminar (Glasgow)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether his Department will be represented at the European seminar of the International Federation of Social Workers to be held in Glasgow from 2 to 6 September.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Since this seminar is based in Scotland, the Scottish Office has had the lead in arrangements. My hon. Friend the Minister of State at the Scottish Office is hosting a reception for delegates during the seminar. Official notifications and invitations to other Departments have not yet been issued. The Department of Health will look with interest at attendance once such information is received.

Management Consultants (Fees)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total sum paid out in fees by his Department to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We cannot apportion expenditure between the Department of Health and Social Security before 1985-86. The estimate expenditure for each succeeding financial year on fees and expenses for management consultants on health matters is as follows:

Financial year	£ million
1985-86	0·479
1986-87	2·103
1987-88	1·244
1988-89	1·584
1989-90	4·870
1990-91	2·870

The figures up to and including 1988-89 are approximate as expenditure was from a joint health and social security budget. In some cases expenditure has been apportioned where consultants have been engaged on both health and social security matters.

The budget for 1991-92 is £2·9 million.

In general, external management consultants are employed by the Department when expertise in a specialist technique is necessary; when investigations are required that extend beyond the Department's own boundary; or when the Department's own resources are too few, or too committed on other work, to tackle an urgent problem and help cannot be obtained from within the civil service.

Spectacles

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the annual (a) uptake of and (b) expenditure on financial assistance for spectacles since 1987 under the national health service voucher scheme.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Details of the number and cost of spectacle vouchers redeemed in England from 1987-88 are shown in the table.

Financial years	Vouchers redeemed (millions)	Expenditure (£ millions)
1987-88	2·524	46·316
1988-89	2·259	50·134
1989-90	2·270	51·056

Figures for 1990-91 are not yet available.

Ophthalmic Opticians

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the current fee paid to an ophthalmic optician for carrying out a national health service domiciliary visit.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The fee for domiciliary visits for ophthalmic opticians as from 1 April 1991 is £20 for the first and second patients seen at one address and £10 for subsequent patients.

Federation of Ophthalmic and Dispensing Opticians

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he (a) will next meet and (b) last met the Federation of Ophthalmic and Dispensing Opticians; and what subjects were and will be discussed.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I met representatives of the federation at the general ophthalmic services publicity campaign launch on 19 February. No meeting is arranged with the federation in the immediate future.

NHS Trusts (Business Plans)

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many staff and of what grade are in post at the Department of Health, and the national health service management executive, to monitor and manage the implementation of national health service trust business plans.

Mr. Dorrell: The preparation of NHS trust business plans is a matter for their own management boards. Certain financial parts of the business plan are monitored by the NHS trust finance branch of the NHS management executive.

The staff numbers and grades in post at present in this branch whose responsibilities are much wider than the monitoring of Trust business plans are:

	Number
Grade 5	0·75
PES	1·00
Grade 7	3·50
SEO	2·00
HEO(D)	1·00
HEO	3·00
EO	2·00
AO	1·00

There are occasions when input from other branches of the NHS management executive is required.

Pergolide

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the drug Pergolide is available to national health service patients.

Mrs. Bottomley: This product is not currently marketed in the United Kingdom.

British Fluoridation Society

Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, further to his answer of 19 April, Official Report, column 285, what information he has on the organisation and structure of the British Fluoridation Society; whether it is a registered charity; and what involvement its members have in the fluoride chemicals industry.

Mr. Dorrell: The British Fluoridation Society—BFS—is a registered limited company. It has an elected council of approximately 25 members which meets three times a year and an executive of eight honorary officers of the society, which meets five times a year.

The BFS has a part-time administration officer based at its head office at 63 Wimpole street, London and a full-time information officer based at the school of dental surgery, university of Liverpool.

The BFS is not a registered charity. We are not aware of any involvement by its members in the fluoride chemicals industry.

Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, further to his answer of 19 April, Official Report, column 285, which regional health authorities are currently considering the implementation of water fluoridation in their areas; and if he will identify the extent of information, advice, materials and other assistance given to them in each of the last five years by the British Fluoridation Society.

Mr. Dorrell: New schemes or extensions to existing water fluoridation schemes are currently being considered in the North Western, West Midlands, Mersey, Northern, Yorkshire, Wessex and Oxford regions.

The Department does not keep information on the assistance given to regions by the British Fluoridation Society.

Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, further to his answer of 19 April, Official Report, column 285, what representations he has received from regional health authorities in the past five years requesting information, advice, materials and other assistance on the subject of implementing water fluoridation in their areas.

Mr. Dorrell: No record is maintained of all the occasions on which regional health authorities have approached the Department for such assistance over the past five years.

Sickle Cell Disease

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what will be the terms of reference for the proposed working party on sickle cell and thalassaemia;

(2) when the proposed working party on sickle cell and thalassaemia will report;

(3) what progress has been made in setting up a working party on sickle cell and thalassaemia;

(4) who will be the members of the proposed working party on sickle cell and thalassaemia;

(5) if he will make a statement on sickle cell and thalassaemia services.

Mr. Dorrell [Holding answer 23 April 1991]: At its meeting on 24 April, the standing medical advisory committee agreed to establish a working party on the clinical and service aspects of haemoglobinopathies. Membership and terms of reference of the working party have yet to be determined.

SCOTLAND

Pollution Research

Mr. Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the number of Government research staff employed on work relating to pollution research in Scotland in each year since 1978.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The majority of Government-funded research staff working in the broad area of pollution research in Scotland are employees of research institutes and units which receive funding from United Kingdom departments and research councils.

Scottish Office commissions research projects in this area by contracting out to other bodies, mainly the Scottish universities and river authorities.

In terms of research staff directly employed by the Scottish Office to work on pollution research, almost all are located in the Agriculture and Fisheries Department's marine and freshwater laboratories. At these laboratories, approximately 65 research staff, at scientific officer and above are engaged in pollution research and this number has remained virtually constant since 1978.

Breast Care Nurses

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many breast care nurses appear on the national register of breast care nurses in Scotland;

(2) how many breast care nurses are employed in each health board in Scotland;

(3) what guidance has been issued from the Scottish Office to health boards on the employment of breast care nurses in Scotland;

(4) how many full-time breast care nurses are employed in each breast cancer assessment centre in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: There is no such national register in Scotland and the term "breast care" nurse is not a recognised description. Each of the seven breast cancer assessment centres is funded to provide a nurse for counselling and other services to the patients. The nurse will also provide a link between the assessment centre and the surgical team in the hospital oncology department for those patients whose condition requires further investigation or treatment. No specific guidance has been given to health boards on employment of nurses in the screening units.

Outwith the national breast screening programme there are health visitors, midwives, district nurses and those nurses who provide care in oncology departments all of whom play a part in breat care, but information is not held centrally on the numbers involved.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give details of the budget allocation for (a) the employment of breast care nurses in Scotland and (b) the training of breast care nurses in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: This information is not held centrally. Nurses are part of the team of staff and their costs are included in the allocations made to the health boards concerned. The total budget of the breast screening programme for 1991-92 is £3·346 million.

Glasgow Local Health Council

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report the names, addresses, qualifications and nominating bodies of all the members of the new Greater Glasgow health board local health council.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: This is a matter for Greater Glasgow health board and the hon. Gentleman may wish to approach the board.

Reconstructive Surgery

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to extend the reconstructive surgery services in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: There are no plans to extend the reconstructive services beyond the existing centres.

Nursery Education

Mr. John Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many and what percentage of children aged three and four years were in receipt of nursery education in each (a) regional authority and (b) parliamentary constituency in Scotland in each of the years from 1978-79 to the latest date for which information is available.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The figures for education authority nursery schools and departments at each September for which information is available are set out in the tables below. Information for 1985 and 1986 is not available.

Information by parliamentary constituency is not held centrally.

[1] Provisional.

Local Tax Liability

Mr. Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if, under his new local tax proposals, improvements to a house result in its value rising and crossing the threshold into a higher band, he envisages that this change in the property's valuation will be reflected at any time in the local tax liability.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The treatment of houses which are the subject of such alterations is a matter for consultation.

Road Improvements

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will express the amount of money available to Highland regional council for spending on road improvements per mile of road; if he will further express the sum relevant to the equivalent total for the other Scottish regional councils; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Capital allocations to Scottish regional councils for roads and transport are not project-specific and take into account expenditure proposed both on new roads and on improving existing roads; and the allocation issued to Strathclyde region additionally takes into account capital expenditure proposed on rail projects by the Strathclyde passenger transport executive.

Final capital allocations for roads and transport to regional councils for 1991-92 are as follows:

Council	Total allocation (£ million)	Allocation £ per mile of road[1]
Highland	12·5	3,014
Borders	4·2	2,364
Central	4·4	3,734
Dumfries and Galloway	6·3	2,535
Fife	8·3	6,335
Grampian	12·0	2,621
Lothian	14·4	6,681
Strathclyde	75·6	9,818
Tayside	9·5	3,347

[1] Road lengths at 1 April 1989. Direct comparisons of allocations per road length can be misleading as road widths and levels of use vary considerably.

Out-migration

Mr. Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the net out-migration from Scotland in each year since 1970 to the most recent available figure.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information is given in the following table:

Estimated net civilian out-migration
12 months ending June of year shown

Year	000s
1971	[1]21·7
1972	28·6
1973	11·7
1974	3·0
1975	20·0
1976	5·8
1977	10·8

1986	16·1
1987	15·0
1988	24·7
1989	6·2
1990	[2] – 13·5

[1] The estimate for 1970-71 was compiled on a slightly different basis to those for later years.
[2] There was net in-migration in the 12 months to June 1990.

Local Tax

Mr. Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he envisages that his planned local tax will require a transfer of staff from local authority assessors departments to the district valuer's office.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Consultations are continuing on the arrangements for valuing properties for the council tax and a final decision has still to be taken.

Mr. Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he envisages that the new local tax will necessitate a new valuation roll, itemising each property as the charging basis.

Mr. Allan Stewart: There will be a need for some form of record. The nature of this will be a matter for consultation.

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total cost of (i) producing and (ii) distributing the Scottish Office booklet "You and the Community Charge—A Step by Step Guide".

Mr. Allan Stewart: The cost of preparing, printing and distributing this booklet was £246,367, comprising production costs of £159,800, distribution costs of £70,567 and the agent's management fee of £16,000.

Pupil Testing

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has on the proportion of parents who have withdrawn their children from sitting the primary 4 and primary 7 tests in each education authority area in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: This information is not available.

Forestry Commission

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in the Forestry Commission; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Forestry Commission has two statistical branches in its research division which employs scientists and supporting staff. The scientists are employed on computer programming and systems analysis as well as statistical work, and it is not possible to provide a breakdown of the time they spent solely on statistical duties. In addition, a statistician is employed in the Forestry Commission's headquarters office.

[2] The grade of the HQ statistician in 1980 was senior statistician.
[3] Part-time.

Scottish Development Agency

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in the Scottish Development Agency; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

Mr. Allan Stewart: This is an operational matter for Scottish Enterprise, and I have asked the Chairman to write to the hon. Member.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for East Lothian on 24 April, Official Report, column 458, if he will make it his policy to order a public inquiry into any proposal to establish a dry store for waste nuclear fuel at any site in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Scottish Nuclear's consideration of the dry storage of spent AGR fuel in preference to its immediate reprocessing remains at a relatively early stage. Any application to build such a dry store would be made in the first instance to the planning authority; it would be premature at this juncture to anticipate how it might be handled.

Foxes

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, what is the cost to the Forestry Commission of killing foxes in Scotland, England and Wales for each of the past five years.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 1 November 1990, Official Report, column 723.

Disabled People

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the cost of implementation of sections 1, 2 and 3 of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986 in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 15 April 1991]: It is estimated that the cost of implementation would be about £3 million. As in the rest of the United Kingdom, it has been decided not to implement these sections at present; but the position will be reviewed carefully when the impact of the wider community care reforms set out in the White Paper "Caring for People" can be assessed.

Mentally Handicapped People

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what provision exists for the profoundly mentally handicapped aged 16 years and over in (a) hospitals and (b) in specialist residential facilities within the community.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 17 April 1991]: Information on the detailed provision made for particular categories of mentally handicapped persons is not centrally available.

Nursery Education

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the revenue costs of making the provision of nursery education a statutory responsibility of local authorities.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 17 April 1991]: On the assumption that the present proportion of part and full time nursery school places is maintained, and using current unit costs, it is estimated that the total annual revenue cost of providing nursery education for all three and four-year-olds would be around £124 million.

Lothian Health Board

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list (1) the number of people on the waiting list for operations or procedures in the Lothian health board area in (a) acute specialties, (b) general surgery and (c) orthopaedic surgery in each month from October 1990 to March 1991;

(2) the number of people on the waiting list for operations or procedures in the Lothian health board area for (a) ear, nose and throat surgery, (b) ophthalmology, (c) urology, 8d) dentistry, (e) general medicine, (f) dermatology, (g) respiratory medicine, (h) paediatric surgery, (i) gynaecology, (j) neurosurgery, (k) cardiothoracic surgery and (l) neurology in each month between October 1990 and March 1991;

(3) how many people were on the waiting list for operations in all specialties in the Lothian health board area in each month from October 1990 to March 1991.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 29 April 1991]: The latest available information is set out in the table below:

Waiting lists[1] December 1990

	Total number
Acute specialties	11,065
General surgery	2,715
Orthopaedic	1,285
Ear, nose and throat	2,473
Ophthalmology	1,321
Urology	1,202
Dentistry[2]	309
General medicine	326
Respiratory medicine	—
Dermatology	20
Surgical paediatrics	392
Gynaecology	1,004
Neurosurgery	231
Cardiothoracic surgery	281
Neurology	74
All specialties	13,589

[1] Total in-patient and day case.
[2] Includes orthodontics and paediatric medicine and oral surgery and oral medicine.

Elective Coronary Surgery

Mr. Eadie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Midlothian, of 17 April, Official Report, column 193, if he is yet in a position to announce his decision on whether to allocate more funds for elective coronary surgery in the Lothian health board area.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 29 April 1991]: Negotiations are currently taking place with the health boards concerned about the activity level and funding requirements for major cardiac surgery in 1991-92.

Council Tax

Mr. Doran: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland in relation to his statement made on 23 April 1991 on the proposals for a council tax, how many domestic properties in (a) the city of Aberdeen district and (b) Aberdeen constituency fall into each band in his banding system; on what date the valuations were made; and by whom.

Mr. Allan Stewart [holding answer 30 April 1991]: For the purposes of the illustrative council tax calculations it was estimated that the numbers of properties in the city of Aberdeen district falling into bands A to G were as follows:

Band	Number of properties
A	20,071
B	13,685
C	13,685
D	12,773
E	11,860
F	9,123
G	10,036

The estimate of the distribution of the properties by capital values was based on information provided by the Inland Revenue valuation office as part of an exercise which began in early March. No estimates are available on a constituency basis.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Child Benefit

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much it would cost in total for a full year to restore child benefit for (a) the first child, (b) the second child and (c) all children to its value (i) in 1979 and (ii) in 1987.

Mr. Jack: On the basis of the latest estimates, the gross additional costs in 1991-92 of paying child benefit at its April 1979 value in real terms—£9·90 a week—would be (a) £585 million, (b) £540 million and (c) £1,345 million. The corresponding net costs after adjustments to national insurance and income-related benefits are (a) £415 million, (b) £395 million and (c) £950 million.

The gross additional costs of making payment at the April 1987 real-terms value (£9·55) would be (a) £460 million, (b) £470 million and (c) £1,120 million. The corresponding net costs are (a) £325 million, (b) £345 million and (c) £790 million.

These costs do not take account of the increases in child benefit from next October, at a cost of around £210 million in 1991-92, which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced in his Budget statement.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the full-year cost of raising child benefit in October to £9·55 a week for all children, assuming a corresponding increase in income-related benefit allowances for children.

Mr. Jack: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) on 30 April 1991.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what has been the total cost of child benefit in each year since 1979 in cash and real terms; and what that figure would be if it had been uprated in line with inflation.

Mr. Jack: The costs are contained in the table:

Year	Cash value (£ million)	Equivalent value at 1990-91 prices (£ million)	Notional Expenditure[1] (£ million)
1979-80	2,787	6,026
1980-81	2,944	5,379	3,000
1981-82	3,372	5,619	3,700
1982-83	3,660	5,694	3,900
1983-84	3,988	5,930	4,100
1984-85	4,276	6,051	4,200
1985-86	4,468	5,997	4,400
1986-87	4,513	5,854	4,600
1987-88	4,598	5,663	4,800
1988-89	4,515	5,175	4,900
1989-90	4,537	4,889	5,300
1990-91	4,636	4,636	5,900
1991-92	[2]5,286	4,940	[3]—

[1] Notional expenditure represents estimated expenditure in the financial year, had benefit levels at the appropriate uprating dates reflected the movement in the RPI from April 1979 up to those dates.
[2] Estimated costs including October 1991 increases.
[3] Relevant RPI figure not yet available.

Income Support

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many pensioners in receipt of state pension who previously received income support are now ineligible for income support as from 6 April for (a) Bristol, South, (b) Bristol, East, (c) Bristol, (d) South West region and (e) nationally.

Miss Widdecombe: Income support rates increased from 8 April 1991. The estimated number of income support claimants receiving state pensions who, following the uprating, are no longer eligible for income support is 45,000. However, the extra £80 million directed to younger pensioners at the recent uprating helped another 105,000 to retain their entitlement.

Estimates are not available for the Bristol area or the South-West region.

Pensioners whose incomes are above the level of income support can, of course, claim other benefits such as housing benefit or community charge benefit. They can also apply for help with optical, dental and other charges under the NHS low income scheme.

Source: Modelled using data drawn from the 1989 annual statistical inquiry, uprated to 1990-91 prices and benefit levels.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many pensioners have been taken out of income support arising from the April 1991 pension increase.

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 18 April 1991]: The number of claimants who no longer qualify for income support as a direct result of the recent increase in retirement pension is 40,000. If income support for couples receiving the ordinary pensioner premium had continued to exceed full basic retirement pension levels this number would be reduced only by about 1,000. The extra £80 million directed to younger pensioners at the recent uprating helped another 105,000 to retain their entitlement.

Pensioners whose incomes are above the level of income support can, of course, claim other benefits such as housing benefit or community charge benefit. They can also apply for help with optical, dental and other charges under the NHS low income scheme.

Source: Modelled using data drawn from the 1989 annual statistical inquiry, uprated to 1990-91 prices and benefit levels.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people on income support broken down into (a) lone parents and (b) others, are working between 16 and 24 hours a week.

Miss Widdecombe: We estimate that approximately 60,000 people are receiving income support and working between 16 and 24 hours a week. Of these, about 30,000 are lone parents.

Source: Modelled on data drawn from the 1985-86-87 family expenditure surveys.

Cold Weather Payments

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answers of 7 March, Official Report, column 281, when he expects to be in a position to place in the Library the figures for claims and payments for cold weather payments in respect of the February cold snap; and if those figures will be broken down by region and constituency and by category of claimant eligibility.

Mr. Scott: Information relating to the 1990-91 period is still incomplete as claims are allowed up to three months after the cold weather period. Statistical information for the whole winter period will be placed in the Library as soon as it becomes available.

This information has been collated by region up to and including March 1991 and by district office from April 1991 onwards. It cannot be broken down by constituency or category of claimant eligibility.

National Insurance

Mr. Forman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what would be the additional yield in a full year from abolishing the upper earnings limit for employees' class 1 national insurance contributions.

Mr. Jack: If the upper earnings limit for employees' national insurance contributions were abolished, it is estimated that contribution yield would increase by some £2·5 billion a year.

Carers' Allowance

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he has any plans to make the carers' allowance available to people over the age of 59 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: Invalid care allowance is the main social security benefit for carers. It is intended to help to maintain the income of someone who gives up the opportunity of full-time work to provide substantial and regular care to a severely disabled person. It is not normally available to people after they reach pension age but, subject to the overlapping benefit rules, it continues to be payable beyond pension age to people entitled beforehand. We have no plans to change these arrangements.

Management Consultants (Fees)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the total sum paid out in fees by his Department to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Jack: The estimated expenditure from 1984-85 onwards on fees and expenses for management consultants on social security matters is in the table.

The figures are approximate since expenditure up to and including the 1988-89 financial year is from a joint health and social security budget. In some cases, expenditure has been apportioned where consultants have been engaged on both health and social security matters. The figures include some computer consultancy where this cannot be separately identified.

The information for years prior to 1984-85 could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Year	£ million
1984-85	0·959
1985-86	1·722
1986-87	0·976
1987-88	1·082
1988-89	1·203
1989-90	2·942
1990-91	5·158
1991-92	2·454

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people have been disqualified from unemployment benefit for voluntary unemployment, broken down into categories of disqualification, in each year since 1987.

Mr. Jack: The information requested is in table 1.1 of "Unemployment Benefit Statistics—Quarterly Analysis of Decisions of Adjudication Officers", copies of which are in the Library.

Community Charge Benefit

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish a table showing the net income at which community charge benefit runs out for the average community charge in (a) England, (b) Scotland, (c) Wales and (d) inner London in 1991-92 for the family types (i) a single person aged under 25 years, (ii) a single person aged over 25 years, (iii) a pensioner couple, (iv) a single parent family with a child aged eight and (v) a married couple with two children aged four and six years.

Miss Widdecombe: The information requested is in the following table:

Net Income at which entitlement to Community Charge Benefit ceases

	England	Scotland	Wales	Inner London
	£	£	£	£
Average community charge	252·00	253·00	121·00	219·00
Average weekly charge	4·82	4·84	2·31	4·19
Maximum 80 per cent. benefit	3·86	3·87	1·85	3·35
Single under 25	61·85	61·96	48·49	58·49
Single over 25	70·35	70·46	56·99	66·99
Pensioner couple 60 to 74	134·56	134·76	107·83	127·83
Pensioner couple 75 to 79	137·01	137·21	110·28	130·28
Pensioner couple 80	139·86	140·06	113·13	133·13
Single parent child under 11	121·70	121·81	108·34	118·34
Couple, two children under 11	158·31	158·51	131·58	151·58

Notes:

1. The average community charge figures take account of the £140 reduction in charge levels, they do not however take account of the community charge reduction scheme. The net income figures given in the table will be lower if the average charges are adjusted to take account of the average reduction under the community charge reduction scheme.
2. People below pension age are assumed to be in employment and subject to relevant earnings disregards.
3. Average weekly charge and maximum 80 per cent. benefit relate to a single person, or each member of a couple.

Disablement Benefits

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people were receiving severe disablement allowance at the last date for which figures are available; and if he will break down the figures by sex and standard age cohorts.

Mr. Scott: The information as at 31 March 1990, the latest date for which information is available, is set out in the table:

	Male	Female
age under 20	12,800	9,300
20 to 24	15,100	11,500
25 to 29	17,000	10,600
30 to 34	10,700	12,500
35 to 39	10,500	13,200
40 to 44	9,100	18,400
45 to 49	8,700	16,600
50 to 54	6,100	22,100
55 to 59	6,700	27,500
60 to 64	8,300	19,000
65 and Over	7,400	11,500
all ages	112,400	172,200

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people were receiving income support with a disability premium at the last date for which figures are available; and if he will break down the figures by sex and standard age cohorts.

Miss Widdecombe: The available information is in tables 4.1 to 4.1C and 5.2 of the income support annual statistical inquiry for 1989, a copy of which is available in the Library.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people were receiving housing benefit with a disability premium at the last date for which figures are available; and if he will break down the figures by sex and standard age cohorts.

Miss Widdecombe: At August 1990, the rent rebate and rent allowance case load of those aged less than 60 who were not getting income support, but who were allowed a disability, or severe disability premium was 155,000. The latest comparable figure, for May 1989, for those also in receipt of income support is 140,000. Above the age of 60 the higher pensioner premium is awarded in place of a disability premium. The figures cannot be cross-classified by sex or age.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people were receiving community charge benefit with a disability premium at the last date for which figures are available; and if he will break down the figures by sex and standard age cohorts.

Miss Widdecombe: The information requested is not available.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people were receiving war disablement benefit at each rate at the last date for which figures are available; and if he will break down the figures by sex and standard age cohorts.

Mr. Scott: The number of war disablement pensions in payment at 31 March 1991, was as follows:

Percentage rate	Number of pensions
20	76,611
30	42,635
40	23,860
50	12,867
60	9,132
70	6,711
80	6,200
90	2,310
100	11,714
Total	192,040

Information is not available on the breakdown of these figures by sex and standard age cohorts; the number of war disablement pensioners by age is, however, as follows:

Age	Number of pensioners
Under 20	61
20-29	1,381
30-39	4,000
40-49	9,543
50-59	21,662
60-64	14,967
65-69	38,154
70-79	85,042
80-89	15,068
90 and over	2,162
Total	192,040

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people were receiving mobility allowance at the last date for which figures are available; and if he will break down the figures by sex and standard age cohorts.

Mr. Scott: The latest information at 18 April 1991 is in the table:

Age	Male	Female
Up to 9	5,450	4,180
10 to 14	4,880	4,030
15 to 19	5,590	4,840
20 to 24	7,840	6,740
25 to 29	8,990	8,300
30 to 34	9,200	9,360
35 to 39	10,610	11,830
40 to 44	15,840	18,070
45 to 49	19,970	22,230

Benefits Agency

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the total estimated cost of supplying Benefits Agency staff with uniforms; and whether the cost of uniforms is being deducted from the benefit budgets of each local office.

Miss Widdecombe: The cost of supplying uniforms for Benefits Agency staff is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the agency.

He will write to the hon. Member with such information as is available and copies will be placed in the Library and the public information office.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the total estimated cost of supplying Benefits Agency staff in Bradford with new uniforms.

Miss Widdecombe: The cost of supplying uniforms for Benefits Agency staff is a matter for Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency.

He will write to the hon. Member with such information as is available and copies will be placed in the Library and the public information office.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will take steps to ensure that all garments supplied to Benefits Agency staff will be made from cloth originating in the United Kingdom and made up by suppliers based in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: Information concerning the supplies of garments to the Benefits Agency is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency.

He will write to the hon. Member with such information as is available and copies will be placed in the Library and the public information office.

Attendance Allowance

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people were receiving attendance allowance at each rate at the last date for which figures are available; and if he will break down the figures by sex and standard age cohorts.

Mr. Scott: The information requested is in the table:

Attendance allowances recipients at 31 March 1990
Figures are rounded (thousands)[1]

Age	Higher rate		Lower rate
	Male	Female	Male	Female
2-4	4	3	6	4

Invalidity Benefits

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people were receiving invalid care allowance at the last date for which figures are available; and if he will break down the figures by sex and standard age cohorts.

Mr. Scott: The information requested is in the table:

Invalid care allowance recipients at 2 January 1991
All figures rounded

Age	Male	Female
Under 20	140	430
20 to 24	430	2,600

Home Visits

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what instructions he has issued to local offices about discontinuing home visits on a regular basis; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: Instructions issued to local offices concerning home visits are matters for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member and copies will be placed in the Library and the public information office.

National Insurance

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the effect on Treasury revenues in 1991-92 of extending (a) employers' and (b) employee national insurance contributions to all taxable benefits in kind, assuming (i) the current structure of national insurance contributions and (ii) no ceiling on employee national insurance contributions.

Mr. Jack: The Inland Revenue estimates that the value of benefits in kind reported in the 1991-92 tax year in respect of directors and employees earning over £8,500 a year will be approximately £7·1 billion.

If employers' national insurance contributions were levied on this amount, the contribution yield would be around £750 million. Employees' contributions would amount to some £250 million if the upper earnings limit were maintained; or £650 million if the ceiling were removed. All these figures assume payment by employer and employees at the highest "not contracted out" rate of national insurance contributions—10·4 per cent. for employers and 9 per cent. for employees.

However, tax-paying employers would be able to claim corporation tax or income tax relief which would reduce income to the Consolidated Fund.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what would be the effect on Treasury revenues in 1991-92 and in a full year of abolishing the ceiling on (a) employees' national insurance contributions and (b) national insurance contributions for the self-employed.

Mr. Jack: If the ceiling for employees and self-employed national insurance contributions were abolished, it is estimated that contribution yield would increase in 1991-92 by some £2·2 billion and £0·2 billion respectively. In a full year the increase would be £2·5 billion and £0·5 billion respectively.

Overpayments Recovery Guide

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security to whom his Department's manual, overpayments recovery guide, is circulated; and if he will place a copy in the Library.

Mr. Jack: The administration of overpayments recovery is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member and copies of the reply will be placed in the Library and the public information office.

Income Support

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the numbers of people at each of his Department's offices who are now having deductions made from their income support to cover the poll tax.

Miss Widdecombe: The administration of income support is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member and copies will be placed in the Library and the public information office.

Benefits

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, how many people claim each benefit payable (a) at each of the Nottingham social security offices and (b) in the United Kingdom.

Miss Widdecombe [pursuant to her reply on 27 March at column 449]: I regret that the figure quoted for severe disability allowance (SDA) in Great Britain as 382,600 was incorrect and should have been shown as 256,600.

Pensioner Couples

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the number of new basic pensioner couples who are no longer entitled to income support because of the recent rise in basic pension; and what is the average amount that their income is above the required level.

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 22 April 1991]: The estimated number of pensioner couples who are no longer entitled to income support following the recent uprating is 10,000 of which 5,000 were in receipt of the income support ordinary pensioner premium. However, had income support levels for pensioner couples of all ages continued to exceed full basic retirement pension levels, only around 1,000 of these would have retained their entitlement. The average amount by which weekly income exceeds current benefit levels for pensioner couples who are no longer entitled to income support is estimated to be 69p.

Pensioners whose incomes are above the level of income support can, of course, claim other benefits such as housing benefit or community charge benefit. They can also apply for help with optical, dental and other charges under the NHS low income scheme.

Source: Modelled using data drawn from the 1989 annual statistical inquiry, uprated to 1990-91 prices and benefit levels.

DEFENCE

Aldermaston

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the release of tritium at AWE Aldermaston in February; whether there was any danger to the population living around the establishment; and if he will make a statement on the adequacy of the present effectiveness of the monitoring equipment.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: A small quantity of tritium—some 27 terabecquerels—was accidentally released on 19 February 1991. The highest dose which could have been received by any member of the public was much less than 1 microSievert, several thousand times smaller than the average annual dose to the United Kingdom public from all background sources. There was therefore no danger to the local population or effect on the environment. The effectiveness of monitoring equipment at AWE was well demonstrated by the fact that it picked up these extremely low levels.

Defence Workers (Radiation)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, (1) pursuant to his answer of 11 March, Official Report, column 411, if he will now provide a breakdown for (i) Rosyth dockyard, (ii) Devonport dockyard, (iii) Aldermaston atomic weapons establishment, (iv) Coulport RNAD and (v) the Faslane submarine base, of individual radiation dose exposures for workers in the bands (a) 0 to 10, (b) 10 to 15, (c) 15 to 20, (d) 20 to 30, (e) 30 to 40 and (f) greater than 40 mSv for the year 1990;

(2) if he will give a breakdown for (a) HMS Neptune and (b) HMS Defiance of individual radiation dose exposures for individuals in the bands (i) 0 to 10, (ii) 10 to 15, (iii) 15 to 20, (iv) 20 to 30, (v) 30 to 40 and (vi) greater than 40 mSv for the year 1990.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: I will write to the hon. Member.

Wind Power

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on progress achieved to date in his Department's wind power research programme.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: This is a matter for the Defence Research Agency under its framework document. I have therefore asked the chief executive of the DRA, Mr. Nigel Hughes, to reply direct to the hon. Member.

Management Consultants (Fees)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the total sum paid out in fees by his Department to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Fees paid to management consultants engaged centrally by the Ministry of Defence for the years 1984-85 to 1990-91 are as follows:

FY	£ million
1984-85	0·604
1985-86	1·787
1986-87	6·203
1987-88	5·140
1988-89	3·109
1989-90	5·292
1990-91	3·935
1991-92	[1]3·912

Defence Equipment Exhibition

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the countries who are attending the defence component and equipment exhibition at the national exhibition centre, from 14 to 16 May.

Mr. Alan Clark: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) on 13 March at column 575.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the officials of his Department who will be attending the defence component and equipment exhibition at the national exhibition centre, Birmingham, from 14 to 16 May.

Mr. Alan Clark: Various officials will attend as part of their normal duties.

The Gulf

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence why the water allowance received by troops during the recent conflict in the Gulf has now been withdrawn from troops serving in that area; why certain categories of accommodation have also been withdrawn; whether other facilities provided during the conflict are under consideration for withdrawal; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: It is normal practice for the provision of accommodation, allowances and facilities for service personnel to be subject to modification in the light of changed circumstances. The water allowance in the Gulf has not been withdrawn.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence why reservists called up during the Gulf war received a smaller number of days leave than regular soldiers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Regular soldiers returning from the Gulf were granted 28 days' leave against their normal annual leave entitlement.

No reservist served for more than four months in the Army, and 21 days' leave was considered very fair.

Bloodhound Missile

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he intends to start the development of a replacement for the Bloodhound missile.

Mr Alan Clark: It is currently intended to invite international industry to tender against a cardinal points specification for a future medium surface-to-air missile system.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions have taken place with NATO authorities regarding a possible replacement for the Bloodhound missile.

Mr. Alan Clark: We have consulted NATO authorities and our NATO allies on a number of occasions.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many staff have been involved in the study of a possible replacement for the Bloodhound missile.

Mr. Alan Clark: This information is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what feasibility studies into a replacement for the Bloodhound missile have taken place.

Mr. Alan Clark: The United Kingdom has undertaken its own national medium surface-to-air missile system feasibility study and has also participated in an Independent European Programme Group study.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what expenditure has been incurred to date on the study of a possible replacement for the Bloodhound missile.

Mr. Alan Clark: The MOD incurred commitments of £1·5 million on extramural support for the national and international MSAM studies. Details of intramural expenditure could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what communications have taken place with industry regarding a possible replacement for the Bloodhound missile.

Mr. Alan Clark: Industry was involved in the national and international MSAM system studies. It has also been consulted about our plans to issue an invitation to tender. In December 1990 an announcement was made in the MOD's contracts bulletin to coincide with the distribution to industry of a draft of the cardinal points specification for comment.

Defence Research Agency

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what estimates have been made of the possible reductions in employment at the Defence Research Agency resulting from the "Options for Change" study;

(2) what arrangements have been made for the Defence Research Agency to carry out non-military work.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: This is a matter for the Defence Research Agency under its framework document. I have therefore asked the chief executive of the DRA, Mr. Nigel Hughes, to reply direct to the hon. Member.

Service Personnel (Housing)

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his anwswer of 24 April, which local authorities he has consulted in the course of his examination of the housing needs of service personnel.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Until decisions on the future size and shape of the armed forces have been taken, it would be premature to discuss housing requirements with individual local authorities.

United Kingdom-Soviet Military Meetings

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 24 April, if he will list the bilateral and multilateral fora at which United Kingdom and Soviet service personnel meet.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The multilateral fora in which United Kingdom and Soviet service personnel meet include: meetings under CSCE auspices; the CFE negotiations in Vienna; the conference on disarmament; and visits to NATO at Evere. Occasions for bilateral meetings include: visits and exchanges; annual discussions on the prevention of incidents at sea agreement; contacts between United Kingdom attachés in Moscow and the Soviet Ministry of Defence and between Soviet attachés in London and my Department; and contacts in third countries between United Kingdom service attachés and their Soviet counterparts.

Royal Aircraft Establishment, Farnborough

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what discussions have taken place with local authorities regarding the possible sale of land or property at the royal aircraft establishment at Farnborough;

(2) what plans exist to dispose of land or property at the Royal Aircraft Establishment at Farnborough.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: We announced in September 1990 our preliminary view that research and experimental flying, currently undertaken at Bedford, Boscombe Down and Farnborough, should be collocated at Boscombe Down. Since then, we have been in close consultation with a range of interested parties, including the local authorities. We are currently considering the results of these consultations and hope to make an announcement shortly. We have also announced recently a number of separate studies into a range of sites—including Farnborough—which go to make up the newly formed Defence Research Agency. These studies are at an early stage and decisions on them will not be taken for some time. A substantial presence will be retained on the Farnborough site.

Operation Haven

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what RAF resources are currently being used in Operation Haven.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: There are three Hercules C-130 transport aircraft and 12 Chinook helicopters from the Royal Air Force based in Turkey undertaking relief operations.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proportion of current RAF flights from the United Kingdom to Turkey is being used for the support of military operations; and what proportion is being used for the transport of civilian relief supplies.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Initially, there were six flights carrying relief supplies to Turkey by RAF aircraft prior to the Overseas Development Administration chartering its own aircraft. Currently, all RAF flights between the United Kingdom and Turkey are in support of the deployment of 3 Commando Brigade and other units undertaking duties on Operation Haven. Civilian relief supplies from the United Kingdom to Turkey are currently packed at RAF Lyneham and are being delivered from Heathrow by a Boeing 707 chartered by the ODA.

Defence Technology Enterprises Ltd.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current staffing establishment of Defence Technology Enterprises Ltd.; and what it has been in each year since the establishment of the company.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The staffing of Defence Technology Enterprises Ltd. is a matter for the company.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consideration has been given to changing the role or size of Defence Technology Enterprises Ltd.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The size and commercial strategy of DTE Ltd. are matters for the company. The MOD continues to have a formal relationship with DTE which is being reassessed to reflect the creation of the Defence Research Agency.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many licences or signed options to use Ministry of Defence technology have been arranged by Defence Technology Enterprises Ltd. in each year since its establishment.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The number of licences and signed options granted by DTE Ltd. is primarily a matter for the company. Cumulative totals were, however, quoted in the Statement on the Defence Estimates 1987 to 1989 inclusive.

RAF Reserve

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what encouragement is given to pilots who leave the RAF to participate in the Royal Auxiliary Air Force and the RAF Volunteer Reserve.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: All officers who leave the RAF are provided with resettlement literature which includes full details on both the Royal Auxiliary Air Force and the RAF Volunteer Reserve; those who show an interest are encouraged to contact their nearest Royal Auxiliary Air Force squadron or RAF Volunteer Reserve flight.

Germany (Environmental Improvements)

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 24 April, what commitments have been entered into with the German authorities relating to environmental improvements.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: We have a general commitment to respect host nation legislation in accordance with the NATO status of forces agreement. The supplementary agreement to the SOFA also provides for such matters as the avoidance of unnecessary exercise damage, the application of German regulations for construction, use of installations for defence purposes and public safety. We are constantly aware of the German authorities' concerns and have issued an environmental protection directive and taken other measures to prevent or minimise environmental damages.

NATO Rapid Reaction Force

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions have taken place with his NATO counterparts regarding possible command arrangements for a NATO rapid reaction force.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Proposals for changes in alliance forces, including the creation of a rapid reaction corps, are under discussion in NATO. No decisions have yet been taken.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) whether any new safety features on British nuclear weapons have been introduced in the last 30 years;

(2) whether any changes have taken place to procedures for the handling of nuclear weapons that have enhanced safety in the last 30 years.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) on 25 March, Official Report, column 302. Nuclear weapon safety is under continuous review, but the hon. Member will appreciate why I cannot reveal details of changes in design or procedures that may have arisen through this process.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will obtain a copy of the report of the panel on nuclear weapons safety commissioned by the United States Energy Secretary for the Ministry of Defence library.

Mr. Alan Clark: Yes.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what communications have taken place with the United States Government regarding nuclear weapons safety.

Mr. Alan Clark: We have regular and frequent communications with the United States Government in this area.

Written Answers to Questions

Thursday 2 May 1991

HOME DEPARTMENT

National Association of Probation Officers

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last met representatives of the National Association of Probation Officers to discuss the new framework for the probation service.

Mr. John Patten: The then Home Secretary met the National Association of Probation Officers on 3 August 1987 to discuss "Probation—The Next Five Years", a statement produced jointly by the Central Council of Probation Committees, the Association of Chief Probation Officers and NAPO.

Cars (Anti-Theft Measures)

Mr. Allen McKay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will now discuss with representatives of the motoring organisations, consumer associations and motor manufacturers the desirability of fitting laminated glass in cars to enhance their anti-theft properties.

Mr. John Patten: We are considering this matter, in consultation with others. In doing so, we must take account of both the security and safety implications of fitting laminated glass.

Mr. McWilliam: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will next meet representatives of the motor manufacturers to discuss increasing anti-theft standards in automobiles.

Mr. John Patten: My right hon. Friend met the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders on 24 April and he and I met representatives from 11 motor manufacturing companies on 29 April to discuss car security. At these meetings we discussed measures that could be taken by the manufacturers further to improve car security and the individual manufacturers and SMMT will provide an update on how progress can be made in about three months' time.

Prisoners (Visits)

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to ensure that prisoners are imprisoned at a convenient distance for regular visits from their families.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Nearness to the prisoner's home or that of his or her likely visitors is a factor taken into account when sentenced prisoners are allocated to training establishments in England and Wales. But prison staff also take into account other factors, including the availability of places and security and control considerations, as well as any other needs the prisoner may have.

Civil Defence

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has made any decision on the reviews of civil defence and civil emergency planning undertaken by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We hope to be able to make an announcement shortly.

Magistrates Courts, Devon

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) when he will announce his decision on changes in the magistrates courts in Devon;

(2) when he expects to announce that a decision has been made on the future of the magistrates court in South Molton.

Mr. John Patten: We hope to make an announcement as soon as possible.

Police Officers

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many female police officers there were in England and Wales on 1 January 1990; what percentage of them were promoted during 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: On 1 January 1990, there were 13,829 women police officers in England and Wales. Information on the total numbers of officers promoted is not centrally held.

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many male police officers there were in England and Wales on 1 January 1990; and what percentage of them were promoted during 1990.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: On 1 January 1990, there were 112,281 male police officers in England and Wales. Information on the total numbers of officers promoted is not centrally held.

Prison Suicides

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of prison suicides in each of the years 1987 to date in which the coroner identified lack of medical care as a material factor; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: There have been five cases of self-inflicted death in prison service establishments since 1987 in which the inquest verdict on the cause of death made reference to a lack of care. Of these, one death was in 1987, three were in 1990 and one in 1991.

The verdicts concerned did not distinguish between medical care and other means of providing care for prisoners. The duty of care is shared by all prison staff, not only medical or nursing staff. The Government are concerned to ensure that proper standards of care are achieved in prisons. We are giving very serious consideration to the recommendations made about this in the report on suicide and self-injury by Her Majesty's chief inspector of prisons.

Data Protection Register

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total sum paid out in fees by the office of the Data Protection Registrar to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I set out below the registrar's expenditure on specialist advice, other than public relations, in the years since his office was established in 1984:

1984-85	15,302
1985-86	37,383
1986-87	6,558
1987-88	9,764
1988-89	36,788
1989-90	17,416
1990-91	31,229

The budget for 1991-92 is £30,000.

I understand separate figures for management consultancies could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Departmental Property, London

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much land his Department owns in London; and how much of that land is unused.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The most recent available information is that the Home Office owns about 230 acres of land in the Greater London area. The departmental register of unused and underused land, which is available for inspection by any member of the public, shows that the only unused portion of that land is an area of approximately 10 acres at Feltham, in the London borough of Hounslow.

National Sporting Events

Sir Alan Glyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from members of the public seeking an assurance that national sporting events will continue to be available on the main television channels as well as on cable and satellite.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Since the revised list of events drawn up under section 182 of the Broadcasting Act 1990 was published on 17 April, the Home Office has received 42 letters from members of the public about it. Events on the list may not be shown on pay-per-view terms; but there has never been any guarantee that particular sporting events, whether or not included on the list, will be shown on terrestrial television services.

Police Force Numbers

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list, for each police authority in Wales, for each of the past five years, 1991 and 1992, the recommendation made by the chief constable as to the number of police officers needed by that force to maintain an adequate level of cover.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Since 1986 the four Welsh police authorities have made applications to the Secretary of State for increases in establishment as shown in the table:

	Dyfed-Powys	Gwent	North Wales	South Wales
1986-87	1	nil	niil	nil
1987-88	nil	17	nil	nil
1988-89	nil	42	41	66
1989-90	nil	33	31	77
1990-91	8	11	21	67
1991-92	nil	9	nil	nil
1992-93	50	10	30	44

Wolds Remand Prison

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the standard of service which will be expected of a private sector company contracted to run Wolds remand prison.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Work has now been completed on the specification for the operation of Wolds remand prison under private sector management and the selection and training requirements for prisoner custody officers. This forms part of the invitation to tender being issued to potential contractors today and a copy has been placed in the Library. Subject to the passage of the Criminal Justice Bill through Parliament and the receipt of satisfactory tenders, we would aim to award a contract in the autumn.

CIVIL SERVICE

Work Experience

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service to what degree civil service trade unions have co-operated in secondment for work experience placements in the civil service.

Mr. Renton: Participation in work experience arrangements in the civil service, including the unions' interest in this, is a matter for individual Departments.

In my own Department we have arranged work experience placements for a number of years with the support of unions.

ENERGY

Brown Book

Mr. Hague: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he will publish his next report on the development of the oil and gas resources of the United Kingdom, the Brown Book.

Mr. Wakeham: I have today published the latest edition of the Brown Book, and have arranged for copies to be placed in the Library of the House and the Vote Office. The report provides a detailed account of the development of oil and gas resources during 1990.

ENVIRONMENT

Urban Development Corporations

Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will supply for each financial year since 1981 the amount of grant in aid given by his Department to each urban development corporation.

Mr. Key: The table supplies the information.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is his estimate of the total cost to date of the publication and distribution of poll tax registration forms;

(2) what is his estimate of the total cost of printing and distributing poll tax reminder forms;

(3) what is his estimate of the staffing costs of poll tax registration officers;

(4) what is his estimate of the cost of computer equipment for the administration of poll tax registers.

Mr. Portillo: The Department does not have this information. The Government provided a total of £117·5 million in the 1988-89 and 1989-90 rate support grant settlements in England for community charge preparation costs, including £55 million by way of specific grant. In addition, allocations amounting to a total of £170·3 million were made for capital expenditure in 1988-89 and 1989-90. The cost of collecting the charge was allowed for in the revenue support grant for 1990-91 and will continue to be supported in 1991-92.

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total cost of (i) producing and (ii) distributing the booklet sent to all households describing the working of the community charge.

Mr. Portillo: The costs of producing the leaflet "The Community Charge (the so-called poll tax): How it will work for you" which was distributed to every household in England during May 1989 were approximately £370,000. The distribution costs were approximately £600,000.

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the cost to date of the printing and issuing of poll tax collection books; and what was the cost of reissuing new poll tax collection notices and books following the Budget changes in poll tax levels.

Mr. Portillo: Information on the cost of printing and issuing community charge collection books is not available. Information on the cost of re-billing following the Community Charges (General Reduction) Act is not yet available, but the Government have undertaken to meet the reasonable additional costs which local authorities incur.

Council Tax (Great Grimsby)

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing for Great Grimsby the numbers in each band qualifying for a reduction in council tax on income grounds in addition to a 25 per cent. discount.

Mr. Key: The information requested is not available.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the nature of the calculation by which he arrived at an average council tax of £496 for Grimsby; and if he will list the factors which accounted for only 24 of the 29 authorities with a higher percentage spending over standard spending assessment than Grimsby having higher estimates of tax in each band.

Mr. Key [holding answer 30 April 1991]: The method used to calculate the illustrative council tax bills published on 23 April is set out on the sheet covering the tables.

The main factors which determine the level of bills shown for each area are the level of spending in relation to standard spending assessment by all authorities providing services in the area; the proportion of properties in each of the seven bands; and the number of discounts assumed to be given in each area.

The exemplifications published on 23 April show over half of domestic properties in Great Grimsby falling in band A, with a bill for two or more adults of £402. Single adult households will receive a 25 per cent. reduction.

Countryside Commission

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total sum paid out in fees by the Countryside Commission to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Trippier: The following table gives the available information. No figures are available prior to 1 April 1982.

Nature Conservancy Council

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total sum paid out in fees by the Nature Conservancy Council to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Trippier: Expenditure on management consultants is not recorded separately. However, expenditure on all consultancies since 1986-87 is listed. No figures are available for previous years.

Ordnance Survey

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total sum paid out in fees by the Ordnance Survey to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Baldry: Records in the detail required to provide the information are not available prior to 1985-86. The available information is as follows:

Fees paid to management consultants

Year	£000s
1985-86	276·9
1986-87	200·6
1987-88	236·8
1988-89	220·5
1989-90	242·4
1990-91	241·1

The budget for 1991-92 makes provision of £374,000 for management consultants' fees.

London Population

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (a) what is the current level of population density per acre in London boroughs for planning purposes and (b) when it was last reviewed.

Sir George Young: The most recent estimates of population for each London borough are those prepared by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys (OPCS) for mid-1989. The population densities for each borough on that basis are given in column (A) of the table. The mid-year population estimates are revised annually by OPCS.

The calculation of population densities for the urban areas of each London borough, excluding the main areas of open land and green belt, are available from the 1981 census. Figures on that basis are given in column (B).

Caravan Sites

Sir George Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the local authorities in England which have not yet been designated under the Caravan Sites Act 1968.

Sir George Young: Sixty-three per cent. of local authorities in England are not designated under the Caravan Sites Act 1968. For brevity, I list those authorities which are designated by type of authority.

Planning Applications

Mr. Gorst: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of local authority planning refusals have been overruled by an inspector in the last 12 months for which figures are available.

Sir George Young: In the 12-month period ending February 1991, 32·3 per cent of appeals to the Secretary of State, following a local authority decision to refuse a planning application, were allowed.

Mr. Gorst: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any plans to afford the same rights to those who object to a planning application as apply to property developers when an appeal by the developers is made to him following refusal of planning consent by a local authority.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend is required by statute to take into account any representations about planning appeals made to him by third parties, so long as they are relevant to the case, regardless of the procedure followed. Although most third parties appear at a public local inquiry only at the inspector's discretion, inspectors are instructed not to refuse to hear such parties without good reason, particularly if the result of the inquiry could adversely affect their interests.

Mr. Gorst: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he has any plans to compensate local authorities for the money they spend to defend their planning decisions;

(2) what steps he takes to ensure that the amount of money spent by local authorities to defend their decisions is justified and reasonable; and if he will give figures for the amount spent by each local authority for 1988, 1989 and 1990.

Sir George Young: It is for local authorities to decide how much to spend on defending their planning decisions at appeal. Information is not available about the amount spent by each authority in the last three years. Fees for planning applications are set to recover about 50 per cent. of authorities' development control costs, which include costs incurred at appeal, and those fees are being raised progressively with the aim of covering 100 per cent. of development control costs. Where unreasonable behaviour by another party at a public local inquiry results in unnecessary expense to a local planning authority my right hon. Friend may award costs to the authority. Fifty-four such awards were made in 1989-90.

HEALTH

Female Circumcision

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make funding available for courses for doctors and nurses for in-service training to help deal with the physical and psychological consequences of female circumcision.

Mr. Dorrell: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) on 25 March, at columns 322-24. It is for the health authorities concerned to provide funding for in-service training.

Medical Staff (South Manchester Health Authority)

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) junior doctors, (b) consultants and (c) nurses were employed by the South Manchester health authority in March 1979 and March 1991, respectively.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The table shows the figures for 1982 and 1989, the earliest and latest years for which comparable information is available.

South Manchester health authority as at 30 September each year[1]

	1982	1989
Junior Doctors[2]	230	260
Consultants	140	150
Nursing and Midwifery Staff[3]	3,030	3,110

Notes:
[1] All figures are rounded to the nearest 10 whole-time equivalents.
[2] Staff included: Registrars, Senior House Officers, House Officers (excluding all locum staff). Senior Registrar figures are not available at a district level.
[3] Includes Agency Staff.

Hospital Beds, South London

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the number of beds available (i) to NHS patients and (ii) private patients in (a) Guy's hospital, (b) King's College hospital, (c) St. Thomas's hospital, (d) Lewisham and North Southwark health authority, (e) Camberwell health authority and (f) West Lambeth health authority at the beginning of each financial year since 1979.

Mr. Dorrell: I shall let the hon. Member have such information as is available as soon as possible.

Departmental Land, London

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much land his Department owns in London; and how much of that land is unused.

Mr. Dorrell: The Department does not own land in London. At 31 March 1990—the latest figures available—the NHS owned approximately 1,700 hectares of land in the Greater London area, of which approximately 400 hectares had been identified as surplus to requirements.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy to commission a report on the likely total job losses in opting-out hospitals in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No. Trusts are in the vanguard of the shift away from central control. They have the capacity and capability to use their new-found freedoms for the benefit of their patients.

Patient Referrals

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what machinery exists to deal with disputes between purchasing health authorities and non budget-holding general practitioners over the appropriateness or otherwise of referrals of patients for treatment by hospitals with which the purchasers do not have contracts.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: It has always been recognised that GPs will sometimes wish to refer a patient to a hospital or service with which the patient's district health authority (DHA) has no contract in place. District health authorities have been asked to plan to take account of this and are holding reserves of funds to meet the cost of expected levels of these referrals.

Mrs. Bottomley: District health authorities would not generally be expected to challenge such referrals, unless they were clearly perverse or wholly unjustified on clinical grounds. However, DHAs would have to make a judgment on the relative priority of providing funding for the treatment. In an emergency, treatment will always be provided immediately and the cost met by the DHA. In non-urgent cases, DHAs will be expected to fund treatment as quickly as available resources allow, taking account of the clinical priority of the individual case.

Clinical Treatment

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are his Department's plans for dealing with those cases whereby national health service patients registered with budget-holding general practitioners are denied access to clinical treatment which is still available to those registered with non budget-holding practitioners; if he will take steps to prevent further such occurrences; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Fundholding practices are responsible for purchasing a defined range of hospital treatment for their patients. For treatment not included in this range, their patients are covered by the relevant district health authority's contract. Fundholding practices are allocated budgets which have as their starting point previous hospital usage and prescribing patterns. They are neither preferentially funded nor disadvantaged compared with district health authorities.

WALES

Computerised Systems

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if general practitioners have achieved the target set by his Department of 80 per cent. making use of computerised systems by April 1991.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: It is believed that the target set, in "Agenda for Action", to have 80 per cent. of general practices in Wales computerised, has not been achieved. The current estimate is 60 to 65 per cent. computerised. The position will be confirmed through a survey of general practice computerisation presently being undertaken in England and Wales by the Department of Health. To achieve the target figures, GPs will need to be encouraged to computerise their practices. Computerisation is being promoted by:

(a) the two GP computing advisers for Wales and family health service authority (FHSAs) IT officers.
(b) proposed changes to the direct reimbursement scheme for GP practice computerisation to make it more flexible, and by devolving funds for managing the scheme from the Welsh Office to FHSAs.
(c) the GP computing project which aims, over a three-year period, to increase and co-ordinate the spread and utilisation of general practice computing in Wales.

Open-heart Surgery Centre

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a list of those hospitals currently being considered as the second open-heart surgery centre in south Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Information concerning the provision of a second cardiac facility will be announced when we have fully considered all appropriate options.

Earlswood Roundabout (Traffic Lights)

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish the criteria he has used to determine delaying the installation of temporary traffic lights at the Earlswood roundabout until 1993.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The traffic signals are to be provided as part of an improvement to Earlswood roundabout and will be permanent, operating on a part-time basis at peak periods. The roundabout is being used as a temporary access for the M4 construction between Earlswood and Lonlas. Should the improvement and the traffic lights be installed now, serious contractual problems would result.

Road Improvements

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the estimated total spending on major improvement schemes by his Department on (a) the A55 trunk road and (b) the M4 for each year since 1979.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Expenditure on major improvement schemes, including schemes completed, in progress and in preparation, for each year since 1979 is:

£ million

Unfit Meat

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will place in the Library, for each of the last five years, the number of bovine animals that his veterinary officers have found to contain prohibited artificial substances rendering the meat unfit for human consumption; what is the nature of the substances; and what is the number of prosecutions which followed.

Mr. David Hunt: Information on this matter is held centrally. My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food will be placing a note in the Library of the House containing the details for Great Britain.

Agriculture Prices

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table showing the price levels of primary agricultural products in Wales over the last 15 years.

Mr. David Hunt: Prices for five products are shown in the following tables:

Mentally Handicapped People

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has for public consultation on his second phase of the review of the all-Wales strategy for the development of services for people with a mental handicap; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: We intend to publish shortly outline proposals for the future development of services for people with mental handicaps in Wales. There will be a period of public consultation on them until the late summer, including discussions with each county planning team during June and July. We will very much welcome comments from service users and their families and all others with an interest.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the timetable for the review of the all-Wales strategy for his development of services for people with a mental handicap.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The formal review of the all-Wales strategy for the development of services for people with mental handicaps was launched on 26

November 1990, and comments were invited by 22 February 1991. Almost 120 written responses were received, and we are currently considering how the strategy might be taken forward beyond the original 10 years, which will end in March 1993.

The second round of public consultation, following the publication shortly of our outline proposals, will last until the late summer. We intend to make a final announcement about the arrangements for further development of services before the end of the year.

Employment Statistics

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will list (a) the total number of jobs created or safeguarded in Wales and (b) the location and number of jobs between June 1987 and May 1990;

(2) what is his estimate of (a) the total number of jobs created or safeguarded in Wales and (b) the locations and numbers of jobs since May 1990.

Mr. David Hunt: The information requested is not held centrally by my Department. However, the following table shows, for each county, the total jobs expected to be created and/or safeguarded on projects associated with offers of regional selective assistance (RSA) and revised regional development grants (RDG) made during the periods 1 June 1987 to 31 May 1990 and 1 June 1990 to 29 April 1991.

The table also shows totals of jobs achieved on projects which have attracted regional selective assistance since 1972 and revised regional development grants since 1984.

Ambulance Service

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he has any plans to change the structure and organisation of the ambulance service in Wales, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The structure and organisation of patient transport services in Wales are currently being examined by independent consultants commissioned by the Department. I will consult widely on their recommendations before deciding whether to make any changes.

District General Hospitals

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list all district general hospitals in Wales and provide for each (a) the total establishment and (b) the actual number of employees in post on 1 April, in each case giving the total figure and the breakdown by categories including (i) consultants, (ii) junior hospital doctors, (iii) senior nurses and nurse managers, (iv) nurses, (v) auxiliary staff, (vi) MLSOs and (vii) other categories of staff.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The available information, which relates to staff in pay units associated with DGHs, is given in the table. Staff establishment figures are not available centrally and medical and dental staff in post figures are not available below district health authority level.

Staff in post (numbers) as at 31 March 1991

Note: Not all staff will work wholly at the hospitals with which they are included and staff in other units may work part of their time at the hospitals listed.

Welsh Development Agency

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total sum paid out in fees by the Welsh Development Agency to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. David Hunt: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave him on Wednesday 1 May 1991.

Advertising

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total expenditure by the Welsh Office in 1990-91 on (a) press advertising, (b) television advertising and (c) other advertising and promotion.

Mr. David Hunt: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) on 25 April 1991, at columns 537-40.

Dentists

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many dentists were employed in the national health service in each county in Wales in each of the last five years; and how many are currently employed.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Information on the number of dentists[1] employed in the national health service in the years 1985 to 1989—the latest available data—is given in the table.

County	1985	1986	1987	1988	1989

[1] General dental practitioners, including assistants, as at 1 October, community dental staff as at 30 September and hospital dental staff, excluding hospital practitioners and clinical assistants, as at 30 September.

Wind Farms

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will provide policy guidelines on the creation, siting and construction of wind farms in rural Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: Detailed planning guidance on renewable energy, including wind farms, is being prepared.

Health Service (Advertising)

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was (a) the amount devoted to the national health service in Wales and (b) the percentage of expenditure under each heading that was devoted to the national health service in Wales in each of the six years 1985-86 to 1990-91 in respect of his Department's expenditure on (i) press and advertising, (ii) television advertising and (iii) other advertising and promotion.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The information is as follows:

Gross expenditure on the NHS

Years	£ million
1985-86	953
1986-87	1,025
1987-88	1,135
1988-89	1,270
1989-90	1,376
1990-91	1,554

Health advertising expenditure as a percentage of total Welsh Office advertising expenditure

(ii) TV	92·98	41·18
(iii) Other	17·01	31·01

Note: Figures for expenditure on advertising for the years prior to 1989-90 are not available.

Hospitals (Trust Status)

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list all those hospitals in Wales which have (a) asked for information about the process and implications of transfer to trust status, (b) expressed interest in transferring to trust status and (c) communicated to him or his officials a wish or intention to seek approval for transfer to trust status.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The decision on whether to apply for self-governing status is a matter for individual health service units. To date, only Pembrokeshire has indicated its intention to apply to become a national health service trust. The potential development of trusts elsewhere in Wales will become known only when formal expressions of interest have been submitted.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Additionality

Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the outcome of the ministerial meeting concerning additionality of funds held between himself and European Commissioner Millan on 25 April.

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what conclusion he came to after his meeting with Commissioner Bruce Millan on additionality.

Mr. Lilley: With my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Northern Ireland, Wales and Scotland, and other Ministers, I met Mr. Bruce Millan, European Commissioner with responsibility for regional policies, on Thursday 25 April to discuss issues relating to the Community's structural funds.

We discussed a range of issues concerning the funds' grants in the United Kingdom, as well as broader matters relating to the future of the funds.

The proposed RECHAR programmes of grants for United Kingdom coalfield areas were one of the subjects discussed. The meeting helped reduce the misunderstanding there has been about the additionality of Community grants. I remain in touch with the Commission and hope that agreement will now soon be reached to enable these useful programmes to proceed.

Export Credits Guarantee Department

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the total sum paid out in fees by the Export Credits Guarantee Department to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Sainsbury: The figures are as follows:

1986-87	382
1987-88	365
1988-89	719
1989-90	691
[1]1990-91	581
[2]1991-92	673

[1] Provisional.
[2] Budget (provisional).

Notes:
1. Comparable figures for the years before 1986-87 are not readily available.
2. The figures exclude fees paid to professional advisers in connection with the proposed privatisation of the short term insurance business of ECGD.

Personal Sequestration

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on progress being made by his Department on its investigation on the operation of the system of personal sequestration in Scotland; and if he will list those persons and organisations so far consulted.

Mr. Redwood: The evaluation is in its final stages. Officials have discussed the operation of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act 1985 with various organisations and individuals, but there has been no formal consultation process. Those who have helped include:

Citizens Advice Scotland
Money Advice Scotland
The Consumer Credit Association of the UK
The Credit Services Association
The Scottish Courts Administration
The Accountant in Bankruptcy
Professor William McBryde of Dundee University
A. M. Hamilton of McGregor Donald Messrs. Pannell Kerr Foster
Messrs. Cork Gully
Adam Berkley of Watson Personal Finance
The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland

I have also received, or had forwarded to me, representations on the subject from other organisations and individuals, including:

The Radio, Electrical and Television Retailers Association
Geoffrey Ognall of Legal & Trade
Mrs. Maria Stepek
N. Firestone, Firestone Wilson

Soviet Union Export Credits

Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about the availability of medium-term cover to the Soviet Union from the Export Credits Guarantee Department for the use of British exporters.

Mr. Sainsbury: ECGD cover for medium-term export credits for the Soviet Union is currently being reviewed and new commitments are not being undertaken pending the outcome of the review.

Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list those Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries which at present offer medium-term cover export credits for business with the Soviet Union and those which do not.

Mr. Sainsbury: As far as is known, all OECD members are presently offering cover for medium-term export credits for the Soviet Union with the exception of Sweden, which is postponing decisions on new applications.

Insurance Services Group

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what contacts he has had with the chairman and chief executive of Sun Alliance regarding its proposed bid for the Insurance Services Group of ECGD.

Mr. Sainsbury: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has had no such contacts.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what provision he made to establish a reserve price for net proceeds to the Exchequer from the sale of the Insurance Services Group of ECGD.

Mr. Sainsbury: Price will be an important but not the sole criterion in decisions about the sale of the short-term business of ECGD.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has on the dates on which the management team of (a) Assicurazioni Generali, (b) NCM, (c) Trade Indemnity and (d) any other bidders visited Cardiff with a view to preparing bids for the Insurance Services Group of ECGD.

Mr. Sainsbury: Visits to Cardiff were offered to each of the management teams of the companies invited to tender for the short-term business of ECGD. The dates on which those visits took place were as follows:

	Date
Trade Indemnity	3 April
Sun Alliance	4 April
Assicurazioni Generali	10 April
NCM	16 April
COBAC	17 April

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what facilities were given to representatives of the appropriate trade unions to meet the management of Assuricazioni Generali, NCM, COBAC, Eagle Star, Sun Alliance and Trade Indemnity during their exploratory visits to ECGD, Cardiff, prior to finalising their bids for the Insurance Services Group.

Mr. Sainsbury: Each of the shortlisted companies invited to bid for the short-term business of ECGD was invited by Government to meet representatives of the appropriate trade unions during their visit to Cardiff. Each company which visited Cardiff had such a meeting.

SCOTLAND

Scottish Natural Heritage

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what conveniently available figures he has of the number of contract staff currently working for Scottish Natural Heritage; and what steps are being taken to ensure that the reservoir of expertise among those who worked on contract for the Nature Conservancy Council in Scotland has been kept available for Scottish Natural Heritage.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: At present there are 65 contract staff working for the Nature Conservancy Council in Scotland and 19 contract staff working for the Countryside Commission for Scotland.

Subject to parliamentary approval of the Natural Heritage (Scotland) Bill, it is hoped that Scottish Natural Heritage will be established on 1 April 1992. Staff on contracts with the predecessor bodies with termination dates after 1 April 1992 will have their contracts honoured. Scottish Natural Heritage will also be able to appoint or re-appoint contract staff where appropriate. Decisions on staff levels and structures will be taken later this year.

Local Tax Exemplifications

Mr. Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a detailed note on the methodology and valuation estimates used to produce his recent local tax exemplifications for Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Details of the basis of calculation of the exemplifications were provided in a note that accompanied the figures. If the hon. Member has any specific queries not covered in the note, I would be happy to respond to them.

Mr. Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information is held by the district valuer on capital valuation of domestic properties in (a) the public and (b) the private sector in Scotland; and if any other section of the Inland Revenue provided capital valuation information for his recent exemplifications for a local tax in Scotland.

Mr. Maples: I have been asked to reply.

The valuation office Scotland holds for valuation and land ownership purposes information about various types of property, including a record of all sales of heritable property obtained from the public records or the Department of Registers of Scotland. No other part of the Revenue provided capital valuation information to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Urban Motorways

Mr. David Marshall: to ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the total mileage of urban motorway in each urban area of Scotland (a) already constructed and in operation, (b) under construction at present and (c) planned for the future.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Details of public road lengths by region and class as at 1 April 1990 are given in table 5.2 of "Scottish Transport Statistics 1989". The figures for Strathclyde region include 47 km of motorway within the Glasgow city boundary. As urban motorways are the responsibility of local roads authorities, their construction and planning are dependent on local authority processing of statutory procedures and availability of finance. These plans are subject to change. Currently under construction by Strathclyde region is 4·6 km of non-trunk urban motorway—part of the M80 Stepps bypass, which is a joint scheme with the Scottish Office.

Forestry Commission

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total sum paid out in fees by the Forestry Commission to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Forestry Commission does not keep a separate record of fees paid to consultants. A general search of the relevant files has identified only one occasion when consultants were employed to advise on management questions. That was in 1984, at a cost of £17,000. The commission has no current plans to employ management consultants.

Scottish Development Agency

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total sum paid out in fees by the Scottish Development Agency to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Allan Stewart: This is an operational matter for Scottish Enterprise, which succeeded the Scottish Development Agency on 1 April 1991, and I have asked the chairman to write to the hon. Member.

Legal Aid

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: to ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what proportion of the Scottish population is today eligible for (a) legal advice and assistance and (b) civil legal aid; and what was the figure in 1979.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is not available.

Pupil Expenditure

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing the expenditure per pupil on (i) books and (ii) equipment in (a) primary schools and (b) secondary schools in cash and real terms since 1976.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 29 April 1991]: Information from 1977, the earliest year for which details are available in the form requested, is given in the tables, which have been compiled from local authority financial returns. Expenditure on equipment was not separately identified in these returns until 1982-83. There have been some variations from year to year in the recording of expenditure under these two headings. It is therefore possible that some expenditure on books may be included under expenditure on equipment and vice versa.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Management Consultants

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the total sum paid out in fees by the Overseas Development Administration to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mrs. Chalker: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State on 1 May.

Food Aid (EC)

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs for what reasons Her Majesty's Government's representative opposed the European Commission proposal on the funding of the EC's 400,000 tonnes of food aid for Africa, at the meeting of the Committee of Permanent Representatives of Member States on 23 April; and if he will make it his policy to end Her Majesty's Government's opposition to the proposal in order to secure a COREPER decision on funding at its meeting on 2 May.

Mrs. Chalker: We endorsed during last week's discussions in COREPER the proposal of the EC Commission to make available an extra 400,000 tonnes of EC food aid for the relief of famine in Africa. We proposed that the food aid should be sent to Africa this week and the funding sorted out later. I wrote to Commissioner Marin earlier this week making the same point. I hope that agreement can be reached at COREPER today.

Kurds

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East, on 25 April, Official Report, columns 507-8, if he will list those supplies which were donated to the Overseas Development Administration and give details of the organisations which made such donations.

Mrs. Chalker: The following relief supplies on aircraft chartered by ODA were donated:

Supplies	Donor
2,500 groundsheets	Salvation Army
120,000 blankets	Mersey Regional Health Authority
216,000 multivitamin capsules	Nature Slim UK

The other supplies on ODA flights were purchased by the ODA from various suppliers, including some non-governmental organisations. The ODA also paid the costs of chartering the Oxfam flight on 22 April, carrying two Land Rovers and drinking water supply equipment. In addition, a further flight has gone to Iran carrying goods donated by the public.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Kuwait

Mr. Prescott: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs at what time, GMT and local, the British ambassador to Kuwait first learnt of the invasion of Kuwait by the Iraqi forces on 2 August 1990; at what time, GMT and locally, he was aware of the attack on the royal palace; and how far the palace is from his residence.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 14 November 1990, at column 136. At approximately 03.00 GMT, 06.00 Kuwait local time, on 2 August the ambassador became aware of an Iraqi attack on the royal palace, which is less than a quarter of a mile from the ambassador's residence.

Trilogue Meeting

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is Her Majesty's Government's policy on how the 1 billion ecu of new resources for EC external purposes should be allocated by the trilogue meeting on 2 May.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The trilogue on 2 May will discuss proposed revisions to the financial prespectives for both 1991 and 1992. We are participating constructively in the Council perparations for this trilogue. We shall continue to press the need for additional provisions to be fully justified.

Safe Havens

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his policy of widening safe havens.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We are continuing with our policy for the establishment of safe havens. Work on the camp at Zakho is well advanced and preparations are being made for further safe havens.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Post

Mr. Steen: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will take steps to ensure that post which arrrives for an hon. Member at the House Post Office is delivered the same say at hon. Members' offices outside the main building.

Mr. MacGregor: I have asked the Serjeant at Arms to look into the matter and he will contact the hon. Member.

DEFENCE

Recruits (Minimum Age)

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the minimum age for recruits for the Royal Marines and RAF; and how long this has been so.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The minimum age for recruitment to the Royal Marines and RAF is as follows:

	Males	Females
Royal Marines
Officers	17 years 6 months	—
Servicemen	16 years	—
Royal Air Force
Officers	17 years 6 months	18 years
Servicemen	16 years 6 months	17 years

In the time available, it has not been possible to ascertain precisely how long the age limits have been in force. The minimum age for RM service men is believed to have increased to 16 with the raising of the school leaving age in 1972. In the RAF, the current minimum age limits for officers and airwomen have been in place since at least 1967. The minimum recruitment age for airmen has been 16 years 6 months since 1981. Between 1967 and 1980 it varied between 16, 16 years 6 months and 17.

Nuclear Submarines

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will list the sites currently being considered for interim disposal of (a) HMS Warspite (b) HMS Churchill and (c) HMS Conqueror;

(2) what research his Department currently is undertaking into cutting up reactors from decommissioned nuclear fleet submarines in a contained environment.

Mr. Alan Clark: A number of options are currently under consideration for the method and location of the interim storage and eventual disposal of decommissioned nuclear submarines.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he had with his NATO counterparts regarding the disposal of nuclear fleet submarines after decommissioning.

Mr. Alan Clark: There is a regular exchange of information between the United States and United Kingdom Governments under the 1958 mutual defence agreement and we are generally aware of each other's views. The only other NATO member operating nuclear submarines is France, with whom we have held no substantive discussions on the subject.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the independent expert members of the nuclear-powered warship safety committee who have specific expertise in (a) reactor safety and (b) decommissioning of nuclear-powered submarines.

Mr. Alan Clark: The membership of the nuclear-powered warship safety committee is confidential.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he makes it his policy to rule out the disposal of decommissioned nuclear fleet submarines at sea.

Mr. Alan Clark: A number of options are currently under consideration for the method and location of the interim storage and eventual disposal of decommissioned nuclear submarines. But the Government are keeping under review whether the option of disposing of large decommissioned items at sea needs to be maintained.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what joint research with other NATO countries his Department has commissioned in the last 10 years regarding disposal of nuclear fleet submarines.

Mr. Alan Clark: None.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the locations of all Z-berth sites in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: United Kingdom Z-berths, including buoys and anchorages, are at:

Barrow-in-Furness
Barry
Broadford Bay
Brodick Bay
Campbeltown
Cardiff
Coulport
Dales Voe
Devonport and Plymouth Sound
Faslane
The Firth of Forth
Glen Mallan
Holy Loch
Lamlash Bay
Lerwick
Liverpool
Loch Ewe
Loch Fyne
Loch Goil
Loch Long
Loch Na Beiste
Loch Striven
Portland
Portree
Portsmouth
Raasay
Rosyth
Rothesay
Southampton
Spithead
Thurso Bay
Torbay

In addition, we have decided to establish a Z-berth at Swansea.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the longest estimated half-life of components inside the reactors of (a) HMS Conqueror, (b) HMS Churchill and (c) HMS Warspite.

Mr. Alan Clark: Components as such do not have half-lives. The term half-life is associated with the radioactive decay of individual isotopes.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the maximum number of decommissioned nuclear fleet submarines which can be laid up at (a) Devonport and (b) Rosyth without taking away berths which would otherwise be used by operational ships at those sites.

Mr. Alan Clark: There would be sufficient berths at Rosyth and Devonport to store all decommissioned nuclear submarines for the foreseeable future without penalty to operations.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether the moratorium of the London dumping convention is binding in respect of disposal of decommissioned nuclear fleet submarines.

Mr. Alan Clark: No.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the formal decommissioning of HMS Conqueror will now take place.

Mr. Alan Clark: HMS Conqueror was formally decommissioned from Royal Navy service on 31 December 1990. The first stage of decommissioning, in the separate sense that the word is applied to radioactive facilities, will begin shortly.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what aspects of the material condition of (a) HMS Warspite, (b) HMS Churchill and (c) HMS Conqueror contributed to the decision to decommission them.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: It is not our normal practice to comment on the material state of individual submarines. Whilst the material state of ships and submarines is taken into account when decisions are taken to decommission them, it was not a major factor in the decisions to decommission Warspite, Churchill and Conqueror except in the general sense that they were among the Royal Navy's older and therefore less capable submarines.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consideration his Department is giving to the potential safety implications of the technical defect discovered in HMS Warspite at the end of 1989 in respect of the options for interim disposal of decommissioned nuclear fleet submarines.

Mr. Alan Clark: The technical defect discovered in HMS Warspite has no bearing on the options for the decommissioning and disposal of the Royal Navy's nuclear-powered submarines.

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which of the existing Z-berth sites are being considered as options for interim disposal of decommissioned nuclear fleet submarines.

Mr. Alan Clark: None.

Ministry of Defence Land (London)

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much land his Department owns in London; and how much of that land is unused.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The Ministry of Defence currently holds the freehold interest to 1,232 hectares—3,045 acres—in the Greater London area, of which 20 hectares—42 acres—is unused and available for disposal. A further 32 hectares—79 acres—is occupied by the Ministry of Defence on leasehold terms.

Foxhunter Radar

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Foxhunter radar systems have been delivered to the RAF, and how many of the delivered systems meet the RAF's minimum operational requirement.

Mr. Alan Clark: Of a total of 200 radars on order, 183 have been delivered to the RAF for installation in Tornado F3s, all of which have been cleared for service use.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current status of the Foxhunter radar procurement programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: Development of stage 1 of the two-stage improvement programme has now been completed and modification of in-service radars is well under way. Development of stage 2 is expected to be completed this year.

Defence Budget

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his policy regarding the release of information on the long-term costings of the defence budget.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The 10-year costing of the defence programme—known as the long-term costing—is designed for internal planning purposes. Approval to commit expenditure is subject to separate procedures and endorsement by Ministers as appropriate. To avoid giving a misleading impression as to the firmness of our plans we would not therefore normally provide details of the contents of the long-term costing.

"Options for Change"

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence by when it is intended that the results of the "Options for Change" study will be fully implemented.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: We intend to move to new force structures by the mid-1990s.

EH101 Helicopters

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to procure a utility variant of the EH101 helicopter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: We are considering the results of the project definition phase of the utility EH101. As I explained to the House on 22 January this year, the analysis is taking longer than expected because of the need to take into account the implications of changes in Europe.

International Arms Register

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consideration has been given by his Department to the possibility of establishing an international arms register.

Mr. Alan Clark: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has stated his support for a United Nations arms transfer register. My Department is working with all other interested Departments to further this important initiative. In parallel, my Department has supplied the chairman for a United Nations experts study group which will be reporting shortly to the Secretary General on measures to promote arms transfer transparency including the setting up of an international arms transfer register.

Ballykelly Army Base

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether a file has been sent to the Director of Public Prosecutions in Northern Ireland regarding allegations that a fraud ring operated at Ballykelly Army base in recent years during contract work for the Army.

Mr. Yeo: I have been asked to reply.
I understand that police inquiries are continuing.

EMPLOYMENT

Offshore Pipeline Valves

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many of the 193 valves required to be fitted as a result of Offshore Installations (Emergency Pipe-line Valve) Regulations 1989 were fitted as at 31 March.

Mr. Forth: As at 31 March 1991, 164 of the total 192 emergency shutdown valves had been fitted or relocated in compliance with the Offshore Installations (Emergency Pipeline Valve) Regulations 1989. Of the 28 valves remaining at 31 March, 25 of them are in the Brent field and all the associated pipelines are shut down pending installation of the valves.

British Tourist Authority

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the total sum paid out in fees by the British Tourist Authority to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Forth: These matters are the responsibility of the board of the British Tourist Authority, and I am asking the chairman to write directly to the hon. Gentleman.

Ford Car Factory

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will assess the effect on the level of unemployment on Merseyside of the proposed reduction in employment in the Ford car factory.

Mr. Forth: I have no plans to make such an assessment. The company has announced a reduction in staffing of 2,800 at its Halewood plant to be phased in over several years, and to be achieved in the main by natural wastage, early retirement and voluntary redundancy.

The normal range of services and facilities of the Department and of the employment service will be available to Ford employees who lose their jobs.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Income Tax

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table showing the change in income tax in 1991-92 as against the 1978-79 indexed regime, broken down into the top 1 per cent., 5 per cent., 10 per cent. and bottom 50 per cent. of taxpayers showing the total change and the average gain.

Mr. Maude: Latest estimates of the annual change in income tax liability resulting from the changes in tax rates, allowances, and thresholds are in the table. The 1978-79 income tax regime has been indexed to 1991-92 levels by reference to the statutory formula, and allowing for independent taxation.

For the purposes of these calculations, the indexed regime 1978-79 has been applied directly to the income base of 1991-92. In practice, retention of the 1978-79 regime, indexed as appropriate, for the intervening years would have led to changes in the income base.

Reductions in income tax per individual[1] in 1991-92 compared with the 1978-79 indexed regime

Quantile group of individual taxpayers	Total reductions 1991-92 prices	Average reduction at 1991-92 prices
	£ million	£
Top 1 per cent.	8,600	30,900
Top 5 per cent.	12,500	9,000
Top 10 per cent.	15,000	5,400
Bottom 50 per cent.	4,000	300
All taxpayers	28,700	1,000

[1] Individuals liable to income tax under the 1978-79 indexed regime.

I regret that my reply to a related question on 15 April 1991, at columns 13-14, was incorrect. The corrected table is as follows.

Average reduction in income tax per individual in 1991-92 compared with 1978-79 indexed regime

Range of individual's income in 1991-92 £	Average reduction at 1991-92 income levels £
Under 5,000	130
5,000-10,000	350
10,000-15,000	650
15,000-20,000	950
20,000-25,000	1,300
25,000-30,000	1,700
30,000-40,000	2,400
40,000-50,000	3,800
50,000-60,000	6,300
60,000-70,000	9,800
over 70,000	38,600
Total	1,000

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the effect on Treasury revenues in 1991-92 and in a full year of introducing an alternative minimum tax of (a) 20 per cent. and (b) 25 per cent. of gross income on all taxpayers with a gross income over (i) £40,000, (ii) £45,000 and (iii) £50,000 a year.

Mr. Maude: The information is as follows:

Additional tax liability arising from introduction of alternative minimum tax on gross income: 1991-92

Gross income of individual taxpayer (£)	Rate of minimum tax
	20 per cent. £ million	25 per cent. £ million
Over 40,000	40	225
Over 45,000	30	115
Over 50,000	25	80

The estimates do not take account of any behavioural effects which might result from the introduction of the new arrangements.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the effect on Treasury revenues in 1991-92 and in a full year of a 1 per cent. cut in the basic rate of income tax; and what would be the cumulative effect after five years of an additional 1 per cent. cut each year, assuming indexation of the current structure of income tax.

Mr. Maude: A one penny cut in the basic rate of income tax in 1991-92 would have a direct revenue cost of about £1·9 billion in 1991-92 and £2·0 billion in 1992-93. The cost in a full year at 1991-92 levels of income would also be about £1·9 billion. Costs of changes in later years will depend on the growth of income.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the effect on Treasury revenues in 1991-92 of introducing higher rate bands of income tax equal to 45 per cent. on taxable incomes from £30,200 to £36,700 and 50 per cent. on taxable incomes over £36,700.

Mr. Maude [pursuant to his reply, 1 May 1991]: The answer should have read as follows:

The yield at 1991-92 levels of income of introducing the rates of income tax shown in the table is estimated to be about £1 billion in 1991-92, and about £2 billion in a full year.

Taxable income £	Rate per cent.
1 to 23,700	25
23,700 to 30,200	40
30,200 to 36,700	45
36,700 and over	50

Taxable income is income subject to tax from all sources after deducting allowances and reliefs. The estimate does not take account of the consequential effect on capital gains tax, nor does it allow for any behavioural effects that might result from such an increase.

Personal Allowances

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the effect on tax revenues in 1991-92 and in a full year of (i) a 5 per cent., (ii) a 10 per cent. and (iii) a 15 per cent. increase in the personal allowances and age-related personal allowances for income tax, not including the married couple's, widow's and additional personal allowances, assuming the benefit of the increase is limited to the basic rate of tax.

Mr. Maude: The information is given in the table, which assumes that the changes are restricted to the basic rate of income tax:

Increase[1] in personal allowances[2]	Direct revenue effect (cost(−)/yield(+))
	Receipts in 1991-92		In a full year at 1991-92 income levels
	Compared with 1990-91 allowances £ million	Compared with statutory indexation £ million	Compared with 1990-91 allowances £ million	Compared with statutory indexation £ million
(i) 5 per cent.	−0·9	+0·8	−1·1	+1·0
(ii) 10 per cent.	−1·7	−0·1	−2·2	−0·1
(iii) 15 per cent.	−2·5	−0·9	−3·2	−1·2

[1] Percentage increases are based on the 1990-91 levels of allowances.
[2] Excluding married couple's allowance for those aged under 65, additional personal allowance, and widows bereavement allowance.

Value Added Tax

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what items of safety equipment used to prevent accidents both at home and at work are exempt for VAT; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will list the items of safety equipment used in work places on which a refund of VAT can be claimed;

(3) if he has any proposals to introduce VAT exemptions on items of home safety equipment; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The only items of safety equipment specifically zero rated for VAT are supplies of protective boots and helmets to industry for the purchaser's own personal use. VAT on other safety items supplied for use in respect of taxable business activities may be reclaimed in the normal way. It would be contrary to European Community law to extend our current VAT zero-rating provisions. Although member states may retain zero rates which were in force on 31 December 1975, they may neither widen the scope of existing provisions nor introduce new ones.

Volunteer Drivers

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make it his policy to ensure that no volunteer drivers will be made liable for tax on their mileage during the financial year 1991-92.

Mr. Maude: The position in law is that, if drivers for a voluntary car service receive mileage allowances which do no more than reimburse the expenses they have actually incurred, there will be no liability to income tax. But if they receive allowances which exceed their expenses, the profit may be taxable.

The great majority of drivers cover modest mileages each year and receive modest allowances providing no or minimal profit; and there is no question of taxing these. However, some volunteer drivers receive very significant amounts of allowances. With my approval, the Inland Revenue is considering whether any advice needs to be given to organisations involved with volunteer drivers. Until that review is completed, neither organisations using volunteer drivers nor the drivers themselves will be expected to take any action so far as income tax is concerned, in relation to mileage allowances for voluntary work. Drivers who are in business as taxi, hire car or minibus operators, and do some driving for voluntary car schemes, are regarded as driving in the course of their businesses and should therefore have included any allowances they receive in their business accounts.

I have noted the hon. Gentleman's suggestion about tax liabilities for the year 1991-92. Any new arrangements which may be introduced for what is expected to be the small proportion of drivers who may have a tax liability will be applied only from a current date; and there will be no question of reopening earlier years. I cannot yet say when the Inland Revenue's review will be completed.

Inland Revenue

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total sum paid out in fees by the Inland Revenue to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Maude: Information relating to the financial years 1979-80 to 1987-88 inclusive is not readily available and cannot be obtained without disproportionate cost. The spend on management consultants—excluding computer-related consultancies—for the remaining years is as follows:

Year	£K
1988-89	1,253
1989-90	1,468
[1]1990-91	2,741
[2]1991-92	1,892

[1] Forecast outturn.
[2] Budget.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in the Inland Revenue; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 1 May 1991]: The information is in the table.

Complements are not available for years before 1981.

At the senior level of the service, where management forms a major component of most jobs, there are servicewide common pay and grading arrangements. These unified grades 1 to 7 are known as the open structure and cover grades from permanent secretary level to grade 7 level. Within the unified grades there are no formal barriers to movement between the former occupational groups—for example, scientists, administrators, statisticians. Each post should be filled by the person best equipped in terms of skills, ability and experience.

Customs and Excise

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total sum paid out in fees by HM Customs and Excise to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Customs and Excise estimates that expenditure on management and computer consultancies from 1979-80 to 1990-91 to be as follows:

	£ million
1979-80	Nil
1980-81	Nil
1981-82	Nil
1982-83	Nil
1983-84	0·02
1984-85	0·19
1985-86	1·34
1986-87	2·04
1987-88	1·44
1988-89	3·53
1989-90	3·25
1990-91	2·51

The budget for 1991-92 is £3·86 million.

Valuation Office

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will place a copy of the valuation office's rating circulars numbers 53 and 58 in the Library;

(2) if he will publish details of the valuation exercise carried out by the valuation office in preparation for publication of the Government's council tax proposals.

Mr. Maude: The Inland Revenue valuation office has been working with other Government Departments to provide policy advice to Ministers in connection with the Government's proposals for a new council tax in the usual way. It is not the practice to disclose the basis or the details of such advice.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the cost of the exercises being undertaken by the valuation office in relation to rating circulars 53 and 58; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude: The estimated cost of these exercises is about £275,000.

Finance Bill

Mr. Burns: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the notes on those clauses of the Finance Bill to be taken in Committee of the whole House will be made available to hon. Members.

Mr. Mellor: Yes. The appropriate notes on clauses were placed in the Vote Office earlier today.

Tax Avoidance

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a further statement about measures to combat tax avoidance.

Mr. Maples: The Government intend to bring forward measures in the current Finance Bill aimed at preventing the circumvention of the corporation tax ring fence around profits from North Sea oil, by schemes involving the use of stapled stock.

Section 497 of the Taxes Act 1988 prevents a company from setting off advance corporation tax on distributions made to an associated company against corporation tax on its ring fence profits—broadly the profits from exploring for and producing oil and gas in the United Kingdom and United Kingdom continental shelf. The Government propose to extend this provision to cover distributions made to any shareholder in respect of securities the ownership of which is linked in the form of stapled stock or otherwise to the ownership of shares in an associated company. The proposals will take effect for distributions made on or after today.

Press and Public Relations Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of the Central Office of Information.

Mr. Maples [holding answer 26 April 1991]: The number of staff employed in the press office of the Central Office of Information, which has always equalled the full complement, on 1 April since 1979-80 is as follows:

	Number
1979-80	2
1980-81	1
1981-82	1
1982-83	1
1983-84	1

Research Projects

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list all the research projects (a) currently under way and (b) planned by his Department, giving the title of the research and its completion date in each case.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 30 April 1991]: Research commissioned by my Department and planned commissions are as follows:

Project title	Estimated completion date
In progress:
Competitiveness of United Kingdom financial services	June 1991

HMSO

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in HMSO; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

Mr. Maples [holding answer 1 May 1991]: HMSO has had no separate statistical divisions or statistical posts from 1979 to the present date.

National Savings Department (Staff)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions for the Department for National Savings; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

Mr. Maples [holding answer 1 May 1991]: The numbers of staff employed in the statistical branch of the Department for National Savings in the years 1984-91 were as detailed in the table. Figures for the years 1981-83 are no longer available. There were no statistical posts before July 1981.

Tax Allowances

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish figures showing, for the most recent available date, the value in current prices of all tax reliefs and allowances claimed, on average, by taxpayers with gross incomes between (a) £0-£5,000, (b) £5,000-£10,000, (c) £10,000-£15,000, (d) £15,000-£20,000, (e) £20,000-£25,000, (f) £25,000-£30,000, (g) £30,000-£40,000, (h) £40,000-£50,000 and (i) over £50,000 a year.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 1 May 1991]: Latest estimates for taxpayers in 1990-91 are as follows:

Gross Income £ per year	Amount of tax reliefs and allowances set against income £
0-5,000	3,200
5,000-10,000	4,200

Petrol Duties

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the effect on Treasury revenues in 1991-92 and in a full year of a 1 per cent. increase or decrease in the duties on (a) leaded petrol, (b) unleaded petrol and (c) derv.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 1 May 1991]: The revenue effects include the effect of consequential VAT on excise duty where appropriate. They are as follows:

£ million

	Revenue Gain/Loss
	1991-92	1992-93 (Full year)
Leaded Petrol	45	45
Unleaded Petrol	30	40
Derv	20	25

There is not yet sufficient evidence on which to base reliable estimates of the amount of switching between leaded and unleaded petrol in response to a tax change. As a result, the figures above do not allow for any additional switching.

Business Expansion Scheme

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his forecast for the cost to the Exchequer in 1991-92 and in a full year of the business expansion scheme.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 1 May 1991]: The cost of income tax relief for BES in 1990-91 is provisionally estimated as £120 million. It is too early to make a reliable estimate for 1991-92.

TRANSPORT

Drink Driving

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will consider whether earlier and systematic public information on whether a driver killed in a road crash had consumed alcohol would help to maintain awareness of the dangers of drink driving.

Mr. Chope: We publish aggregated figures based on coroners' data about drivers who were over the legal limit which show that the number of people killed in drink-related accidents has been reduced by 50 per cent. in the past 10 years. I do not believe it would assist in our continuing campaign against drinking and driving to publish details of whether or not an individual driver killed in a road crash had consumed alcohol.

Road Drainage

Mr. McWilliam: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give an estimate of the increased length of repair-free life of a motorway built using modern drainage techniques as opposed to those constructed using traditional techniques.

Mr. Chope: There is no firm evidence to suggest that modern drainage systems are more effective than properly constructed traditional systems. The main objectives of incorporating modern drainage systems are to separate surface water and sub-surface drainage, improve value for money, reduce the demand for scarce aggregate resources and reduce stone scatter.

Mr. McWilliam: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will investigate the reasons for the reluctance of building contractors to fit modern drainage systems in new road building programmes.

Mr. Chope: I am not aware of any reluctance on the part of contractors to fit modern drainage systems, but am willing to look at any examples which the hon. Member can provide.

Cars (Anti-Theft Measures)

Mr. McWilliam: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) when he will next meet representatives of the motor manufacturing industry to discuss the raising of standards of car design to combat theft of and from cars;

(2) when he will next meet representatives of the AA, RAC and National Breakdown to discuss ways in which automobiles can be better designed to combat theft of and from cars.

Mr. Chope: The Government attach a high priority to the need to improve the design of cars to prevent the theft both of cars themselves and of objects from them.

For this reason, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department has recently met representatives from vehicle manufacturers and the insurance industry. My Department was represented at both these meetings. Further meetings with interested parties will be arranged in future.

Urban Motorways

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the total mileage of urban motorway in each urban area of England (a) already constructed and in operation, (b) under construction at present and (c) planned for the future.

Mr. Chope: Information is not held in this form, but there are 350 miles of motorways in the London boroughs and English metropolitan districts.

Airport Security

Mr. Prescott: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if his Department has discussed with British Airways, BAA or the Metropolitan police the allegations made by Mrs. Victoria Tregartha about inadequate security cover at Heathrow.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Department of Transport has discussed Mrs. Tregartha's allegations with British Airways who had no evidence that the firm, which was the subject of Mrs. Tregartha's allegations, was not carrying out its duties satisfactorily. The Department has also been in contact with the Metropolitan police who are still investigating these allegations. There have been no discussions about the allegations with BAA.

Mr. Prescott: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will reconsider his response to the recommendation of the House of Commons Select Committee on Transport for an independent airport security inspectorate with a separate aviation security fund and levy.

Mr. McLoughlin: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans to change the present arrangements whereby, within the Department of Transport, the Aviation Security Inspectorate is independent of the aviation policy divisions. That arrangement is in line with the Select Committee's recommendation. The Government's reasons for rejecting the Select Committee's recommendation that an aviation security fund should be established and paid for by a levy on passengers remain valid. The fund which was abolished in 1983 was bureaucratic, complicated and costly to administer.

Mr. Prescott: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action his Department has taken arising out of the allegations of Mrs. Victoria Tregartha about inadequate security cover by the BA Securiplans company at Heathrow; when the Department was first aware of the allegations; whether it has yet interviewed Mrs. Tregartha; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Department first became aware of the allegations made by Mrs. Tregartha when the article appeared in the Observer on 7 April. Arrangements were then immediately made for one of the Department's aviation security inspectors to inspect Securiplan's operations at Heathrow. There was no evidence during the period of the inspection that departmental requirements were not being met.

The Department has not interviewed Mrs. Tregartha because the Metropolitan police are still investigating the allegations in the article. If it turns out that they are true, the Department will take whatever further action is necessary.

The Department requires airports and airlines to meet the requirements of the national aviation security programme. If airports and airlines use private security firms, they must ensure that the standards required by the programme are met.

DVLA Records

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will quantify the number of disclosures of personal data that have taken place in the last year from driver and vehicle licensing agency records to those people who show reasonable cause as outlined in section 15(1) of the Road Vehicle (Registration and Licencing) Regulations 1971; whether he will describe the procedures that he adopts to satisfy himself of the reasonableness of that cause; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: During the 12 months ended March 1991 the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency (DVLA) has answered 303,618 reasonable cause inquiries about names and addresses of current or past vehicle keepers recorded at DVLA.

"Reasonable cause" is not defined in law. For the purposes of the 1971 regulations the DVLA generally interprets this to mean an inquiry about a vehicle which has been involved in an incident such as an accident or an offence under the road traffic law and the information is essential to resolving the matter. Requests are carefully vetted to ensure a balance is maintained between releasing information where it is justified and protecting the privacy of individual motorists as required under the principles of the Data Protection Act 1984.

Taxi Drivers

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action is taken to ensure that (a) new taxi driver licence applicants and (b) current taxi driver licence holders have declared any past criminal offences.

Mr. McLoughlin: Outside London, section 59 of the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1976 requires district councils, which license taxi drivers, to satisfy themselves that an applicant is a fit and proper person to hold a licence. The majority of councils will require both new applicants and those seeking to renew their licences to declare any past criminal offences, and local authorities sometimes request police corroboration of such declarations. However, information from police records is not generally made available for these purposes.

Departmental Land, London

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much land his Department owns in London; and how much of that land is unused.

Mr. Chope: The Department of Transport owns 220 miles of trunk road in the London area. In addition it has acquired 1,203 dwellings, 103 business premises and approximately 15·5 acres of land in connection with trunk road improvement schemes in the area.

At present 142 of these dwellings are vacant; 66 are now surplus and are to be sold, 61 are due to be demolished soon and 15 are in the process of being let.

Twenty of the business premises are vacant and tenants are being sought.

Of the land acquired for road schemes, 11·5 acres are undeveloped; 2·2 acres have been let and 1·8 acres are now surplus to requirements and are to be sold.

DVLC, Swansea

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what steps he is taking to provide compensation to those driving schools whose business has been adversely affected by the failure of the DVLC, Swansea, to process heavy goods vehicle provisional licence applications within one week;

(2) how much money will be saved now that the work of the area licensing offices has been transferred to the DVLC, Swansea;

(3) what steps he is taking to reinforce the heavy goods vehicle provisional licence department at DVLC, Swansea, now that it is handling all the provisional licence applications previously dealt with by the area offices;

(4) what steps he is taking to ensure that the DVLC, Swansea, provides an equivalent or better service than that previously provided by the area licensing offices; and if he will indicate the number of days it will now take to process a provisional heavy goods vehicle licence application;

(5) how many additional staff were employed at DVLC, Swansea, to cope with the increased work load once the 11 area licensing offices stopped handling heavy goods vehicle provisional licence applications.

Mr. Chope: DVLA assumed full responsibility for the licensing of lorry and bus drivers from 1 April. Around 40 staff have been trained to deal with applications from lorry and bus drivers, with a further 20 staff in those areas dealing with medical cases and inquiries.

Because DVLA inherited some 5,000 uncompleted cases from the traffic area offices, 16 additional staff have been temporarily drafted in from other parts of DVLA to help out, and some overtime is being worked. The inquiry unit's opening hours have also been extended.

The new lorry and bus driver licensing system at DVLA should be more efficient and quicker. The new system is expected to cost around £1 million a year less to run. DVLA is already dealing with most applications in eight to nine working days, which compares well with the target of 10 working days set for the traffic area offices.

I regret that some cases, which were caught up in the transfer of work from the traffic area offices to DVLA, have taken longer. There is no provision for compensation, but when a driver or driving school has asked for a licence urgently, action has been taken whenever possible to resolve any problem and to arrange for the speedy issue of the licence. Provisional vocational driving licences are given the highest priority at DVLA.

Airports (Flying Hours)

Dr. Hampson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the airports in England which have restrictions on flying hours together with the hours during which landing and take-off is permissible.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Department does not have information on flying hour restrictions at all airports in England. Information about the hours during which United Kingdom airports are open is given in such publications as "Pooley's Flight Guide", which is produced annually with the assistance of the Civil Aviation Authority.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Unfit Meat

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will place in the Library, for each of the last five years, the number of bovine animals that his veterinary officers have found to contain prohibited artificial substances rendering the meat unfit for human consumption; what is the nature of the substances; and what is the number of prosecutions which followed.

Mr. Maclean: Yes. The information is being placed in the Library of the House.

Rodenticides

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Caerphilly of 19 April, Official Report, column 271, if he will list those seven products approved under the Control of Pesticides Regulations as rodenticides.

Mr. Maclean: The seven products approved for use by professionals as rodenticides are:

Alphachloralose (pure)
Alphachloralose 4 per cent. ready mixed
Klearwell Alphacloralose Bait
Rentokil Alphachloralose Concentrate Rentokil Alphalard
Rodextron Mouse Bait
Townex Mouse Poison

There is a further approved rodenticide containing alphacloralose, Rentokil Alphakil, available for use by non-professional users.

Veterinary Investigation Centre

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what level of financial support has been granted to each veterinary investigation centre in England in each year from 1979 onwards; and whether he has any plans to increase the level of financial assistance.

Mr. Curry: It is not possible to supply this information at the level requested. The information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Emergency Food Stocks

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether all the foodstuffs held in his Ministry's emergency food stocks are fit for human consumption.

Mr. Maclean: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 30 January 1991, at column 545. Food stocks no longer fit for human consumption are removed from the strategic food stockpile.

Hague Preference

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will meet a deputation from the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations to discuss the Hague preference.

Mr. Curry: We have already had a number of exchanges on this issue with the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations. We are quite willing to include the items in the agenda in future meetings with the NFFO.

Livestock

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any proposals for the improvement of the quality of British livestock; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: The primary impetus for the improvement of the quality of British livestock must come from the marketplace where quality products will receive a premium return if they are marketed effectively.

The Government encourage quality production directly by aiding specialist beef production through the suckler cow premium scheme currently worth over £71 million per year to the industry. In addition, the Government fund a programme of research and development projects costing over £1 million per year to improve techniques for the selection of breeding stock and for the transmission of desirable genetic characteristics from one generation to the next.

Fish Imports

Mr. Battle: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which countries have exported fish to the United Kingdom since 1974; and how much these exports are as a proportion of all United Kingdom fish imports.

Mr. Curry [holding answer 25 April 1991]: The table shows, for the years 1985 to 1990, the main countries exporting fish and products to the United Kingdom, the quantities involved in tonnes, and the percentage shares. Countries exporting less than 10,000 tonnes in each of the years are not listed, though those appearing accounted for some 80 per cent. of the total trade in the years shown. Comparable data for the years before 1985 are not readily available.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Local Education Authority (Finances)

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish a table showing (a) the capital bid for 1990-91 and (b) the capital allocation for 1990-91 for each local education authority in England.

Mr. Fallon: Details of local authority plans and education annual capital guidelines for 1990-91 are set out below, together with bids and allocations for voluntary aided and special agreement schools.

Notes:
1. All figures are in £000s in cash terms.
2. Allocations allow governors to complete work up to the limit set.
3. The Secretary of State pays grant aid at the rate of 85 per cent.

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish a table showing (a) the revenue budget for 1990-91 and (b) the standard spending assessment for 1990-91 for each local education authority in England.

Mr. Fallon: The information requested is given in the table below, together with the amounts of inner London education grants for the relevant authorities.

[1] Inner London education grants are paid to provide, through the support of expenditure on education, transitional help to charge-payers in Inner London boroughs and in the City of London where the authorities inherited responsibility for the education service from the Inner London Education Authority.—

Note:—

Information on budgeted expenditure is taken from local authorities' returns to the Department of the Environment on forms RA90/91 and RA(SG)90/91. Figures have been repriced to out-turn.—

Research Councils (Expenditure)

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much money, and what percentage of total resources, was spent in the last year for which figures are available by each of the research councils on (a) research into management development, (b) management training and (c) training overall, excluding the employment costs of the trainees; and how the training expenditure is divided between courses provided internally and those provided externally.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The details are as follows:

(a) Research into management development

In 1990-91 the Economic and Social Research Council (ESRC) made 15 awards totalling £419,000 for research projects into various aspects of management development. This represented 5 per cent. of the total of research grants made in that year.

(b) Management training

In 1990-91, the ESRC was supporting 359 students on courses relating to management training at a cost of £1,443,000. This represented some 15 per cent. of the total ESRC expenditure on postgraduate awards.

Expenditure by the research councils on management training of their own staff was as follows:

Agricultural and Food Research Council (AFRC)

In 1990-91 the AFRC spent £70,313 on management training, £60,000 internally and £10,313 on external management courses.

Economic and Social Research Council

In 1990-91 the ESRC spent some £7,000 on management training, of which £700 was spent externally.

Medical Research Council (MRC)

This information (and also at (c) below) is not collected centrally and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Natural Environment Research Council (NERC)

In 1990-91 NERC spent £260,000 on management training, of which £140,000 was spent internally.

Science and Engineering Research Council (SERC)

For the period 1 August 1989 to 31 July 1990, SERC spent £193,000 on management training, all of which was undertaken by the research council's joint training service (JTS).

(c) Training overall

AFRC's total expenditure on staff training in 1990-91 was £270,133, of which £150,000 was undertaken internally or through the JTS. The total of science budget resources devoted to training was about 0·3 per cent.

ESRC's total expenditure on staff training in 1990-91 was £32,100 of which £23,000 was undertaken by JTS. This total represents about 0·1 per cent. of the council's resources from the science budget.

NERC's total expenditure on staff training in 1990-91 was £650,000, of which £220,000 was undertaken internally or by JTS. Total expenditure represented 0·37 per cent. of the council's resources from the science budget.

In the period 1 August 1989 to 31 July 1990, SERC estimates that its total expenditure on staff training amounted to about £707,000. Of this some £420,000 was estimated to have been spent internally. The total training expenditure represents some 0·17 per cent. of the science budget resources made available to SERC.

Grant-maintained Schools

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what has been the cost so far of ballots of parents held under section 61 of the Education Act.

Mr. Eggar: The Electoral Reform Society conducts all parental ballots for grant-maintained status and claims its costs for each individual ballot from the Department of Education and Science. The total of these costs currently stands at some £175,000.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science for each of the financial years 1989-90 and 1990-91, what have been the total levels of (i) liability for VAT, (ii) relief from liability for rates and (iii) special purpose grant (VAT) for grant-maintained schools.

Mr. Eggar: Details of grant-maintained schools' actual liability for VAT are not available. The total level of newly acquired rates relief for ex-county schools was some £141,000 in 1989-90 and some £1,103,000 in 1990-91. Total special purpose grant (VAT) paid to grant-maintained schools was £231,000 in 1989-90 and £639,000 in 1990-91.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science which grant-maintained schools have been visited by Her Majesty's inspectors, and in each case (i) by how many inspectors, (ii) for how long, (iii) at what cost and (iv) whether a report will be published.

Mr. Eggar: At the end of March 1991, there were 50 schools operating under grant-maintained status and HMI had visited 46 of them. Listed below are details of the visits made to each school.

In all cases the inspectors' findings were reported orally to the head and to the chairman of governors where he or she was able to attend. None of these inspections was planned to lead to a published report. My right hon. and learned Friend will therefore not be publishing the findings of these individual school inspectors.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what would be the total full-year cost of grant payable to schools as (i) transitional grant, (ii) special purpose grant (development) and (iii) capital grant if all eligible schools became grant-maintained at the current levels of each (a) during 1991-92 and (b) over a five-year period.

Mr. Eggar: Given the statutory timetable it is not possible for all schools to become grant-maintained in the financial year 1991-92.

These levels of payment are reviewed annually in the light of the Government's spending priorities for education and other services. It is therefore not possible to project a figure for the total cost if all schools became grant-maintained over a five-year period.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many copies have been distributed and, in each case, at what cost of all the editions of the booklet (i) "School Governors—How to Become a Grant-Maintained School", (ii) "Grant-Maintained Schools—Questions Parents Ask" and (iii) "Grant-Maintained Schools—What it Means For Staff".

Mr. Eggar: The information requested is given in the table:

Publication	Total printing cost (all editions) £000	Number of copies distributed (all editions)[1]	Postage costs £000
School Governors: How to become a grant-maintained school	46·9	80,000	[2]n/a
Grant-maintained schools: Questions parents ask	51·6	140,000	[3]n/a
Grant-maintained schools: What it means for staff	9·8	100,000	14·0

[1] The recorded figures are for initial block distributions. Figures for further distributions to individual schools following ad hoc requests are not available.

[2] Postage costs for the block distribution of the first edition were not recorded separately. It cost £870 to post an initial block distribution of the second edition. The third edition has not been block distributed as yet.

[3] It cost £3,700 to post an initial block distribution of the first edition. It cost £8,400 to post a further block distribution of that edition for primary schools with less than 300 pupils when they became eligible for grant-maintained status. Included in that distribution were copies of the second edition of "School Governors: How to Become a Grant-Maintained School".

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science for each of the financial years 1990-91 and 1991-92, what have been the average total allocations of capital grant to grant-maintained schools (i) per school and (ii) per pupil.

Mr. Eggar: Total grant for capital expenditure by grant-maintained schools in 1990-91 was £6·5 million. The planned grant expenditure for 1991-92 is £10·5 million. The average per school for 1990-91 was £130,186 and per pupil £181 based on total school and pupil numbers in that year. Figures for 1991-92 will depend upon the total number of schools and pupils in the sector this year.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science for each of the financial years 1989-90 and 1990-91, what was (i) the amount available and (ii) the amount paid to grant-maintained schools as special purpose grant (development).

Mr. Eggar: Special purpose grant (development) of £177,573 was available to grant-maintained schools in 1989-90. The amount actually paid in that year was £171,190. In 1990-91, special purpose grant (development) of £705,126 was available. This amount will be adjusted during the course of the current financial year if financial returns from schools show that the full amount of grant was not required for the purposes for which it has been made available.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what payments have been made from public funds to the Grant-Maintained Schools Trust in each year since its creation.

Mr. Eggar: Payments of central Government grant in each financial year have been as follows:

1988-89	25,000
1989-90	250,000
1990-91	448,000

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science for each of the financial years 1989-90 and 1990-91, what has been (a) the total and (b) the average per pupil of (i) annual maintenance grant and (ii) all other grant aid paid to grant-maintained schools.

Mr. Eggar: Total annual maintenance grant—AMG—paid was £14·9 million in 1989-90 and £59·2 million in 1990-91. A simple average per pupil can be derived by dividing these figures by pupil numbers recorded in the previous January by all schools that were grant-maintained in that year. On this basis, average AMG paid per pupil was £1,083 in 1989-90 and £1,645 in 1990-91. These figures take no account of the fact that some schools were incorporated as grant-maintained at different times during the year in question.

The total of other grants paid was £2,466,000 in 1989-90 and £8,128,000 in 1990-91. These figures exclude transitional grant which in these years was paid to schools before incorporation as GM schools. It makes little sense to relate the totals of other grants to pupil numbers since these grants are paid on a number of different bases. However, these totals divided by the same pupil numbers produce per pupil figures of £179 in 1989-90 and £226 in 1990-91.

Schools Branch 4

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many staff are employed in schools branch 4, division B at his Department; and what is the annual cost of running this Department.

Mr. Eggar: There are 26 staff employed in schools 4 division B. The cost of running this division in the 1990-91 financial year was approximately £368,000.

Teachers (Assessment)

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps he is taking to accredit prior learning among staff currently employed as teachers; and if he will ensure that teachers who have not had their skills assessed will not be made redundant on grounds of lack of qualification until an assessment has been made.

Mr. Fallon: It is for the LEA or, in a school with a delegated budget, the governing body to determine whether any teacher should be dismissed. If it behaves unreasonably, a dismissal may be found unfair by an industrial tribunal. LEAs and schools are responsible for deciding what induction and other training should be provided for the individual teachers whom they employ. They also share responsibility with other bodies that provide or accredit training for deciding on the scope for accrediting teachers' prior learning.

Children (Assessment)

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science of those children subject to assessment at seven years as part of the national curriculum (a) how many are in mixed age classes and (b) how many are in classes of over 30 in size.

Mr. Eggar: Information on the number of seven-year-old children in mixed age classes and in classes of over 30 in size is not collected regularly. In January 1990, 24 per cent. of all pupils in maintained primary schools in England were in classes of over 30 taught by one teacher.

Further Education

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to his statement on the future of further education 21 March, Official Report, columns 432-448, whether local authorities will be required to seek his consent for contracts exposed to competitive tendering arrangements under the Local Government Act 1988.

Mr. Eggar: No. The application of compulsory competitive tendering to contracts affecting further education and sixth form colleges remains that described in DES circulars 7/88 and 9/88, copies of which are in the Library.

PRIME MINISTER

Whaling

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Prime Minister what action the British Government intend to take at the International Whaling Commission this year to ensure that the moratorium on commercial whaling is maintained.

The Prime Minister: We shall continue to support the moratorium on commercial whaling.

Promis Software

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Prime Minister which Government Departments have purchased Promis software.

The Prime Minister: Departments have delegated authority from the Treasury to purchase proprietary software packages to meet their own needs. Information on such procurements is not collected centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for 2 May.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

International Arms Register

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Prime Minister what discussions he has had regarding the establishment of an international arms register.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 29 April to the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) at column 32.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Magistrates

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Attorney-General what percentage of all magistrates are women; what percentage of magistrates appointed in each of the past 10 years have been women; what percentage of women magistrates are under the age of 40 years; what is the average age of magistrates; what is the average age of all women magistrates; and if he has any proposals to appoint more (a) women magistrates and (b) women magistrates under 40 years.

The Solicitor-General: As at January 1991, in the Lord Chancellor's area of responsibility, women represented 45 per cent. of the total number of active lay magistrates. The percentage of women magistrates appointed in each of the past 10 years, rounded to the nearest point was as follows:

	Per cent.
1981	42
1982	43
1983	45
1984	48
1985	44
1986	46
1987	51
1988	48
1989	49
1990	51

Approximately 4 per cent. of women magistrates are under the age of 40.

The average age of magistrates and the average age of all women magistrates, could only be ascertained at disproportionate cost.

The answer to whether there are any proposals to appoint more (a) women magistrates and (b) women magistrates under 40 years is yes.

Legal Profession (Remuneration)

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Attorney-General if the review by the Lord Chancellor of the legal aid system in the United Kingdom will consider means to harmonise levels of remuneration payable to the legal profession, and to remove existing anomalies between rates of remuneration paid to legal advisers, north and south of the Scottish border.

The Attorney-General: The current review is addressing the financial conditions for the grant of legal aid. It is not considering the levels of remuneration payable to the legal profession.

Legal Aid

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Attorney-General what is the policy of the Government towards reducing the number of persons eligible for legal aid.

The Attorney-General: The Government's policy is to target legal aid to meet need. The Lord Chancellor is conducting a review of the financial conditions for legal aid to see how this can best be achieved.

The number of full civil legal aid certificates issued compared with figures for five and 10 years ago indicates that more people than ever before are taking up legal aid. The figures are in the table:

	Number
1979-80	190,677
1984-85	221,209
1989-90	262,581

The estimated figure for 1990-91 is about 300,000. Over the same period, expenditure on legal aid as a whole increased some five fold.

Court of Protection

Mr. Steen: To ask the Attorney-General what is the cost to the Exchequer of the Court of Protection; and what is its fee income.

The Attorney-General: The operation of the Court of Protection is financed by those who use it. During the financial year ending 31 March 1991 there was no cost to the public purse.

The fee income for that year was £7,750,423·01.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Attorney-General how many patients the Court of Protection is currently handling.

The Attorney-General: The total number of patients whose affairs are currently being administered by the Court of Protection is 30,842 as at 30 April 1991.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Armagh Four

11. Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress there has been in the review of the convictions of the Armagh Four; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mawhinney: A dossier on this case is receiving detailed examination. In the meantime, the Chief Constable of the RUC has been asked to make further inquiries about a number of points. Until the results of these further inquiries are known, it will not be possible for my right hon. Friend to consider whether he would be justified in referring the case back to the Court of Appeal.

Religious Tolerance

13. Mr. Fahnery: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will take steps to hold a representative delegate conference to raise issues conducive to religious tolerance and peace in Ireland.

Mr. Mawhinney: I have no plans at present to hold such a conference. I am pleased to report, however, that the Government have given substantial support to a number of conferences, including a major conference in September 1990, on the role of the churches in community relations in Northern Ireland.

Political Parties (Talks)

14. Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what information he has on who will be representing the Conservative party at the talks on the future of Northern Ireland.

Mr. Brooke: My hon. Friend the Minister of State and I will represent the Government in the forthcoming talks.

Political Devolution

15. Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what recent representations he has received concerning the subject of political devolution in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dickens: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of the prospects for a political solution to resolve conflict in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: I refer the hon. Member and my hon. Friend to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan).

Recession

17. Mr. Kilfedder: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to deal with recession in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham: The latest economic indicators suggest that any downturn in the economy has had less effect in Northern Ireland than in the United Kingdom as a whole. The Government's economic development strategy for Northern Ireland aims to improve the competitiveness of Northern Ireland industry and thereby promote economic growth and a sustained increase in employment.

Irish Prime Minister

18. Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he next expects to meet the Prime Minister of the Republic of Ireland.

Mr. Brooke: I have no present plans to meet the Taoiseach.

Self-Employed People

19. Mr. William Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people are currently self-employed in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: At June 1990, the latest date for which figures are available, there were an estimated 75,800 self-employed persons in Northern Ireland. This represents a growth in self-employment of some 16,600—28 per cent.—since June 1983.

Health and Social Services Boards

20. Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the composition of the non-executive directors of the four area health and social services boards and the membership of the new health and social services councils.

Mr. Hanley: Each health and social services board includes six non-executive members plus a chairman. They were appointed from 1 April this year.

The names of the chairmen of the health and social services councils were announced on 4 April 1991. Nominations for membership of the councils have been invited from district councils, voluntary and community groups and, through public advertisement, from other interested groups and individuals. It is hoped to announce the names of the members shortly.

Teachers' Pay and Conditions

21. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has any plans to review teachers' pay and conditions bargaining arrangements; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: At present my right hon. and noble Friend the Paymaster General has no plans to review the teachers' pay and conditions of service negotiating arrangements. Following the recommendations of the Northern Ireland Teachers' Salaries and Conditions of Service Committee, the Department of Education makes regulations prescribing the rate of salaries and conditions of service.

Employment Trends

22. Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on employment trends in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham: At June 1990 the estimated number of persons in employment in Northern Ireland—including the self-employed—stood at 605,400, which is some 7,000 higher than the previous peak level in 1979. Annual estimates also show that the level of employment has increased consistently since June 1983. Between June 1983 and June 1990 employment in Northern Ireland grew by almost 51,000—9·2 per cent.—mainly due to an increase in employment in private sector services and self-employment.

Higher Education

16. Mr. Hague: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many students are currently studying in universities and institutions of higher education in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: The answer is 25,559 full-time and part-time students. Institutions of further education also provide higher education courses and in 1989-90 total enrolments on such courses—full time and part time—amounted to 3,444 students.

Construction Industry

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a table in the Official Report showing the number of persons employed in the construction industry in each of the last five years for which figures are available in Northern Ireland and also list for each of those years (a) the number of dwellings constructed and (b) the number of construction workers unemployed.

Mr. Needham: The information requested is as follows:

	Employees in employment in construction industry[1]	Number of unemployed construction workers[1]	Number of dwellings completed[2]
1986	24,550	23,307	10,145
1987	25,840	21,964	9,761
1988	26,360	19,251	9,941
1989	25,990	17,938	10,304
1990	25,940	16,959	7,912

[1] Figures relate to June of each year.
[2] Figures relate to the calendar year.

Trust Ports

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he expects to announce the privatisation of the trust ports.

Mr. Needham: It is my intention to bring forward next spring a draft Order in Council which would provide the necessary powers to enable any of Northern Ireland's trust ports to be privatised.

Clenbuterol

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the highest level of clenbuterol found in cattle from County Laois in the Republic of Ireland which were presented for slaughter in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hanley: The answer is 27·2 parts per billion (ppb).

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many clenbuterol-treated cattle from County Laois in the Republic of Ireland have been presented for slaughter in Northern Ireland in the past 12 months;

(2) how many clenbuterol-treated animals from County Donegal in the Republic of Ireland have been presented for slaughter in Northern Ireland in the past 12 months.

Mr. Hanley: In the last 12 months two cattle from County Laois and 24 from County Donegal presented for slaughter in Northern Ireland have been found to contain residues of clenbuterol.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what arrangements exist for action against beef producers in the Republic of Ireland who present clenbuterol-treated animals for slaughter in meat plants in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hanley: All such cases are communicated to the appropriate authorities in the Republic of Ireland and it is for them to decide on what, if any, action is taken against the producers concerned.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make it his policy that all animals originating from a farm in one of whose animals clenbuterol has been detected at a slaughterhouse should have their urine tested; and if he will bring forward proposals for acquiring powers to detain animals which have tested positive for clenbuterol.

Mr. Hanley: I am considering such a policy under the powers available when the Food Safety Order comes into effect on 21 May 1991.

Salbutamol

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make it his policy to carry out tests for salbutamol in animals, and to condemn meat in which salbutamol is found.

Mr. Hanley: Yes, if it becomes apparent that there is abuse of salbutamol. At present we are only aware of abuse of clenbuterol.

Beta Agonist Drugs

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many post-mortem tests are carried out each year on the eyeballs of bovines suspected of treatments with beta agonist drugs.

Mr. Hanley: Post-mortem tests concentrate on liver, as this is the edible tissue in which the highest levels of residue are found relative to the rest of the carcase. It also gives the most consistent results. The potential use of other tissue is being studied.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland in which part of an affected animal have residues of beta agonist drugs most frequently been found by official inspections in the past 12 months.

Mr. Hanley: Residues of beta agonists have been found most frequently in the liver.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Community Charge Rebates

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the cost of introducing a 100 per cent. rebate for community charge payers on income support and equivalent incomes in 1991-92.

Miss Widdecombe: A maximum community charge benefit of 100 per cent. of liability would affect all people receiving community charge benefit, including those on income support and equivalent incomes. The total cost in 1991-92 of 100 per cent. maximum community charge benefit would be some £380 million at current benefit levels.

This estimate assumes that no reductions are made in the income-related benefit levels which were adjusted in April 1989 to include help towards the 20 per cent. contribution to the community charge at an estimated cost of £500 million.

Source: Modelled using data drawn from 1986/7/8 family expenditure surveys.

Child Benefit

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how much will be saved from the clawback of the increase in child benefit of £1 from parents' income support;

(2) how many (a) single parents and (b) parents did not receive the child benefit increase of £1 because they are in receipt of income support and have had the increase deducted from their income support.

Miss Widdecombe: It is estimated that approximately (a) 850,000 single parents and (b) 400,000 other families on income support have received the £1 increase in child benefit for the only, eldest or elder child from April. The payment of this extra amount has been taken into account for income support purposes in the normal way. It is estimated that the extra cost of disregarding the increase in child benefit in income support would be £65 million a year.

Income support rates were also increased from April, and it is estimated that over 99 per cent. of income support recipients will have seen an overall increase in their benefits. Families will receive a further increase in child benefit in October and, exceptionally, the family premium and child allowances will be increased at the same time so that those on income-related benefits gain the advantage of that increase.

Pensions

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when is the appointed day for the imposition of new requirements for pension increases included in the Social Security Act 1990.

Miss Widdecombe: No final decision has yet been made.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the implementation of the provision in the Social Security Act 1990 which requires pension schemes to increase the deferred pensions of anyone leaving by 5 per cent. per annum for all of their pensionable service.

Miss Widdecombe: This provision came into force on 1 January 1991.

Benefits (Manchester)

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people are receiving (a) income support, (b) family credit and (c) housing benefit; and what percentage of the Manchester population this represents.

Miss Widdecombe: The administration of benefits is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member with such information as is available and copies will be placed in the Library and the public information office.

Bari Mustard Gas Disaster

Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to the answer, Official Report, 4 February, column 63, if he will publish in the Official Report how many of the survivors of the Bari harbour mustard gas disaster in 1943 died of (a) lung cancer and (b) other forms of cancer.

Miss Widdecombe: The information requested is not available.

Income Support

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his Department's target for clearing income support claims at each Edinburgh office (a) in 1991 and (b) in 1992; and what is the actual time taken to clear such claims at present.

Miss Widdecombe: The administration of income support is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member and copies will be placed in the Library and the public information office.

Departmental Land (London)

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much land his Department owns in London; and how much of that land is unused.

Mr. Jack: The Department owns 1·05 hectares of land in London, of which 0·2 hectares is unused. Disposal of this recently vacated site is being actively pursued.

Pension Schemes

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the total cost to the national insurance fund, in the financial year 1991-92 and in a full year, of allowing people to contract out of SERPs into a money purchase personal pension scheme giving figures separately for (a) people contracting out of SERPs in 1991-92 and (b) all schemes, giving figures also for Great Britain and the United Kingdom.

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 30 April 1991]: The amount of revenue forgone by the national insurance fund is made up of the contracted-out rebate which was first introduced in April 1978, and the 2 per cent. incentive payment introduced in April 1988.

The Government Actuary estimates that about 0·5 million people will receive payments towards personal pensions for the first time during 1991-92 and the estimated amount of revenue forgone by the national insurance fund in respect of those people will be £260 million for Great Britain, made up of £190 million rebate and £70 million incentive.

The estimated amount of revenue forgone in respect of the total of 4·5 million who will receive payments during 1991-92 will be £2,350 million for Great Britain, made up of £1,740 million rebate and £610 million incentive.

Information relating to Northern Ireland is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the total cost to the national insurance fund in the financial year 1991-92 and in a full year of the 2 per cent. banded earnings offered as an incentive to opt out of SERPs, giving figures for Great Britain and the United Kingdom.

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 30 April 1991]: In the year 1991-92 the Government Actuary estimates that the amount of revenue forgone by the national insurance fund as the result of the incentive payment will be £750 million for Great Britain. This is in respect of an estimated 4·5 million personal pension optants and 1 million members of contracted-out occupational pension schemes who are eligible for incentive payments.

The estimated amount of revenue forgone by offering the incentive in 1991-92 amounts to about 2 per cent. of the total income of the national insurance fund.

It is also estimated that encouraging people to plan for their retirement in this way will result in a reduction in gross public expenditure of £2 billion a year in 2010 rising to £14 billion a year in 2035.

Information relating to Northern Ireland is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Students (Expenditure)

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science, further to his answer of 29 April in relation to expenditure on higher education in the form of mandatory awards, if he will provide the information on expenditure per student on fees and expenditure per student on maintenance in real terms with 1978-79 = 100.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The data requested are given below and cover expenditure made by local education authorities in England and Wales in bestowing mandatory awards under the Education (Mandatory Awards) Regulations.

	Expenditure per student (real index)
Academic year	Fees	Maintenance
1978-79	100	100
1979-80	94	104
1980-81	101	104
1981-82	104	98
1982-83	57	93
1983-84	54	91
1984-85	52	80
1985-86	53	73
1986-87	52	74
1987-88	52	73
1988-89	51	72

The real index has been calculated using the retail prices index. The 1982-83 expenditure on fees is affected by a reduction in the rate set for first degrees and diplomas from £900 to £840 with compensating increases in the direct funds paid to institutions.

Education Support and Training

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much expenditure he intends to support in the 1992-93 grants for education support and training programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I propose a grants programme for 1992-93 supporting total spending by local education authorities of £377 million. This compares with a programme of £346 million in 1991-92.

The proposed programme will target resources to help implement the Government's key education reforms. It includes over £80 million to improve school management and £146 million for the national curriculum. Within these areas, I propose to increase the level of support for key priorities compared with last year: there would be £10 million for governor support; £14 million for teacher appraisal; £15 million to help meet the equipment needs of schools implementing the national curriculum; and £45 million for training and other support for national curriculum assessment.

I am proposing a major new initiative for the inner cities. The most important new policy would be a scheme to raise standards in identified schools facing particularly severe problems. I am also proposing a pilot scheme in a number of inner city areas to improve access by local people to higher education. The new projects, costing £8·6 million, would be concentrated in areas covered by the Government's city action teams and inner city task forces, and would be drawn up in consultation with these bodies.

Another new activity will support the development of regional projects designed to meet the special needs of deaf-blind children.

The programme will support a number of other priority areas, including teacher recruitment and induction of newly appointed teachers.

The package also includes support for schools wishing to introduce vocational qualifications in their sixth forms.

I am writing today to the local authority associations setting out my proposals in detail. I shall be issuing a draft circular shortly, in the light of any comments from the associations, inviting LEAs to bid for grant support.

The table lists my proposals in full.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Family Conciliation Services

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Attorney-General what assistance his Department gives to the Cleveland family conciliation service.

The Attorney-General: No direct or specific central Government funding is or has ever been available for Cleveland family conciliation service. Indirect help is provided through the courts, the probation service and the legal aid fund in some cases. The Government are reviewing the future of, and funding for, conciliation services as part of their consideration of proposals to reform the divorce law.

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Attorney-General what is the Government's policy on the funding of family conciliation services.

The Attorney-General: I refer the hon. Member for Stockton, South to the reply given to the question from my hon. Friend, the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) on 18 April 1991, at column 221.

Immigration Appeals

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Attorney-General what is the period which currently elapses between the lodging of an appeal against a refusal of leave to enter the United Kingdom which is lodged at an overseas diplomatic post and the time when the immigration appeals organisation at Thanet house notifies the appellant or its representative that the appeal has been lodged giving them a choice for an oral or written appeal; and if he will provide this information in respect of each country from which such appeals are lodged.

The Attorney-General: The information requested is not available in respect of individual countries. However, it is estimated that the period which currently elapses between the lodging of an appeal against refusal of entry clearance to the United Kingdom at a diplomatic post overseas and its arrival at the Immigration Appellate Authorities, IAA, at Thanet house is on average one month for visit visa appeals and three months for settlement appeals.

Once the IAA has received an appeal, it is on average able to dispatch the case papers to the appellant or his representative in this country within one week for cases to be heard at Thanet house, and two to three weeks for cases to be heard at other hearing centres. At this stage, the IAA notifies the appellant or his representative that the appeal has been lodged and gives him a choice for an oral or written appeal.

ENVIRONMENT

Buildings (Security)

Mr. Allen McKay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will discuss with representatives of the Association of Chief Police Officers and the secured by design group ways of raising standards and specifications in house and office buildings to make them more secure from illegal entry;

(2) if he will now consider introducing higher specifications and standards in the construction of houses in order to ensure a greater level of security from illegal entry;

(3) if he will discuss with representatives of British police authorities the standards of doors and windows fitted in new and existing houses and the vulnerability to illegal entry of such doors and windows.

Mr. Yeo: My Department is currently funding research into the effectiveness of security measures in buildings and the results will be made available to the British Standards Institution, which is the forum through which interested parties can contribute to the debate on the development of British standards and the United Kingdom's input to European standards.

Building Regulations

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make it his policy to broaden the definition of substantial demolition as part of the Building Regulations (part M) to cover (a) classification or determining the independence of an extension to a building, (b) that material alterations are taken into account and (c) that part M regulations cover the curtilage of the construction site so that concerns such as car parking space can be taken into account.

Mr. Yeo: My Department is conducting a review of part M of the Building Regulations as part of a wider review of the regulations as a whole. The issues raised by the hon. Member are being thoroughly considered by my Department and the building regulations advisory committee, together with other responses to the recent consultation exercise. I expect the revised guidance on part M to be published later this year.

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total expenditure by the Countryside Commission on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Trippier: The following table gives the available information. No figures are available prior to 1 April 1982.

Year	Expenditure on press and public relations £
1982-83	24,644
1983-84	72,264
1984-85	171,668
1985-86	159,318
1986-87	162,164
1987-88	147,628
1988-89	176,543
1989-90	225,138
1990-91	[1]215,027
1991-92	[2]256,000

[1] Estimated.
[2] Budget.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total expenditure by Ordnance Survey on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Baldry: Records in sufficient detail to provide the information requested are held for seven years only. The available information is as follows:

Total expenditure on press and public relations

	£000
1984-85	696·2
1985-86	833·2
1986-87	751·3
1987-88	820·8
1988-89	737·1
1989-90	825·5
1990-91	1,119·4

This 1991-92 budget for press and public relations activities is £1,320,500. The increase in expenditure in the years 1990-92 is attributable to additional publicity for the Ordnance Survey bicentenary in 1991.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total expenditure by the Nature Conservancy Council on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Trippier: Direct expenditure on information and publicity is listed in the table. For 1989-90 onwards the figures are net of receipts.

(Nature Conservancy Council for England)

1979-80	92,000
1980-81	120,000

1989-90	768,000
1990-91	748,000
1991-92	537,000

Wellington House

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether it is his intention to sell Wellington house following the closure of the Crown Suppliers; and what is the latest valuation of Wellington house.

Mr. Yeo: No: it is not intended to sell Wellington house; the building is to be used to house other Government Departments. The latest valuation of Wellington house is £24 million.

Local Authorities (Capping)

Mr. Ken Hargreaves: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what limits he has set, or plans to set, for authorities capped for 1991-92; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: My right hon. Friend decided on 3 April to adopt principles for designating authorities for capping in 1991-92 which gave effect to the provisional criteria announced on 31 October 1990 by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Patten). Applying these principles, he has designated authorities and proposed caps for them as set out in the table. Under the status these authorities had 28 days ending on 30 April in which they could either challenge or accept their proposed caps.

Six authorities—Somerset, Langbaurgh, Milton Keynes, Reading, Greenwich and Middlesbrough—accepted and my right hon. Friend has therefore in each case confirmed the caps for these authorities at the level he originally proposed.

Eight authorities—Basildon, Bristol, Ipswich, Lambeth, Norwich, Stoke-on-Trent, Warwickshire and Wirral—challenged their proposed caps and suggested alternatives as set out in the table. My right hon. Friend will consider their cases and all other relevant information before he decides on the level of the final caps, which may be the same as or different from the amounts he originally proposed.

My right hon. Friend will set out his final caps for challenging authorities in a draft order which he intends as soon as possible to lay before the House. If the House approves the draft he will set the final caps at levels specified in the order.

Short-term Leases

Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any plans to change the financial arrangements for short-term leases acquired by local authorities.

Sir George Young: The Department has today issued a consultation paper to all local housing authorities on the future of short-term leasing. We believe that this form of accommodation has a useful role to play in helping homeless families. We are proposing that, from 1992-93, new leases acquired by local authorities for a term of three years or less should be accounted for outside the housing revenue account. This will put them on a common financial footing with other property used by housing authorities as temporary accommodation for the homeless, but in which they have no long-term interest.

Swimming Pools

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the number of public swimming pools that have closed each year since 1979.

Mr. Atkins: I have been asked to reply.

This information is not held centrally. The overall number of public swimming pools has increased from just over 1,000 in the early 1980s to nearly 1,200 now.

PRIME MINISTER

Civil Defence

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Prime Minister what procedures he has established for co-ordination between the Ministry of Defence, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and agencies of the United States Government regarding the levels of attack preparedness and the length of warning times applicable to future civil defence provision in the United Kingdom.

The Prime Minister: Procedures governing co-ordination on warning times and related matters involve many Government Departments and there are a number of arrangements to which the United Kingdom and the United States of America are party the most important being those established with our NATO partners. All 16 NATO nations are currently discussing revisions to our mutual defence arrangements in the light of the substantial changes that have occurred in Europe.

As for the United Kingdom specifically, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will be making an announcement about changes in our arrangements, including the planning assumptions that will underlie civil defence planning, in the summer.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Kurdish Refugees

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the role of the Crown Agents in providing emergency relief for Kurdish refugees.

Mrs. Chalker: The Crown Agents are playing an important part in procuring and delivering relief supplies to the relief organisations working in the region. They are currently supplying blankets, tents, clothing and food to a total value of just under £1 million on behalf of the European Community, the Overseas Development Administration, the British Red Cross and other charitable organisations.

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the total expenditure by the ODA on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mrs. Chalker: I refer the hon. Member to the reply he received from my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on 30 April, column 140.

EC-Namibia Fisheries Agreement

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what position Her Majesty's Government took on the suspension of negotiations for an EC-Namibia fisheries agreement; and whether he is taking any action to promote a resumption of negotiations.

Mrs. Chalker: The matter was raised in a recent meeting of the Committee of Permanent Representatives of the European Community. Along with other partners, we sought an explanation from the Commission, which has subsequently informed the Namibian Government that the suspension was purely temporary. We look forward to the resumption of negotiations. I shall be taking this up at the ACP ministerial meeting in Brussels next week.

Medical Teams

Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what arrangements his Department is making to send out to Turkey and Iran British volunteer medical teams.

Mrs. Chalker: We are sending out early on 6 May, 90 medical and other volunteer relief workers to help Iraqi refugees on the mountains in the Cukurca region of Turkey and as they move back to their homes in Iraq. These initial teams will be under the direct supervision of the ODA's humanitarian aid co-ordinator, and will work in close co-ordination with British and allied forces in Turkey and Iraq. The operation is being co-financed with the European Community, as part of the Community's emergency aid programme announced on 8 April.

The Iranian authorities have not requested medical volunteers. We are however financing the provision of two field health centres in West Azerbaijan province.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total expenditure by the Office of Data Protection Registrar on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The Data Protection Registrar was first appointed in September 1984. I understand that his office incurred no significant promotional expenditure until the financial year 1985-86. Expenditure on press and public relations is shown in the table:

1985-86	32,492
1986-87	50,212
1987-88	64,624
1988-89	44,780
1989-90	48,822
1990-91	54,163

The estimated expenditure for 1991-92 is £65,000.

Latchmere-Haslar Project

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department for what reason he has decided to withdraw Home Office funding from the Latchmere-Haslar project for refugees.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Home Office has never provided core funding to the Latchmere-Haslar project. The payments made to it were exceptional and for one year and were intended to reflect the additional and transitional costs to the project arising from the transfer of detainees from Latchmere house to Haslar prison. The project's application last December for long-term core funding was turned down, on the grounds that the Government already make a substantial grant-in-aid to the United Kingdom Immigrants Advisory Service to provide advice and representation and that, with limited resources, departure from the established practice of funding a single organisation in this way was not justified. My right hon. Friend is considering that decision further in the light of a substantial number of representations which we have received.

Sunday Trading

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will undertake to refund local authorities the cost of any compensation which they may be required to pay in consequence of injunctions obtained in regard to Sunday trading, pending final determination of the issue by the House of Lords in consequence of the decision of the Court of Appeal; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: No. Local authorities receive a substantial contribution to their costs generally through the revenue support grant system. We have no plan to increase this contribution specifically for their enforcement duties under the Shops Act 1950.

Mr. Paul Brown

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the error made by his Department in deporting the wrong Paul Brown to Kingston, Jamaica; what steps he has made in contacting him and informing him of his Department's error; what has been the result of the appeal made by the other Paul Brown; and what steps he has made to ensure such an error cannot recur.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 22 April 1991]: A Mr. Paul Brown was removed to Jamaica on 7 July 1989 in the mistaken belief that he was subject to a deportation order which had been made against another person of the same name. Both men were Jamaican, both had been convicted of offences, and both had been recommended for deportation by a court. The Paul Brown removed on 7 July 1989 made no representations against his removal. If he wished to return to the United Kingdom he would have to qualify for entry under the immigration rules. Those rules provide that where a passenger has been convicted of an offence included in the list of extradition crimes leave to enter is to be refused unless the immigration officer considers admission to be justified for strong compassionate reasons. Mr. Brown had been so convicted and no steps have been taken to trace him in Jamaica.

The other Paul Brown was deported on 4 July 1990. He did not exercise his right of appeal to the higher court against his conviction or against the recommendation for deportation. The circumstances which led to the confusion of the two identities was most unusual and unlikely to recur. Nevertheless, magistrates courts have been asked to provide the person's date of birth and nationality when notifying my Department of a court recommendation. The Lord Chancellor's Department will be making similar arrangements for the Crown courts.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action the Government are taking on asylum seekers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 23 April 1991]: In view of the increase in the number of people coming to the United Kingdom to seek asylum, the Government have been reviewing arrangements for dealing with asylum seekers. On 26 March, at columns 347-48, I announced the introduction of a visa requirement for Ugandan nationals, who account for a significant proportion of asylum applicants in the United Kingdom. On 26 April, at column 566, my right hon. Friend announced a nearly fivefold increase in staff resources for asylum determination and commensurate increase in other parts of the asylum system. The review is continuing and further announcements will be made as necessary.

DEFENCE

Chemical Defence Establishment, Nancekuke

Mr. Mudd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the evidence that decontamination of the former chemical defence establishment at Nancekuke, Cornwall has not been wholly effective.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: This is a matter for the Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment, CBDE, under its framework document. I have therefore asked the chief executive of the CBDE, Dr. G. S. Pearson to reply direct to the hon. Member.

Resolution Class Submarines

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many refits will be undergone by each Resolution class submarine.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The future refit programme of resolution class submarines is classified.

Service Married Quarters

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has on the number of service married quarters which are illegally occupied by otherwise homeless service families.

Mr. Alan Clark: There were 1,672 service married quarters irregularly occupied as at 31 December 1990.

Armed Forces Personnel

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence further to his answer of 29 April, Official Report, columns 35-36, if he will list in the Official Report, for each of the armed forces, the number of (a) male officers, (b) female officers, (c) service men and (d) service women, who have taken premature voluntary release in each quarter since January 1989.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: No premature voluntary release, PVR, figures for females are available at present. The remainder of the information requested is as follows:

	Officers			Service men
	RN/RM	Army	RAF	RN/RM	Army	RAF

Fuel Air Explosive Weapons

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the Government assessment of claims made by the Iraqi authorities at the Baghdad fair 1990 that they possessed fuel air explosive weapons.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: We are not aware of a "Baghdad fair" in 1990. However, the Iraqis displayed what they claimed were fuel air explosive weapons of Iraqi origin at the Baghdad international military production exhibition in 1989. We cannot comment further on this matter.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of defensive measures to protect soldiers under attack from fuel air explosive weapons.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Fuel air weapons, FAE, are but one of a range of threats which are routinely examined when considering defensive measures for the British soldiers.

Nuclear Vessels and Submarines

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many nuclear arms capable, or nuclear-powered vessels and submarines of the Royal Navy have been (i) completely scrapped, (ii) are in store or (iii) are in active service at the present time.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: It is not our practice to define Royal Navy ships as being nuclear-capable or non nuclear-capable. Four nuclear-powered submarines have been taken out of service, and are awaiting final disposal. Of these, one is stored afloat and three are being, or are about to be, decommissioned. There are currently 18 nuclear-powered submarines in service with the Royal Navy.

Nuclear Facilities

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many square metres of floorspace used for the storage or maintenance of Royal Navy nuclear facilities have been (i) completely decommissioned and ready for alternative use, (ii) are held in reserve or (iii) are in active service at the present time.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The information requested is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Farm Machinery

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the investment in farm machinery in Northern Ireland in each of the last five years for which figures are available; and what were the figures in 1980 and 1975, all figures in cash and in real terms taking 1975 as 100.

Mr. Hanley: The information requested is as follows:

Investment in farm machinery[1]

	In cash prices £ million	In real terms[2] (index 1973 = 100)
1975	20	100·0
1980	33	84·3

Agriculture

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the gross value of the output of the agricultural industry in Northern Ireland in each of the last five years and in 1980 and 1975 in cash and real terms, taking 1975 as 100.

Mr. Hanley: The information requested is as follows:

Value of gross output of agriculture

	In cash prices £ million	In real terms[1] (index 1975 = 100)
1975	286	100·0
1986	752	91·9

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many (a) farmers (full-time), (b) farmers (part-time), (c) agricultural workers (full-time) and (d) agricultural workers (part-time), were engaged in agriculture in Northern Ireland in each of the last five years and in 1980 and 1975.

Mr. Hanley: The information requested is as follows:

Year	Farmers		Agricultural workers
	Full-time	Part-time	Full-time	Part-time
1975	[1]25,500	[1]7,700	10,800	7,500

1990	22,700	11,900	5,100	5,500

[1] Excludes 4,700 female owners, partners and directors for whom information is not available on whether they worked full-time or part-time in agriculture.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the gross profit in agriculture in Northern Ireland in each of the last five years and in 1980 and 1975 in cash and real terms, taking 1975 as 100.

Mr. Hanley: Gross profit data are not available. The following data relate to "total income from farming" which is the closest measure that equates.

Total income from farming

Year	In cash prices £ million	In real terms[1] (Index 1975 = 100)
1975	51	100·0
1980	48	48·8

Universities

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish in statistical form the staff-student ratios in Northern Ireland universities for the last five years, and whether additional capital funding will be made available to Northern Ireland universities to meet the need for additional residential accommodation and other physical resources, arising from increased student enrolments.

Dr. Mawhinney: The aggregate figures for the two universities in Northern Ireland are:

Year	Student/staff ratio
1985-86	11·9
1986-87	12·0
1987-88	13·0
1988-89	13·9
1989-90	14·2

Government funding of £5·5 million has recently been approved for a 3,000 sq m extension to the university of Ulster's Jordanstown campus. In addition, the Department of Education is considering a recommendation from the Universities Funding Council that the Department should provide grant aid for a further 1,700 sq m extension to the university's Magee campus.

No Government funding is at present being made available for additional residential accommodation.

Electricity Industry

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what percentage of agricultural land in Northern Ireland is owned by overseas investors; and if he will list (a) the countries concerned and (b) the percentage of land owned by each.

Mr. Hanley: The information requested is not available.

Clenbuterol

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland in what proportion of herds suspected of being treated with clenbuterol is only a random sample of the whole herd tested; and if he will make it his policy to test all animals in a suspected herd.

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 1 May 1991]: (I am considering the details of an on-farm testing regime under the powers available when the food safety order comes into effect on 21 May. On-farm testing for clenbuterol cannot be currently carried out.

Advertising

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give separate figures for the spending by his Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

Dr. Mawhinney [holding answer 25 April 1991]: The information could not be made available in the form requested except at disproportionate cost. The figures for spending on all advertising and other promotional material are:

1979-80	468,972
1980-81	487,393
1981-82	613,464
1982-83	1,550,896

SCOTLAND

Forestry Commission

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total expenditure by the Forestry Commission on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The total expenditure by the Forestry Commission on information services, shows, exhibitions and publications, including technical publications, is given in the following table. The figures include staff costs and overheads and have been rounded to the nearest £100,000. A more precise breakdown is not available.

1981	800,000

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by the Forestry Commission in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The total expenditure by the Forestry Commission on advertising, legal fees, estate agent fees, and so on, in connection with the disposals programme is given in the following table. The disposals programme started in July 1981, so no expenditure was incurred in the two years ended 31 March 1981. The figures have been rounded to the nearest £100,000.

1982	500,000
1983	500,000

Scottish Development Agency

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by the Scottish Development Agency in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92;

(2) what was the total expenditure by the Scottish Development Agency on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Allan Stewart: These are operational matters for Scottish Enterprise, which succeeded the Scottish Development Agency on 1 April 1991, and I have asked the chairman to write to the hon. Member.

WALES

M4 Matrix System

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether the matrix system on the M4 operates on GMT throughout the year.

Sir Wyn Roberts: No.

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what was the total expenditure by the Welsh Development Agency on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92;

(2) what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by the Welsh Development Agency in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. David Hunt: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave him on Wednesday 1 May 1991.

All-Wales Treatment Centres

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report the contracted through-put targets for each of the three all-Wales treatment centres for orthopaedic surgery, general surgery and ophthalmic surgery.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Throughput targets for 1991-92 are yet to be agreed.

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report, for 1990-91, for each of the three all-Wales treatment centres for orthopaedic surgery, general surgery and ophthalmic surgery, the contracted throughput targets, separately distinguishing the numbers by resident health authority.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The contracted throughput targets for the three all-Wales treatment centres in 1990-91 were:

	Number
a. Ophthalmic treatment centre, Ysbyty Gwynedd, Bangor
Cataract operations	315
Other operations	29
Total	344
b. Orthopaedic treatment centre, Prince of Wales hospital, Rhydlafar, near Cardiff
Hip replacements	233
Knee replacements	57
Other procedures	73
Total	363
c. General surgery treatment centre, Bridgend general hospital, mid Glamorgan
Varicose vein and hernia operations	800
Total	800

Not more than 20 per cent. of the throughput at the orthopaedic and general surgery centres was intended for South Glamorgan and Mid Glamorgan residents respectively whilst at the ophthalmic centre, 20 per cent. of the throughput was aimed at non-Gwynedd residents. Throughput targets for 1991-92 are yet to be agreed, but are not expected to fall below the maximum throughput levels achieved in 1990-91.

Prefabricated Reinforced Concrete Houses

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what purchase price will have to be paid by Swansea city council to repurchase prefabricated reinforced concrete houses; what formula is applicable; and what account is taken of the market price and presumed knowledge of the defects by the purchasers.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Eligible properties would be repurchased by the authority at 95 per cent. of the defect-free value.

Singleton Hospital

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the job description of the consultant radiologist approved for Singleton hospital.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: This is a matter for the district health authority.

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what new representations of substance he has received since the right hon. Member for Swansea, West presented a petition for the retention of the Singleton casualty unit; and what considerations were raised by the petition which required consultation beyond that already encompassed by his review.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The right hon. Gentleman presented his petition on 12 February. In the light of the right hon. Gentleman's representations, I visited the unit on 25 March and met a deputation of local residents, who handed me further letters. Three additional petitions, including another from the right hon. Gentleman, have been received.

In the light of these representations and my personal visit to the unit, I have consulted further within my Department. I am considering all matters put to me and hope shortly to announce the result of the review.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Social Fund

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will state the latest figure he has available for the cumulative loan debt of the social fund and his estimate of what proportion is likely to be written off.

Mr. Scott: The cumulative social fund loan debt as at 31 March 1991 was £142 million. No social fund loans have been written off. All social fund loans are recoverable. Although there may be some circumstances where recovery is abandoned, this may be only temporary.

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many applications for review by a social fund inspector were outstanding for more than one month at the most recent date for which this information is available.

Mr. Scott: On 30 April 1991, there were 1,243 applications for review by a social fund inspector which had been outstanding for more than one month. Additional inspectors have been recruited.

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many applications for review by a social fund inspector were outstanding at the end of February, March and April.

Mr. Scott: The information requested is as follows:

	Number
February 1991	1,709
March 1991	1,923
April 1991	2,223

Additional inspectors have been recruited.

Expenditure

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 17 April, Official Report, column 192-93, regarding social security expenditure, if he will give the same information including expenditure on the unemployed.

Mr. Jack: Details of total social security spending from 1978-79 to 1990-91 are given in the table.

	Expenditure £ million		Percentage change	Cumulative per-
	Cash	1990-91 prices	in real terms	centage change
1978-79	16,602	41,882	—	—
1979-80	19,616	42,412	1·27	1·27
1980-81	23,751	43,396	2·32	3·59
1981-82	28,963	48,260	11·21	14·80
1982-83	33,000	51,240	6·38	21·18
1983-84	36,881	54,842	6·82	28·00
1984-85	39,949	56,533	3·08	31·08
1985-86	43,488	58,359	3·25	34·33
1986-87	46,841	60,763	4·10	38·43
1987-88	48,939	60,270	−0·81	37·62
1988-89	49,721	56,989	−5·44	32·18
1989-90	52,661	56,742	−0·43	31·75
1990-91	59,001	59,001	3·98	35·73

Note: The real terms decrease over the period 1987-88 to 1989-90 is largely attributable to the fall in unemployment since 1986.

Benefits

Mr. Lawson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what were the total amounts of social security benefits paid in each year since 1978-79 in respect of (a) council rents, (b) rates and (c) the community charge.

Miss Widdecombe: Data on help with housing costs are not readily available for years prior to 1983-84. The available information is in the table.

	Council rents (rent rebates) £ million	Community charge benefit and rate rebates £ million
1983-84	1,980	1,218
1984-85	2,145	1,354
1985-86	2,296	1,479
1986-87	2,420	1,635
1987-88	2,506	1,701
1988-89	2,680	1,373
1989-90	2,856	1,460
1990-91	3,180	2,272

Disability Living Allowance

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he intends to issue for consultation his guidelines for visiting doctors on the care component of disability living allowance for (a) the under two-year-olds and (b) disabled people over the age of two; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: We have no plans for consultations on the largely procedural guidelines for visiting doctors examining medical practitioners. We will, however, be consulting disability organisations and specialist groups in the near future on the guidelines for adjudication officers and the doctors who advise them, about the care and mobility effects likely to arise from different medical conditions. We shall also be consulting organisations about the self-assessment claim pack for disability living allowance which should enable many claims to be determined without the need for an examination by an EMP.

Income Support

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the value of the 20 per cent. poll tax compensation within income support in 1991-92 (a) for individual claimants and (b) in total.

Miss Widdecombe: The current value of the amounts which were included in income-related benefit levels in 1989 towards 20 per cent. of the community charge is equivalent to an average community charge for all claimants of £367. This compares with an estimated net average community charge for all income support claimants in 1991-92 of £210 across Great Britain as a whole, taking no account of capping. The estimated total cost of including these amounts in income-related benefit levels in 1991-92 is £540 million.

Pension Funds (Self-investment)

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he expects to bring forward proposals to use the powers contained in the Social Security Act 1990 to restrict self-investment by pension funds.

Mr. Newton: Because of the possible double jeopardy to job and pension that can be caused by a pension scheme investing in a related employer, broad powers were taken in the Social Security Act 1990 to restrict the practice. Messrs. Ernst and Young were asked to report on the overall extent of self-investment and any implications there might be in imposing restrictions. A copy of their report, "Study of Self Investment by Pension Fund", is being published and I have arranged for a copy to be placed in the Library.

Draft regulations have been referred for consideration by the Occupational Pensions Board. We propose that the overall proportion of a scheme's resources that may be self-invested should be limited to 5 per cent. Schemes that are currently above the limit will be required to take steps to reduce their level of self-investment, but only in respect of certain types of investments. A period of two years will be allowed for loans and equities listed on the stock exchange, and five years for equities traded on the unlisted securities market.

Most small self-administered schemes and individual insured schemes will be exempted from the regulations where written agreement by all the members is provided to each act of self-investment. Where schemes currently have holdings of property or equity in private companies, they will not be required to take action to disinvest. In such circumstances no further self-investment may be made.

Housing Benefit

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish a table showing the level of gross earnings in April at which (a) a single householder, (b) a married couple, (c) a married couple with two children aged four and six years and (d) a single parent with one child, aged three years, will lose in housing benefit, assuming full take-up of family credit, average rent and rates and other assumptions, as in his reply to the hon. Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Clay), Official Report, 1 December 1987, column 566.

Mr. Jack [holding answer 30 April 1991]: The answer is set out in the table. It should be noted that the results in the table remain arbitrary. They cannot reflect, except by chance, the actual circumstances of particular people and cannot claim to be representative of the population at large. The table uses hypothetical rents so it does not reflect the full range of housing costs which people can pay. The table sets out separately the cut-off points for housing benefit, which, in the earlier reply to the hon. Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Clay) included rate rebate, and community charge benefit.

	Level at which housing benefit ceases		Level at which community charge benefit ceases
	Gross earnings £ per week	Total net income £ per week	Gross earnings £ per week	Total net income £ per week
Single householder	87	77·02	76	74·64
Married couple	118	107·49	146	123·05
Married couple with two children aged 4 and 6	105	147·89	169	158·05
Lone parent with one child aged 3	91	131·76	62	128·37

Notes:

1. A community charge of £250 per person, per annum has been assumed throughout.
2. Average rents are assumed to be as follows: £21·23 for a single person and for a married couple; £23·43 for a single person with one child and £25·60 for a married couple with two children. All other assumptions are as set out in the published tax/benefit model tables.

Pensioners

Mr. Soames: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the achievements since 1987 and the present objectives of Her Majesty's Government's policies for caring for pensioners.

Miss Widdecombe: Since 1987, the Government have maintained the value of the state retirement pension and have continued to pursue the sound economic policies which have been the essential catalyst for the growth in pensioners' income during the 1980s. In addition, the abolition of the earnings rule in 1989 has allowed older people to remain in employment without reducing their state pension. The increased prosperity which these policies have brought to an expanding number of older people means, for example, that over 70 per cent. of pensioners now live in homes which are centrally heated and 86 per cent. have access to a telephone.

At the same time, we recognise that there is still a need to protect the position of those who are less well off. As part of the April 1991 uprating of income-related benefits, the ordinary pensioner premium (for those aged 60 to 74) was increased by an extra £1 per week for single people and £1·50 for couples at a cost of some £80 million. This is in addition to a previous measure, taken in October 1989, which directed extra resources to older and disabled pensioners through income related benefits at a cost of £200 million in the first full year.

There have been significant increases in the help available towards fees for those pensioners living in residential care and in nursing homes—a total of £1,270 million went to some 189,000 recipients in 1990 of whom the vast majority are elderly.

The Government have also assisted those who wish to remain independent within their own homes. We have established, or helped to fund, a number of schemes, such as the minor works assistance grant, the disabled facilities grant and the home improvements agencies which provide independent advice and practical help for elderly people who wish to undertake repairs.

Of equal importance to the maintenance of independence is the support given carers in the community. The Department has taken its own measures to improve their lot both by increasing financial provision through the extension of invalid care allowance to married women and the recently introduced carer premium in the income-related benefits. The number of carers receiving ICA has increased from 11,000 in 1985-86 to an estimated 125,000 in 1990 and estimated expenditure is now £213 million.

Over the last 12 months we have introduced other measures which will help carers further. The amount a carer can earn without removing entitlement to ICA was increased from £12 to £20 in April 1990 and by a further 50 per cent, to £30 from April this year. A new carer premium was introduced into the income-related benefits in October 1990. Together with the abolition of the six-month qualifying period for attendance allowance for people with a terminal illness, this measure will cause a greater take-up of ICA. Finally, from October this year the carer premium will be extended to eight weeks after caring ceases.

Our primary objective for the future is to continue with and enhance the policies outlined in this reply—policies, for instance, which meant a real increase in income of 31 per cent. for the average pensioner in the first eight years of our term of office and which have helped nearly half of all pensioners to own their own home and nearly three-quarters to build up their own savings income. More particularly, the community care proposals outlined in "Caring for People", which will be fully implemented by 1993, will be shortly be providing a complete, locally determined package of care for those who will require it.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Income Tax

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the effect on Treasury revenues in 1991-92 and in a full year of introducing an upper limit on all income tax allowances and reliefs of (a) £10,000, (b) £15,000 and (c) £20,000 a year.

Mr. Maude: It is estimated that at 1991-92 levels of income the introduction of the upper limits specified would yield about (a) £700 million, (b) £250 million and (c) £150 million in a full year. The estimates do not take account of any behavioural effects which might result from the introduction of such a limit.

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total expenditure by the department for national savings on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Maples: Estimated figures for expenditure in the years 1984-85 to 1991-92 on press and public relations, including sales information units, established 1989, but excluding staff costs, are as listed below. No figures are available for the years prior to 1984-85.

Year	Press and public relations £
1991-92	87,950
1990-91	75,650
1989-90	41,525
1988-89	20,000
1987-88	22,830
1986-87	17,500
1985-86	15,500
1984-85	15,500

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total expenditure by the Inland Revenue on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Maude: Information relating to the financial years 1979-80 to 1985-86 inclusive is not readily available and cannot be obtained without disproportionate cost. The spend on press and external public relations activities for the remaining years is estimated to be as follows:

Year	£000
1986-87	580
1987-88	650
1988-89	810
1989-90	820
1990-91[1]	7,728
1991-92[2]	890

[1] Forecast outturn.
[2] Budget.

The figure for 1990-91 includes expenditure of £6·95 million on an advertising campaign to increase public awareness of the new arrangements, for non-taxpayers to register for payment of bank and building society interest without the deduction of income tax.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total expenditure by HMSO on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Maples: HMSO has commissioned no press and public relations work.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total expenditure by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Total expenditure by HM Customs and Excise on press and public relations is as follows:

1984-85	63,000
1985-86	87,000
1986-87	85,000
1987-88	89,000
1988-89	126,000
1989-90	92,000
1990-91	102,000
1991-92	[1]86,000

[1] Estimated expenditure.
The figures for 1979-1984 are not available.

Fees

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by Her Majesty's Stationery Office in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Maples: Nothing.

Chancery Banking Group

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list each local authority that deposited money with the Chancery Banking group, and the amount deposited by each.

Mr. Maples: The information requested is confidential and is not available to the Treasury.

Tax Allowances

Mr. Battle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what will be the effect on tax revenues in 1991-92 of freezing the additional personal allowance at £1,720; and what increase in one-parent benefit could be financed from this amount.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 1 May 1991]: The yield in a full year at 1991-92 levels of income is estimated to be about £20 million compared with statutory indexation. This would finance a 30p per week increase in one-parent benefit.

National Savings

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total sum paid out in fees by the Department for National Savings to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Maples [holding answer 2 May 1991]: Figures for the years 1984-85 to 1991-92 are given in the table. No figures are available for the years prior to 1984-85.

Year	£000s
1991-92	[1]383
1990-91	349
1989-90	342
1988-89	424
1987-88	410
1986-87	308
1985-86	748
1984-85	684

[1] Estimate.

HMSO

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total sum paid out in fees by Her Majesty's Stationery Office to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Maples [holding answer 2 May 1991]: The records on HMSO's management information system do not differentiate between management and other consultancy, notably computer consultancy. The consultancy cost for each financial year is assessed as being:

Year	£
1983-84	70,000
1984-85	150,000
1985-86	400,000
1986-87	550,000
1987-88	400,000
[1]1988	155,000
1989	290,000
1990	400,000

[1] Nine months.

HMSO changed its financial year from the fiscal to the calendar year in 1988. Comparable figures for the years 1979-80 to 1982-83 could be given only at disproportionate cost. The consultancy budget for 1991 is £265,000.

Tropical Hardwoods

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make it his policy to introduce additional taxes on the sale of tropical hardwoods; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 2 May 1991]: I have no present plans to do so. Deforestation is a global problem requiring a concerted response, rather than piecemeal imposition of taxes by individual nations. The environment White Paper includes a number of measures to promote sustainable development of the tropical timber industry.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Kuwait

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answers to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Central (Mr. Watson), Official Report, 24 April, column 453, if, during his visit to Kuwait, he will make urgent representations against the proposed show trials of Palestinians followed by public hangings or firing squads; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs will reiterate to the Kuwaiti authorities the importance of ensuring that all residents of Kuwait are treated fairly and humanely and in accordance with the law and with their fundamental human rights.

Human Rights

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland of 24 April, Official Report, columns 455-6, whether he will give details of the specific complaints expressed by the United Nations Committee on Human Rights during the presentation of the United Kingdom's third periodic report on 1, 2 and 3 April.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We have yet to receive the summary record of the human rights committee's proceedings. As soon as it is available, copies will be placed in the Library of the House.

I can inform the hon. Member, however, that the committee questioned our delegation in detail on a wide range of issues in the United Kingdom and dependent territories. It was concerned in particular with issues relating to Northern Ireland, Hong Kong, the optional protocol to the international covenant on civil and political rights and the incorporation of the covenant into domestic legislation.

Convention on Inhumane Weapons

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his policy on the 1981 convention on inhumane weapons.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I refer the hon. Member to the written answers given to the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) on 14 March, and 22 April, on the same subject, at cols 634 and 293 respectively.

EMPLOYMENT

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the total expenditure by the British tourist authority on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Forth: These matters are the responsibility of the board of the British tourist authority and I am asking the chairman to write directly to the hon. Gentleman.

Employment Training

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether training providers in Bradford are to be paid only when trainees secure employment.

Mr. Jackson: The contracts for training in Bradford are negotiated between training providers and the Bradford training and enterprise council. The financial details of these contracts are commercial in confidence.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has received about the reduction in training places, especially for those with special needs, in Bradford in the coming year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: I have not received any recent representations concerning training places for those with special needs in Bradford. It is for Bradford training and enterprise council to decide with whom it contracts to provide training to meet local needs.

Gas Surge (Royston)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, if he will list the actions he has taken since the gas surge in Royston on 8 March in order to prevent a recurrence of this event.

Mr. Forth: [pursuant to his reply, 18 April, column 221] I regret that the answer contained an incorrect statement in that it said that British Gas had replaced approximately 4,000 metres of pipeline. The correct information is as follows:

Inspectors from the Health and Safety Executive are carrying out a full investigation into the gas incident in Royston on 8 March. HSE will decide what action, if any, is appropriate when the investigation is completed.

I understand that British Gas has replaced approximately 4,000 gas meters as a result of the incident.

Industrial and Occupational Health Problems

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what recent research he has funded into industrial and occupational health problems; and what guidance he has offered to employers as a result.

Mr. Forth [holding answer 30 April 1991]: The Health and Safety Executive, HSE, funds both intramural and extramural research projects into industrial and occupational health problems.

There are 87 occupational health projects presently contracted at universities, research institutes and Medical Research Council, MRC units. HSE's occupational medicine and hygiene laboratory also has a significant programme in this area.

In addition to this research, investigations are mounted by doctors in HSE's employment medical advisory service, EMAS and epidemiological studies are conducted by HSE's epidemiology and medical statistics unit.

The production of guidance notes for both employers and employees relies upon the results from these intramural and extramural research projects, EMAS investigations and epidemiological studies.

Full details of HSE's current research are listed in its 1991-92 "Programme of research and related services". A copy is available from the House of Commons Library.

Baggage Allowance

Mr. Thorne: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will initiate a survey of the impact that an increase in baggage allowance for passengers on British airlines flying to and from British airports would have on encouraging visitors to Britain to take advantage of these services.

Mr. McLoughlin: I have been asked to reply.

I have no plans to initiate such a survey. Baggage allowances for passengers travelling on British airlines are a commercial matter for the airlines themselves.

TRANSPORT

British Rail

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list his Department's statutory responsibilities to overview and control British Rail's operations and those matters which fall within the operational responsibility of British Rail.

Mr. Freeman: Under section 3 of the Transport Act 1962, it is the duty of the railways board to provide railway services in Great Britain, and to have due regard to efficiency, economy and safety of operation. The Secretary of State's responsibilities include, in section 27 of the Transport Act 1962, powers to give the railways board directions of a general character as to the exercise and performance of its functions in relation to matters affecting the national interest. The Secretary of State may also, under section 3 of the Railways Act 1974, give directions to the board imposing on it obligations to provide passenger services that it would not provide on a commercial basis and to compensate it for the losses incurred. Since 1 April 1988, this obligation has not applied to InterCity.

Baggage Allowance

Mr. Thorne: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether there are any plans to increase the baggage allowance for passengers flying on British airlines to and from British airports to match those of other countries.

Mr. McLoughlin: Baggage allowances are not fixed by the Government but are a commercial matter for the airlines themselves to determine, subject only to being filed with the Civil Aviation Authority as part of the normal tariff approval procedures. I am not aware that the baggage allowances set by British carriers are significantly different from those of their foreign competitors.

Air Misses

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list by year for the last 10 years, to date, the number of air misses that have been reported to the Civil Aviation Authority in the region of the Humber estuary; and if he will give the location and the types of aircraft involved.

Mr. McLoughlin: The information is as follows:

Track Circuit Failures

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what were the results of his Department's investigations into the two track circuit failures that occurred during February at (a) Aberdeen and (b) Wymondham; and how many (i) railway staff and (ii) passengers were being carried in each incident.

Mr. Freeman: The incident at Aberdeen, which was reported to the Health and Safety Executive's railway inspectorate, involved the derailment of an empty passenger train with only the train crew on board. The incident at Wymondham, which was not statutorily resportable, involved a track maintenance machine carrying a permanent way gang. The actual number of staff concerned is not known. No passengers were involved in either incident.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport on what date he received the British Rail signal and telecommunications technical investigation report 91019 DC track circuits discussion of residual voltage and wrong side failure modes with special reference to bonding principles, dated 25 March; what action he has taken in respect of the report's findings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: The Health and Safety Executive's railway inspectorate received a copy of this report on 1 May, and is now considering it. Meanwhile, BR has taken action to avoid a recurrence.

Safety Standards (Cars)

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether there are absolute safety standards governing the construction of motor cars and vehicles in the United Kingdom; and whether there are any proposals for an EC directive on the subject.

Mr. Chope: Yes. All new cars and goods vehicles must meet at least the saftey standards in national vehicle type approval. Type approval is based largely on standards agreed in the EC and in the United Nations Economic Commission for Europe, and it covers the inspection of prototype vehicles and manufacturers' arrangements for ensuring conformity of production. An EC-wide whole vehicle type approval scheme is being developed, to allow manufacturers the option of obtaining whole vehicle approval in any EC member state, but this will not in any way comprise safety standards.

A17

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he received with regard to the proposed A17 Leadenham bypass in Lincolnshire; if he will give the reasons for his decision to overrule the inspector's report; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: The letter of 24 February issued on behalf of the Secretaries of State for the Environment and of Transport explained their decision in detail. I will send the hon. Lady a copy.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Decommissioning

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will meet representatives of the fishing industry to discuss a decommissioning scheme.

Mr. Curry: If the industry produces workable proposals for an industry funded decommissioning scheme together with effective measures for long-term conservation, I will examine them.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Dangerous Dogs

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to introduce legislation to prevent the import of dangerous dogs.

Mr. Sainsbury: A ban on such imports would present serious practical difficulties because it would clearly be impossible to identify on import whether individual dogs would later prove dangerous; controls would thus have to focus on identifiable breeds but cross-breeding would allow evasion; and smuggling would be encouraged, so adding to the risk of rabies spreading into the United Kingdom. Dangerous dogs pose problems regardless of whether they are imported or domestically bred. A Home Office consultation paper published in June last year on "The Control of Dogs" sought views on a range of possible remedies. Responses are currently being considered before the Government announce their decisions.

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the total expenditure by the Export Credits Guarantee Department on press and public relations in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Sainsbury: The total expenditure of the ECGD on press public relations is shown below:

Year	£000
1985-86	541
1986-87	703
1987-88	747
1988-89	1,112
1989-90	1,271
[1]1990-91	1,067

[1] Provisional.

For the years 1979-80 to 1984-85, the expenditure was recorded by the central office of information as an allied service. The budget for 1991-92 has still to be finalised, and will depend on developments in the privatisation process.

Export Credits Guarantee Department

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by the Export Credits Guarantee Department in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Sainsbury: The total sums paid out by the ECGD in fees to outside organisations in the futherance of privatisation since 1979-80 are as follows:

Year	£000
1979-80 to 1988-89	Nil
1989-90	103
1990-91[1]	3,413

[1] Provisional

The budget for 1991-92 has still to be finalised, and will depend on developments in the privatisation process.

The costs of the current privatisation of the short-term business of ECGD, including fees paid to advisers, will be reported to Parliament after the sale is completed.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in the Export Credits Guarantee Department; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 1 May 1991]: The ECGD does not have any statistical divisions.

HEALTH

Lincolnshire Health Authorities

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many nurses were employed by the North Lincolnshire health authority in March 1979 and March 1991, respectively.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Due to the re-organisation of health authority boundaries in 1982, figures for North Lincolnshire health authority prior to this date are not comparable with the figures for later years. The table shows the figures for 1982 and 1989, the earliest and latest years for which comparable information is available.

The reduction in the number of nurses employed is due in part to a mental handicap unit at Caistor being transferred to the management of Yorkshire regional health authority, instead of Trent regional health authority.

Children in Care

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his latest estimate of the average weekly cost per child or young person in care.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Information about the costs to local authorities of children in care expressed in terms of cost per child week for different types of accommodation are published in the reports under the Child Care Act 1980 entitled "Children in Care in England and Wales". The most recent publication is for the year ending 31 March 1988, copies of which are available in the Library.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his latest estimate of the number of children and young persons in care; and if he will give details of the reasons for their admission.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The latest estimate of the number of children and young persons in care is for 31 March 1989. It is estimated that 62,148 children and young people were in care then. The numbers in care have fallen by 32 per cent. since 1979. The table shows this broken down by legal status and reason for current episode. These figures are provisional.

NHS Trusts

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will set out for each established national health service trust (a) the level of any staff reductions proposed, (b) any proposed changes in the level of services and (c) their current financial position.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No. National health service trusts have extensive freedom to manage their own affairs. However, trusts will be obliged to publish an annual report and accounts.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the national health service units which are currently being considered for self-governing trust status.

Mr. Waldegrave: To date, 59 of the 130 hospitals and other units that expressed an interest in becoming a trust by April 1992 have submitted formal applications. Others continue to arrive daily. They are as follows:

Northern regional health authority
- Cleveland ambulance services
- Gateshead Community Unit
- Northgate Hospital, Northumberland
- North West Durham hospital and community unit
- North Tees acute and community services
- Royal Victoria and dental hospital, Newcastle upon Tyne
- South Tees acute hospital services

Yorkshire regional health authority
- Airedale health services
- Bradford mental health and community services
- Northallerton health services
- York health services

Trent regional health authority
- South Yorkshire metropolitan ambulance services
- Weston Park hospital, Sheffield

East Anglian regional health authority
- East Suffolk community unit
- Huntington acute and Hinchingbrooke hospitals

North West Thames regional health authority
- Barnet community health services
- Barnet and Edgware hospitals
- Northwick Park hospital
- Hillingdon community health unit
- North West Hertfordshire mental handicap unit
- South Bedfordshire community and mental health services
- Bedford general hospitals
- Luton and Dunstable hospital

North East Thames regional health authority
- Essex ambulance services
- North Essex healthcare
- North East Essex mental illness unit
- Royal London homoeopathic hospital
- Southend community care services
- Forest healthcare

South East Thames regional health authority
- King's healthcare unit
- Dartford and Gravesham priority services
- Tunbridge Wells mental handicap unit

Wessex regional health authority
- Bath district mental health unit
- Bournemouth and Christchurch acute unit
- Poole acute unit
- East Dorset community services
- Royal United hospital, Bath
- Wiltshire healthcare
- Avon and Somerset community unit

Oxford regional health authority
- Aylesbury Vale priority services unit
- East Berkshire mental handicap unit
- Horton general hospital
- Milton Keynes acute and maternity services unit
- Milton Keynes community and mental health services unit
- West Berkshire mental handicap unit
- Heatherwood and Wexham park hospitals

South Western regional health authority
- Royal Cornwall hospitals
- Frenchay acute and community services
- Southmead acute and community services
- Gloucester ambulance services
- Devon ambulance services
- Greater Bristol unit
- Exeter community services

Mersey regional health authority
- Liverpool community and priority services
- Mersey regional ambulance services
- Mersey regional centre for neurosciences
- St. Helens and Knowsley community unit
- Southport acute unit

North Western regional health authority
- Oldham acute and community services.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he has decided not to proceed with any of the proposed national health service trusts which he has already announced.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will decide which of these hospitals and other units will be approved for trust status once he has fully examined their applications; considered the views expressed in the public consultation process; and is satisfied that they can fulfil the criteria for moving into trust status.

Census

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement explaining the procedures under which the questions in the census form are determined; what is the specific purpose of various questions in the current census; and if he will take steps to ensure that future census forms take account of the right of privacy of individuals in society.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: An account of the consultation and testing procedures, the topics covered and the uses to which the statistics on each topic will be put is given in paragraphs 9 to 23 of the White Paper 1991 Census of Population, Cm. 430, of July 1988, which set out the Government's proposals. An account is also given, at paragraph 24, of the topics that were considered but excluded as a result of the selection process.

The importance of privacy is a prime consideration when assessing the public acceptability of census questions. This, and the need to keep the census form to an acceptable length, will continue to be key considerations in planning any future census, as will, of course, the need to keep private the personal information people put on their forms. The Census Act 1920 strengthened by the Census (Confidentiality) Act of earlier this year, gives legal protection to the confidentiality of personal census information.

Northern RHAs

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the number, size and nature of service increment for teaching and regional contracts placed with provider units by the Northern regional health authority for 1991-92.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley This information is not held centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact Mr. Peter Carr, the chairman of Northern regional health authority for details.

Haemophiliacs

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made with the settlement of the litigation by those haemophiliacs infected with HIV; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I am pleased to be able to announce that a formal offer conveying the detailed terms of the settlement has now been made to the plaintiffs' representatives. The new trust, which will administer the payments, the Macfarlane (Special Payments) (No. 2) Trust, is being set up today.

Payments can begin as soon as acceptances have been received from individual plaintiffs and the settlement has been approved by Mr. Justice Ognall. This should be within a few days.

Full details of the payments to be made under the settlement will be given once those details have been announced in open court.

Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990

Mr. Summerson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are his proposals for regulations under the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Department of Health has published for consultation proposals for regulations under the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990. It is proposed to bring these regulations into force on 1 August. The main provisions of the Act will come into force on that day, and the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority will assume its full powers.

The regulations will cover the composition of licence committees; licensing procedure; extension of the maximum storage period for gametes in specific circumstances; exemption from licence requirements for those keeping and examining gametes or embryos in connection with the investigation of, or proceedings for, an offence; and for storage of gametes for purposes which are not intended to be controlled by the Act.

The Department has also published for consultation proposals to ensure a smooth transition to the new licensing system. These do not form part of the regulations, but will be contained in a commencement order.

The Department has sent proposals for these regulations to a wide range of professional bodies, relevant treatment and research centres and other interested organisations. I am arranging for copies to be available in the Vote Office. The Department will consider all comments received carefully in formulating the regulations which will be laid before Parliament.

Infertility

Mr. Summerson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he has any plans to lay regulations to bring the infertility treatment known as GIFT within statutory control.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Government have no plans to take further steps to regulate GIFT at the moment, but we intend to keep this matter under review.

Treatments subject to statutory control under the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act include those which involve the creation of a human embryo outside the body and those which involve the use of donated or stored gametes or embryos. GIFT is not intended to secure the creation of an embryo outside the body. Where it involves the storage or donation of any gametes, GIFT will be subject to the licensing provision of the Act because it falls within the second category set out above. Thus provision already exists to safeguard those involved in treatment in these circumstances. But in other cases, for example, when the husband's sperm is used, it will not. Many centres offering GIFT will also have to be licensed under the Act because of other treatments they provide, for example, in-vitro fertilisation. This means that these centres will need to comply with the provisions of the Act and follow the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority's code of practice.

Mr. Summerson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he is taking in respect of information about their donor parents for children born as a result of infertility treatment.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Regulations under section 31(4)(a) of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 can require the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority to give specified information at age 18 or later to an applicant born following treatment services involving the use of donated gametes.

This raises profound issues which require wide-ranging consultation. We do not therefore propose to introduce regulations at this time, and donors will remain anonymous.

Family Planning

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to ensure that all health authorities and national health service trusts follow the 1974 memorandum of guidance on family planning and make male and female sterilisation operations available under the national health service, both for family planning and medical reasons.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The national health service management executive is writing to all regional health authority general managers about the provision of male and female sterilisation operations.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those health authorities and national health service trusts which do not make available male and female sterilisation operations under the national health service.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) on 15 April at column 80.

COMARE Investigations

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) whether the Committee on Medical Aspects of Radiation in the Environment is still investigating the possible causes of leukaemia and lymphatic cancer among under nine year olds living near nuclear establishments;

(2) whether the findings of Dr. Gardner at Sellafield are part of the brief of COMARE.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Yes.

Preliminary advice on Professor Gardner's findings from the Committee on Medical Aspects of Radiation in the Environment was published in the Official Report on 2 April 1990 at columns 430-34. In formulating further advice to Government, the Committee will take the results of Professor Gardner's study into consideration, along with the results of other studies, either completed, under way or planned.

COMARE's work programme as at January 1990 was set out in the reply that my hon. Friend the then Under-Secretary of State gave my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) on 10 January 1990 at columns 662-63. COMARE is currently engaged in a review of the possible health effects of radioactive discharges from the Sellafield installation in the light of new data which has emerged since the committee reported on the position in west Cumbria in 1986.

COMARE is expected to have completed this review by the middle of next year. Other major areas in COMARE's current and future work programme include the following:

i. the incidence of childhood cancer in the vicinity of Scottish nuclear sites, other than Dounreay;
ii. consideration of the results of the case-control study of childhood cancer in the vicinity of Aldermaston and Burghfield, results expected in early 1992;
iii. consideration of the results of other studies recommended in previous advice to Government;
iv. consideration of the results of a major study of the geographical distribution of childhood cancer on a nationwide basis, results expected 1992;
v. participation in a review of the evidence relating to the incidence of childhood cancer around nuclear installations, once the results of the geographical studies—see iv above—are available.

Employment of Children

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he anticipates giving approval to city of Bradford metropolitan council byelaws, concerning the employment of children submitted on 25 October 1989; what are the reasons for the delay in the granting of approval; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Bradford metropolitan council's draft byelaws were resubmitted to the Department following earlier consideration and were received on 20 December 1990.

Having considered the revision, the Department is now content with the draft byelaws and is writing to the council setting out further procedures it needs to follow.

NHS Internal Market

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which health authority has responsibility under the national health service internal market for meeting the costs of travel, overnight accommodation and escorts when a patient from one health authority area is sent for treatment at a district hospital in another health authority area.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: In the new contracting arrangements, purchasers of health services—mainly district health authorities and fund holding GPs—will be responsible for meeting the costs of treatment given to their residents or patients; this will include the costs of ambulance transport—with an escort—if this is considered medically necessary. For other journeys, the hospital travel cost scheme provides full or partial reimbursement for the cost of travelling to hospital where patients are in receipt of income support or family credit; others on low income may also get help.

CIVIL SERVICE

Non-governmental Organisations

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service what was the total cost of running the Government quasi-autonomous non-governmental organisations in the two most recent years for which figures are available.

Mr. Renton: Details of total expenditure by non-departmental public bodies can be found in "Public Bodies 1990", copies of which are available in the Library of the House.

ENERGY

Renewable Energy Programmes

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list his Department's current and planned renewable energy programmes in Scotland by type, cost, site location and capacity.

Mr. Moynihan: A total of 38 renewable energy projects currently being carried out under my Department's research, development and demonstration programme have a contractor or site located in Scotland. They comprise:

Technology	Projects	Contract Value £ million
Wind	14	15·5
Biomass	13	2·8
Solar	6	0·8
Geothermal	1	0·6
Wave/Hydro	4	0·3

Small scale low cost wave power device phase 2
Transfer of PDP2 tapes
Consultancy on review of NEL—OWC

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how much has been allocated in research and development moneys by his Department to cover (a) nuclear power and (b) renewable energy in each year from 1979.

Mr. Moynihan: The figures are given in the table:

	Nuclear energy £ million	Renewables £ million
1979-80	145·5	8·2
1980-81	188·0	11·3
1981-82	203·2	15·3
1982-83	212·4	12·7
1983-84	203·8	11·9

Nuclear Reactors (Decommissioning)

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy (1) what research is under way to establish the cost and feasibility of full decommissioning of nuclear reactors;

(2) how many nuclear reactors are fully decommissioned; and at what cost;

(3) what information he has as to whether Nuclear Electricity has a fully costed strategy for decommissioning its remaining Magnox reactors.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: No commercial reactors in the United Kingdom have yet been fully decommissioned. Nuclear Electric and AEA Technology have programmes of research relating to the decommissioning of nuclear reactors which have the objectives to ensure the continued safety of the public, work force and the environment; to minimise environmental impact; to release land for other use as appropriate; and, consistent with the foregoing, to minimise expenditure.

AEA Technology is proceeding with a programme to fully decommission the prototype advanced gas-cooled reactor at Windscale by 1998 to demonstrate both decommissioning capabilities and costs involved.

Nuclear Electric's current strategy for decommissioning its nuclear power stations is set out in its report and accounts for 1989-90, which also identified the accounting provisions made for future decommissioning costs, which were based upon Nuclear Electric's estimates of those costs.

Windfarm Developments

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make it his policy to introduce revised procedures and modify the requirements for detailed site-specific information for windfarm developments of less than 5 MW.

Mr. Moynihan: The procedures to select projects to be contracted in fulfilment of a non-fossil fuel obligation are a matter for the Non-Fossil Purchasing Agency Ltd.—NFPA—as the agent of the regional electricity companies on which the obligation is placed. The procedures adopted by the NFPA take into account the statutory requirement to make arrangements which "will secure" the specified amounts of non-fossil generating capacity and the need for advice from the Office of Electricity Regulation on whether the draft contracts available to the NFPA would be likely to meet this requirement.

Electricity Privatisation

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy (1) if he will give details of the cost incurred in debt write-off prior to the privatisation of the electricity generation and distribution companies in England; and what percentage of the total debt this is;

(2) if he will give details of the cost incurred in debt write-off for the electricity generating and distribution companies prior to privatisation; and what percentage of the total debt this is.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: No debt write-off occurred in connection with the privatisation of the electricity industry in England and Wales. On flotation, moreover, the companies bore new debt to Government totalling £3·583 billion overall, which will accrue to the taxpayer in addition to the proceeds from the sales.

Initial Nuclear Feasibility Study

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy on how many occasions since February 1989 officials from his Department have met representatives from British Nuclear Fuels to discuss the initial nuclear feasibility study; and if he will make a statement on the outcome of these discussions.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The study is still at an early stage. My officials have been kept informed of its progress in the course of their regular meetings with British Nuclear Fuels plc.

National Grid Company

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what consultations he has had with the chairman of the National Grid Company concerning the environmental health implications of electro-magnetic radiation from overhead supergrid lines on nearby residential properties.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The Department's engineering inspectorate is in regular contact with the National Grid Company in respect of electromagnetic fields and keeps me fully informed on the matter.

Power Failures

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list the number of power failures that have occurred in the Doncaster area during the past 12 months giving (a) location, (b) reason for breakdown and (c) the duration of the breakdown until supply was resumed; and what were the figures 12 months ago.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Only supply interruptions of a major nature are required to be reported to the Secretary of State under regulation 35 of the Electricity Supply Regulations 1988. Essentially these interruptions involve 20 MW or more, or 5 MW for one hour or longer or more than 5,000 consumers for one hour or longer. During the past two years no such interruptions involving the Doncaster area have been reported by Yorkshire Electricity other than the blizzard of 8 and 9 December 1990 which affected major parts of Doncaster.

Oil Fires (Kuwait)

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on his talks in Kuwait in relation to British, American and Saudi action to extinguish oil fires.

Mr. Latham: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on his visit to Kuwait, including his meeting with the Kuwaiti Prime Minister on 27 April; and what discussions were held regarding putting out the fires in oil wells caused by the Iraqi armed forces prior to the liberation of Kuwait.

Mr. Wakeham: I visited Kuwait on 26 to 28 April with a team of British business men. This visit was part of our response to the request made by the crown prince to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister that Britain should play a substantial part in the reconstruction of Kuwait. My meetings with the crown prince and with Kuwaiti Ministers were very positive and encouraging and I believe that United Kingdom industry will be able to make a significant contribution both to solving the urgent problem of extinguishing the fires and capping the wells and to the reconstruction of Kuwait's oil industry. The most immediate effect of my visit is the Kuwait Oil Company's intention to commission the Kuwaiti British Fire Group, a joint venture of AMEC, Taylor Woodrow and Wimpey, to undertake a damage assessment survey of a number of wells in northern Kuwait. If the Kuwaiti authorities are satisfied with the findings of this survey the fire group is likely to be appointed to put out the fires and cap the wells in that part of Kuwait.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what estimate he made of the ferocity and consequences of oil fires in Kuwait in (a) October 1990, (b) November 1990, (c) December 1990, (d) January 1991, (e) February 1991, (f) March 1991 and (g) April 1991, (i) pre and (ii) following his official visit to Kuwait to assess the extent of the conflagration.

Mr. Wakeham: The Government's latest view of the consequences of the oil fires in Kuwait remains as stated in the assessment by the Departments concerned, entitled "The Potential Impact of the Burning Oil Wells in Kuwait on the Environment and Human Health" a copy of which was placed in the Library of the House on 15 April 1991.

The main purpose of my visit to Kuwait was part of the follow-up to the request made to the Prime Minister by the crown prince on 6 March that Britain should play a substantial part in the reconstruction. I led a team of business men, most of whom had specialist expertise in the oil and gas industries, to investigate opportunities for British industry, as a result of which I have every reason to believe that a group of United Kingdom companies will be awarded a contract to carry out a damage assessment of one of the oilfields.

This is expected to lead to major opportunities for British industry to work on extinguishing and capping burning wells and restoring oil production.

TRANSPORT

Rail Freight

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the level of United Kingdom use of rail for freight relative to other members of the European Community.

Mr. Freeman: The UIC's "International Railway Statistics 1989" gives the following figures for freight carried by rail.

	Rail traffic lifted Tonnes (millions)	Rail traffic moved Tonnes kms (millions)
Belgium	81·1	9,400
Denmark	7·9	1,700
France	153·8	54,600

Great Britain	143·1	16,700
Greece	n/a	n/a
Holland	21·5	3,300
Italy	66·7	21,300
Luxembourg	17·8	700
Portugal	7·3	1,800
Republic of Ireland	n/a	n/a
Spain	38·3	14,400

Train Accidents

Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how many people are recorded as having fallen from British Rail trains in each year from 1981 to 1991;

(2) how many people have died as a result of falling from British Rail trains, in each year since 1981.

Mr. Freeman: The information requested is as follows. The figures for 1990 are provisional. Information for 1991 is not yet available.

Number of persons fallen from British Rail trains

LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

CSCE

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Lord President of the Council what part the United Kingdom Parliament played in the conference of parliamentary representatives from the member states of the conference on security and co-operation in Europe held on 1 to 3 April.

Mr. MacGregor: The President of the Chamber of Deputies of the Spanish Parliament, Senor Felix Pons, wrote to Mr. Speaker inviting six members of the United Kingdom Parliament to attend this conference. Following discussion through the usual channels, a delegation led by my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling) attended the conference. The other members of the delegation were:

Mr. Frank Cook
Mr. Patrick Duffy
Sir Geoffrey Finsberg
Sir Michael Marshall
Lord Montgomery of Alamein

Delegations from all 34 CSCE participating states attended the conference and agreed to establish a CSCE parliamentary assembly in which the United Kingdom Parliament will have 13 seats. I am placing in the Library of the House a copy of the final resolution agreed by the delegates.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Vagrants

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Don Valley on 29 January, Official Report, column 455, when the branding of vagrants was abolished from the Justices of the Peace Act 1361; what sections of this Act are still in force; and if he has any plans to bring in new legislation within this Act.

Mr. John Patten: On the first part of the question, I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to him on 29 January at column 455. As to the remainder, the Justices of the Peace Act 1361 is not organised into sections. The extant power from the 1361 Act is for magistrates to make binding-over orders. We have no present plans for legislation in this area.

Data Protection

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects the review committee exploring the wider use of police criminal records to report; whether the committee explored the practice of employers and local authorities forcing data subjects, prior to employment, to exercise their right of subject access under the terms of the Data Protection Act with respect to personal data held by the police; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The report of the efficiency scrutiny into criminal records was received on 24 April. It deals with various aspects of the question of disclosure from the criminal records, including the issue of enforced subject access for the purpose of job applications. The report is being considered in accordance with the interdepartmentally agreed arrangements for the conduct of efficiency scrutinies.

Prisons (Heating)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those of Her Majesty's prisons that have coal-fired boiler heating.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The list of prisons which have heating supplied via coal-fired boiler houses is as follows:

Ashwell, Nottingham
Deerbolt, Norwich
Feltham, Onley
Full Sutton, Rudgate
Gartree, Risley
Garth, Stoke Heath
Highpoint, Standford Hill (Part)
Hindley, Stocken
Long Lartin, Thorn Cross
Littlehey, Thorpe Arch
Lowdham Grange, Wayland
The Mount, Wymott

Police Cells

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will list by police stations in South Yorkshire how many (a) males and (b) females were held in police cells for the latest date he has available; and if he will show in his answer for each police station the longest length of stay a prisoner in each category has been held;

(2) what is the longest period (a) a male and (b) a female has been held in a police cell in South Yorkshire due to shortage of prison space following the Strangeways prison riot.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: On Thursday 2 May a total of 24 prisoners were held in police cells in the South Yorkshire police area. All were male and all were held at Doncaster police station. No female prisoners have been held in South Yorkshire police cells as a consequence of the prison disturbances in April 1990. Information about the length of time which individual prisoners have spent in police cells is not available centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Firearms Offences

Sir Eldon Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information is collected by (a) the Home Department and (b) police forces on the number of persons convicted of firearms offences who were in possession of a firearms certificate at the time when their offence was committed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Police forces would incur disproportionate cost in collating this information. It is, therefore, not available centrally.

Pucklechurch Remand Centre

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects Pucklechurch remand centre to be brought back into use.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I am considering a range of prison estate planning issues, including the future of Pucklechurch remand centre. I hope to be in a position to reach a decision in the near future.

Prisons (Baby Food)

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department is he will take steps to ensure that women in mother and baby units in prisons are allowed to prepare fresh foods for their babies.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list by women prison establishment those that (a) do and (b) do not allow mothers who are in prison with their babies to prepare fresh food for their babies other than manufactured baby food.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The provision of food in the three mother and baby units varies with the nature of the accommodation and the age of the children.

At HM prison Askham Grange, where mothers may keep their babies with them to the age of 18 months, fresh food is prepared for all the babies by one of the mothers.

At HM prison Styal, where babies may stay until nine months old, a range of both proprietary baby food and fresh food is available and mothers may choose in consultation with the nursing sister how to feed their babies. The food is prepared by the cook on the unit.

At HM prison Holloway, where the age limit is also nine months, mothers are provided with a range of propriety brands of food for their babies, supplemented by fruit juice and milk. Consideration is being given to extending the range of food available. Mothers may also purchase fresh fruit for their babies from the prison canteen.

Strip Searches

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give details of the number of strip searches carried out on females sentenced category A and remand prisoners being held in Her Majesty's prisons Durham and Brixton since November 1989; if any prison contraband, smuggled item or illegal correspondence was discovered in any search, indicating which items; in how many cases prisoners refused to be searched and had to be restrained while the search was being conducted; and what were the reasons for the search.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Between 1 November 1989 and 30 April 1991, category A women prisoners held in Durham and Brixton prisons were strip-searched on a total of 244 occasions. No unauthorised article was found. On no occasion did the prisoners refuse to be strip-searched. Strip searching is a routine security measure to which all prisoners male and female are subject, both for its deterrent effect and as a means of discovering unauthorised articles.

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of the Office of the Data Protection Registrar.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I understand that the Office of the Data Protection Registrar does not have a press and public relations office. The registrar is advised by a public relations agency on public relations matters generally.

Motoring Offences

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions there have been in each of the past five years for offences committed by motorists in yellow box junctions; and what evaluation his Department has made of their effectiveness.

Mr. John Patten: Separate figures for offences committed in yellow box junctions are not available centrally. The Home Office has not carried out any evaluation of yellow box junctions recently.

Squatters

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 6 February, Official Report, column 143, what conclusions he has reached on plans to revise the law relating to squatters and second homes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We expect to announce the outcome of our review as soon as possible.

Thamesmead Estate

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Deputy Commissioner of the Metropolitan police on the policing of the Thamesmead estate, with particular reference to the police response to allegations of racial harassment.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No. The Metropolitan police continue to give a priority response to racial incidents, as the 1991 strategy statement makes clear.

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will obtain for his Department's Library a recording of the LWT "London Programme" broadcast on Friday 26 April, about law and order in Thamesmead; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Home Office monitors recordings or transcripts of all television programmes dealing with substantive law and order issues. The specific policing matters raised in the LWT "London Programme" broadcast on 26 April are for the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis.

Forensic Science Services

Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how long it takes on average for forensic science laboratories to analyse blood samples from the date of arrival at the laboratories concerned.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information is not readily available in the form requested. I will write to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list, by police authority in England and Wales, the average time in 1990-91 for forensic science laboratories to analyse blood samples from the date of arrival at the laboratories concerned.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information is not available in the form requested.

Drug Trafficking

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to receive a report from the working group set up to review the provisions on the confiscation of drug traffickers' assets.

Mr. John Patten: I am pleased to announce that the working group has now completed its consideration of the provisions of the Drug Trafficking Offences Act 1986. Its report, a copy of which has been placed in the Library, was published today. It contains a number of important proposals designed to make it easier for the courts to apply the confiscation provisions and to enforce confiscation orders once they are made. In view of the innovatory nature of some of these proposals, it is important that we should give the public and key interest groups an opportunity to comment on what has been proposed. We shall therefore welcome comments on any of the issues raised. In the light of responses to the document, which we are seeking by 12 June, we shall consider what legislative measures need to be taken to strengthen the existing procedures.

The working group is now examining the parallel confiscation provisions contained in part VI of the Criminal Justice Act 1988.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Capital Gains Tax

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the yield for capital gains tax for the years 1987-88, 1988-89, 1989-90 and 1990-91; and what is the anticipated yield for 1991-92.

Mr. Maude: The following table shows the receipts of capital gains tax and the estimated total liability to capital gains tax arising on gains realised in each of the years since 1987-88. Capital gains tax receipts in any year reflect liabilities for the previous and earlier years.

Year	Capital gains tax receipts in the year £ million	Estimated capital gains tax liabilities on gains realised in the year £ million
1987-88	1,379	2,500
1988-89	2,323	1,900
1989-90	1,854	[1]2,100
1990-91	[2]1,855	[1]1,200
1991-92	[1]1,400	[1]1,500

[1] 1991-92 Financial Statement and Budget Report forecast
[2] Provisional

These figures exclude capital gains of companies taxed within corporation tax.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of capital gains tax paid was paid at 40 per cent. in (a) 1988-89, (b) 1989-90 and (c) 1990-91.

Mr. Maude: Capital gains tax receipts in 1988-89 correspond to gains realised in 1987-88 and earlier years which were taxed at a flat rate of 30 per cent.: no capital gains tax was paid at 40 per cent. in 1988-89.

It is estimated that the proportion of capital gains tax receipts attributable to liabilities charged at the higher rate of 40 per cent. was about a half in 1989-90 and three quarters in 1990-91. The increase in the proportion mainly reflects the reduction between 1989-90 and 1990-91 in receipts attributable to gains realised in 1987-88 and earlier which were taxed at 30 per cent.

These figures exclude gains realised by companies which are chargeable to corporation tax.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the number of staff employed by the Inland Revenue in regard to capital gains tax; and what was their cost for the latest year available.

Mr. Maude: The estimated staff usage on capital gains tax work in 1989-90 was 1,261 man years, with a direct cost of some £27.5 million.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the revenue cost for the latest year available of the loss allowance provisions within the capital gains tax system.

Mr. Maude: I regret that appropriate information is not available centrally on which to base a reliable estimate.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the breakdown for capital gains tax receipts as between equities, property, land and other capital gains for 1990-91.

Mr. Maude: The provisional estimate of receipts from capital gains tax in 1990-91 is £1,855 million. It is estimated that about two thirds of these receipts arose from gains on shares and other financial assets with the remainder attributable to gains on land, property and other tangible assets. For a more detailed breakdown by asset type of net chargeable gains arising from disposals made in 1987-88, I refer my hon. Friend to table 11.6 of "Inland Revenue Statistics 1990". The figures exclude gains realised by companies which are chargeable to corporation tax.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the current capital gains tax percentage change on equity gains in (i) the United States of America, (ii) Germany, (iii) Japan and (iv) France; and what information he has as to whether there is a time limit to the application of any equity change on gains in these countries.

Mr. Maude: The latest available information is given in the table, which is supplemented by notes.

The general rule in these countries is that if gains are taxed at all they are added to income and taxed at the ordinary income or corporation tax rate as appropriate, but various reliefs and exemptions may apply.

None of these countries has the equivalent to indexation which substantially reduces the effective rate of tax in the United Kingdom. Apart from Japan, none of the countries has an equivalent of the United Kingdom annual exemption.

Country	Nominal rates of tax on equity gains of
	Individuals	Companies
	Per cent.	Per cent.
USA[1]	15 or 28 plus state tax	15-34 plus state tax
Germany[2]	19-53	50
Japan[3]	10-50 plus local taxes 5-15	37·5 plus local taxes 17-20
France[4]	16 or 5-56·8	34

Notes:

1. USA Most states impose a state tax on both individuals and companies. In California, the most populous state, the top rate of 9·3 per cent. produces effective maximum rates of approximately 34 per cent. for individuals and 40 per cent. for companies. The tax rates are the same for long-term gains (i.e. on assets held for more than one year) and short-term gains (on assets held for less than one year).

2. Germany Private gains for individuals are not subject to income tax unless they arise from sale of equities within 6 months of date of acquisition or from disposal of more than 1 per cent. of shares in a corporation in which the individual owned a substantial interest (more than 25 per cent. of share capital). Companies' gains are taxable however long an asset has been held.

3. Japan The first 500,000 yen (£1,527 at latest available purchasing power parities rate) of gains of individuals in a year are exempt. Only one half of long-term gains (on assets held more than 5 years) is taxable. Individuals may elect to be taxed on equity gains at 20 per cent. (plus local taxes), in which case the special deduction does not apply and the whole gain is taxable. Companies' gains are taxable however long an asset has been held.

4. France Special 16 per cent. rate applies where individual has long-term gain (on assets held for at least 2 years) or gain on sale of shares which constitute part of a substantial interest in a company. Long-term gains of companies are taxed at 19 or 25 per cent. depending on the type of security held.

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of the Department for National Savings.

Mr. Maples: The full complement of staff including vacant posts employed in the press office of the Department for National Savings on 1 April each year 1979-91 was as listed in the table. There is no record of how many posts were vacant at these dates.

	Numbers
1 April 1979	6
1 April 1980	6
1 April 1981	5
1 April 1982	5
1 April 1983	4
1 April 1984	4
1 April 1985	4
1 April 1986	4
1 April 1987	4
1 April 1988	4
1 April 1989	4
1 April 1990	4
1 April 1991	3½

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of the Inland Revenue.

Mr. Maude: The information is as follows:

Year	Complement	Staff in post
1981	6	6
1982	6	6
1983	6	6
1984	6	6

	Manyears
1985	14
1986	16
1987	18
1988	21
1989	22
1990	22
1991	21

No figures are available for the years prior to 1 April 1981. The figures shown for the years 1981 to 1984 relate only to the Inland Revenue press office. Since 1984 both press and external public relations activitities have been part of the wider duties undertaken by the Department's communications group. There are thus no complements for these later years, and the figures are estimates of the manyears employed on the functions in question. The increase in numbers from 1985 onwards is due to an increase in activity on public information services, including local radio phone-ins, a mobile inquiry centre and the schools education service.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of Her Majesty's Stationery Office.

Mr. Maples: HMSO has had no press and public relations office from 1979 to the present date. Press and public relations reponsibilities have formed a small part of the duties of one nominated officer.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of HM Customs and Excise.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The number of staff in the press and information office of HM Customs and Excise is as follows:

	Complement	Staff actually employed
1979-80	8	4
1980-81	7	6
1981-82	7	6
1982-83	7	6
1983-84	7	6
1984-85	7	5
1985-86	7	6
1986-87	8	7
1987-88	8	5
1988-89	9	7
1989-90	9	5
1990-91	11	9
1991-92	11	9

Pensions

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to review the indexation of public sector pensions.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I have no plans to do so.

European Coal and Steel Community

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what (a) grants, (b) loans and (c) at what rates of interest for loans, have been made by the European Coal and Steel Community to retail organisations in the United Kingdom in each of the last three years; and what is his estimate of the effect on the competitiveness of the receiving companies and/or bodies as compared to their rivals in the market place for their goods and/or services.

Mr. Leigh: I have been asked to reply. There have been no such grants, but one "conversion" loan in 1990 and one in 1991. There may have been sub-loans made under global loans through financial intermediaries but information about these is not available.

The purpose of ECSC conversion loans is to assist with the creation of employment for people made redundant from the coal and steel industries. The loans are available in designated areas throughout the European Community. The criteria applied are set by the Commission. I cannot estimate the effect on the competitiveness of the recipients.

The rates of interest attached to any individual line are a matter of commercial confidentiality between the borrower and the Commission.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Sheep Scab

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many representations he has received on the new controls relating to sheep scab; and how many of these representations are critical of the self-regulatory nature of the controls.

Mr. Maclean: The Department has received a number of representations about the self-certification arrangements which applied during last autumn's compulsory national dip for sheep scab and all contained some criticisms of the move to owner declarations by farmers.

We have completed our assessment of the 1990 national dip and the success of the self-certification arrangements and it is clear that large numbers of owner declarations were not returned to local authorities at the end of the dipping period, as required by the legislation. All comments from interested organisations on the national dip have been carefully considered and, as a result, we have decided to streamline the arrangements to apply during this year's compulsory national dip for sheep scab which will take place during the period Sunday 22 September to Saturday 2 November.

The requirement in the Sheep Scab (National Dip) Order 1990 for undipped sheep moved during the dipping period to be accompanied by an owner declaration will be dropped. This will reduce the number of forms that farmers are required to complete and will scale down the involvement of market authorities in countersigning forms at markets.

I hope that the Government's positive response to suggestions from those involved in the national dip on how to improve the arrangements will result in greater commitment from the industry on sheep scab control measures. Last year's response was disappointing and we shall be looking for a much better response from farmers this year on the completion of owner declarations.

Feline Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many cats have been diagnosed as suffering from feline spongiform encephalopathy.

Mr. Maclean: Spongiform encephalopathy has been confirmed in 15 cats in Great Britain and one in Northern Ireland.

Brown Hare Syndrome

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) whether he has any evidence linking European brown hare syndrome with oilseed rape;

(2) what is his estimate of the mortality levels caused by European brown hare syndrome.

Mr. Maclean: Although the grazing of "double low" varieties of oilseed rape was initially suspected as one of the possible causes of European brown hare syndrome, there is no evidence linking oilseed rape with the disease. A virus is now considered to be the likely cause. Mortality may be high in any one incident, but the proportion of diseased animals is unknown and it is not yet possible to assess the wider impact on the hare population.

Rhizomania

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many incidents of rhizomania have been reported in the United Kingdom in the last three years; and what action he has taken to combat the disease.

Mr. Curry: Two cases of rhizomania were found in 1989 and three cases, on adjoining farms, in 1990. These cases, which were all in Norfolk, were identified in the extensive survey for rhizomania which we carry out annually. The only previous identification of the disease in this country was at a farm in Suffolk in 1987.

We operate a range of controls, including import controls, to combat this disease. Where it is found, we require strict hygiene measures to prevent spread of the disease by movements off the farm and restrictions are placed on cropping on the farm. These normally involve grassing down infected fields, some limitations on root crops on other parts of the farm and a ban on growing sugar beet or planting material. The exact nature of these restrictions will depend on the circumstances of the case.

Wool

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement concerning his assessment of the prospects of British wool producers in 1991 and 1992.

Mr. Curry: Returns from wool production form, on average, 5 to 10 per cent. of individual producers' total returns from sheep farming. Prospects for wool producers thus depend on a range of factors, including market prices and input costs. Prices for finished lambs in 1991 so far have been following the usual seasonal trends and prices for British wool, although weak, have shown some improvement in recent sales. In addition, United Kingdom sheep farmers enjoy significant financial support through the EC sheep regime and hill livestock compensatory allowances. This support, which takes account of both market prices and income levels, is likely to total some £394 million in 1990.

EC Surplus Food

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how subsidised foodstuffs from EC surplus stocks are now distributed round the United Kingdom; what are the criteria used; how frequently such distributions are made; and what are his plans for the future of these distributions.

Mr. Curry: The distribution of surplus butter and beef relies on the voluntary participation of charitable and other non-profit-making organisations. The method and timing of distributions are matters for these organisations themselves to decide according to local needs and their own resources. In order to meet the requirements of European legislation, only the homeless and destitute, people in receipt of income support or family credit and people living in welfare hostels are eligible to receive produce under the United Kingdom scheme.

We will shortly announce the future arrangements for distribution.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will prohibit breeding from the offspring of BSE-affected cattle.

Mr. Maclean: No.

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations his Department has received from local authorities regarding the case for national policy guidance in respect of the need for, and situation of, additional incinerator capacity for bovine spongiform encephalopathy-infected carcases.

Mr. Maclean: We have received a number of representations from local authorities which are considering planning applications for incineration plants seeking advice on the disposal of suspect bovine spongiform encephalopathy carcases. The State Veterinary Service will provide advice and information to any local authority which seeks it.

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment his Department has made of the effects of disposal of bovine spongiform encephalopathy-infected carcases by means of incineration.

Mr. Maclean: Incineration is a safe, effective means of disposal, leaving only sterile ash.

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will make a statement on his policy relating to the transport and processing of carcases affected by bovine spongiform encephalopathy and the recommended means of disposal;

(2) if he will make a statement of his Department's policy relating to the scale and distribution of additional incinerator capacity for the disposal of bovine spongiform encephalopathy-infected carcases in the south-west peninsula;

(3) what assessment his Department has made of the number of bovine spongiform encephalopathy-infected carcases that will require disposal by incinerator annually in the south-west peninsula over the next (a) five years and (b) 10 years.

Mr. Maclean: The carcases of suspect bovine spongiform encephalopathy cases are disposed of by burial or incineration. Although both are safe, well-established methods, incineration in plants which comply with strict conditions laid down by the Ministry for storage and incineration is preferable. Carcases are moved under licence to these incineration plants, and the vehicles used must comply with the licence conditions.

Within the south-west region there are two incineration plants in which suspect bovine spongiform encephalopathy carcases are incinerated. However the disposal of carcases is handled on a national basis and is not restricted by regional or other boundaries. Carcases that originate in the south-west are not necessarily incinerated there.

At the moment over 90 per cent. of carcases are incinerated. Our aim is to deal with all carcases in this way and we hope shortly to have sufficient capacity to do so. Nevertheless, we would consider contracting with any incineration plant which can meet our standards and has obtained the necessary local authority planning consents and approvals.

Baby Food

Miss Lestor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will bring forward proposals to require manufacturers of baby food to declare the meat content of the products, just as manufacturers of ordinary meat products do.

Mr. Maclean: The European Commission has issued a draft directive that lays down compositional and labelling requirements for cereal-based and other processed foods for infants and young children. The proposals contain minimum content levels for meat and certain other characterising ingredients. Negotiations in Brussels are scheduled to commence early in June. The Commission also intends to introduce proposals on quantitative ingredients declaration of foodstuffs shortly.

Irrigation

Mr. Onslow: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps his Department has taken to ensure that the leaflet "Good Irrigation Practice, Make Every Drop Count" is made available to every holder of a spray irrigation licence in England and Wales.

Mr. Curry: The leaflet, which concentrates on an early warning system for farmers of impending restrictions by the National Rivers Authority, was intended to go to every licence holder in England and Wales. In the event, the authority was unable to introduce the warning system outside its Anglian region this season, and leaflets have therefore gone to licence holders in that region only.

Aluminium

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the progress of research on bioavailability of aluminium from food and water at the trace metabolism unit at Southampton.

Mr. Maclean: The work being carried out at Southampton university, which is being funded by the Ministry, is an initial pilot study to investigate the feasibility of measuring differences in aluminium absorption from different foods and beverages. Results are expected later this year and will be assessed to see whether further work should be commissioned.

Pesticides

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he will take to ensure the safe disposal of alphachloralose and other pesticides which are held by individuals but which no longer have approved use under the pesticide regulations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: Advice on disposal of unwanted pesticides is given in a code of practice for the safe use of pesticides by this Department and the Health and Safety Commission, which was issued last year. Detailed consideration is now being given to a scheme to offer the collection and disposal of unwanted pesticides held on farms, which would be run by trade associations. This will complement the long-term campaign, launched in March, to persuade those who abuse pesticides such as alphachloralose to kill wildlife that this practice is wrong and unnecessary.

Advertising

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food further to his answer to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) on 25 April, Official Report, column 556, if he will give a further breakdown of his Ministry's expenditure on other publicity materials for each year between 1984-85 and 1991-92; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer [holding answer 3 May 1991]: The information available is as follows:

	1988-89 £'000	1989-90 £'000	1990-91 £'000	[1] 1991-92 £'000
Food Safety	409	1,263	1,104	2,700
Environment	7	94	139	310
Imports (Control of Imported Animal and Plant Disease)	232	213	282	325
Animal Welfare	27	50	82	150
Grant Aid Schemes	194	90	70	87
Research and Development	0	4	54	74
Miscellaneous Campaigns (e.g. MAFF Touring Exhibition)	135	659	648	500

[1] Forecast.

Publicity material produced by this department, other than modest amounts of press advertising, consists of publications, exhibitions and audio visual/video, as well as associated market research and distribution. Individual projects employ a mixture of these media as appropriate. Figures provided for the period 1988-89 to 1991-92 are available following a change in the way expenditure is recorded. Comparable figures for 1984-85 to 1987-88 could only be made available at disproportionate cost.

Official Meetings

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, if he will list the number of occasions during the last 12 months on which he has held official meetings with (i) the National Farmers Union, (ii) the Food and Drink Federation, (iii) the Retail Consortium, (iv) the Consumers Association and (v) the National Consumer Council.

Mr. Gummer: I have held six official meetings with the National Farmers Union on bovine spongiform encepathology and allied subjects, at which the main issue was the responsibility of the farming community to the consumer. I have had four meetings with the National Farmers Union to discuss the technicalities of the price fixing and other EC issues of direct concern to farmers. In addition, I have held the three formal consultation meetings involving the National Farmers Union on the wool guarantee, the autumn hill review and the price fixing, and three on specific subjects (the milk marketing boards, salmonella compensation and landlord/tenant law). I addressed the National Farmers Union annual general meeting on 12 February and will send a copy of my speech to the hon. Gentleman. I also had a courtesy visit from the new National Farmers Union president after his election.

The Consumers Association and the National Consumer Council both nominate members to the Ministry's consumers' panel and their senior officers attend the regular meetings held with leaders of consumer organisations. These bodies have met on seven occasions either under my chairmanship or that of my hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean), the Parliamentary Secretary.

I have met the Food and Drink Federation on two occasions and the Retail Consortium on one occasion.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for 7 May.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. Immediately after questions I shall depart the House to attend a guard of honour for the Prime Minister of Spain. I shall be having further meetings later today.

World Bank (Forest Policy)

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Prime Minister which Department has responsibility for instructing the United Kingdom's World Bank executive director regarding World Bank forest policy.

The Prime Minister: The Overseas Development Administration.

Oil Fires (Kuwait)

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 25 April 1991, Official Report, column 1208, if he will make a further statement on United Kingdom action in relation to oil fires in Kuwait.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy gave today to him and to my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham).

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Data Protection Registrar

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what discussions he has had with the Data Protection Registrar as to the number of boards of governors and head teachers that are not registered under the terms of the Data Protection Act; and whether he will make a statement concerning the outcome of those discussions.

Mr. Fallon: Information is not available on registration under the Data Protection Act by boards of governors and headteachers. Officials of the Department are in discussion with the office of the Data Protection Registrar on the scope of registration by schools and guidance will be issued in the summer.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has made any estimate of the cost of registration of each school under the Data Protection Act should boards of governors, head teachers and each local education authority need to register under the Act; and whether he plans to increase grants in order to cover these costs.

Mr. Fallon: I have nothing to add to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member on 19 February 1991, at column 76.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the general items of personal information that are held in relation to individuals in list 99; if he will indicate the number of entries in list 99; whether the individual has the right to challenge the accuracy of the information held against him on list 99; whether he has had discussions with the Data Protection Registrar concerning list 99; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fallon: List 99 contains the names, dates of birth, and departmental reference numbers of 1,540 persons who are currently wholly or partially excluded from teaching or work with children or young persons on grounds of misconduct. Before directing that any person shall be excluded, my right hon. and learned Friend offers him or her the opportunity of making representations. List 99 is outside the scope of the Data Protection Act and has not therefore been the subject of any discussion with the Data Protection Registrar.

Schools (Debt Charges)

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if his Department keeps any record of the debt charge of schools leaving local authority control.

Mr. Eggar: As the liability of an authority in respect of the principal of, or any interest on, any loan held by the authority for the purposes of a school which becomes grant maintained is not transferred to the governing body of a grant-maintained school, the Department has no need to keep a record of such debts.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what advice his Department gives local authorities in respect of debt charge incurred from capital investment in schools which subsequent to the investment leave local authority control; and what account is taken of any such debt charge when assessing the Department's revenue support for the local authority.

Mr. Eggar: The statutory provisions on debt charges relating to schools which become grant maintained are set out in section 74 of the Education Reform Act 1988. Those debt charges are treated in the same way as other local authority debt charges for the purpose of calculating standard spending assessments.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has for financing the debt charge paid by local authorities in respect of schools which adopt grant-maintained status.

Mr. Eggar: Authorities receive an appropriate allowance for the financing of their capital debt liabilities, including relevant liabilities relating to schools in their area that are grant maintained, within their standard spending assessments.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the debt charge to local authorities in regard to capital spend on schools which have subsequently opted out of local authority control; and if he will list the debt charge by local authority, indicating in each case the number of schools which have taken grant-maintained status.

Mr. Eggar: As the responsibility and the financing for any debt charge attributable to a grant-maintained school remains with the former maintaining authority, the Department has no need to keep a record of the debt charges. The information requested is therefore not available.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if his Department takes account of the debt charge on a local authority in regard to a school which adopts grant-maintained status when determining the allocation of revenue funding between the school and the local authority.

Mr. Eggar: The responsibility for meeting debt charges that relate to the period before a school is incorporated as grant-maintained remains with the school's former local authority. Authorities receive an allowance for capital financing within their standard spending assessments. A grant-maintained school's annual maintenance grant, which is recouped from its former maintaining authority, does not include provision to meet such charges.

Educational Psychological Service

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the local education authorities that do not provide an educational psychological service from their retained percentage of the budget.

Mr. Fallon: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to him on 30 April 1991, at columns 141-42.

Quangos

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the individual appointments excluding casual vacancies he is scheduled to make to quasi autonomous non-governmental organisations in (a) 1991 and (b) 1992 indicating in each case the title of the post, the salary if any and the duration of the appointment.

Mr. Eggar: The information is as follows:

Name of Body	Next appointment due, and length of appointment	Salary
Business and Technician Education Council	Chairman and all 12 members in 1992 Three-year appointments	Chairman part-time £7,500 Members unpaid
Centre for information on Language Teaching and Research	Three members in 1991 Four members in 1992 Appointed for up to three years	Unpaid
Central Bureau for Educational Visits and Exchanges	Six members in 1991 Four-year appointments	Unpaid

Natural Environment Research Council

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what super-computing facilities are available to the Natural Environment Research Council.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The National Centre supercomputers available to the Natural Environment Research Council include the joint research councils' Cray XMP-48 at the Science and Engineering Research Council's Rutherford Appleton laboratory, the Cray XMP-28 at the university of London computer center and the VP1200 at the Manchester computer centre. Time on other supercomputers in the USA and at the Meteorological Office has been obtained on an ad hoc basis for collaborative research projects.

Global Climate Model

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what priority he attaches to a global climate model.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The Natural Environment Research Council has given high priority to the development of global and regional models of the oceans and atmosphere. The science budget also supports a wide range of related research aimed at improving understanding of climate change processes and impacts.

Ocean Studies

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will provide a supercomputer for Natural Environment Research Council work for ocean forecasting.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Decisions on the provision of supercomputing facilities are based upon the advice which my right hon. and learned Friend receives from the Advisory Board for the Research Councils. No advice on this matter has yet been received.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what facilities he provides for world ocean calibration development.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The Natural Environment Research Council James Rennell centre at the university of Southampton is actively involved with the British National Space Centre and the European Space Agency in observations designed to calibrate instruments on the European remote sensing satellite—ERS-1—which is used to study temperatures, currents and winds at the ocean surface.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proposals he has to finance the work on plants in the ocean at the James Rennell centre of the Natural Environment Research Council marine atmospheric sciences unit.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The Natural Environment Research Council is already supporting research at the James Rennell centre for ocean circulation at the university of Southampton, in collaboration with Princeton university in the USA and the United Kingdom climate prediction centre—the Hadley centre—in the development of mathematical models of the seasonal variation in the production of microscopic planktonic plants in the oceans, with special reference to their role in the absorption of carbon dioxide.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what requests he has received from the National Rivers Authority for more information facilities in the Western ocean.

Mr. Alan Howarth: My right hon. and learned Friend has received no such request.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what action he is taking to improve relationships with the Japanese in relation to (a) deep ocean technology, (b) the study of the micro-structure of the ocean and (c) global climate weather forecasting.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Working relationships are generally established at a personal level in the course of an individual scientist's work. Scientists supported by the Natural Environment Research Council maintain good relations with the Japanese in relation to both deep-ocean technology and the study of the micro-structure of the ocean. The links between the United Kingdom and Japan relating to global climate weather forecasting are primarily made through the Meteorological Office. Recently visits have been made to Japan to discuss operational meteorological and oceanographic forecasting.

In 1989, a round table meeting of senior Government scientists from Japan and the United Kingdom was held in London. Marine technology was one of the many items discussed. A further meeting will be held in Tokyo later this year.

East Birmingham Task Force

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science has met or visited the East Birmingham task force.

Mr. Alan Howarth: I visited the task force area on 21 December 1989, 23 April 1990, 3 September 1990, 30 January 1991 and 1 May 1991. I held meetings with the task force leader on 20 March 1990 and 18 March 1991 to discuss the annual action plan.

Teachers' Pensions

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) whether he has any plans to review the indexation of teachers' pensions and what action has been taken in the last six months in regard to indexation of teachers' pensions;

(2) what plans his Department has for determining future increases in teachers' pensions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fallon: In common with other public service pensions, teachers' pensions are increased at the same time and by the same percentage as the earnings-related element of the state retirement pension. The amount of the annual uprating each April reflects the movement in the retail prices index during the 12-month period ending the previous September. There are no plans to change these arrangements.

The Pensions Increase (Review) Order 1991 announced that public service pensions would be increased from 8

April 1991. For pensions which began before 24 April 1990 the increase is 10·9 per cent. For pensions which began on or after 24 April 1990 a proportion of the full increase is paid.

ENVIRONMENT

Water Supply Failure

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the number of times there was a failure of water supplies in the Doncaster area during the last 12 months by (a) location, (b) reason for breakdown, and (c) the duration of the breakdown until supply was resumed; and what were the figures for the previous year.

Mr. Baldry: Monitoring the level of service by water companies to customers is the responsibility of the Director General of Water Services.

Phosphate Waste

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the names and locations of companies that are known to discharge phosphate waste into coastal and river waters in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Baldry: The control of discharges of phosphate waste into coastal and river waters in the United Kingdom is a matter for the National Rivers Authority. The Department does not keep lists of names and locations of companies making such discharges.

Palace of Westminster

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the current position on the project for cleaning the stonework of the Palace of Westminster; and if he will take action to speed up the project.

Mr. Yeo: The contract for the current stage of the programme to repair and restore the stonework, which covers the south elevation and the Victoria Tower is scheduled for completion in 1994. Before the stage is completed, plans will be drawn up and agreed with the Houses so that the next phase of the work, covering the internal courtyards, can continue without a break.

Drinking Water

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will list in rank order the water companies with the highest level of purity and lowest level of contamination of the drinking water they supply.

Mr. Baldry: Because of the number and diversity of the parameters used in regulating the quality of drinking water, and also because some companies supply water from a number of different sources, it would not be possible to rank companies in the way suggested.

Rights of Way

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his Department's current policy on showing the location of public rights of way on Forestery Commission land on its Landranger and Pathfinder maps.

Mr. Baldry: Ordnance Survey policy has not changed. All rights of way which appear on local authority definitive maps are shown on the Landranger and Pathfinder series of maps.

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, in the press and public relations office of the Nature Conservancy Council.

Mr. Trippier: The Nature Conservancy Council employed two people in its press and public relations office from 1979-80 to 1989-90. This was increased to three in 1990-91. The Nature Conservancy Council for England employs two people on this work.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of the Ordnance Survey.

Mr. Baldry: The information requested is as follows:

	Staff Complement	Staff in Post on 1 April
1979	7	7
1980	7	7
1981	7	7
1982	8	8
1983	6	6
1984	7	6
1985	6	6
1986	6	6
1987	6	6
1988	6	6
1989	6	6
1990	6	6

Over the same period, the total number of staff employed by Ordnance Survey reduced from 3,587 to 2,482.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of the Countryside Commission.

Mr. Trippier: The table gives the available information. No figures are available prior to 1 April 1982.

	Press and PR Staff[1]
1982-83	3
1983-84	3
1984-85	3
1985-86	3
1986-87	3

1988-89	3
1989-90	5
1990-91	5
1991-92	5

[1] Staff figures are at 1 April, and staff in post equals the staff complement.

Golf Courses

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many planning applications for golf courses have been made to local planning authorities in each of the last five years; how many have been granted; how many have been refused; how many included a hotel; how many went to appeal; and, of these, how many were granted.

Mr. Yeo: Information about planning applications is not collected in a form which enables those for golf courses to be identified separately. The position on appeals involving golf courses is as follows:

Year	Appeals received (number including hotels)	Appeals decided	Appeals granted
1986-87	21 (2)	14	2
1987-88	12 (2)	17	6
1988-89	27 (5)	10	2
1989-90	50 (3)	37	9
[1]1990-91	95 (11)	51	17

[1] provisional

Construction Products Directive

Mr. Page: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the regulations appertaining to the construction products directive due to be implemented on 27 June are to be published.

Mr. Yeo: The drafting of construction products regulations to implement the EC construction products directive is nearing completion. It is hoped to lay the regulations on or about 27 June.

Development Corporation Officers

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any plans to extend to cover the officers of development corporations the provisions of the Local Government Act 1988 which restrict involvement in party political affairs for those local government officers earning above a particular level; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: We have no plans to do so.

Local Government Finance

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment by how much in real terms, and taking account of any changes in responsibilities, the total income of local authorities increased in the first year of operation of the community charge as against the last year of the rating system; and what steps he is taking to ensure that there is no similar increase in the first year of operation of the council tax.

Mr. Key: Total demands and precepts in 1990-91, after capping, showed an increase of 15·1 per cent. in cash terms over adjusted net revenue income in 1989-90, a real terms increase of 6·7 per cent. The Government have said that they will ensure, through capping, that the substantial increase in spending which accompanied the transition to the community charge is not repeated.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy that calculation of the central provision of support for local authority expenditure should, from 1992, include economic and employment factors to reflect the particular needs of localities facing above average need.

Mr. Key: My right hon. Friend will make known his proposals for the distribution of revenue support grant for 1992-93 in the autumn. The consultation paper about the new council tax, issued on 23 April, made it clear that the Government are not proposing any major changes to the present standard spending assessments which are based on extensive research.

Public Sector Land

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will introduce further measures to encourage the bringing into use of vacant public sector land in the light of responses to his Department's consultation paper; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: There was widespread agreement with our proposal to give statutory backing for public sector owners' registers of their unused and underused land. Pending any longer-term decision to introduce new primary legislation to this effect, we propose now to require local authorities under section 230 of the Local Government Act 1972 to supply the Department with aggregate information about their registers. Compliance with this aspect of the 1989 code of practice has been particularly disappointing. We propose also to give local authorities clear notice that, if the provisions of the code on making such registers available to the public are not properly met this year, we intend to make regulations under section 3 of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 to make these provisions to a binding requirement for 1992. My officials are writing to the local authority associations today on these points. They are also writing to other bodies about compliance with the code.

We have decided not to proceed with the other main proposals in the consultation paper for directing disposals to named persons and for experimental local franchises of packages of sites. Strong objections were raised against these possibilities during consultation.

There was general recognition of the desirability of further action to bring vacant public sector land into use. Existing measures include derelict land grant, follow-up of the Audit Commission's report on local authorities' property management and directions to dispose of land entered on my right hon. Friend's register. For their part, Government Departments and other bodies face pressure to dispose of vacant land in their possession through the annual public expenditure survey and related discussions. My right hon. Friend is considering what further measures might be appropriate and our conclusions will be announced in due course.

Aggregates

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the long-term forecast of demand for aggregates.

Mr. Yeo: New forecasts of the demand for aggregates for the next 20 years have been prepared by independent consultants. These have been published today. They are not Government plans or targets to be met.

The forecasts are based on the longer-term prospects for construction investment and indicate a rising trend in demand for betweeen 421 million tonnes per annum and 490 million tonnes per annum by 2001—about 4 per cent. a year.

The Government are publishing the forecasts now so that the environmental implications of the rising demand for aggregates can be fully considered. These are a matter for serious concern. The forecasts do not mean that the demand must be met from new sources of land-won aggregates. Nor do they mean that targets are set for production by the minerals industry.

Aggregates are needed to meet the demand for improvements to transport infrastructure, house building, improvements in water quality and hospitals. The Government are currently revising the present guidelines for aggregates provision in England and Wales which were published in mineral planning guidance note No. 6—MPG6—in March 1989.

The Government recognise that the mining of aggregates is a matter of considerable public concern and that there is a widespread view that the industry's operations lack sufficient regard for the environment. Before new guidelines are published the Government will wish to hear from the industry what practical steps they intend to take to improve their environmental performance and their standing with the public.

The Government will expect the industry to make greater use of alternative sources of supply. These include the potential from marine dredged sand and gravel; the greater use of materials such as china clay, sand and colliery minestone; and the increased exploitation of waste and recycled materials including power station ash, blast furnace slag and crushed concrete. We shall also consider the contributions that can be made from coastal super quarries. The Government have research in hand to examine all these options.

The publication of the forecasts will enable the Government to consider the view of local authorities, the industry and the general public about the future demand for aggregates, before publishing draft guidelines for public consultation.

The Government will consider whether the present policy of ensuring a steady supply for the construction industry remains appropriate and whether it encourages efficiency in aggregates use. The regional aggregates working parties have been asked to consider the medium and long-term implications of the forecasts on their regions.

While the forecasts provide general background information about trends in demand, their use in relation to the consideration of a particular application on development plan is necessarily limited until the revised guidelines are published. MPG6 remains the Government's policy for aggregates provision until it is revised. Mineral planning authorities should have regard to the statement made by the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope) in July 1989 which made it clear that MPG6 should be implemented as a matter of priority.

Interest Rate Swaps

Sir Trevor Skeet: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement in the light of the House of Lords' judgment on local authority interest rate swaps.

Mr. Heseltine [pursuant to his answer, 24 January 1991, columns 275-76]: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and I have given careful consideration to the implications of this judgment. The Government have received a number of representations favouring a variety of different schemes of legislation to enable local authorities to make payments under past arrangements which have been found to be unlawful. The Government have concluded, however, that it is best not to seek to alter the existing legal obligations of the parties to these arrangements.

As the Government have already made clear, there is specific legislation enabling local authorities to borrow money and protecting those who lend to local authorities. This legislation was not in issue in the recent litigation on interest rate swaps.

Merseyside (Ministerial Visit)

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will make a statement on the recent visit of the Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities to Merseyside;

(2) if he will make a statement on the recent meeting of the Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities with the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside concerning extra funding for Liverpool city council.

Mr. Portillo [holding answer 2 May 1991]: I met the honourable Members for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry) and for Liverpool, Garston (Mr. Loyden) on 17 April to discuss additional financial assistance for Liverpool city council. I reminded them of a range of Government programmes which are benefiting Liverpool, such as the urban programme, estate action, the city action team, the Merseyside development corporation and the Granby/Toxteth task force. I explained that we were not prepared to help the council resolve problems arising from its spending programmes of the mid-80s which were in opposition to Government policies. We are however keen to encourage the council to participate fully in our initiatives for inner-city regeneration and to benefit from the additional resources that come with them.

I took the opportunity to emphasise these points when I visited Liverpool on 26 April and had discussions with the city council. I impressed on the council the need for a constructive approach to working in partnership with the Government, the private sector and other agencies. I also visited Cable Communications Ltd. in Brunswick business park, where I saw the company's operations to deliver cable television to the region.

London Docklands

Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many people from the unemployment registers in the London boroughs of Southwark, Tower Hamlets and Newham have secured employment in new businesses in the London Docklands UDA.

Mr. Jackson: I have been asked to reply.

Questions on operational matters in the Employment Service executive agency are the responsibility of Mike Fogden, the agency's chief executive, to whom I have referred this question for reply.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Food Aid (Africa)

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much food aid has been contributed by Her Majesty's Government to meet the food aid needs in Africa; and what have been the bilateral donations from EC member states, the United States and other bilateral donors.

Mrs. Chalker: Since September 1990 Britain has committed 158,000 tonnes of food aid to Ethiopia, Sudan, Mozambique, Angola and Malawi. The United States of America and European Community, the largest donors, have so far pledged 815,000 tonnes and 685,000 tonnes respectively to these same countries. On 2 May the European Community agreed to provide a further 400,000 tonnes for Africa as a whole. Full details of individual contributions made by other donors are not yet available on the same basis.

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give his assessment of food aid needs to meet the current famines in Africa; and what are the comparable figures produced by the European Commission and the World Food Programme.

Mrs. Chalker: The European Commission's most recent assessment suggests a total emergency food aid requirement of some 4·5 million tonnes for the whole of 1991 based on an estimated 31 million people affected in 12 countries in Africa. According to the Commission this estimate has been checked with the FAO, the World Food Programme, Canada and the United States of America. We agree broadly with it.

Kurdish Refugees

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has about the availability of Harir airport for use to transport supplies to the Kurdish refugees.

Mrs. Chalker: Although we understand that Harir may be serviceable, I am not aware of any plans to use it at present.

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of the Overseas Development Administration.

Mrs. Chalker: The number of press and public relations posts in the Overseas Development Administration has been 12 from 1979-80 to the present. All posts were occupied on 1 April each year, except in 1983 when there was one vacancy.

Ethiopia

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the capacity of the joint relief partnership to meet the needs of the people of Wollo and Gonder for emergency assistance; and whether the British Government will provide financial help to the Ethiopian relief organisation to implement its programme of internal purchase to allow Ethiopians in these areas to feed themselves.

Mrs. Chalker: The joint relief partnership, using the southern line, should be able to meet substantially the emergency needs of the people of Wollo and Gondar. This will depend however on continued supplies of food arriving at Assab and on securing conditions allowing the southern line to be kept open. We are providing assistance through the southern line. We have no plans at present to finance internal purchase arrangements.

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the adequacy of the provision of aid for the Wollo and Gondar regions of Ethiopia; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: The emergency needs of the people of Wollo and Gondar should be able to be met substantially through the operations of the joint relief partnership, using the southern line. This will depend however on continued supplies of food arriving at Assab and on security conditions allowing the southern line to be kept open. We are providing assistance through the southern line.

Vietnam

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to give Vietnam financial assistance to help pay arrears owed to the IMF.

Mrs. Chalker: The United Kingdom strongly supports the internationally agreed strategy for assisting developing countries with their arrears to the IMF and World bank, demonstrated by our active role in clearing Guyana's and Zambia's arrears. We have no direct bilateral aid programme with Vietnam and hence at present are not in a position to offer a financial contribution in the context of the settlement of Vietnam's arrears. We are keeping the position under review.

African Countries

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what quantity of seeds the ODA has supplied or has plans to supply to (a) Sudan, (b) Ethiopia and (c) other African countries facing famine; when the seeds are expected to arrive; and when they will be distributed to farmers.

Mrs. Chalker: In response to the famine in Africa the ODA has funded supplies of seeds, at a total cost of over £2·505 million, as follows:

(a) Sudan

630 tonnes millet through SCF for May 1991 planting (£490,000.)

£510,000 through CARE towards cost of mixed grains for May 1991 planting.

£125,000 through ACORD towards cost of mixed grains for May 1991 planting.

(b) Ethiopia
No seed supplied recently, but we are willing to look sympathetically at requests as a famine relief measure.

(c) Other African countries affected by famine:

Angola
13 tonnes white maize sent through CAFOD to arrive September 1990—£13,700.
300 tonnes millet and sorghum sent through Christian Aid to arrive September 1990—£177,700.
£17,000 through CAFOD towards cost of 4 tonnes vegetable seeds sent to arrive October-November 1990.
£25,000 through OXFAM towards cost of 100 tonnes sorghum to arrive March-April 1991.
Visits by CAFOD and Christian Aid are now in progress to report on distribution and use of seed.

Liberia
US$50,000 through UNDRO for vegetable and rice seeds for mid-1991 planting.

Malawi
£45,950 through World Vision towards cost of vegetable/grain seeds for mid-1991 planting.

20*Mozambique*
£439,000 through NGOs towards costs of seeds for planting April 1991.
£634,000 through NGOs towards costs of 2,447 tonnes vegetable/grain seeds for planting October 1991.

Brazil

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to increase the provision of aid to the indigenous peoples of Brazil; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: We are already financing a health project for the Yanomami Indians through Oxfam. We are currently discussing with the Brazilian authorities the possibility of providing further help for indigenous people and I will be very happy to do so from within our bilateral programme for Brazil if suitable activities can be identified. Support has also been made available under the joint funding scheme to British non-governmental organisations undertaking development projects in Brazil and, subject to the availability of resources, new proposals from non-governmental organisations will be considered.

Glendon Hospital, Montserrat

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when it is expected that the roofless part of Glendon hospital in Montserrat, which was damaged by Hurricane Hugo in 1989, will be repaired; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: Glendon hospital is functioning normally albeit with less space available because the roofless part is not currently in use. Work on rehabilitation and redevelopment, including construction of a new roof, will go ahead as soon as the accommodation required to house the hospital temporarily is ready to be occupied.

Iraqi Refugees

Mr. Gerald Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what arrangements his Department will make to send out to the Iraqi refugees relief goods donated by the public.

Mrs. Chalker: We have already helped voluntary bodies, including British Aid for the Kurds, with the costs of transport of relief supplies generously donated by the public. We have now reached an agreement with CARE Britain under which they are responding to requests for assistance from voluntary bodies by screening and collecting priority relief items. The ODA will then take responsibility for their onward transport. Voluntary bodies interested in this arrangement should contact the ODA's disaster unit first.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

European Political Union

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he is in possession of the draft treaty on European political union; and when he expects that copies will be available for hon. Members.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Yes. I understand the Library is taking steps to obtain a copy.

This text does not have any formal standing. As a negotiating document, it may quickly become out of date. I do not intend to make it formally available to the House. There will, however, be ample opportunity for hon. Members to debate the issues with which it deals, for example during the regular EC debate in the run-up to the next European Council in June.

Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place in the Library a copy of the draft treaty on political union submitted by the Luxembourg presidency on 15 April.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The document is in the public domain. I understand that the Library is taking steps to obtain a copy.

Khmer Rouge

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many letters he has received from (a) the Khmer Rouge and (b) Pol Pot, by year for the last four years to date; and if he will make a statement on their contents and his replies.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) on 26 July 1990, at column 475. Apart from these, no other letters from the Khmer Rouge, or Pol Pot, have been addressed to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs.

Iran

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has had about the number of executions which have taken place in Iran in the last 12 months.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We continue to receive reports from various sources of large numbers of executions in Iran. We have on many occasions expressed our concern about allegations of human rights abuses there, in particular the large numbers of executions.

East Germany

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foriegn and Commonwealth Affairs what is the cost of bringing the agriculture of the former East Germany into the European Community.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The European Commission has estimated the additional cost to the Community agriculture budget in a full year resulting from German unification at 1,414 mecu or £985 million. A total of 1,315 mecu- £916 million - has been provided in the 1991 Community budget for this purpose, which represents slightly less than a full year's cost.

British Consulate, Patras

Mr. Latham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foriegn and Commonwealth Affairs what report he has received from Her Majesty's ambassador in Athens about the public speech by the Greek Minister of Public Order on 27 April regarding an alleged Palestinian terrorist threat to the British consulate in Patras; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Garel-Jones: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs was informed of the Greek Minister of Public Affairs' speech on the day it was made. Her Majesty's embassy in Athens is in close touch with the Greek authorities. Her Majesty's representatives in Greece take any terrorist threat to British interests very seriously. They have taken suitable security measures, including the temporary closure of all British consulates and vice-consulates in Greece outside Athens.

United Nations Children's Rights Convention

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs further to his answer to the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence), Official Report, 26 April 1991, column 598, when he expects to conclude his consultation with the United Nations islands and dependent territories on the United Nations convention on the rights of the child.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We are continuing our consultations with the dependent territories and the United Kingdom islands. We shall ratify the convention on the rights of the child as soon as possible.

Kurdish Refugees

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foriegn and Commonwealth Affairs if he has made any representations to the Government of Turkey concerning their refusal to grant refugee status to Iraqi Kurds.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The Turkish authorities have allowed Iraqi displaced persons to come down from the mountains to more accessible areas inside Turkey where immediate relief aid can be provided. The Turkish Government share the longer-term objective of the relief effort to ensure that they can eventually return to their own homes in Iraq in peace and security.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has made any representations to the Turkish Government concerning the placement of Kurdish refugee camps in Turkey under United Nations supervision; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Garel-Jones: No representations have been made to the Turkish Government regarding the supervision of camps in Turkey for Iraqi displaced persons: these camps are at present under the control of the Turkish authorities. They are not administered by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on violations of article 1 of the Geneva convention 1951 and the 1967 protocol on refugees by the Turkish Government in their dealings with refugees from Iraqi Kurdistan.

Mr. Garel-Jones: We have received no reports of any violations of article 1 of the 1951 Geneva convention or the 1967 protocol on refugees by the Turkish Government.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

South Africa (Sanctions)

Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the economic sanctions against South Africa, including the withdrawal of export credit and trade promotion facilities which would otherwise be available, still being enforced by (a) Her Majesty's Government and (b) other Governments of the European Community.

Mr. Sainsbury: The economic sanctions applied by Her Majesty's Government are included in the list of sanctions set out in annex C of appendix 2 to volume II of the Foreign Affairs Committee report, "UK Policy towards South Africa and other States of the Region", 14 February 1991, a copy of which is available in the Library of the House.

Since that report was submitted, EC Foreign Ministers have agreed in principle to lift the measures imposed in September 1986. The Government have also notified the Commonwealth of their intention to lift the ban on Government funding of trade missions to, and participation in trade fairs and exhibitions in, South Africa.

Other EC countries are known to apply additional economic sanctions against South Africa at national level, but details are not available.

Chancery Group

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) who is responsible for making an announcement, and at what time he expects it to be made, concerning the safety and security of money placed by investors with the Chancery Group;

(2) what information he has on the current position of the Chancery Group, and the safety of investors' money.

Mr. Redwood: I understand that the administrator, Price Waterhouse should be able to help the hon. Member on these points.

Bankruptcy Protection

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will bring forward proposals to establish a system of bankruptcy protection similar to chapter 11 used by firms in the United States of America to reorganise their finances without liquidation.

Mr. Redwood: I have no plans at present to do so.

Receives (Charges)

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will bring forward proposals to require receivers put in by banks to provide the firms they are put into with a breakdown and explanation of their charges.

Mr. Redwood: I have no plans at present to do so.

Bankruptcy Court

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will bring forward proposals to establish a bankruptcy court on the lines suggested by Sir Kenneth Cork.

Mr. Redwood: I have no plans at present to do so.

Insolvency

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations have been made to him about the case for reform of insolvency procedures.

Mr. Redwood: My right hon. Friend and I have received various approaches about aspects of insolvency policy. The working of the Insolvency Act 1986 is kept under review by the insolvency service executive agency.

Waste Paper Imports

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the monthly value and quantity of imports of waste paper from Germany for 1988 to the latest available month.

Mr. Sainsbury: The information requested is as follows:

Imports of waste paper (SITC 251.1) from Germany

1. From January 1991 the figures are for United Germany.
Earlier figures are for the Federal Republic of Germany.
2. Imports are on a country of consignment basis.
The country from which the goods are consigned is not necessarily the country of shipment, origin or manufacture.

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff including vacant post in the press and public relations office of the Export Credits Guarantee Department.

Mr. Sainsbury: The information is available only for the years 1984 to 1991 inclusive, and is as follows:

ECGD—Press and Public Relations Branch

	Full complement including vacant posts	Staff employment
1 April 1984	6	6
1 April 1985	6	6
1 April 1986	6	6
1 April 1987	6	5
1 April 1988	7	7
1 April 1989	7	6
1 April 1990	7	7
1 April 1991	7	7

Business Statistics

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many businesses (a) began trading and (b) went into receivership in each of the last 10 years in (i) Suffolk and Norfolk, (ii) England and (iii) the United Kingdom.

Mr. Redwood: Information is not readily available in the form requested. The following table gives estimates of the number of companies whose registered offices are in the areas shown:

	Norfolk and Suffolk	England and Wales	Great Britain
Companies incorporated in financial year 1990-91	1,200	108,700	113,700
Active companies on register at 31 March 1991	16,900	978,300	1,030,200
Of which: In receivership	168	8,430	9,120

It should be noted that the location of companies in receivership may depend on the location of the offices which carry out receivership duties and that companies can be in receivership for a number of years.

The number of companies which were incorporated and which went into receivership during the last 10 years is as follows (data for Norfolk and Suffolk are not available):

Year	England and Wales		Great Britain
	Incorporations (000s)	Receiverships (000s)	Incorporations (000s)	Receiverships (000s)
1981	68·9	1·3	72·4	1·7
1982	83·0	2·7	87·2	2·9
1983	91·5	2·8	96·2	3·1

Insurance Services Group

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his written answer of 1 May, if all of the bidders have tabled an offer to pay for the acquisition of Export Credits Guarantee Department's Insurance Services Group in Cardiff.

Mr. Sainsbury: Both NCM and Assicurazioni Generali have tabled an offer to pay for the acquisition of the short-term business of ECGD, subject to contract. Trade Indemnity has submitted an alternative proposal. Each response is now being evaluated by the Government and their advisers.

EC Regional Funds

Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give figures for the total amount of assistance received from EC regional funds to each standard planning region of the United Kingdom since the accession of the United Kingdom to the European Community.

Mr. Leigh: The information requested is not readily available and could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

Bankruptcies

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the number of bankruptcies and liquidations categorised by size in each month of 1989, 1990 and 1991 to date; and in how many cases banks put in receivers.

Mr. Redwood: Statistics on the number of bankruptcies and company insolvencies are maintained quarterly and are not categorised by size. Administrative receivers are appointed under powers given in debentures by debenture holders, the vast majority of whom are banks. Statistics are maintained on a quarterly basis showing the number of receivers appointed by debenture holders, but are not held of the proportion of such appointments made by banks.

Quarterly figures for the period requested are as follows:

Year	Q1	Q2	Q3	Q4	Total
Bankruptcies
1989	1,972	2,103	1,837	2,226	8,138
1990	2,514	2,804	3,018	3,722	12,058

COCOM Talks

Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the progress of the COCOM talks on exports to eastern Europe.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 2 May 1991]: Subject to the satisfactory resolution of some outstanding issues on telecommunications and computers during the next two weeks, discussions on a major revision of COCOM's industrial list, which commenced in autumn 1990, are scheduled to be concluded at a COCOM high-level meeting on 23 and 24 May 1991. The current industrial list, comprising 80 separate items, will then be reduced to a core list of 10 categories covering only the most strategic and sensitive goods and technologies.

SCOTLAND

Local Government Finance

Mr. Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will set out the total amounts paid by central Government as rates rebates, community charge rebates and transitional relief for every year since 1975, including an estimate for 1990-91 and 1991-92, in cash and real terms and as a proportion of total local government spending.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Figures for transitional relief, community charge reduction and total local government spending since 1 April 1989 are provided in the table. Rates rebates and community charge rebates are a matter for the Department of Social Security.

Local government spending[1]

	Cash	Real Terms (1991-92 prices)
	£ million	£ million
1989-90	4,728	5,451
1990-91	5,179	5,541
1991-92	5,666	5,666

Transitional relief/community charge reduction[1]

	Cash	Real Terms (1991-92 prices)	Percentage of Local government spending
	£ million	£ million
1989-90	7·9	9·1	0·2
1990-91	63·0	63·0	1·2
1991-92	43·0	43·0	0·7

[1] In Scotland the transitional relief scheme has been replaced, with backdated effect to 1 April 1990, by the personal community charge reduction scheme. The 1989-90 figure shows payments to date and may be subject to variation. The 1990-91 figure is an estimate of expenditure on the reduction scheme and updates expenditure already made on transitional relief. The 1991-92 figure is an estimate which takes account of the £140 general reduction in charges.

Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what action he proposes to take in the light of local authorities' budgets for 1991-92; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: Local authorities in Scotland have budgeted to increase their expenditure this year by £420 million or 9·4 per cent. over the provisional outturn figures for last year. Overall authorities plan to spend £119 million or 2·5 per cent. in excess of the 1991-92 grant-aided expenditure—GAE—figures.

While this represents an improvement on the position last year when the average excess over GAE was 4·6 per cent., I remain concerned about the burden facing local taxpayers in certain areas as a result of the spending plans of the authorities concerned. Among the regional councils—which, of course, account for the bulk of local government expenditure in Scotland—the authority planning by far the most substantial spending excess—12·18 per cent. above GAE—is Lothian. I have accordingly decided to initiate action in terms of schedule 3 to the Abolition of Domestic Rates Etc. (Scotland) Act 1987 in respect of that authority, on the grounds that its planned expenditure for 1991-92 is excessive and unreasonable. A letter has today been sent to the council proposing a reduction of £50—that is, from £310 to £260—in its personal community charge for this year—the equivalent of a reduction in its planned expenditure of £25 million. The letter invites the council to make representations.

Mr. Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the proportion of total local government spending financed by (a) the rates/community charge, (b) non-domestic rates, (c) Government grants and (d) rents and local charges in Scotland in each year since 1974.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The percentages of total local government income from each source to finance rate fund services is shown in the table. Figures for 1989-90 and 1990-91 are not yet available. Figures exclude transactions on housing revenue accounts. Total local government income shows slight differences from total local government expenditure because of the use of balances in financing expenditure.

Local Tax Exemplification

Mr. Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if any information was available to his Department in his recent local tax exemplification on market values of residential property in each local authority area in Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Yes. Estimates of the distribution of the housing stock by capital value in each local authority area were provided to the Scottish Office by the Inland Revenue Valuation Office.

Mr. Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how he arrived in his recent local tax exemplifications for Scotland at (a) the total valuation of the Scottish housing stock, (b) the total valuation of the public sector stock, (c) the total valuation of the private sector stock and (d) the distribution of properties in each proposed band in each local authority area in Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The estimates were based on information provided by the Inland Revenue Valuation Office on the distribution by capital value of the housing stock in each local authority area. This information does not separately distinguish public and private sector stock.

Community Charge

Mr. Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the estimated local income tax rates required to replace the gross income, including rebates, raised from the community charge in each region and district authority on the basis of planned expenditure in 1991-92; what those rates are net of rebates; and what those rates are equalised and unequalised.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Approximate rates of local income tax required to replace the budgeted income from the community charge in 1991-92, including rebates and after receipt of community charge grant, are given in the table. The calculations assume resources equalisation—that the yield of 1p in the pound is the same per adult in all areas. It is not possible to calculate equivalent figures net of rebates, nor on the basis of an unequalised local income tax base.

Note:

The local income tax rate for Scotland has been estimated for 1991-92 by dividing the total amount to be raised from the community charge, net of community charge grant, by an estimate of the yield of 1p in the pound on the basis rate of income tax for Scotland. Income from the community water charge is not included.

Capital Valuation (Domestic Properties)

Mr. Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if his Department used any building society information in reaching its conclusions on the capital valuation of domestic properties in Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: No.

Community Charge Reduction Scheme

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much money his Department has made available for the operation of the community charge reduction scheme in Scotland in 1991-92.

Mr. Lang: A sum of £43 million has been made available to cover payments to charge payers under the community charge reduction scheme in respect of the 1991-92 financial year. The Government have also undertaken to meet reasonable costs incurred by local authorities in administering the scheme.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how long on average it takes for each department of the Scottish Office to pay contractors and suppliers from receipt of invoices; and what representations he has received on this matter during the last five years.

Mr. Lang: In making payments to contractors and suppliers, all my departments observe the guidance in "Government Accounting". This means that, once liability to pay has matured, payments are made in accordance with the terms and conditions of payment as specified in contracts or purchase orders or, in the absence of such contractual arrangements, within 30 days of receipt. Generally, it is our practice to make payments as early as possible in line with the Government's support of the "prompt payment" initiative.

In the last five years, three representations have been received on this issue. One arose from a dispute over the goods supplied; the second was the result of incorrectly addressed correspondence; and the third was directed to the department in error.

Strathclyde Fire Service

Mrs. Irene Adams: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will publish a table showing the figures for call-outs to actual fires for Strathclyde fire service for the last available quarter for (a) the whole of Strathclyde fire service, (b) each division of Strathclyde fire service and (c) each station within Strathclyde fire service;

(2) if he will publish a table showing the call-out figures for Strathclyde fire service for the last available quarter for (a) the whole of Strathclyde fire service, (b) each division of Strathclyde fire service and (c) each station within Strathclyde fire service;

(3) if he will publish a table quantifying the mobilising time from all fire stations in Strathclyde fire service and the attendance time for all fire stations in Strathclyde fire service.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This information is not held centrally.

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of the Forestry Commission.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The complement of staff in the public information division of the Forestry Commission is given in the table. Before 1982, the division was responsible for preparing exhibitions for shows, but this work was then delegated to local offices, leading to the reduction of four posts. No posts are recorded as being vacant on 1 April in any year.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of the Scottish Development Agency.

Mr. Allan Stewart: This is an operational matter for Scottish Enterprise, and I have asked the chairman to write to the hon. Member.

Crime, Strathclyde

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the percentage change in the number of recorded crimes in X division of Strathclyde police for each year since 1980 and for each category of crime.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information is given in the following table:

Health Service

Mr. Douglas: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish the appropriate figure for the annual uprating for inflation in relation to Scottish health service costs for each year since 1979.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: No such index is maintained. Detailed information of the costs of hospital and community health and family services is published annually in "Scottish Health Service Costs".

Ravenscraig and Clydesdale Steelworks

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has anything to add to his reply of 22 April, Official Report, column 338, concerning the information he received from the European Commissioner, Sir Leon Brittan, relating to the statements made by Sir Robert Scholey to the Select Committee on Trade and Industry concerning the attitude of the Commission to a possible sale of Ravenscraig and Clydesdale steelworks.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I have nothing to add to the reply which I gave the hon. Member on 22 April.

War Crimes

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what investigation the Lord Advocate has directed to attempt to identify persons resident in the United Kingdom who may have been involved in the murder of Germans in Berlin in 1945 by Russian soldiers;

(2) what investigations the Lord Advocate has directed to attempt to identify persons resident in the United Kingdom who may have been involved in the murder of partisans in southern France in 1945;

(3) what investigation the Lord Advocate has directed to attempt to identify persons resident in the United Kingdom who may have been involved in the massacre of the Russian officer corps or any of those murdered in Stalin's purges;

(4) what investigation the Lord Advocate has directed to attempt to identify persons resident in the United Kingdom who may have been involved in the massacre of Polish officers at Katyn;

(5) what investigation the Lord Advocate has directed to attempt to identify persons resident in the United Kingdom who may have been involved in the murder of Cossacks in Yugoslavia, Russia and Austria in 1945;

(6) what investigation the Lord Advocate has directed to attempt to identify persons resident in the United Kingdom who may have been involved in the murder of Poles in the Warsaw uprising in 1944.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: So far as the Government are aware, no allegations have been made that persons resident in this country participated in any of these murders.

Planning Procedures

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement of his consideration of the appeal by East Lothian district council against the decision of Lothian regional council to call in the planning consent for the restoration of Archerfield house and the development of the surrounding estate.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 1 May 1991]: I am considering this appeal case and will issue my decision shortly. I shall send the hon. Member a copy of the decision letter.

Management Consultants (Fees)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total sum paid out in fees by his Department to management consultants in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 1 May 1991]: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answers that my predecessor gave him on 13 March 1990 at column 114 and 13 March 1989 at column 35. Additional information is as follows:

HEALTH

Breast Care Nurses

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many breast care nurses appear on the national register of breast care nurses.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Department does not hold a register of breast care nurses.

Health Systems (Employment)

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will list the total number of persons employed in (a) private health systems, (b) NHS or equivalent and (c) the overall total in (i) the United Kingdom, (ii) Germany and (iii) France;

(2) if he will list the number of nurses employed in (a) private health systems, (b) the national health service or equivalent and (c) the overall totals in (i) the United Kingdom with those employed, (ii) Germany and (iii) France.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The available information for England is given in the table. Information relating to Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland is a matter for my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales, for Scotland and for Northern Ireland. Information regarding Germany and France is not collected by this Department. My hon. Friend may wish to approach the embassies concerned for details.

[1] All figures are independently rounded to the nearest hundred (100).

[2] Includes agency staff, qualified nurses and midwives, learners and unqualified staff.

[3] The only data collected centrally on private sector staff relates to private hospitals, homes and clinics registered under section 23 of the Registered Homes Act 1984.

[4] "Whole time equivalent" relates to the contracted hours of employment in the individual establishments and does not equate to the 37·5 hour standard week worked by NHS nursing staff.

[5] Includes staff at the Dental Estimates Board, Prescription Pricing Authority, London Post-Graduate Special Health Authorities and Family Practitioner Committees and other statutory authorities, agency staff, permanent paid and honorary staff and locums.

Chainsaw Accidents

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information his Department holds on the number and nature of non-work accidents through the use of chainsaws over each of the past 10 years.

Mr. Dorrell: This information is not collected centrally.

Prescription Charges

Mr. Lee: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people claiming exemption from prescription charges were (a) investigated and (b) prosecuted in the last 12 months of which figures are available.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: In 1989, a total of 52,968 claims for exemption from prescription charges were referred for investigation. The decision to prosecute in any individual case is the responsibility of the family health services authority and such information is not available centrally.

Hospital Trusts

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what general assurances on financial solvency he seeks when considering applications to establish hospital trusts; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Financial viability is one of the criteria considered when deciding whether to establish a unit as a trust. The unit's management has to have a clear perception of the financial challenges facing it and the plans and ability to deal with them.

Louth County Hospital

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the capital expenditure on Louth county hospital in Lincolnshire since April 1979 and since April 1975.

Mr. Dorrell: The information requested is not held centrally. My hon. Friend may wish to contact Sir Michael Carlisle, the chairman of Trent regional health authority, for details.

Sign Language Interpreters

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those health authorities that provide British sign language interpreters for deaf and hard of hearing patients; and which make a charge for the service.

Mr. Dorrell: This information is not held centrally.

Walsall NHS Trust

Mr. George: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the future funding of Walsall NHS trust.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Walsall hospitals' national health service trust, like all other trusts and directly managed units, obtains its income from contracts to provide health services to health authorities which purchase such services on behalf of their residents. The hon. Member may wish to contact Mrs. M. Foden, the chairman of the trust, for details.

Disaster Counselling

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he has received the report of the working party on disaster follow-up and counselling; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We have received a copy of the report of the independent working party on disaster follow-up and counselling, which was published today and which is entitled "Disasters: Planning for A Caring Response". Copies are available in the Library.

The Government will be studying the report carefully and will welcome the views of interested organisations.

Air Pollution

Mr. Summerson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether any recommendations have been made by the advisory group on the medical aspects of air pollution episodes about the advice that should be given to the public during periods of high ozone concentrations.

Mr. Dorrell: The advisory group has recently completed a detailed report on ozone and its effects on health and this will be published by Her Majesty's Stationery Office as soon as possible. The executive summary of the report is published today and copies have been placed in the Library. Copies of the summary are available to the public from the Department.

The main conclusion of the group is that the ozone levels experienced in the United Kingdom during hot summer weather are unlikely to produce any permanent lung damage and general warnings to the public are not justified. However, during periods of high ozone concentration some individuals sensitive to ozone may experience respiratory symptoms while taking vigorous exercise out of doors, and these symptoms may be more troublesome in those with some impairment of lung function. The group has recommended that advice should be made available so that individuals who are particularly sensitive to ozone can take steps to reduce exposure.

The group's recommendations have been accepted by Government and will be implemented immediately. Information and advice about ozone levels and their effects and how to minimise exposure to ozone is available on the air quality help line set up by the Department of the Environment and the Meteorological Office. The Chief Medical Officer has written to all doctors setting out the report's main conclusions.

Pregnancy Services

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish figures for 1989-90 of the number of clinics in England offering (a) IVF, GIFT and other procedures and (b) GIFT and other procedures but excluding IVF.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The information requested is not available centrally. However, some information on these matters is expected to be published in the Interim Licensing Authority's 1991 annual report later this year.

Eye Hospitals

Mr. Loyden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the regional health authorities that have a specialist eye hospital in their region.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The location of specialist eye services is a matter for the health authority concerned. The information requested is as follows:

Northern
- Eye Infirmary, Sunderland
- North Riding Infirmary (ENT and Eye)

North West Thames
- Western Ophthalmic Hospital

South East Thames
- Sussex Eye Hospital
- Kent County Ophthalmic and Aural Hospital

Wessex
- Southampton Eye Hospital

Births

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish figures showing the number of (a) twins, (b) triplets, (c) quadruplets, (d) quintuplets and (e) sextuplets born in England and Wales in 1990; what was the total number of maternities in that year; and what was the total number of multiple cases of each type which were conceived as a result of (i) IVF, (ii) GIFT and (iii) other forms of assisted births.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: In 1990, there were 701,130 maternities in England and Wales. These included:

	Numbers
Twins	7,934
Triplets	201
Quadruplets	10
Quintuplets or over	0
Total number of maternities with multiple births	8,145

Data on the number of births which occurred following IVF, GIFT or other procedures to assist conception are not yet available.

Female Circumcision

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he is going to issue new interdepartmental guidelines on inter-agency working in cases of child protection, with special reference to female genital mutilation.

Mr. Dorrell: Guidelines on inter-agency working in cases of child protection are to be issued under the title of "Working Together" in Autumn 1991. This will draw attention to the Prohibition of Female Circumcision Act 1985.

Manchester Hospital Trusts

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on further plans for changes in the provision of services and jobs within the opted-out hospitals in central and south Manchester; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: National health service trusts in central and south Manchester will ensure that they respond to priorities set by district health authorities and fund holders.

Health Care, London

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he received a copy of a report published by the Health Economics Consortium at York university called a "Review of the Evidence of Higher Costs of Health Care Provision in Inner London and a Consideration of Implications for Competitiveness."

Mr. Dorrell: We received a copy of this report on 24 April from the Inner London Health Authorities Group who commissioned it. We are studying it carefully and will be discussing any implications with the Thames regional health authorities.

Regional Health Authorities (Expenditure)

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the expenditure by each regional health authority in each year since 1978-79 in cash terms and adjusted for changes in input unit costs.

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 16 April 1991]: Tables showing the total revenue and total capital expenditure by regional health authorities for the years since 1978-79 have been placed in the Library.

The figures for RHAs are influenced by the extent to which they directly manage and account for services, including capital schemes; the balance of such responsibility between the RHA and the district health authorities comprising each region varies from one region to another and has been subject to changes over the period. Additional tables showing expenditure by health regions —RHAs and DHAs—have therefore been provided.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Doncaster Office

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many items of post are outstanding currently at his Department's offices in the Doncaster area;

(2) what are his current plans to alter the structure and staffing levels of his Department's offices in the Doncaster area;

(3) how many staff are employed and at what level in each of his Department's offices covering the Doncaster area; and what were the comparable figures (a) 12 months ago and (b) 24 months ago.

Miss Widdecombe: The administration of social security benefits is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member and copies will be placed in the Library and the Public Information Office.

Pensioners, Plaistow

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many pensioners in the E6 and E13 postal districts served by the Plaistow office have not received pensions for up to five or more weeks due to non-receipt of pension books; and if he will make a statement concerning the visit of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe), to the office on 30 April.

Miss Widdecombe: The information is not available in the form requested, since local social security offices do not keep statistical records of delay in issuing instruments of payment. When this problem occurs, it is dealt with on an individual basis. The manager of the Plaistow office is aware of a number of cases of non-receipt of new order books in time for the next pay day.

I visited Newham district, which comprises the offices at Stratford, Plaistow and Canning Town, on 30 April. I saw the problems associated with accommodation in the district. The situation is being addressed urgently and a number of options are being pursued to improve the service to our customers.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Language Studies

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to ensure that French or German will continue to be offered in primary schools after the modern language option in primary B. Ed courses in Northern Ireland has been discontinued.

Dr. Mawhinney: Language studies is not a compulsory area of study within the common curriculum at primary level; it is, therefore, a matter for schools to decide whether to offer a modern language to their pupils.

The proportion of primary schools which teach French is small and there is no evidence that this provision is constrained by a shortage of teachers. The Department of Education for Northern Ireland is not aware of German being offered by any primary schools; nor was this language available as an option in the B.Ed.

The Department has recently established a working group on modern languages, which will prepare programmes of study and attainment targets for key stages 3 and 4. It is expected that the working group will offer comment on the introduction of modern languages at earlier stages.

Northern Ireland Electricity

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he will publish details of regulations and licences to cover generators, transmission, distribution and supply and the grid code for successor companies to Northern Ireland Electricity.

Mr. Needham: I expect to be able to place preliminary drafts of licences for the generation, transmission and supply of electricity in the Libraries of both Houses and in the Assembly Vote Office at Stormont before the end of June 1991. Details of a grid code will be available later in the year.

Limavady-Aghinaloo Road

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he expects work to begin on upgrading the road between Limavady and the industrial site at Aghinaloo.

Mr. Needham: No proposals exist for such upgrading.

Fair Employment

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the names of the executive directors in each of the four area health and social services boards; whether their appointments comply with the provisions of the fair employment guidelines; if these appointments reflect the religious breakdown of the work forces in their respective areas; and if he will make a statement about the proportion of Protestants employed by the area health and social services boards.

Mr. Hanley: The names of the officer members of each health and social services board, appointed to date, are as follows:

Eastern board:
- Mr. P. G. Kinder
- Mr. I. R. Reid

Northern board:
- Mr. D. D. Smyth
- Mr. R. S. Ross
- Miss M. S. Irwin
- Mr. J. S. MacDonnell
- Miss E. M. McNair
- Dr. J. D. Watson

Southern board:
- Mr. J. E. Lamb
- Mr. B. P. Cunningham
- Mr. R. Blair
- Mr. M. Doris
- Dr. P. Kilbane
- Mr. F. A. Rice
- Mr. T. J. Frawley
- Mr. S. Cuddy
- Mr. D. Burke
- Dr. W. W. McConnell

Members of health and social services boards are holders of an office; in that capacity they do not act as officers or employees of the boards, and their appointments as members of the boards do not fall within the scope of the Fair Employment Acts 1976 and 1989. As for their capacity as officers—that is, as employees—of the boards, I am satisfied that the procedures for appointment are such that any appointments since 1976 have been made with due and proper regard for the law relating to fair employment.

With regard to the request for a statement on the proportion of Protestants employed by the boards, I refer the right hon. Gentleman to the recent publication by the Fair Employment Commission, "A Profile of the Workforce in Northern Ireland: A Survey of the 1990 Monitoring Returns", copies of which are in the Library. This shows that the employees of the four health and social services boards were composed of 50·9 per cent. Protestants, 39·3 per cent. Roman Catholic and 9·8 per cent. non-determined. Excluding those for whom a community was not determined, the proportion of Protestants was 56·5 per cent.

Strip Searches

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will detail the number of strip searches made on female persons in Her Majesty's prison Maghaberry monthly since May 1990, giving the number of persons involved and the number of times each person was searched; if any prison contraband, smuggled item, or illegal correspondence was discovered in any search, indicating which items; in how many cases prisoners refused to be searched and had to be restrained while the search was being conducted; and what were the reasons for the search.

Dr. Mawhinney: Details of the number of, and reasons for, strip searches of female prisoners in Her Majesty's prison Maghaberry from December 1989 to May 1990 were provided on 4 July 1990, at columns 601-4. The statistics from June 1990 to March 1991 are as follows:

Births

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish figures showing the number of (a) twins, (b) triplets, (c) quadruplets, (d) quintuplets and (e) sextuplets born in Northern Ireland in 1990; what was the total number of maternities in Northern Ireland for that year; and what was the total number of multiple cases of each type which were conceived as a result of (i) IVF, (ii) GIFT and (iii) other forms of assisted births.

Mr. Hanley: The information on multiple births and maternities will be included in the Registrar General's annual report which will be published in June 1992. However, figures will be available in unpublished form by the end of May 1991 and I will send a copy to the hon. Member when they are available. In 1990, seven sets of twins and two sets of triplets were conceived following IVF treatment. There were no multiple births resulting from other forms of specialist infertility treatments.

Press and Public Relations Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of his Department.

Dr. Mawhinney [holding answer 26 April 1991]: It would require disproportionate time and cost to provide data on staff complements from 1979.

The available information including vacant posts is as follows:

	Staff complement	Staff in post as at 1 April
1989-90	52	50
1990-91	61	54
1991-92	60	58

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of the Welsh Development Agency.

Mr. David Hunt: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave him on Wednesday 1 May 1991.

Prefabricated Reinforced Concrete Houses

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the 10 Welsh housing authorities which share the £4·29 million for prefabricated reinforced concrete houses; how much each received for which purposes; and how many prefabricated reinforced concrete houses are involved in each housing authority.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett [holding answer 3 May 1991]: The 10 authorities which share the additional allocation are shown as follows, together with the amounts made available, and the numbers of precast concrete houses in each authority's area.

The additional resources are mainly to help homeowners who are eligible for assistance under the housing defects legislation. The allocation for Glyndwr and Port Talbot is to assist in dealing with particular difficulties over system built houses in their own stock. The additional funds are allocated against ongoing reinstatement programmes and not specific dwellings.

Wool

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement concerning his assessment of the prospects in 1991 and 1992 for the Welsh wool-producing sector of agriculture.

Mr. David Hunt: Returns in Wales from wool production form, on average, 4 to 6 per cent. of individual producers' total returns from sheep farming. Prospects for wool producers thus depend on a range of factors, including market prices and input costs. Prices for finished lambs in 1991 so far have been following the usual seasonal trend and prices for British wool, although weak, have shown some improvement in recent sales. In addition, Welsh sheep farmers enjoy significant financial support through the EC sheep regime and hill livestock compensatory allowances. This support, which takes account of both market prices and income levels, is estimated to total some £96 million in 1990.

Craft Industry

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the funding of the craft industry in Wales by the Welsh Office, the Welsh Development Agency and the Development Board for Rural Wales respectively.

Mr. David Hunt: The Welsh Development Agency and Development Board for Rural Wales contribute a grant to the Wales Craft Council, employ craft business advisers and undertake a range of marketing activities. Also, craft producers are able to apply for a range of general grants, loans and business services offered by the agencies. The development board estimates support will amount to more than £220,000 in the current financial year. WDA support is estimated at £518,500. Craftspeople may also apply for the services and grants offered by the Welsh Office.

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement concerning the extent of any public funding of the Wales Craft Council for 1991-92, including any conditions upon which such funding will be based.

Mr. David Hunt: The Welsh Development Agency and the Development Board for Rural Wales have agreed to provide a total of £40,000 a year for two years to the Wales Craft Council to cover specific activities. The funding will be subject to normal conditions.

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will place in the Library a copy of the report which he received recently from the Welsh Development Agency concerning the craft industry in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: I have received no such report. I have, however, received an evaluation of the craft initiative, prepared by my Department in consultation with the Welsh Development Agency, among others, and I have placed a copy of this in the Library.

Births

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish figures for 1990 showing the estimated percentage of women delivering in Wales whose deliveries were (a) spontaneous, including abnormal presentation of head and breech spontaneous, (b) instrumental, including forceps, vacuum and breech extractions, (c) caesarean section and (d) other and unspecified means.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The information requested is not yet available for 1990. Figures for 1989 are given in the table.

Estimated percentages of hospital deliveries by type of delivery: Wales 1989

Type of delivery	Estimated percentage
Spontaneous	80·0
Instrumental	7·0
Caesarean	13·0

Note: The information is based on OPCS 4th revision codes for the classification of surgical operations and procedures which were introduced in 1988.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish figures for 1990 showing the estimated percentage of women delivering in Wales (a) whose labours were induced, (b) whose labours were of spontaneous onset and (c) who had elective caesarean section.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The information requested is not yet available for 1990. Figures for 1989 are given in the table.

Estimated percentages of hospital deliveries by type of onset of labour: Wales 1989

Type of onset of labour	Estimated percentage
Induced	3·0
Spontaneous	85·0
Elective caesarean	5·0
Other caesarean	7·0

Note: The information is based on OPCS 4th revision codes for the classification of surgical operations and procedures which were introduced in 1988.

East Glamorgan District General Hospital

Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give the date upon which construction work will commence on the replacement East Glamorgan district general hospital.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: It is for Mid Glamorgan health authority to decide the date in which construction work commences.

Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many beds are to be included in the replacement East Glamorgan district general hospital.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: This new hospital development is being planned on the basis of a district general hospital of 640 beds. Initially it is proposed that 533 beds will be provided.

Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will ensure that sufficient revenue capital will be available to ensure that the existing level of health provision at East Glamorgan district general hospital will be maintained until the opening of the replacement East Glamorgan hospital; and if he will make a statement as to the likely cost, per annum, of ensuring that provision.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Until such time as the new hospital is open, services will continue to be provided from East Glamorgan hospital. The extent to which services are provided will depend upon the contracts placed with the hospital by the purchasers of its services—mainly Mid Glamorgan health authority and the local GP fund-holding practices. Health authorities and GP fund holders have a duty to secure the best quality and value for money in the services they obtain with the funds provided to them. They will have to satisfy themselves that East Glamorgan hospital meets these criteria if the existing level of provision is to be maintained or increased.

Cardiac Patients

Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many health authorities in Wales, besides Mid Glamorgan, have issued directives or recommendations that patients of 70 year of age or over, suffering from cardiac conditions, should be treated differently from patients who have not reached that age.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: This information is not held centrally. Admission policies and the provision of health care are matters for health authorities to determine in the light of local circumstances and in the best interest of patients.

Asthma

Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list, by health authority district, the number of in-patients admitted to hospitals in Wales who were diagnosed as suffering from asthma in 1987, 1988, 1989, 1990 and 1991.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The number of in-patient deaths and discharges from NHS hospitals in Wales, by district health authority of treatment, with a principal diagnosis of asthma is shown in the table for 1987, 1988 and 1989. Information for 1990 and 1991 is not yet available.

Neath and Port Talbot Hospital

Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give a date upon which work will begin on the new Neath and Port Talbot hospital.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: It is for the West Glamorgan health authority to decide the date on which work commences.

Conwy Tunnel

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the cost to the tourism industry of the delays in opening the Conwy tunnel; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: There has been no significant delay in the construction of the A55 Conwy crossing scheme, which is planned for completion this autumn. The upgrading of 51 of the 60 miles of the A55 to dual carriageway standard has already greatly enhanced prospects for the economy of north Wales, including the tourism industry.

Pregnancy Services

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish figures for 1990 of the number of clinics in Wales offering (a) in vitro fertilisation—IVF—gamete inter-fallopian transfer—GIFT—and other procedures and (ii) GIFT and other procedures but excluding IVF.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: This information is not available centrally.

Archaeological Remains

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will introduce legislation to require planning authorities in Wales to inform solicitors making their local searches if there are archaeological remains present on the land.

Sir Wyn Roberts: No. Archaeological remains scheduled as being of national importance under the provisions of the Ancient Monuments Archaeological Areas Act 1979 are registered as land charges and can be identified during local searches. Details of other archaeological remains are not registered as land charges but information on these is held by the four Welsh archaeological trusts which may be consulted.

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he intends to issue a policy planning guidance document in Wales, similar to the PPG 16 issued by the Department of the Environment in November 1990, on archaeology and planning.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Yes. A draft PPG on archaeology and planning in Wales was issued for consultation in September 1990. A copy is available in the Library of the House. We have had a positive response and expect to issue this guidance shortly.

Public Bodies

Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the executive non-departmental public bodies in Wales scheduled for financial management and policy reviews during the current financial year.

Mr. David Hunt: In accordance with the arrangements for undertaking regular, five-year reviews of NDPBs announced by the then Prime Minister on 28 January 1988 the Welsh Office will be undertaking financial management and policy reviews of the Welsh Development Agency, Development Board for Rural Wales, Land Authority for Wales, Sports Council for Wales and the Wales tourist board during 1991-92.

Welsh Language

Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the outcome of his recent consultation on exemptions from, and implementation timetable for, teaching Welsh in the national curriculum; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: The implementation of the national curriculum and any exemption from it must be considered in the context of my overall policy for the teaching of Welsh in schools. The Education Reform Act 1988 provided that Welsh is an integral part of the curriculum for schools in Wales. I reaffirm the general policy aim, which I announced to the House on 22 January, that Welsh should be studied by all pupils in schools in Wales between the ages of five and 16, though not necessarily to full GCSE level.

The consultation document on exemptions which I issued last November set out specific criteria and circumstances under which I was prepared to consider a limited range of exemptions from the national curriculum requirements to teach Welsh.

I propose that there should be an exemption of incoming pupils who transfer late in their school careers to schools in Wales and who had little or no opportunity for studying the language in school in the previous three years. These draft regulations were widely supported. The regulations will also apply to pupils who meet these criteria and who transfer between schools in Wales. All pupils to whom this exemption will apply, will retain the right to study the language if they wish and schools will be encouraged to offer them this option. I now intend to proceed to make the relevant regulations.

There was general approval for my proposals to allow an extended implementation timetable for some schools in four LEAs—Dyfed, Gwent, Powys and South Glamorgan. Two of the schools in Dyfed—Tasker-Millward and Pembroke—have now indicated that they will introduce the national curriculum requirements for Welsh earlier than proposed. I welcome this positive approach. Six other schools requested deferment. Each case has been carefully considered and of these, Fitzalan high school, Cardiff, will be added to the draft order which I am now issuing for consultation.

My proposals set out two very specific sets of criteria for the exemptions of a small number of schools from the key stage 4 requirements for Welsh. The Curriculum Council for Wales and a number of organisations, including some teacher associations, were opposed to any exemption in key stage 4. In view of this response, and the advice received from the Curriculum Council for Wales I have reviewed both sets of proposals strictly in line with the criteria set out in my consultation document.

The first of the exemption proposals related to the five secondary schools in the South Pembrokeshire area covering the period up to 1996-97 by which time all of these schools, in line with the agreement with the LEA, will be expected to introduce fully the key stage 3 requirements. A further 12 schools sought deferment on grounds of similar area characteristics. None was supported by their LEAs and since my proposals applied only to the schools in South Pembrokeshire, the exemptions to be included in a draft order will be limited to these schools.

Secondly, in the consultation document of November 1990, exemption from the key stage 4 requirements was also proposed for a group of seven schools—six in Clwyd and one in Gwent—with catchment areas or potential catchment areas for pupils across the English border. These proposals reflected the concerns expressed by the headteachers and governing bodies of the schools about the potential loss of pupil numbers. Subsequently a further 11 schools requested similar consideration.

I have carefully considered the position in the light of the review to which I referred above. I have taken into account the significant number of requests for further exemptions on grounds of catchment areas and the impact such exemptions would have on Welsh education in these areas and on my overall policy for teaching Welsh in schools. As a result of the representations made and by consideration of all the factors, I have decided to reduce the number of exemptions in this category. It will be limited to three schools in Clwyd and two in Gwent. These schools are: Darland high school; St. David's high school, Saltney; the Maelor school, Penley; Chepstow and Monmouth comprehensive schools. They will be included in the draft order which I am now issuing for consultation. I should stress that all exempted schools will be encouraged to make arrangements for Welsh to be an option at key stage 4 for those pupils who choose it.

Some secondary schools also requested exemption from the key stage 3 requirements. I made no proposals for such exemption and do not intend to do so. All secondary schools in Wales will be required to introduce the key stage 3 requirements for the teaching of Welsh.

The Curriculum Council for Wales and other bodies expressed the view that all exemptions should be subject to review. I accept that advice. A review will be carried out in the 1996-97 academic year to consider all exemptions. By that time I will expect all schools and LEAs to have established implementation plans to introduce the teaching of the language in all key stages in line with my overall policy for Welsh which I outlined earlier.

Veterinary Investigation Centre, Bangor

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many representations he has received concerning the future of the veterinary investigation centre at Bangor since November 1990; and how many of the representations are opposed to the closure.

Mr. David Hunt: Sixteen representations indicating opposition to the closure of the Bangor centre have been received since November 1990.

Farm Costs

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish figures showing the variable input costs accrued on farms in Wales in each of the last 15 years according to farm size and farm type.

Mr. David Hunt: Information showing the variable input costs for farms of the same types and sizes is only readily available since 1984-85 and is as follows:

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish figures showing the net income from management and investment in farms in Wales in each of the last 15 years according to farm size and farm type.

Mr. David Hunt: Details of management and investment income are only available for years since 1986-87 and are as follows:

(£000)

Farm type	Management and investment income
	1986-87	1987-88	1988-89

Farm Investment

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish figures showing the level of investment in new buildings, plant and machinery in farms in Wales in each of the last 15 years according to farm size and farm type.

Mr. David Hunt: Investment details by farm type and size are not available. Figures for aggregate capital formation in plant and machinery are however published in "Farm Incomes in Wales", volume 4, table 3.11, and average investment per farm, by type and tenure is collected as part of the farm business survey and published annually in the same source.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish figures showing the amount of total interest bills and outstanding bank advances secured by farms in Wales in each of the last 15 years according to farm size and farm type.

Mr. David Hunt: This information is not available for the number of years or in the form requested. Data collected since 1985-86 shows average bank advances outstanding and interest payments made per farm to be as follows:

	1985-86	1986-87	1987-88	1988-89
LFA Livestock Farms
Average Bank Advance	17·9	23·2	35·7	23·9

Forestry

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much money has been allocated by his Department to Coed Cymru in each year since 1985; and what is the estimated allocation to be granted for 1991-92.

Mr. David Hunt: Coed Cymru does not receive any financial support from the Welsh Office but is jointly funded by the Forestry Commission, the Countryside Council for Wales and local authorities.

Unfit Dwellings

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table of the most recent available data showing the number of unfit dwellings in each local authority area in Wales, for the categories (a) unfit local authority properties, (b) unfit housing association properties, (c) unfit public sector properties, other than local authority-owned and (d) unfit private sector properties, other than housing association owned.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The 1986 Welsh house condition survey estimated the number of unfit dwellings in each local authority area in Wales for the following categories:

(a) local authority properties
(b) Housing Association properties
(c) New Town Corporation properties
(d) private Sector properties

as shown in the following table:

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will make a statement on the future of the experimental husbandry farm at Pwllpeiran.

Mr. David Hunt: I will write to the hon. Gentleman and place a copy of my letter in the Library of the House.

Homelessness

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table showing, for each local authority in Wales, the number of persons accepted as homeless in each year since 1979 inclusive.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The numbers of persons accepted as homeless by each local authority for each year since 1979 are shown in the table.

Farm Diversification

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total number of representations received by his Department concerning the axeing of grant aid for converting farm buildings into tourist accommodation under the farm diversification grant scheme; and how many representatives have been critical of this decision.

Mr. David Hunt: The statutory instrument ending capital grant assistance for tourist accommodation, other than for camping and bunkhouse barns, under the farm diversification grant scheme came into operation on 16 January 1991. As of 30 April my Department had received 11 letters concerning the withdrawal of this grant assistance, of which 10 questioned the decision.

Education Spending

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table showing (a) the revenue budget for 1990-91 and (b) the standard spending assessment for 1990-91 for each local education authority in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: The standard spending assessment for each county council in Wales relates to the totality of services it provides and is not hypothecated to individual services. The following table gives the 1990-91 standard spending assessment for each county, together with the comparable estimated revenue expenditure:

1990-91

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table showing (a) the capital bid for 1990-91 and (b) the capital allocation for 1990-91 for each local education authority in Wales.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Capital resources for Welsh local authorities, including those allocated to education authorities are distributed mainly by means of formulae which have been endorsed by the local authority associations. They are not hypothecated to particular services and are not subject to bids. At the all-Wales level I set the total assumed gross expenditure for education in 1990-91 at £53·7 million. The latest available projection, at October 1990, by local authorities of their planned spending was £49·3 million.

WDA Industrial Units

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many Welsh Development Agency industrial units are empty awaiting tenants in each of the counties of Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: The information is as follows:

Number of units vacant and available for letting (as at 30 April 1991)

County	Number
Clwyd	55
Dyfed	42
Gwent	87
Gwynedd	62
Mid Glamorgan	76
South Glamorgan	3
West Glamorgan	38

These vacancies represent 11 per cent. of the agency's total portfolio.

Housing Investment Programme

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table showing, for each local authority in Wales, the (a) 1990-91 housing investment programme bid and (b) 1990-91 housing investment programme allocation of capital spending.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Local authorities were not asked to specify in their housing strategy and investment programmes the level of central Government input they required towards their 1990-91 housing programmes. Details of housing annual capital guidelines—ACG—and supplementary credit approvals—SCA—for discretionary home renovation grants and special projects for each authority in 1990-91 are given in the table. The figures exclude resources for old style home improvement grants and mandatory home renovation grants for which final claims have yet to be submitted.

Urban Motorways

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total mileage of urban motorway in each urban area of Wales (a) already constructed and in operation, (b) under construction at present and (c) planned for the future.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The only length of motorway in Wales fitting this definition is the 1·5 mile M4 Port Talbot bypass in West Glamorgan. No additional urban motorways are either under construction or planned.

Official Visits

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the cost to his Department of his visit to Fishguard and west Wales on 1 May.

Mr. David Hunt: On Wednesday 1 May 1991, I was received by the mayor of Fishguard and Goodwick town council at the town hall Fishguard where I was introduced to county, district, and local representatives.

I was then taken on a tour of Fishguard and Goodwick area by coach with the town clerk, Mr. Harold Rees, including a visit to the Fishguard factory of Slimma (Wales) Limited.

At a formal meeting later in the town hall I received presentations from the following speakers:

Mr. C. B. Fenemore—Route Director, Sealink Stenna, Fishguard harbour.
Mr. A. Daniels—Executive Director, Welsh Development Agency.
Mr. D. K. Jones—County Engineer and Surveyor, Dyfed County Council.
Mr. R. Anderson—Planning Officer, Preseli Pembrokeshire District Council.
Chief Inspector Horne—Dyfed Powys police.
Councillor W. Lloyd Evans—County/District/Town Council.
Mrs. M. Griffiths—Chairman, Fishguard and Goodwick Chamber of Trade.
Councillor A. Allison—District/Town Council.
Councillor B. Colnet—Fishguard and Goodwick Town Council.
Councilor D. Davies—District/Town Council.
Mr. Geraint Howells—MP, Ceredigion and North Pembrokeshire.

At the conclusion of the meeting, I visited Fishguard harbour and attended lunch aboard the Stenna Felicity hosted by Sealink Stenna. During the afternoon I had meetings with local NFU and FUW representatives, Carningli rural initiative, the Fishguard music festival, the spirit of youth festival, Gwyl Gwaun, the chamber of trade, including political meetings at Fishguard Bay hotel. As soon as the cost of the visit to the Welsh Office is known, I shall write to the right hon. Gentleman and place a copy of my letter in the Library of the House.

Mumbles (Development)

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he will inform Swansea city council and other interested parties of which procedures he has decided to adopt in relation to his determination of the Bright and Pepper/Fairclough development at Mumbles, Swansea.

Mr. David Hunt [holding answer 3 May 1991]: I shall announce the procedures as soon as I am content that the environmental assessment submitted by the applicants is complete.

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will take steps to inform Swansea city council and other interested parties of the procedures which are to be followed in relation to the environmental impact study by (a) the developer, Bright and Pepper/Fairclough, and (b) the independent consultants appointed by Swansea city council to ensure that all information necessary to determine the application for development at Mumbles, Swansea, is available to him.

Mr. David Hunt [holding answer 3 May 1991]: My officials are scrutinising the environmental statement and supplementary information submitted by the developers and others. Should the environment information provided be considered inadequate to complete a full assessment, the developers will be required to supply further information under regulation 20 of the Town and County Planning (Assessment of Environmental Effects) Regulations 1988. In this event, Swansea city council and the other statutory consultees will be informed.

DEFENCE

Atomic Weapons Establishment (Cardiff)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list those occasions since 1979 on which incidents have occured at AWE, Cardiff, involving a release of argon gas contaminated with beryllium powder into the atmosphere.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: There have been no such occurrences.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give details of the standard procedure to be followed at AWE, Cardiff if the steel vessel containing beryllium powder were to burst within the furnace under pressure; whether that standard procedure has been altered during the past 10 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: It would not be in the national interest to give details of AWE Cardiff's processing operations. However, during the site's many years of work with beryllium the most stringent health and safety procedures have been developed including careful control and monitoring. In the event of an abnormal occurrence the systems are designed to safeguard the work force, the public and the environment against potential hazard.

Gulf War

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many under-18s were injured or killed whilst serving in the armed forces during the Gulf war.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: According to our records, no service personnel under 18 years of age were injured during hostilities in the Gulf, but one soldier aged 17 was killed.

Premature Voluntary Release

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the latest figures for the rate of premature voluntary release in (a) the Royal Navy, (b) the Army and (c) the Royal Air Force.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The latest premature voluntary release—PVR—annual exist rates are for the year to 31 March 1991 and are given in the table.

	Percentage rate
Officers
RN/RM	3·24
Army	4·19
RAF	2·31
Service men
RN	6·21
RM	6·42
Army	2·83
RAF	4·22

PVR figures for females are not currently available, but are being collated for future publication. The figures in the table therefore relate to males only.

Army Helicopters

Mrs. Maureen Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make further resources available to improve the defence capability of Army helicopters in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The defensive capabilities of Army helicopters are kept under review.

Schools (Efficiency Exercise)

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much money has been awarded under the Ministry of Defence's efficiency exercise incentive scheme to private schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: I will write to the hon. Member.

Grenadier Guards

Mr. Churchill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether the three Grenadier guardsmen who lost their legs and sustained other injuries in the course of their duties on a live firing range in Canada in July 1989 have received the automatic payments to service men when they are invalided out of the service including a tax-free war pension, a tax-free service pension and a tax-free lump sum and terminal grant; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Only one of the guardsmen has been discharged from the Army. He was awarded an immediate service invaliding pension and terminal grant by the Ministry of Defence. A war disablement pension, which is administered by the Department of Social Security and is payable following discharge from the armed forces only where a disability is due to or aggravated by military service, has been awarded at the 100 per cent. rate and a payment issued. This is tax free. As a result, his service invaliding pension, which has been in issue from the date of discharge, has been converted to a higher, tax-free, service attributable pension. He has also been awarded an additional tax-free lump sum.

Armed Forces (Crown Proceedings) Act

Mr. Churchill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the operation of the Armed Forces (Crown Proceedings) Act 1987.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Since the repeal of section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act 1947 by the Armed Forces (Crown Proceedings) Act 1987, we have received 2,249 claims for compensation from members of the armed forces. A total of 271 claims have been settled at a cost of £3,433,414. Nine hundred and thirty seven claims have been repudiated and 1,041 are still under investigation.

Chieftain Tank

Mr. Clelland: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what specific factors still remain to be settled before the decision on the replacement for Chieftain tanks.

Mr. Alan Clark: The hon. Member would not expect me to give details at this stage of a competition.

Mr. Clelland: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what effect consideration of the potential use of helicopter gunships is having on the timing of his announcement of the replacement for Chieftain tanks.

Mr. Alan Clark: We are considering all relevant factors before making a decision on the equipment for our future main battle tank fleet.

Service Men (Compensation)

Mr. Churchill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether it remains the policy of Her Majesty's Government to ensure that compensation available to service personnel should be in line with awards by the courts to civilians in comparable cases.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Yes.

Mr. Churchill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence where responsibility for paying compensation will rest in the event of a member of Her Majesty's forces currently being provided to serve under contract to a private company, namely Royal Ordnance, for mine-clearance duties in Kuwait, suffering injury or death in the course of his duties; and whether he will ensure that such compensation will be no less favourable than that payable to a British civilian employed by a British company.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We are still discussing the details of this deployment with Royal Ordnance, and appropriate compensation arrangements are one of the matters under consideration.

Live Ammunition (Training)

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the practice adopted by the Army in training with live ammunition; and if he will state the number of serious injuries suffered in the last five years both in the United Kingdom and outside on such training exercises.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [holding answer 2 May 1991]: Use of live ammunition in training exercises is covered by a variety of range, safety and weapon systems instructions.

A number of serious injuries arising from training using live ammunition is set out in the table:

Number of serious injuries caused by training with live ammunition

Year	Number
1986	16
1987	14
1988	23
1989	20
1990	12

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what policy is adopted by his Department in compensating those service men seriously injured as a result of training where live ammunition is used; and if he will make a statement on how many cases remain outstanding in the past three years.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [holding answer 2 May 1991]: Since the Crown Proceedings (Armed Forces) Act 1987 became law, service personnel have had the right to pursue common law claims for damages against the Crown for any injury they suffer which they believe to have been caused through a negligent act or omission on the part of the Ministry of Defence, its servants or agents. Such claims are considered on a strict legal liability basis. It is not possible to give the number of cases which involved training with live ammunition and where claims are still outstanding as statistics are not held in a manner that can show this.

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether the practice of using live ammunition in training exercises is being reviewed by the Army; and when it was last reviewed.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [holding answer 2 May 1991]: The regulations regarding the use of live ammunition in training exercises and range safety instructions are kept under constant review.

EMPLOYMENT

Tourism

Mr. Day: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on his official visit to the United States to promote Britain as a tourist destination.

Mr. Howard: The purpose of my visit was to lend support to the efforts of the British Tourist Authority and the tourism industry to impress upon north Americans that this is an ideal time to visit Britain. While I was in the United States I addressed the World Travel and Tourism Council, the only Government Minister from outside the United States to do so.

Strikes

Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any proposals to change the procedures for calling strikes.

Mr. Howard: I have no proposals to announce at this stage, but the law on strikes is a matter which the Government keep under active review. Unlike the Labour party, we have no intention of changing the law to make striking easier.

Manual Workers

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the average number of hours worked per week for people engaged in manual occupations, excluding overtime, in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Jackson: It is estimated from the labour force survey that the average basic usual hours worked per week by people in manual occupations, excluding overtime, was 35·6 hours in Great Britain in the spring of 1990.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is his current estimate of the total of people employed in more than one job who are counted more than once in the employment statistics.

Mr. Jackson: Precise information on the number of people with more than one job included in the published work force in employment estimates is not available. However, the labour force survey estimated that 724,000 people held a second job as an employee in the spring of 1990.

Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what are the latest figures for unemployment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: In March 1991 seasonally adjusted unemployment in the United Kingdom was 2,092,700, a fall of 26 per cent. since the June 1987 election.

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many 16 and 17-year-olds are included in the most recent unemployment statistics.

Mr. Jackson: In January 1991 the number of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom aged under 18 was 2,709.

Low Wages

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has on the number of workers employed at wage rates below 50 per cent. of the male median wage.

Mr. Forth: We estimate the number to be around 3 million.

Trade Unions (Sequestration)

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he has any proposals to restrict the power of the courts to sequestrate union assets.

Mr. Forth: No. Sequestration is a penalty which may be imposed on any organisation which commits contempt of court. To restrict the powers of the court to sequestrate union assets would, therefore, be to give a special, and totally unjustifiable, privilege to trade unions.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many training and enterprise councils became operational in April.

Mr. Howard: Twenty-three training and enterprise councils became operational in April 1991 which brings the total of operational TECs up to seventy-four. The remaining eight TECs will be operational later this year.

Textiles and Clothing

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what recent discussions he has had with representatives of the textile and clothing industries about employment levels.

Mr. Jackson: Employment Ministers meet representatives of the textile and clothing industry from time to time, but there have been no recent discussions on this subject.

Retraining (Cumbria)

Mr. Franks: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has to improve retraining schemes in Cumbria.

Mr. Howard: Cumbria training and enterprise council is now responsible for training schemes in Cumbria and is currently restructuring ET to meet local needs more effectively. It will be launching several new training packages today, including pre-recruitment training, short duration training and a training and recruitment package. This is an excellent initiative showing how TECs can provide an immediate and flexible response to the needs of their constituents.

Industrial Tribunals

Mr. Holt: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many industrial tribunal cases have found in favour of the appellant during the past 12 months; and how much compensation has been paid.

Mr. Forth: In the year up to the end of March the industrial tribunals found for the applicant in 5,033 cases and awarded a total of £3,490,454 in compensation.

Community Employment

Mrs. Maureen Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what assessment he has made of the report from Full Employment United Kingdom recommending community employment for the unemployed in return for benefits after one year's unemployment.

Mr. Jackson: I am grateful to Full Employment United Kingdom for sending me a copy of its report which I read with interest. Constructive contributions to the discussion about the further development of our programmes and services for unemployed people are always to be welcomed.

Restart Courses

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what arrangements exist to enable benefit claimants who have been unemployed for over two years and who are in part-time employment to attend compulsory restart courses.

Mr. Jackson: Questions on operational matters in the Employment Service executive agency are the responsibility of Mike Fogden, the agency's chief executive, to whom I have referred this question for reply.

Jobs

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many jobs he expects to be created in the next 12 months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: My Department does not offer forecasts of employment.

Employment Training

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what is the total number of ET training agents who have received approval for (a) each of the first five criteria and (b) each of the last four criteria set out in approved training organisation process;

(2) what is (a) the total number of ET training agents, (b) the total number of ET training managers, (c) the total number of ET training agents awarded approved training organisation status by 31 March and (d) the total number of ET training managers awarded approved training organisation status by 31 March;

(3) what is the total number of ET training managers who have received approval for (a) each of the first five criteria and (b) each of last four criteria set out in the approved training organisation process.

Mr. Jackson: In April 1990 the nine criteria considered in awarding approved training organisation status to ET training providers were consolidated into seven which cover the same ground. The total number of ET training agents and training managers is not available, nor is separate information for training agents and training managers covered by the approved training organisation process. A total of 880 of those ET training agents and training managers who commenced on 5 September 1988 were still contracted by the Department of Employment or by training and enterprise councils to deliver employment training on 31 March 1991. By that date all had received approval for each of the first four criteria and 809—92 per cent.—also for the last three criteria and therefore for approved training organisation status.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether those released from prison or young offender institutions are eligible for employment training in Bradford; and what assessment he has made of the likely implications of alternative policies in this area.

Mr. Jackson [holding answer 3 May 1991]: Persons released from prison or young offender institutions who are 18 or over and under 60 are eligible for employment training if, at the time of seeking entry, they have accumulated 26 weeks of qualifying time spent either in unemployment or in custody or both. In addition, such persons can be eligible for fast entry into employment training if they have special training needs associated with disability, literacy, numeracy and language difficulty or if they qualify as skill shortage or enterprise entrants or labour market returners. A proportion of persons released from prison or from young offender institutions who are eligible for employment training are also covered by the Government's guarantee and aim. Eligibility for employment training is not defined or limited by location within Great Britain. There is no intention to apply alternative eligibility arrangements in Bradford and no assessment of other possibilities has been made.

Training Investment

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the average invested per capita for trainees on courses organised by the training and enterprise councils; and what are the comparable figures for training schemes in West Germany.

Mr. Jackson: The information requested is not available.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Advertising

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give separate figures for the spending by the Overseas Development Administration on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

Mrs. Chalker: I refer the hon. Member to the reply he received on 25 April from my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals he has to privatise any activities of the Overseas Development Administration.

Mrs. Chalker: I have no proposals to privatise any activities of the Overseas Development Administration.

Ethiopian Relief Organisation

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has given, or proposes to give, assistance directly to the Ethiopian Relief Organisation after the cancellation of the joint relief partnership scheme by the Ethiopian central Government.

Mrs. Chalker: The joint relief partnership—JRP—has not been cancelled. Latest reports indicate that the JRP continues to operate the southern line relief supply route satisfactorily. We are providing assistance through the southern line and in other ways. I have no plans at present to give assistance directly to the Ethiopian Relief Organisation.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Balance of Payments

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the relationship between the balance of payments cost of an increase in overseas aid and the domestic balance of taxation and net public spending.

Mr. Mellor: Overseas aid in the form of cash grants counts as a transfer debit in the invisible trade balance of the current account. An increase in such aid would therefore reduce the surplus on invisibles and so increase the current account deficit. It would count as public expenditure. To the extent to which it added to the planning total, it would need to be financed from general taxation.

Household Incomes

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing gross rates as a percentage of equivalised disposable income for each category and each year itemised in table R of the article on household incomes in the March issue of "Economic Trends"; and if he will add the average for all households in each tenure type;

(2) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing gross rates as a percentage of equivalised disposable income for each category and each year itemised in table Q of the article on household incomes in the March issue of "Economic Trends"; and if he will add the average for all households in each household type;

(3) what is his estimate of the gross and net council tax payable as a percentage of household equivalised disposable incomes by decile groups as defined in the article on household income in the March issue of "Economic Trends", together with the corresponding figures for rates in 1988.

Mr. Mellor: It is not meaningful to compare unequivalised gross rates with equivalised values of income.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the numbers of households in each of the lowest two quintiles in table 3 appendix 1 of the article on household incomes in the March issue of "Economic Trends", receiving a rate rebate of (a) 100 per cent. and (b) 50 to 99 per cent. and the numbers receiving combined housing benefit/rate relief in excess of rates.

Mr. Maples: The figures are as follows:

1988 Quintile groups of equivalised disposable income

	Number of households
Percentage of domestic rates	Bottom	2nd
Rate rebates
1. 100 per cent.	68	53
2. 50 to 99 per cent.	344	197
3. 0 to 49 per cent.	1,041	1,203
	1,453	1,453
Households where total of rate rebate and rent rebate/allowance is in excess of domestic rates	601	489

Note: Care should be taken in the interpretation of these figures, which are subject to sampling error, and the accuracy of reporting by households, in the Family Expenditure Survey which is the source of the data. Rate rebates may not always relate to the same time period as the reported income.
Source: Central Statistical Office.

The 100 per cent. figures include any cases where reported rebates exceed the domestic rates.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table, further to the article on household incomes in the March issue of "Economic Trends", showing the increase in real disposable incomes since 1979 of the top and bottom deciles of households and the increases in the percentage of real disposable incomes taken by gross rates in each case.

Mr. Mellor: The analysis behind the article on household incomes has not been designed to give reliable estimates of increases in absolute income levels between two years. The remaining information is as follows.

Gross rates as percentage of disposable income in: 1979 and 1988

	Decile group of households ranked by equivalised disposable income		All households
Per cent.	Bottom	Top
1979	9	3	4
1988	15	3	5

Note: Rate rebates will significantly reduce the burden of gross rates for lower income households.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each column in each table in the article on household incomes in the March issue of "Economic Trends" the average amount of tax relief in total and per recipient.

Mr. Mellor: The information could be produced only at disproportionate cost.

However, the average amount of some forms of tax relief—relief at source on mortgage interest under the MIRAS system and life assurance premiums—is given for quintile and decile groups of households for 1988 in tables 3 and 4 of appendix 1 of the article in March's "Economic Trends".

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish a table showing for each of the decile groups in table 2 of appendix 3 to the article on household incomes in the March issue of "Economic Trends", the estimated gross amount of council tax payable compared to the gross rate, together with the corresponding tax rebate.

Mr. Mellor: Estimates of council tax are not available.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the numbers of households in each decile of table 2, appendix 3 of the article on household incomes in the March issue of "Economic Trends" that received rate rebates or housing benefit equal to (a) 100 per cent. and (b) 50-99 per cent. of rates.

Mr. Maples: The figures are as follows:

	Decile groups of unadjusted disposable income
1988 Number of households	Bottom	2nd	3rd	4th	5th	6th	7th	8th	9th	Top	All households
Total rate rebate and rent rebate allowance, as a percentage of domestic rates:
100 per cent. or more	301	392	267	126	60	34	19	14	6	2	1,221
50 to 99 per cent.	107	59	42	30	18	12	12	4	2	2	288
0 to 49 per cent.	318	276	418	570	649	680	696	708	719	722	5,756
Total	726	727	727	726	727	726	727	726	727	726	7,265

Note: Care should be taken in the interpretation of these figures, which are subject to sampling error, and the accuracy of reporting by households, in the Family Expenditure Survey which is the source of the data. Rate rebates may not always relate to the same time period as the reported income. Some high income households may contain low income benefit units entitled to rebates, for example lodgers.

Vote Bundle

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will tabulate in the Official Report the amount charged for the full Vote bundle in each Session of Parliament for 1980-81 to date in cash prices and at 1990-91 prices; and if he will state the amounts charged during the current Session, its estimated cost and method of calculation.

Mr. Maples: The cost of taking one copy of the Vote bundle throughout each Session of Parliament since 1980-81 is as follows:

Session	Prices charged	Prices charged uplifted to 1991 prices
1980-81	1,757	3,221
1981-82	2,113	3,510
1982-83[1]	1,509	2,396
1983-84[2]	3,039	4,586
1984-85	2,738	3,895
1985-86	2,885	3,937
1986-87[1]	1,569	2,058
1987-88[2]	4,664	5,913
1988-89	4,128	4,852
1989-90	4,304	4,680
1990-91[3]	3,800	3,800

[1] 6 month Session due to General Election.
[2] 17 month Session.

Council Tax

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each quintile group of households in the family expenditure survey ranked by the gross amount of council tax payable the average (i) unadjusted disposable income, (ii) equivalised disposable income, (iii) number of households qualifying for relief and (iv) the amount of relief per qualifying household;

(2) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each quintile group within each household type in table 5, appendix 1 of the article on household incomes in the March issue of "Economic Trends", his estimate of the gross council tax to replace gross rates, together with his estimate of the average amount of rebate.

Mr. Maples: Estimates of council tax cannot be made from the data available.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the average increase in the amount payable by (a) council tenants and (b) other householders under the council tax over rates in 1979-80 and 1989-90; and if he will provide corresponding figures for each region.

Mr. Key: I have been asked to reply.
The information requested is not available.

Advertising

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give separate figures for the spending by the Department for National Savings on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

Mr. Maples: Figures for the years 1981-82 to 1991-92 are as follows. No breakdown by advertising medium is available for the years 1981-82 to 1983-84 and no total figures prior to 1981.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give separate figures for the spending by the Inland Revenue on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

Mr. Maude: Information relating to the financial years 1979-80 to 1985-86 inclusive is not readily available and cannot be obtained without disproportionate cost. The spend on advertising, omitting staff and accommodation-related costs, for the remaining years is as follows:

£ thousand

	Television	Radio	Newspaper	Other promotional
1986-87	0	0	15	300
1987-88	0	0	15	350
1988-89	0	0	20	250
1989-90	0	0	30	400
1990-91[1]	4,376	0	2,155	692
1991-92[2]	0	0	20	300

[1] Forecast outturn
[2] Budget

The figures for 1990-91 include expenditure of £6·95 million on an advertising campaign to increase public awareness of the new arrangements for non-taxpayers to register for payment of bank and building society interest without deduction of income tax.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give separate figures for the spending by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Her Majesty's Customs and Excise has not used television, radio or newspaper advertising for promotional purposes. The information available on other promotional material is as follows:

	Estimate expenditure £
1984-1985	21,000
1985-1986	29,000
1986-1987	28,000
1987-1988	29,000
1988-1989	47,000
1989-1990	31,000
1990-1991	44,000
1991-1992	54,000

The figures do not include recruitment advertising. The figures for 1979-84 are not available.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give separate figures for the spending by Her Majesty's Stationery Office on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

Mr. Maples: HMSO has not used television or radio advertising. Expenditure on advertising in newspapers and journals and on other promotional material for each financial year was:

Year	Advertising in Newspapers and Journals[1] £000	Other promotional material £000
1983-84	42	151
1984-85	45	125
1985-86	69	191
1986-87	61	160

Year	Advertising in Newspapers and Journal[1] £000	Other promotional material £000
1987-88	83	172
1988[2]	89	142
1989	[3]1,027	563
1990	406	658

[1] Details of expenditure on newspaper advertising as opposed to journal advertising are not available.
[2] HMSO changed its financial year from the fiscal to the calendar in 1988 (9 months).
[3] Includes expenditure on a major campaign to launch new health and safety posters.

Figures for the years 1979-80 to 1982-83 could be provided only at disproportionate cost. The comparable budgeted figures for 1991 are £539,000 and £589,000 respectively.

The greater part of the expenditure is incurred in publicising publications and HMSO would normally expect to recover the costs through sales.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give separate figures for the spending by the Department for National Savings on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

Mr. Maples: Figures for the years 1981-82 to 1991-92 are as follows. No breakdown by advertising medium is available for the years 1981-82 to 1983-84 and no total figures prior to 1981.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proposals he has to privatise any activities of the Department for National Savings.

Mr. Maples: None.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proposals he has to privatise any activities of Customs and Excise.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: In common with other Departments, Customs and Excise carries out a continuing programme of market testing reviews of its activities. Where market testing identifies areas where value for money could be improved by contracting out work to the private sector, the feasibility of doing so will be examined.

Oil and Gas

Mr. Doran: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the total amount paid in (a) petroleum revenue tax, (b) royalties and (c) corporation tax arising out of oil and gas operations in the United Kingdom continental shelf in each year since 1979; and what is his estimate of the total amount of each tax to be paid in fiscal year 1991-92.

Mr. Maples: The information required (in £ millions) is contained in the table:

Fiscal Year	[1]Petroleum Revenue Tax	Royalties	[2]Corporation Tax
1979-80	1,435	628	250
1980-81	2,410	992	341
1981-82	4,415	1,396	681

Premium Bonds

Sir Peter Blaker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government with regard to the reinvestment of £50 prizes won under the premium bond scheme.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I have decided that winners of £50 prizes should be permitted to reinvest them in additional bonds if they so wish. Amendments to the regulations to effect this change will be laid before Parliament shortly.

Civil Research and Development

Mr. Wray: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the comparative figures for expenditure on civil research and development, as a percentage of their gross national product, of the United Kingdom, Canada, Belgium, France, Germany and Sweden, for each year since 1974.

Mr. Maples [holding answer 7 May 1991]: Separate data for civil R and D expenditure by industry in the United Kingdom were collected for the first time in 1989. Provisional figures indicate that total civil R and D expenditure from all sources in 1989 represented 1·7 per cent. of gross domestic product. Standard international comparisons of R and D expenditure are usually given in terms of gross domestic product and not gross national product.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Local Education Authorities

Mr. Butcher: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Mr. Coombs) of 12 February, Official Report, columns 437-38, if he will list all local education authorities in England in rank order of central administration expenditure on education per secondary pupil per year, starting with the highest spending authority.

Mr. Fallon: Expenditure for central administration is collected only as a single figure for all education services. That figure is not allocated to individual sectors of the education service, so expenditure attributable to a single sector such as secondary schools is not available.

Mr. Butcher: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Mr. Coombs) of 12 February, Official Report, columns 437-38, if he will list all education authorities in England in rank order of total combined expenditure per secondary pupil per year on school meals, central administration, debt charges or revenue contributions to capital outlay.

Mr. Fallon: Expenditure figures for the central services identified in the question are collected only as single totals for all education services. The figures are not allocated to individual sectors of the education service, so expenditure attributable to a single sector such as secondary schools is not available.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what additional (a) loan sanction and (b) grant has been granted to Doncaster local education authority for education purposes for (i) the current financial year (ii) the last financial year and (iii) for the year 1992-93.

Mr. Fallon: Details of the annual capital guidelines—ACGs—and the educational grants made to Doncaster for 1990-91 and 1991-92 are set out in the table. Grants and ACGs for 1992-93 have not yet been determined.

£ thousands

	1990-91	1991-92

GEST[4]	—	2,715·0
Travellers[5]	58·1	60·9
Section 11[6]	17·8	22·0

Notes:

[1] The figures represent planned expenditure by the Governors of voluntary aided or special agreement schools. Grant is paid up to a maximum of 85 per cent on such expenditure.

[2] ESG—Education Support Grants.

[3] LEATGS—LEA Training Grants Scheme

[4] GEST—Grants in Education Support and Training. This incorporates the ESG and LEATGs schemes.

[5] The figures represent approved expenditure. Grant aid is paid at the rate of 75 per cent.

[6] Grant under Section 11 of the Local Government Act is administered by the Home Office. Grant is paid at the rate of 75 per cent. on approved salary costs. The figure for 1991-92 is a provisional estimate.

Urban programme grant is allocated to local authorities for economic, environmental, social and housing projects. Doncaster received £2 million in each of 1990-91 and 1991-92. Detailed statistics are not available to isolate the education component from the total urban programme grant.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the total amount of moneys that his Department has allocated to Doncaster local education authority for the maintenance and repair of school buildings for the current financial year; and what was the amount for the last financial year.

Mr. Fallon: The Government do not allocate to LEAs separately identified recurrent funds for repairs and maintenance: it is for each authority and, under local management, its schools, to determine what proportion of the total recurrent funds available to them to allocate for that purpose.

As far as capital works on school buildings is concerned, Doncaster local education authority has been given an education annual capital guideline—ACG—of £375,000 for 1991-92 to contribute towards capital spending in schools. The authority is free to spend its overall capital resources as it chooses, and can supplement its annual capital guidelines from capital receipts and other sources of funding, including its revenue budget. The LEA also received an allocation of £145,000 for projects at voluntary aided—VA—and special agreement—SA—schools.

For 1990-91 Doncaster received an ACG of £860,000 —of which £780,000 was for schools, and an allocation for VA and SA schools of £345,000.

Geography

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what assessment he has made concerning the unit costs of material, textbooks, samples, maps or other aids including films, videos or filmstrips, models, globes or other equipment required as capital and revenue expenditure in order to provide for the geography curriculum and programme of study specified in SI 1991, No. 678.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend had general regard to the resource implications of the attainment targets and programmes of study specified in the document attached to SI 1991, No. 678. However, it is for each school to decide what, if any, additional equipment it requires to deliver the national curriculum. In 1991-92, grants will be available to support up to £15 million of expenditure by local education authorities on equipment for the national curriculum.

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will state the amount of specialised space required by current school building regulations in respect of studies in geography consequent on the requirements of SI 1991, No. 678 in terms of room units or floor space, including storage space, per thousand pupils or similar ratio.

Mr. Eggar: The minimum teaching accommodation requirements set out in the Education (School Premises) Regulations 1981 refer only to the overall area to be provided. The requirements do not specify space standards for particular subjects of the curriculum.

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will state the relationship between the programme of study and attainment targets specified in his approved geography curriculum, as set out in SI 1991, No. 678, and the general certificate of secondary education in geography.

Mr. Eggar: Although GCSE courses in geography are currently unaffected, with effect from autumn 1994 all GCSE geography syllabuses will have to reflect the curriculum requirements outlined in SI 1991, No. 678.

Personal Achievement Records

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects each child in local education authority-supported schools to have a record of personal achievement; and what guidance he is offering to local education authorities.

Mr. Eggar: Regulations laid last summer require parents to be given reports on the achievements of all children in years 1, 2, 3, 7 and 8 and sixth formers, and will extend progressively to cover all years by 1994. The accompanying circular 8/90, "Records of Achievement", offers guidance both on the legal framework and how it might be developed at schools' discretion. All secondary schools have in addition been encouraged to give all their school leavers a national record of achievement from this summer.

Assisted Places Scheme

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what were the numbers of places, total cost, and cost per place of places under the assisted places scheme at each school in Newcastle upon Tyne for each of the last five years.

Mr. Fallon: The information requested is given in the tables, but figures in respect of the academic years prior to 1988-89 are not readily available. The Church high school joined the assisted places scheme from the start of the 1989-90 academic year.

Access Courses

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has on how many access courses there are in the United Kingdom; what percentage of men and women take part in these courses; and if he will give a breakdown of the percentage of men and women by region.

Mr. Alan Howarth: A survey published by the educational counselling and credit transfer information service listed 522 access courses in England in 1989. Based on information from the "Further Education Statistical Record", 34 per cent. of students enrolled on access courses in England at Novembver 1989 were men and 66 per cent. were women. Percentages by region are:

	Per cent. Men	Per cent. Women
North	34	66
Yorks/Humberside	32	68
North West	32	68
East Midlands	47	53
West Midlands	33	67
East Anglia	44	56
Greater London	36	64
Other South East	24	76
South West	34	66

Information about access courses in the rest of the United Kingdom is the responsibility of my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Northern Ireland, for Scotland and for Wales.

Mathematics and Science

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what progress has been made on the review of the attainment targets and programmes of study for mathematics and science in the national curriculum.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Jointly with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales, I am today publishing statutory proposals for new orders setting out the attainment targets and programmes of study for mathematics and science in the national curriculum. Our purpose is to make the assessment of these subjects more manageable for teachers and others, and to make reports on pupils' achievement in them easier for parents to understand. The effect of our proposals is to reduce the number of attainment targets in each subject to five. Within the attainment targets the number of statements of attainment will also be reduced, by slightly more than half. Our proposals will not change in substance the content of the curriculum for these subjects. I have today asked the National Curriculum Council in England to carry out consultations on the proposals, and comments should be sent to the council by 19 July. My right hon. Friend will initiate consultations in Wales. A copy of the published proposals has been placed in the Library of the House.

I intend that the new structure of attainment targets should be in place in time for the 1992-93 school year, and have decided that it would be right to consolidate their introduction with the first statutory assessments of 14-year-olds in these subjects, which will now take place in summer 1993. In preparation for those statutory assessments, I have invited the School Examinations and Assessment Council to co-ordinate a non-statutory pilot assessment of 14-year-olds against the revised attainment targets in 1992. The statutory assessment of seven-year-olds is already under way this year, and I think it right to continue with that assessment against the existing attainment targets in 1992, switching to the new structure in 1993.

Teacher Training

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the postgraduate certificate of education and B.Ed teacher education and training courses presently operating under temporary approval.

Mr. Fallon [holding answer 29 April 1991]: The PGCE and B.Ed courses presently operating under temporary approval are listed in the table. The Council for the Accreditation of Teacher Education—CATE—intends to complete its scrutiny of these courses and make its recommendations to the Secretary of State by the end of July.

Chief Inspector of Schools

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will set out in detail the procedures for the forthcoming appointment of a new holder of the office of Her Majesty's chief inspector of schools, including the nature of the involvement of Ministers in the appointment.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 4 March 1991, c. 42]: Before proceeding with the choice of a permanent successor to the present senior chief inspector I wish to carry out a thorough internal review of the structure and role of Her Majesty's inspectorate. I see this review as a necessary consequence of my decision to remove further education and sixth-form colleges from local education control and of the decisions of a growing number of maintained schools to opt out from local authority control. I will explore all possible options for an inspectorate capable of delivering an effective system of quality control based on inspection for the evolving pattern of educational provision. The outcome could well be a very different job description for the head of the inspectorate. I have asked therefore the Civil Service Commissioners to take no further action with the open competition they have been organising to identify a new senior chief inspector. In the meantime it is important that HM inspectorate should be under sound and strong leadership when the present SCI retires at the end of August. I am therefore appointing an internal candidate as SCI who will be well able to carry out the functions of the post until the review is complete and a new appointment can be made following a public competition.

TRANSPORT

Clapham Junction Railway Accident

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has received a further progress report from British Rail on implementation of the recommendations of Sir Anthony Hidden's report on the Clapham junction railway accident; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: Sir Bob Reid has submitted British Rail's third progress report to me, and I have arranged for copies to be placed in the Library. BR has continued to make progress on these recommendations, and all of those for BR or the British Transport police are either complete or have actions in hand. Some of the recommendations require long-term development. I welcome the report, which demonstrates BR's commitment to maintaining a very high standard of safety. Safety improvements under way include changes in working methods, improved training, new safety management systems and investment in new equipment.

Dry Cargo Ships

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what advice he has been given and what research has been carried out or commissioned by his Department on the safety implications for dry cargo ships of (a) fitting ships with structural monitoring systems, (b) the speed with which ships are loaded and (c) other technical and staffing considerations relating to safety; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: My Department has jointly funded with "Lloyd's Register of Shipping" the developments of the "black box" voyage data recorder. This equipment is presently being evaluated at sea. It embodies, among other things, features designed to monitor stress levels at critical locations of a vessel's structure. Stress levels may be monitored with this equipment during loading and unloading operations, and in addition recorded for analysis at a later date.

Research commissioned by the Department into the "Technology and Manning for Safe Ship Operations" in 1986 formed the reference work for a strategic policy committee, under the Merchant Navy Training Board, to develop a modular structure of qualifications based on standards to perform separate shipboard functions. These new initiatives on training and future manning models are referred to in "British Shipping: Challenges and Opportunities", which suggests a target date for their implementation of September 1992.

Explosives Train (Emergency Alert)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement in respect of an incident on the evening of 22 March when a train carrying explosives was involved in an emergency alert near Thirsk, Yorkshire.

Mr. McLoughlin: I understand that on 22 April British Rail's lineside equipment detected hot wheel bearings on a train at Thirsk. The fire brigade was called as a precautionary measure. The incident was not reported to the Health and Safety Executive's railway inspectorate, but the inspectorate is making inquiries.

British Rail Investment

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 22 April, Official Report, columns 348-49, how much of the £1·4 billion will be invested in (a) Scotland, (b) in new rolling stock, (c) on improvement of lines connecting the channel tunnel with Scotland and the north of England, (d) electrification of lines and (e) special measures for the protection of the environment both in Scotland and in England.

Mr. Freeman: Proposals for providing freight services north of London are currently being examined by British Rail as part of its £1·4 billion programme of investment to take advantage of the initial opening of the tunnel. Possible sites for a freight terminal in Strathclyde are being considered. No firm figures are therefore available for expenditure in Scotland. Spending of over £650 million is planned on new rolling stock for freight and inter-capital passenger services. A total of £21 million will be spent improving freight routes connecting the channel tunnel to Scotland and the north of England. On electrification, £43 million will be spent on the west London line and the line between Tonbridge and Redhill. Spending on environmental protection relating to work on existing lines cannot be separately identified.

Quangos

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the individual appointments excluding casual vacancies he is scheduled to make to quasi-autonomous non-governmental organisations in (a) 1991 and (b) 1992 indicating in each case the title of the post, the salary if any and the duration of the appointment.

Mr. McLoughlin: The readily available information about appointments for which my right hon. and learned Friend is responsible is given in "Public Bodies 1990" and "Public Appointments: A Handbook for Women's Organisations", copies of which are in the Library of the House.

A40, Ealing

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the precise nature of the work currently being undertaken on the central reservation of the A40 in the London borough of Ealing; when he expects it to be completed; what the final cost will be; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: The work currently under way on the A40 Western avenue in the London borough of Ealing entails the repair and replacement of central reserve safety fencing and to bring it up to the latest departmental standards. At the same time, existing emergency crossover points are being closed permanently on road safety grounds and the street lighting is being improved.

Work is scheduled for completion by the middle of May at an estimated cost of £377,000.

HGVs (Carbon Dioxide)

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimates he has made of the amount of carbon dioxide which may be emitted from the existing heavy goods vehicle fleet during its remaining lifetime.

Mr. Chope: The latest available figure is 28,000 tonnes per annum for 1988 and relates to total carbon dioxide emissions from all road vehicles. No breakdown of this figure between vehicle types is available. The remaining life of the existing heavy goods vehicle fleet depends on varying factors and cannot be predicted with accuracy.

Speed Limits

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many representations he has received called for the lowering of the maximum speed limits on roads in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Chope: I receive a substantial quantity of correspondence concerning national speed limits and their enforcement.

Motoring Offences

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment his Department has made of the effectiveness of yellow box junctions in accident prevention; and if he has any plans to extend their use to pedestrian crossings.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 7 May 1991]: Yellow box markings were introduced in the Traffic Signs Regulations 1975 primarily as a means of speeding up traffic flow at junctions. At signal-controlled junctions their introduction led to marked reductions in injury accidents, particularly involving pedestrians.

There are no plans to extend their use to pedestrian crossings. At "zebra" crossings the yellow box would conflict with the zebra stripes. Yellow box markings used at "pelican" crossings would be likely to have little impact.

Pelican Crossings

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether his Department has any intention of reviewing the criteria for qualification for a pelican crossing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 7 May 1991]: It is for individual local highway authorities to decide whether a particular crossing is needed in the light of criteria published by the Department. These are to be reviewed further with the local authority associations later this year.

Eurofreight Terminal (Scotland)

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to announce his decision on the siting of Scotland's Eurofreight rail terminal.

Mr. Freeman: The siting of channel tunnel freight terminals is a commercial matter for British Rail. I understand that it is currently discussing possible locations in Strathclyde with local authorities and private sector developers and hopes to make an announcement this summer.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Kurdish Refugees

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals there are to promote safety zones for Kurds presently on the Iran-Iraq border.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We are continuing our policy of establishing safe havens in northern Iraq. We will assist with the most appropriate measures to meet the humanitarian needs of all Iraqi refugees as quickly and effectively as possible. We hope that the United Nations will soon be in a position to take over the operation.

Bangladesh

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps to safeguard minority interests and human rights in Bangladesh his Department has taken with reference to (1) the protection of tribal people in Chittagong hill tracts, (2) the protection of non-Muslim temples, churches and relics, (3) the exodus of Bengalese to India to escape harassment and (4) the Enemy Property Act.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Through our regular contacts with the Bangladesh Government, I know that they are well aware of the importance we attach to respect for human rights, including the rights of minorities.

Quangos

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the individual appointments exluding casual vacancies he is scheduled to make to quasi-autonomous non-governmental organisations in (a) 1991 and (b) 1992 indicating in each case the title of the post, the salary if any and the duration of the appointment.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Individual apopintments are scheduled to be made in 1991 and 1992 to the following bodies for which the diplomatic and aid wings of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office are responsible:

Middle East

Mr. Knapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his recent visit to the middle east.

Mr. Hurd: I visited Egypt, Jordan, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia from 1 to 4 May. In addition to meetings with those Governments, I also had a discussion with the Foreign Minister of Yemen in Cairo on 2 May.

In Cairo I had useful talks withn President Mubarak, Foreign Minister Abdul Meguid and presidential adviser Osama Al Baz. We discussed regional issues, including the middle east peace process. Bilateral issues discussed included President Mubarak's forthcoming state visit. We agreed that there are now no significant differences in the British and Egyptian approach to the main problems of the middle east.

In Jordan I had discussions with King Hussein, the Crown Prince, the Prime Minister and the Foreign Minister. Jordan is keen to play a helpful role in Mr. Baker's peace initiative and to rebuild relations with the west and her Gulf neighbours. I made clear our continuing friendship for Jordan and our wish to see Jordan resume its rightful position in the Arab world.

In Kuwait I saw the state of the country following liberation. I was shocked at the extent of the destruction by the Iraqis during their brutal occupation. Much remains to be done before Kuwait is functioning again as a prosperous society, and in this task of reconstruction Britain intends to take a full part. We discussed this co-operation in detail. My meetings with the Amir, the Crown Prince and the Foreign Minister covered a number of issues. I raised reports of human rights abuses following liberation and in particular the position of Palestinians in Kuwait. The Amir said that the Government would hold to their commitment to hold general elections in 1992. He emphasised his concern at Iraq's failure to return a large number of Kuwaitis detained in Iraq and property removed from Kuwait during the occupation.

In Saudi Arabia my discussions with the King and his Minister of Foreign Affairs revealed a close identity of view. The Saudis remain concerned to support the middle east peace process and to keep up the pressure on the Iraqi Government to fulfill their commitments to the United Nations. I explained the background to our efforts to provide humanitarian help to Iraqi refugees and displaced persons and our view that Iraq could not be allowed to rejoin the family of nations while Saddam Hussein remained in power in Baghdad.

In all four countries there was appreciation for Britain's continuing role in the middle east whether in pressing for a settlement of the Arab-Israel dispute on the basis of UN Security Council resolutions or in underpinning new arrangements for ensuring the security of the Gulf.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Replica Guns

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what restrictions exist on the sale of replica guns by mail order;

(2) if he will introduce measures to curb the sale of replica guns;

(3) what restrictions exist on the sale of replica guns through retail outlets.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Under the Firearms Act 1982 the sale and possession of replica firearms which can be readily converted to fire live ammunition are subject to the same stringent controls as those imposed on real firearms under the Firearms Acts 1968 to 1988. Where such a replica is sold, whether by mail order or through a retail outlet, the purchaser must produce a firearm certificate as proof of authorisation to acquire the weapon concerned. The possession of any imitation firearm, whether readily convertible or not, with intent to commit an offence or resist arrest is an offence for which the maximum penalty is life imprisonment. We have no plans to control the sale of replica firearms that cannot be readily converted to fire live ammunition.

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received criticising the easy availability of replica guns.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to the question by my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Paice) on 7 March at column 269 since when he has written to the Home Office on this matter. No other such representations have recently been received.

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if there have been any recent changes in the level of offences involving the use of replica guns.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Figures for the last four years for which statistics are available are shown in the table:

Year	Number of offences
1989	235
1988	185
1987	201
1986	195

Warwickshire Police

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what comments he has received from Her Majesty's inspector of constabulary on the effect of the Government's proposed poll tax capping of Warwickshire county council on policing within the county.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Her Majesty's inspector of constabulary will report on the Warwickshire constabulary following his inspection of the force on 7 to 9 May. No specific comments have been received on the effect of the proposed cap.

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from the chief constable of Warwickshire on the likely impact of the Government's proposed poll tax capping of Warwickshire county council.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: My right hon. Friend has received no such representations since my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment announced on 3 April his proposals for capping a number of local authorities, including Warwickshire.

Crime Statistics

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will publish a table showing the level of recorded crimes in the categories (a) burglaries, (b) crimes of violence against the person and (c) property theft, including theft from vehicles, for each police authority in England in 1979, 1989 and 1990;

(2) if he will publish a table showing the level of recorded crimes in the categories (a) burglaries, (b) crimes of violence against the person and (c) property theft, including theft from vehicles, for each police authority in Wales in 1979, 1989 and 1990.

Mr. John Patten: Information on notifiable offences of violence against the person, burglary and theft and handling stolen goods by police force area is published annually in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales". The information is given in table 32 of the issue for 1979 and table 2.5 for 1989. Copies of these publications are available in the Library. Corresponding figures for 1990 have also been placed in the Library.

Unexplained Deaths

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average length of time between each notification of an unexplained death and the determination of cause of death by a coroner in each of the past two years, for (a) England and (b) Medway.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I regret that this information is not collected centrally. I understand that coroners endeavour to hold inquests as soon as practicable following the death, but sometimes delays are experienced because of the need to wait for witnesses or other evidence.

Poland

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will take steps to abolish the visa requirement for Polish citizens wishing to visit the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We have no plans to abolish the visa requirement for Polish nationals.

Parliamentary Nomination Forms (Doncaster)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects his Department to be able to supply Doncaster metropolitan borough council with parliamentary candidates" nomination forms.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Nomination papers for candidates at parliamentary elections are not supplied by the Home Office. I understand that the acting returning officer in Doncaster obtains supplies from Her Majesty's Stationery Office.

Animals (Research)

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the medical establishments to which he has given a licence to acquire animals which have not been bred specifically for the purpose of research.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: It is not our practice to give details of individual scientific procedure establishments.

Life Imprisonment

Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people sentenced to life imprisonment were released (i) on parole and (ii) on life licence in the last 10 years; and how many in each category of those released have been convicted of a further homicide or serious violent offence.

Mr. John Patten: A person sentenced to life imprisonment can be released from prison only on life licence.

The table gives figures for the number of persons first released on life licence for the years 1979-88 and how many of these were convicted of a "grave" offence since release, by the end of 1988.

Year of first release	Number[1] released	Number reconvicted of 'grave'[2] offence by the end of 1988	Number reconvicted of homicide
		Total	Of which Homicide	Serious violence
1979	74	3	2	1
1980	48	3	1	2
1981	82	1	—	1
1982	107	5	1	4
1983	104	4	3	1
1984	68	2	—	2
1985	69	1	—	1
1986	48	3	—	3
1987	58	—	—	—
1988	70	—	—	—
1979-88	728	22	7	15

[1] Excluding those deported immediately on release.
[2] A 'grave' offence is an offence of homicide, serious wounding, rape, buggery, robbery, aggravated burglary and arson.

The reconviction information was obtained via the offenders' index. More information on the recalls and reconvictions of life licensees is published annually in a Home Office statistical bulletin "Reconvictions and recalls of life licensees and Mentally Disordered Offenders, England and Wales", the latest issue of which is in the Library.

Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons sentenced to life imprisonment have been released from prison in the last 10 years having served (i) less and (ii) more than the minimum term, if any, recommended by the sentencing trial judge.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: During the last 10 years seven prisoners have been released on life licence at an earlier date than that recommended by the trial judge, including two who were terminally ill and released on humanitarian grounds. In the same period six prisoners were released after they had served more than six months longer than the minimum period recommended by the trial judge.

Nationality Office

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on progress in establishing a direct line at the Liverpool nationality office for hon. Members' inquiries.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Inquiries should continue to be pursued through the existing telephone numbers in Lunar house. However, hon. Members will shortly be advised of new arrangements for making inquiries on nationality matters when the transfer of work from Croydon to Liverpool is complete.

Data Protection

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will describe the reasons for the Government's opposition to the European Commission's proposal for a data protection directive; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: As indicated in the answer to the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) on 22 February 1991, at column 278, the Government wish to see all Community states ratify the European convention on data protection and introduce national implementing legislation. We are not yet convinced that provisions of the draft directive which go beyond the convention are necessary or desirable.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many replies to his consultation exercise in relation to the proposal by the European Commission for a data protection directive he has received; how many come from organisations representing data users and how many from organisations representing data subjects; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I have received written comments on the draft directive from 56 organisations broadly representing data users' interests, and four from organisations broadly representing data subjects' interests. Negotiations on the draft directive have begun in Brussels, and the Government are considering their position in the light of the comments they have received.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to propose amendments to the Data Protection Act.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: As indicated in my right hon. Friend's reply to the hon. Member on 18 October 1990 at column 893, legislation is unlikely before the European directive has been adopted.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give separate figures for the spending by the office of the Data Protection Registrar on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The Data Protection Registrar was first appointed in September 1984. I understand that no significant promotional expenditure was incurred in the financial year 1984-85. Expenditure in the years 1985-86 to 1990-91 and the estimate for 1991-92 on fees paid for promotion were as follows:

	Advertising				Exhibitions
	TV	Radio	Newspaper	Other
	£	£	£	£	£
1985-86	—	—	319,012	—	10,538
1986-87	—	—	156,912	—	22,143
1987-88	—	—	364,614	—	15,157
1988-89	—	—	448,603	—	11,383
1989-90	301,353	—	8,348	—	21,260
1990-91	198,380	—	2,125	2,500	21,101
1991-92	—	—	50,000	2,500	25,000

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has to privatise any activities of the office of the Data Protection Registrar.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The Data Protection Registrar is an independent authority appointed by the Crown to enforce the Data Protection Act 1984. I have no plans for changing his status. It is for the registrar to decide how best to carry out his specific statutory functions.

Prison Officers

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list by year for the last 10 years and for the current year to date (a) the number of prison officers found guilty of offences at their place of work, (b) the prison and (c) the offence.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The tables give details of prison officers found guilty of offences in criminal proceedings and of officers found guilty of disciplinary offences as a result of internal disciplinary proceedings. Table A contains a full breakdown for the past 10 years by establishment and by offence. Table B contains only those offences which were dealt with centrally, either by virtue of their intrinsic seriousness or because the officer appealed against the governor's findings. The majority of disciplinary offences are dealt with locally and no central record is kept. In view of the wide range of disciplinary offences, it is not practicable to provide a breakdown by individual offence.

1981

Brixton—Officer convicted of assault on inmate.

1982

Brixton—Officer convicted of assault on inmate.

Kingston—Officer convicted of theft of meat from prison.

Ashford—Officer convicted of criminal deception (fraudulent expenses)

1983

Askham Grange—Officer convicted of false accounting.

Blundeston—Officer convicted of theft and falsifying accounts—took money from staff fund for disabled.

Oxford—Officer convicted of deception, attempted deception and forgery—submitted incorrect expenses claim.

1984

Swinfen Hall—Officer convicted of false accounting and obtaining money by deception—false mileage claim.

1985

Leicester—Officer convicted of deception (falsely claimed lodging allowance).

Bedford—Officer convicted of stealing money from incoming letter to an inmate.

1986

Leicester—Officer convicted of stealing cream and peas from prison kitchen.

Cardiff—Officer convicted of drugs offences involving an inmate.

Wandsworth—Officer convicted of forgery: altered a medical certificate and then submitted it to the Department.

1987

Grendon—Officer convicted of conspiracy to supply a Schedule B drug to a prisoner.

Liverpool—Officer convicted of possession of drugs with intent to supply to a prisoner.

Ford—Officer convicted of four offences of corruption (bringing alcohol, tobacco and other items into the prison).

Albany—Officer convicted of theft from officers' mess.

1988

Blundeston—Officer convicted of theft and false accounting as Treasurer of Officers' Club.

1989

Maidstone—Officer convicted of 2 counts of indecent assault on female member of staff.

Lincoln—Officer convicted of theft of meat from prison.

Coldingley—Officer convicted of theft of £1,000 from Officers' Club.

Table B: Officers found guilty of serious disciplinary offences (year of final disciplinary decision)

"Frances the Firefly"

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many copies of "Frances the Firefly" were produced for his Department by the Central Office of Information; what was the cost of (i) the production and (ii) the distribution of "Frances the Firefly"; who offered advice on the content of "Frances the Firefly"; and whether he intends to produce a sequel.

Mr. John Patten: The "Frances the Firefly" package consists of a story book and a five-minute video intended to warn small children of the dangers of playing with matches. To date 900,000 copies of the story book have been distributed, 97 per cent. of which were in response to requests. A total of 374 copies of the video have been sold and there have been 1,089 loans of the video through the central film library.

The production costs for the story book were £190,503 including the costs of development and reprints. The production costs of the video were £59,126 including £54,920 on development costs. The initial distribution costs of the video and story book were £14,728.

Advice on the content of the video and publication was provided internally by the Home Office fire and emergency planning department and the Home Office public relations branch, by the Central Office of Information and from a sample of primary school teachers in the Greater London area; and the style of presentation was also discussed with child psychologists.

It is intended to produce worksheets later this year to accompany the existing package. The character is capable of being used in future projects aimed at children, but no decision has yet been taken on a sequel.

Vagrancy

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to repeal the Vagrancy Act 1824.

Mr. John Patten: No. The Vagrancy Act 1824 has been much amended over the years and in its present form provides power to deal with a number of nuisances, including indecent exposure.

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many prosecutions and convictions under the Vagrancy Act 1824 occurred in 1989 and 1990; and what was the average cost of prosecution;

(2) how many prosecutions and convictions under the Vagrancy Act 1824 occurred in 1989 and 1990 for young people under the age of 18 years; and what was the average cost of prosecution for this age group.

Mr. John Patten: Information for 1990 is not yet available. Prosecutions and convictions for 1989 for all Vagrancy Act offences are shown in the table.

Category	Prosecutions	Convictions
All ages	3,482	2,839
Under 18	247	175

Prosecution costs are not available by reference to offence.

Missing People

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to establish a national database of missing persons.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Yes. My right hon. Friend plans to introduce a national index of missing persons on the new police national computer.

Narayan Shankar

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to make a final decision on the future of Narayan Shankar (Ref. S680769), whose application for political asylum was made in August, 1989; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The delay in dealing with applications for asylum is a result of the increase in the number of applications in the last two years. On 26 April my right hon. Friend announced a nearly fivefold increase in staff resources for asylum determination. Mr. Shankar's application is receiving attention and his representatives will be informed of the outcome as soon as possible.

Football Licensing Authority

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) full-time and (b) part-time inspectors are currently in post at the Football Licensing Authority, how many more (i) full-time and (ii) part-time inspectors it is planned to appoint; what stage has been reached in the training of these inspectors; and what timescale is envisaged for the completion of all Football Licensing Authority inspectors' training.

Mr. John Patten: Eight full-time ground safety inspectors are already in post, and one further full-time appointment is expected to be made shortly. No further appointments, either part time or full time, are currently proposed. The initial teacher training programme for the inspectors began on 1 May and will take about one month to complete.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to extend the remit of the Football Licensing Authority to cover all sports grounds designated under the Safety of Sports Ground Act 1975 and all grounds requiring safety certificates or licences under parts III and IV of the Fire Safety and Safety of Places of Sports Act 1987; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: No. The responsibilities of the Football Licensing Authority under the Football Spectators Act 1989 are limited to sports grounds at which designated football matches are played. We have no plans to extend the powers of the authority to other sports grounds.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the introduction of section 13 of the Football Spectators Act 1989.

Mr. John Patten: The Football Spectators Act 1989 (Commencement No. 3) Order 1991 (SI No. 1991/1071 (C 28)) was laid on 1 May, and will bring section 13 of the 1989 Act into force on 3 June 1991. Section 13 empowers the Football Licensing Authority to keep under review the discharge by local authorities of their functions under the Safety of Sports Grounds Act 1975 in relation to sports grounds at which designated football matches are played; and subject to consultation with regulatory authorities, to direct local authorities to include terms and conditions in safety certificates. Section 13 also empowers the authority's inspectors to enter and inspect relevant sports grounds and to examine safety certificates and related records, and enables the authority to require local authorities to furnish it with information relating to the discharge of the functions which the Football Licensing Authority is empowered to keep under review.

Police Complaints Authority (Appointments)

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any new appointments have been made to the Police Complaints Authority.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I have recently appointed two further members to the Police Complaints Authority. Mrs. Linda Cawsey will join the authority on 13 May and Mr. Mark Chapman on 10 June. Mrs. Cawsey was until recently a senior manager with BP International Ltd. while Mr. Chapman was formerly Her Majesty's ambassador to Iceland.

War Crimes

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what investigation he has directed to attempt to identify persons resident in the United Kingdom who may have been involved in the murder of partisans in southern France in 1945;

(2) what investigation he has directed to attempt to identify persons resident in the United Kingdom who may have been involved in the massacre of the Russian officer corps or any of those murdered in Stalin's purges;

(3) what investigation he has directed to attempt to identify persons resident in the United Kingdom who may have been involved in the murder of Cossacks in Yugoslavia, Russia and Austria in 1945;

(4) what investigation he has directed to attempt to identify persons resident in the United Kingdom who may have been involved in the murder of Poles in the Warsaw uprising in 1944;

(5) what investigation he has directed to attempt to identify persons resident in the United Kingdom who may have been involved in the murder of Germans in Berlin in 1945 by Russian soldiers;

(6) what investigation he has directed to attempt to identify persons resident in the United Kingdom who may have been involved in the massacre of Polish officers at Katyn.

Mr. John Patten [holding answer 7 May 1991]: So far as the Government are aware, no allegations have been made—in the media, or to the Government, the police or anyone else—that persons resident in this country participated in any of these murders.

PRIME MINISTER

Ministers' Visits

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Prime Minister what are the guidelines for Ministers using Government expenses to undertake official visits which promote prospective candidates for the constituency visited.

The Prime Minister: As under previous Administrations, Ministers do not normally use official resources, such as transport, in connection with party business, but there may be circumstances which makes this necessary, for example, security or when official and party engagements are consecutive.

EMPLOYMENT

Race and Sex Discrimination

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many cases of breaches of the legislation on race and sex discrimination have the Employment Service referred to the Commission for Racial Equality and the Equal Opportunities Commission.

Mr. Jackson: Questions on operational matters in the Employment Service executive agency are the responsibility of Mike Fogden, the agency's chief executive, to whom I have referred this question for reply.

Redundancies

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many redundancies there were in British companies in each year since 1987; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: The number of confirmed redundancies recorded in each of the years since 1987 is given in the table.

Confirmed redundancies

Year	Number
1987	144,135
1988	107,930
1989	116,766
1990	124,777

Quangos

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the individual appointments excluding casual vacancies he is scheduled to make on quasi-autonomous non-governmental organisations in (a) 1991 and (b) 1992 indicating in each case the title of the post, the salary if any and the duration of the appointment.

Mr. Forth: The readily available information about the appointments for which I am responsible, a number of which fall to be made in 1991 and 1992, is given in "Public Bodies 1990" and "Public Appointments: A Handbook for Women's Organisations", copies of which are in the House of Commons Library.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what proposals he has to privatise any activities of the British Tourist Authority.

Mr. Forth: Following the completion of the Government's review of support for tourism, the authority announced on 6 December 1989 the privatisation or contracting out of certain of its activities. The authority will keep under review further possibilities for privatisation.

Training

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of people on work-related Government training programmes are (a) men and (b) women on each programme; and what is the total percentage of (i) single women, (ii) married women and (iii) women with children on each programme.

Mr. Jackson: Information about the proportions of men and women on employment training and youth training is given in the following table. No information is available about the marital status of women or the number with children.

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many women-only training schemes there are in the United Kingdom which are Government-funded; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: Information on the number of these programmes is not held centrally. Training and enterprise councils have discretion under the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 to operate single-sex training programmes.

Continental Shelf (Deaths and Injuries)

Mr. Doran: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the number of (a) deaths and (b) serious injuries in the United Kingdom continental shelf in each year from June 1979 to 1 April.

Mr. Forth: The number of accidents causing deaths or serious injuries on or near to offshore installations on the United Kingdom continental shelf have in the past been published annually in the report "Development of the Oil and Gas Resources of the United Kingdom". Copies of the report for 1990 are now available in the Library of the House. The information for the calendar years from 1979 to 1990 is as follows:

Employment Training

Mr. Andrew Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list those parts of the country in which employment training is to be available to people aged 18 to 24 years only; and whether he expects this restriction to be permanent.

Mr. Jackson [holding answer 1 May 1991]: The Government are committed to ensuring that employment training plays its proper part in meeting the Government's guarantee and aim for long-term unemployed people. The provision of employment training is now largely a matter for training and enterprise councils. Training and enterprise councils are obliged to ensure that priority is given to those unemployed people who fall within the guarantee and aim groups, including people aged 18 to 24 years. I am satisfied that adequate resources are available for employment training for it to continue to play its part in meeting the Government's guarantee and aim.

British Tourist Authority

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of the British Tourist Authority.

Mr. Forth [holding answer 7 May 1991]: These matters are the responsibility of the board of the British Tourist Authority and I am asking the chairman to write directly to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give separate figures for the spending by the British Tourist Authority on (a) TV advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in the following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

Mr. Forth: These matters are the responsibility of the board of the British Tourist Authority and I am asking the chairman to write directly to the hon. Gentleman.

HEALTH

Salmonella

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish in the Official Report for each regional health authority area for each of the past five years the number of cases of food poisoning from salmonella per thousand of the population.

Mr. Dorrell: The information requested is given in the table. This information is not routinely published because the rates are not comparable either between regions or over years. There are a number of reasons for this. Specimens from residents of one region may well be examined in a laboratory in a neighbouring region. The catchment areas of laboratories are unknown and may indeed overlap. Levels of reporting between regions may vary. It is not known how much effect these factors will have on rates, or how the factors have changed over the years.

NHS Expenditure

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the level of expenditure on (a) the national health service, (b) the health and community health services current budget and (c) the family health service current budget, adjusted for changes in input unit costs, in each year since 1970-71.

Mr. Dorrell: The table gives HCHS current, FHS current and total NHS expenditure adjusted for changes in input unit costs in each year since 1974-75. This information measures changes in total inputs at constant factor cost, but ignores the continuing success of national health service management in increasing the efficiency with which it uses resources.

Because of transfers between programmes, consistent information for earlier years is not available. HCHS and FHS figures in column A are in line with those printed in the departmental report (CM15 13) as they have been adjusted to reflect the transfer to the HCHS of family health service administration, Disablement Services Authority and the family health services cash-limited spending. The figures in column B do not reflect these transfers and are therefore not comparable with those for later years. It is not possible to produce HCHS and FHS current expenditure estimates for years prior to 1985-86 on a basis consistent with the revised definition.

Blood Transfusion Service

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give figures for the quantities of blood supplied by private companies and the national blood transfusion service respectively to the national health service in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Dorrell: No blood is supplied by private companies to the NHS. In 1989 the national blood transfusion service issued 1,758,951 units of whole blood to the NHS in England.

Pharmaceuticals

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received from the pharmaceutical industry about the consequences for pharmaceutical research in the United Kingdom of proposals on the duration of patent protection; and if he will make a statement setting out the nature and origin of the problem.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Representations have been received from individual companies and the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry on the relationship between pharmaceutical research and patent life. I refer my hon. Friend to the reply my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry and Consumer Affairs gave to my hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Gregory) on 15 April at columns 32-33.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will outline the duties of the Medical Control Authority which supervises pharmaceutical and medical items; and if he will indicate whether there is any appeal system against items being classified as medical or drug treatments.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Medicines Control Agency of the Department of Health acts on behalf of Ministers for the protection of public health through the licensing and control of medicines under the Medicines Act 1968 and EC regulations and directives. Items for which medicinal claims are made are licensable as medicines, though "instruments, apparatus and appliances" are expressly excluded from the Act's scope. In cases of doubt, the Medicines Control Agency expresses an opinion on a product's status, which a company may or may not accept. Ultimately, only the courts can provide an authoritative interpretation of the law if mutual agreement on status cannot be reached.

Wheelchairs and Artificial Limbs

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much money the Disablement Services Authority distributed to the health authorities to run the wheelchair and artificial limb service; and how much each health authority received.

Mr. Dorrell: For 1991-92, the Department made initial allocations of £110·5 million revenue to regional health authorities for purchasing former Disablement Services Authority activities; £4·4 million has also been allocated for committed capital schemes. The amounts distributed to each of the 14 regions were as follows:

£ thousands

Region	Revenue	Capital

Quangos

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the individual appointments excluding casual vacancies he is scheduled to make to quasi-autonomous non-governmental organisations in (a) 1991 and (b) 1992 indicating in each case the title of the post, the salary if any and the duration of the appointment.

Mr. Dorrell: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is responsible for a number of appointments which will fall to be made in 1991 and 1992. Details of each of these could be provided only at disproportionate cost. However, information is available in "Public Bodies" and "Public Appointments: A Handbook for Women's Organisations", a copy of which is available in the Library.

Infant Formulae

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance has been given to maternity units regarding offers from manufacturers of free samples or supplies of milk powder or other infant formula.

Mr. Dorrell: In July 1989, guidance (HC(89)21), a copy of which is available in the Library, was issued to all regional, district and special health authorities in England and Wales instructing them neither to accept nor distribute free samples and to refuse to accept subsidised supplies of infant formulas. This was part of the Government's response to the World Health Organisation's programme to promote and protect breast-feeding. In addition, authorities were advised to ensure that acceptance of any gift or other commercial donation should not be seen to have influenced their purchasing choice.

Smoking-related Diseases

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give an estimate of the cost of treating smoking-related illness in England and Wales in 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: I refer the hon. and learned Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) on 4 July 1990 at column 594 and the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Amos) on 11 March 1991 at column 349.

Thalassaemia

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health to what extent he has funded ante-natal research since 1979; if he will give any convenient figures for research into thalassaemia; and what assessment he has made of the saving that consequent improved diagnostic work has made in hospital time and expense.

Mr. Dorrell: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Preston (Mrs. Wise) on 12 March 1991 at columns 495-96 on the funding of ante-natal research.

The main agency through which the Department supports biomedical and clinical research in the United Kingdom is the Medical Research Council, which receives its grant in aid from the Department of Education and Science. I understand that a number of research projects into thalassaemia are currently being undertaken by the MRC.

There has been no assessment of the saving that consequent improved diagnostic work has made in hospital time and expense.

St. Paul's Eye Hospital, Liverpool

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will make a statement on the meeting held with the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside and members of a delegation about the proposed closure of St. Paul's eye hospital and the provision of eye care on Merseyside;

(2) if he will list the representations he has received concerning the proposed closure of St. Paul's eye hospital and eye care on Merseyside; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: We are considering carefully the points raised at the meeting I had recently with the hon. Member. In addition, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will shortly be meeting a delegation led by my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) before we come to a final decision.

We have received representations from the Liverpool Central and Southern community health council, Canon Frayling, the Rector of Liverpool, and, in addition to the hon. Members already mentioned, the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) and the hon. Members who put their names to early-day motions 273 on 19 December 1990 and 773 on 30 April. Our attention has been drawn to a petition presented to the Prime Minister's office and we have received 10 letters addressed directly to Ministers.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list in the Official Report the hospitals on Merseyside which have applied for trust status; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: A total of 130 hospitals and other units have expressed interest in trust status from April 1992. The full list has been placed in the Library. The following 10 units are located within the Mersey Regional Health Authority's boundaries:

Aintree Hospitals (Walton and Fazakerly)
[1]Liverpool Community and Priority Services
Liverpool Obstetrics and Gynaecology Unit
Macclesfield Acute Services
Macclesfield Community and Mental Health Services
[1]Mersey Regional Ambulance Services
Mersey Regional Centre for Radiotherapy and Oncology
[1]Mersey Regional Centre for Neurosciences
[1]St. Helens and Knowsley Community Unit
[1]Southport Acute Unit.

[1] Formal applications already received.

Note: Since the announcement in December the units in Macclesfield have decided to work to a slower timetable.

Hospital Paediatric Pathologists

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the number of specialist hospital paediatric pathologists in national health service hospitals in each year since 1985; and if he will express this as an average figure for each such hospital offering paediatric services.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: One of the national service objectives for 1990-91 was for all regions to have at least one paediatric pathologist post and to have conducted a review of the need for further posts to be established by 1992. All regions have met this objective, although one region has had difficulties in filling its vacant post.

Air Pollution

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how much his Department has spent on research into the effects of particulate levels in air on health for each of the last five years;

(2) how much his Department has spent on research into the effects of sulphur dioxide levels in air on health for each of the last five years;

(3) how much his Department has spent on research into the effects of ozone levels in air on health for each of the last five years;

(4) how much has been spent by his Department on research into the effects of lead levels in air on health for each of the last five years.

Mr. Dorrell: The main agency through which the Government support biomedical and clinical research in the United Kingdom is the Medical Research Council, which receives its grant in aid from the Department of Education and Science. I understand that research into air pollutants is included in the MRC's current research programme.

I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) on 14 November 1990 at columns 162-63. The Department of Health has set up an advisory group on the medical aspects of air pollution episodes. This group was established to consider what advice, if any, should be given by central Government about personal protection measures when levels of air pollution are high. An executive summary of its first report on ozone was published on 7 May and copies are available in the Library. Copies of the full report, published by HMSO, will be available later in the summer.

The group is now considering the winter pollutants with particular regard to sulphur dioxide and plans to publish the report of its findings early next year. The advisory group will be considering particulates along with sulphur dioxide and the winter pollutants.

The levels of lead in air in the United Kingdom, except for one or two specific industrial sites, are well within levels set by the EC and have reduced considerably over recent years due to Government action to reduce lead in petrol.

NHS Employees (Letter)

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give the cost of sending all national health service employees the standard letter concerning national health service reforms dated March 1991 signed by Duncan Nichol.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The cost of printing and distributing Duncan Nichol's letter to health authorities was £127,000, a unit cost of 13p per letter. The cost of the exercise was met by the Department of Health. The Department maintains a budget for NHS communications, part of which is intended to keep NHS employees informed of developments in the health service and to enable them to participate more fully.

A copy of the letter is available in the Library.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if his Department will be retaining outside consultants to evaluate second-wave applicants for trust status.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Yes. Following a competitive tendering exercise the Department has appointed management consultants Coopers and Lybrand Deloitte to assist with the financial evaluation of second-wave applicants for trust status.

Abortion

Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he is yet in a position to publish the Government's response to the 10th report of the Social Services Committee, Session 1989-90, on its inquiry into the working of the conscience clause in the Abortion Act 1967.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Government have today published, as Command Paper 1538, their response to the 10th report from the Social Services Committee, Session 1989-90. Copies are available from the Vote Office and have been placed in the Library.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to make a statement on the status of local authority care home trusts.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 22 March at column 256.

NORTHERN IRELAND

John F. Kennedy Park

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what funds will be allocated for the removal of graffiti at John F. Kennedy park, Bessbrook, County Armagh; and if he will make a statement on the arrangements for the removal of graffiti in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham: There are no proposals to remove graffiti. District councils are empowered under article 18 of the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Northern Ireland) Order 1985 to remove graffiti from private property. Government Departments and statutory bodies are responsible for the removal of graffiti from their own properties.

Quangos

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the individual appointments excluding casual vacancies he is scheduled to make to quasi-autonomous non-governmental organisations in (a) 1991 and (b) 1992, indicating in each case the title of the post, the salary if any and the duration of the appointment.

Mr. Brooke: The readily available information about the appointments for which I am responsible, a number of which will fall to be made in 1991 and 1992, is given in "Public Bodies" and "Public Appointments: A Handbook for Women's Organisations", copies of which are in the Library.

Housing Executive (Rates Collection)

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the total value of rates collected by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive from housing executive tenants annually in each of the last three years; and what is the actual or estimated total cost per annum of this rate collection.

Mr. Needham: I have been informed by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive that it is not possible to disaggregate the total value of rates collected as rent and rates are collated and collected as one amount. This also applies to the cost of rate collection.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Munny Ltd.

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give the date of the last accounts filed at Companies house for Munny Ltd.

Mr. Redwood: The last accounts filed at Companies house for Munny Ltd. were for the period ending 31 March 1988, and these were received on 6 May 1989. The registrar is currently pursuing the company in respect of the 1989 and 1990 accounts and annual returns. The directors have been warned that continued failure to file may lead to prosecution.

Chancery Group

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list all the companies in the Chancery Group, the regulatory body each company is a member of, and the date of the last accounts of each company filed at Companies house.

Mr. Redwood: The registrar has confirmed that a company called Chancery Group plc was incorporated on 6 June 1990. The first accounts, for the period ending 31 March 1991, in which subsidiary companies would be listed are due be filed by 31 October 1991.

Chancery plc is an authorised institution under the Banking Act 1987 and a member of the Securities and Futures Authority.

Insolvency

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proposals he has to expand the work of the Department of Trade and Industry on insolvency.

Mr. Redwood: I have no such plans. The insolvency service recruits staff when necessary to meet its workload.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proposals he has for increasing competition among insolvency practitioners.

Mr. Redwood: Following the recommendation of the insolvency review committee chaired by Sir Kenneth Cork, Government policy is to ensure that there are sufficient suitably experienced insolvency practitioners available to compete for insolvency appointments whilst at the same time enforcing acceptable standards of education and experience. This has been achieved by the introduction of licensing.

Seven professional bodies, representing accountants, solicitors and specialists in insolvency, which are able to satisfy the Secretary of State that they regulate the practice of their members, have been authorised to license their members if they are fit and proper persons to act as insolvency practitioners. Any professional body that considers that it is able to satisfy the Secretary of State's requirements may apply for recognition.

In addition, any person able to satisfy similar requirements but who is not a member of a recognised professional body may apply to the Secretary of State for authorisation. As at 31 December 1990, the professional bodies had licensed a total of 1,751 practitioners and the Secretary of State a further 138.

In liquidations and bankruptcies, the creditors have the opportunity to vote on the selection and remuneration of the practitioner. An administrative receiver is appointed by a secured creditor, who fixed his remuneration, but he is required to hold a meeting of creditors and they may apply to the court if they object to his conduct or remuneration.

Amoco

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he received the recommendation on the Elf-Aquitaine takeover of Amoco's oil refining and allied downstream business interests in the United Kingdom from the Monopolies and Mergers Commission; when he anticipates making a decision; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: The Monopolies and Mergers Commission submitted its report on the acquisition by Societé Nationale Elf Aquitaine of certain assets of the Amoco Corporation to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on 27 March 1991. My right hon. Friend laid the report before the House and published it on Friday 3

Advertising

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give separate figures for the spending by the Export Credits Guarantee Department on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

Mr. Sainsbury: Figures of expenditure by ECGD on press and public relations, broken down where possible between press advertising and other promotional expenditure, are as follows:

	Total	Press Advertising[1]	Other
	£000	£000	£000
1985-86	541	—	—
1986-87	703	—	—
1987-88	747	—	—
1988-89	1,112	710	402
1989-90	1,271	986	285
[2]1990-91	1,067	692	375

[1] Separate figures are not available before 1988-89. No expenditure has been incurred on TV and radio advertising.
[2] provisional

For the years 1979-80 to 1984-85, the expenditure was recorded by the Central Office of Information as an allied service. The budget for 1991-92 has still to be finalised, and will depend on developments in the privatisation process.

Bankruptcies

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will bring forward proposals to prevent banks from liquidating viable firms in such a way as to pre-empt other creditors by early appointment of receivers.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 7 May 1991]: The Governor of the Bank of England has warned banks against precipitate action in winding up companies. It is more a matter for the bank than for the DTI.

WALES

Food Poisoning

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report for each health authority in Wales for each of the past five years, the number of cases of food poisoning from salmonella per thousand of the population.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The number of cases of food poisoning from salmonella for each district health authority in Wales is not available. However, data on the number of reports of salmonellas in Wales as a whole are given in the table.

Laboratory reports of salmonellas[1] from Wales to the communicable disease surveillance centre

Year	Total reports	Rates per 1,000 population
1985	450	0·16
1986	690	0·24
1987	746	0·26
1988	819	0·29
1989	[2]1,161	[2]0·40
1990	[2]1,306	[2]0·45

[1] Laboratory reports of Salmonellas (excluding Typhi and Paratyphi) in Faeces-cases and Excreters in Wales.
[2] Provisional data and rates. (The 1990 rate is based on 1989 Mid Year Population estimate as the 1990 estimate is not yet available.)

Council Tax

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the number of domestic residences in each of the property value bands of the proposed council tax in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The information requested is shown in the table.

Number of dwellings falling into band

Property band	Number
A	181,600
B	214,700
C	241,700
D	199,900
E	171,900
F	85,800
G	63,400
Total	1,159,000

Baglan Moors Hospital

Mr. John Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether the proposed starting date for the new district general hospital at Baglan Moors remains as set out in his letter of 13 September 1990 to the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The projected start date of 1992-93 is currently under review by West Glamorgan health authority which is responsible for progressing the scheme.

Advertising

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give separate figures for the spending by the Welsh Development Agency on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

Mr. David Hunt: I refer the Gentleman to the reply I gave him on Wednesday 1 May 1991.

History

Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he proposes to amend the statutory order for history in the national curriculum in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: Yesterday I published for consultation proposals to amend the Education (National Curriculum) (Attainment Targets and Programmes of Study in History) (Wales) Order 1991.

These, which relate to the programme of study for key stage 3, have been prepared following a review of the structure of unit 27 and its links with unit 18 which I recently asked Professor Rees Davies and the ex-chairman of the History Committee for Wales and other ex-members of the committee to undertake.

My proposals will provide for an even more valuable and attractive introduction to 20th century history for pupils in key stage 3. They will also bring unit 27 closer in its objectives and scope to the other compulsory units in key stage 3.

I am consulting the Curriculum Council for Wales and a wide range of educational interests on the proposals and I have asked for their responses by 10 June. I shall place a copy of my proposals in the Library of the House.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Baby Food Products

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy to bring forward legislation requiring baby food products to bear labels stating their (a) meat content, (b) calorie content and (c) protein content; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: The European Commission has issued a draft directive which lays down compositional and labelling requirements for cereal-based and other processed foods for infants and young children. The proposals set out minimum content levels for meat and certain other characteristic ingredients and require a statement of the available energy and protein content to appear on the label. Negotiations in Brussels are scheduled to commence early in June. The Commission also intends to introduce proposals shortly on quantitative ingredients declaration of foodstuffs.

Sweeteners

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will seek information from Commissioner Bergemann about the nature of the representations he received from the Government of France on 14 April relating to his decision on 15 April to exclude snack foods from the directive on sweeteners.

Mr. Maclean: The next stage of the procedure will involve a detailed examination of all the considerations relevant to the revised proposals that the Commission will be bringing to Council following the first reading in the European Parliament.

Animal Medicine Licence Fees

Mr. Ian Stewart: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to see representatives of the National Office of Animal Health about animal medicine licence fees.

Mr. Maclean: A meeting has been arranged for 21 May.

Nephrops

Mr. Beith: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to establish a pressure stock licensing stock scheme for nephrops, or to ban twin-rig trawling for nephrops; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: These and other ideas for the future management of nephrops were discussed at a Sea Fish Industry Authority seminar on nephrops on 10 April. All parties involved are now reflecting on the views expressed.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the current state of the North sea and Irish sea nephrops stock.

Mr. Curry: The advisory committee on fishery management of the International Council for the Exploration of the Seas has undertaken a thorough review of the various EC nephrops fisheries including those in the North and Irish seas and, in its latest report, recommended that each should be subject to its own specific total allowable catch, bearing in mind the fishing effort involved. We have asked the EC Commission to act on this advice and are now awaiting appropriate proposals.

Sea Level (London)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has carried out of the risk to London from rising sea levels.

Mr. Curry: Sea level rise was one of the factors taken into account in the design of the Thames barrier and associated tidal defences which protect London from flooding. Current best estimates of global sea level rise by the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change fall within the range of possibilities considered in the barrier design. This Department sponsors research to monitor sea level trends and is also closely monitoring scientific evidence emerging from other sources.

Surplus Food Scheme

Mr. Mans: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the invitation to organisations to participate in the 1991 surplus food scheme in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: I announced to the House on 13 February that the surplus food scheme would be continued for a further year. Following that announcement, the press coverage that attended it and the individual invitations issued by my Department, we have been able to designate 774 organisations as potential participants in this year's scheme. There are approximately 3,800 tonnes of butter and 3,000 tonnes of beef available to be distributed to the most needy citizens.

Once again I have designated more organisations than in previous years in order to ensure, as far as possible, the availability of food across the country. But as the quantities are limited, it must be understood that the assistance will, necessarily, be spread even more thinly as a result. The produce will be shared as fairly as possible on the basis of an amount proportional to the number of needy people it will reach. I am giving special priority in allocating this food to organisations providing prepared meals and to those serving the homeless and destitute. In addition, in order to receive an allocation, the smallest organisations may have to co-operate this year to keep the processing and distribution costs to a minimum.

I am placing a list of all the organisations I have designated in the Library of the House and officials will now be writing to all the organisations that applied.

Nutrition

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if the policy concerning recommended amounts of nutrients, as set out in the report by the Committee on Medical Aspects of Food Policy in 1979, paragraphs 13 to 16, remains Her Majesty's Government's policy; and if he will make it his policy to maintain it by ensuring that such recommended amounts are the minimum necessary to ensure that the majority of the population has adequate nutrition;

(2) what consideration has been given by his Department to the use of dietary reference values as a means of providing information to the public about the daily intake of nutrients.

Mr. Dorrell: I have been asked to reply.

Since 1987, the Committee on Medical Aspects of Food Policy to which the Government look for expert advice on diet and nutrition has been engaged in a review of the recommended daily amounts—RDAs—for food energy and nutrients set in 1979. Until its conclusions are published the 1979 RDAs remain current. Its report is currently being finalised, and we hope that it will be ready for publication in May or June. Once the report is published I shall arrange for copies to be placed in the Library.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Benefits

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will list for each of his Department's offices covering the Doncaster area, the average length of time taken to process applications for each of the benefits administered by his Department; and what are the national averages;

(2) what are the latest figures for the Doncaster area for the number of people claiming (a) income support, (b) housing benefit and (c) family credit; and what were the figures for the last 12 months.

Miss Widdecombe: The administration of social security benefits is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member and copies will be placed in the Library and the Public Information Office.

Social Fund

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many social fund loan applications were refused by each of his Department's offices covering the Doncaster area in (a) 1990-91 and (b) the current year to date, due to perceived inability to repay.

Mr. Scott: The administration of the social fund is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member with such information as is available and copies will be placed in the Library and the Public Information Office.

Mr. Caborn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many applications for social fund loans from the York local office were refused on the grounds of inability to pay; and if he will show this figure as a percentage of all applications for loans from the York local office in 1988-89, 1989-90 and 1990-91 to date;

(2) if he will indicate the factors used by the York local office to determine high, medium and low priority groups and priority circumstances for community care grant applications (a) before 6 September 1990, (b) between 6 September and 21 October 1990 and (c) since 22 October 1990, and the reasons why the criteria were changed at these dates.

Mr. Scott: The administration of the social fund is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member and copies will be placed in the Library and the Public Information office.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many housing benefit review boards have sat in each year since 1984; and what was the number of successful appellant reviews during each of these years.

Miss Widdecombe: Data on review boards are not available for years prior to 1988-89. Based on information, which has not been validated, from 362 out of a total of 483 local authorities, the number of housing benefit cases submitted to a review board in 1988-89 was 2,213, of which 481 resulted in revised determinations. For 1989-90, on the basis of 320 returns, the figures were 2,336 and 530 respectively, but determinations in favour of the appellant are not separately recorded.

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he will place in the Library an amendment or an addendum to the housing benefits guidance manual to incorporate the provisions for a period in which persons who it is alleged have received an overpayment of housing benefit may make offers for repayment or appeals in respect of overpayment decisions prior to recovery action, as incorporated in the overpayment recovery guide for his Department.

Miss Widdecombe: Departmental officials are currently working on a number of amendments to the housing benefits guidance manual. Among them will be enhanced guidance on overpayments which will reflect the overpayments recovery guide as regards the action to be taken prior to the commencement of a recovery. The amended guidance will be placed in the Library.

Benefit Eligibility

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many 16 and 17-year-olds were ineligible for benefits despite being unemployed in (1) 1989 and (2) 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: Any unemployed 16 or 17-year-old who is seeking a youth training placement is eligible for income support if severe hardship would otherwise result. Seventy-one per cent. of applications for severe hardship payments were successful in 1990 against 29 per cent unsuccessful. In 1989, the figures were 66 per cent. successful and 34 per cent. unsuccessful. Sixteen or 17-year-olds are not eligible for unemployment benefit because they are unable to satisfy the national insurance contribution conditions.

Footnote: 19,280 applications for severe hardship payments were successful in 1990 against 7,767 unsuccessful. In 1989 there were 11,965 successful and 6,164 unsuccessful applications.

Care Homes

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people were claiming income support or supplementary benefit in respect of (i) residential care and (ii) nursing homes for each year since 1979 at each of the Newcastle upon Tyne benefit offices.

Miss Widdecombe: I understand from Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency, that the information is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Rent and Community Charge Benefits

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the marginal tax benefit withdrawal rate on additional gross income for a person paying standard rate income tax and national insurance and receiving both a rent rebate and community charge benefit as from April 1991; and what is the tax benefit withdrawal rate for each element.

Mr. Jack: The 1988 social security reforms and subsequent tax and national insurance changes eliminated the highest marginal deduction rates and it is now virtually impossible to find oneself worse off as a result of an increase in gross pay.

Someone in work will normally have standard deduction rates of 25 per cent. for income tax and 9 per cent. for national insurance. The marginal deduction rate for such a person paying standard rate income tax, national insurance and receiving both a rent rebate and community charge benefit as from April 1991 is 87 per cent.

The marginal deduction rate on total gross pay for each element is:

	Per cent.
Tax	25
National insurance	9
Housing benefit	43
Community charge benefit	10

Community Care

Mr. Caborn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish a table indicating (a) the number of applications for community care grants received, (b) the number of community care grants paid, and (c) the cash value of community care grants paid by the York local office in each month in 1990 for each of elderly, mentally ill/handicapped, disabled/chronically sick, young persons leaving local authority care, persons who have misused drugs/alcohol, ex-offenders, persons without a settled way of life and families under exceptional pressure.

Mr. Scott: Information is not available in the client groups requested, but details of the total number of community care grants received and paid and the cash value of those paid are in the Library.

DEFENCE

NAAFI

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement in respect of the future of the NAAFI.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: NAAFI fulfils an important support and welfare role for the services. The effects on NAAFI of changes in the structure of our armed forces are being studied.

Armed Forces

Mr. Douglas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give details of the size of the armed forces, broken down by army, navy and air force and by civilian and military personnel in each of the member states of the European Community, United States of America, Sweden, Norway and the USSR.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Details of the size of the United Kingdom armed forces are shown in volume 2 of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1990"—Cm 1022-11. Information on the size of foreign armed forces is contained in "The Military Balance" published by the International Institute for Strategic Studies, copies of which are held by the Library of the House.

RAF Leeming (Noise)

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence in respect of how many houses in the vicinity of Royal Air Force Leeming has statutory injurious affection compensation, or non-statutory equivalent compensation, has been paid on account of serious noise disturbance created by the deployment of Tornado aircraft to that air station.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Ministry of Defence complies administratively with the provision of part I of the Land Compensation Act 1973. The Act confers a right to injurious affection compensation—IAC—for depreciation in the value of dwellings and certain small business properties caused by the physical effects, for example, noise, of the bringing into use of new public works. Considerable works were undertaken at RAF Leeming to enable the deployment of Tornado aircraft to take place. To date, 374 IAC claims have been received and 40 of these have been settled.

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many houses in the vicinity of Royal Air Force Leeming have been acquired with the agreement of their owners on account of serious noise disturbance created by the deployment of Tornado aircraft to that air station; and under what statutory or administrative provisions were such acquisitions carried out and payments made to the home owners concerned.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Ministry of Defence's policy, which is non-statutory, is limited to the areas around military airfields where we offer to purchase homes subject to average noise levels of 83DB(A) and above. This allows an opportunity for those most affected by noise to move away. At RAF Leeming 19 offers were made which resulted in the purchase of 12 homes.

Armed Forces (Pay)

Mr. Douglas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give details of the levels of pay for all ranks of the armed services stationed in the United Kingdom and overseas.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Government agreed to implement in full, from 1 April, the recommendations made by the Armed Forces Pay Review Body. The current rates of military salary for all ranks up to and including brigadier and equivalent are shown in tables 1, 2 and 3 of the 20th report of the review body—Cm 1414, January 1991. Pay levels for senior officers are recommended by the Top Salaries Review Body. Following the Government's decision to stage the implementation of the TSRB award, salary levels for 1991-92 will be as follows:

	From 1 April 1991 £	From 1 December 1991 £
Major General	52,100	53,000
Lieutenant General	59,450	60,000
General	82,800	84,250
Field Marshal	102,950	104,750

Army ranks are shown; the pay rates apply equally to equivalent ranks in the other services.

Mr. Douglas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give details of the levels of pay for civilian armed services personnel stationed in the United Kingdom and overseas.

Mr. Alan Clark: The expression "civilian armed services personnel" is a contradiction in terms.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Quangos

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list the individual appointments excluding casual vacancies he is scheduled to make to quasi-autonomous non-governmental organisations in (a) 1991 and (b) 1992 indicating in each case the title of the post, the salary if any and the duration of the appointment.

Mr. Chris Patten: None.

ENERGY

Renewable Energy Programmes

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will state the sources of separate expenditure on renewable energy programmes in or for Scotland in each year since 1979.

Mr. Moynihan: My Department supports an extensive programme of research, development and demonstration of sources of renewable energy where those sources show the potential for economic viability and are environmentally acceptable. For expenditure on that programme, by individual technology since 1979, I refer the hon. Member to the answer my hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) gave him on 26 April at columns 613-16. In 1990-91 total expenditure was over £20 million. Expenditure is distributed throughout the United Kingdom. There is no specific allocation for Scotland.

Combined Heat and Power

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list the information he has on the number of combined heat and power schemes currently operational in (a) London and (b) each of the other European Community capital cities.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I am not aware of a source for such detailed information. However, as my answer to the hon. Member on 22 February at columns 278-79 points out, the Office of Electricity Regulation is in the process of gathering information on combined heat and power—CHP—utilisation in the United Kingdom. My Department does not hold detailed information on the extent of combined heat and power utilisation in European Community capital cities.

Privatisation

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what were the expenses included in the £12,439,000 gross expenditure on privatisation of the electricity supply industry in 1989-90, apart from the £12·1 million paid to outside organisations.

Mr. Wakeham: The additional expenses are mainly those associated with the establishment of the successor companies to the Central Electricity Generating Board.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will give for each relevant year his Department's total gross expenditure on the privatisation of (a) British Gas and (b) the electricity supply industry.

Mr. Wakeham: The total gross external costs incurred by the Department of Energy in connection with the privatisation of British Gas and the electricity supply industry in England and Wales were as follows:

£ million

	British Gas	Electricity Supply Industry
1985-86	1·4	—
1986-87	196·6	—
1987-88	53·3	0·8
1988-89	22·5	5·5
1989-90	4·0	12·4
1990-91[1]	3·5	303·1

[1] The figure for 1990-91 is the gross provision Voted by Parliament. The final outturn figure will be published in the Appropriation Account for 1990-91 later this year.

Source: Department of Energy Annual Appropriation Accounts 1985-86 to 1989-90 and Supply Estimates 1991-92, Class V Energy.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what were the £4,024,000 residual expenses in 1989-90 from the sale of shares in British Gas.

Mr. Wakeham: The residual expenses in 1989-90 consisted of: £1,707,000 in connection with the gas bill voucher scheme; £2,303,500 in connection with the bonus share issue; and £13,500 in connection with the administration of the British Gas share offer companies.

Natural Gas

Mr. Doran: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is the current level of imports of natural gas into the United Kingdom, what proposals there are to increase this level; and what criteria he will adopt in considering these proposals.

Mr. Moynihan: In 1990, imports of natural gas from Norway accounted for 13·5 per cent. of total supplies. A small amount—less than 0·1 per cent. of total supplies—of liquefied natural gas was imported from Algeria. I am aware of a number of proposals that might increase this level. In considering any import proposals, the Government will weigh carefully the availability of competitive supplies from the United Kingdom continental shelf and the market opportunities open.

ENVIRONMENT

Contracting Out

14. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment to what extent it is the policy of his Department to contract work out to the private sector.

Mr. Heseltine: It has been the Government's policy since 1980 to transfer work from Government Departments to the private sector whenever this is commensurate with sound management and represents good value for money. My Department supports that policy.

Council Housing

15. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many council houses there are; how many council (a) houses and (b) flats have been sold since May 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: English local authorities owned some 2·4 million houses and 1·6 million flats in April 1990. About 1·1 million houses and 120,000 flats have been sold into owner-occupation between April 1979 and December 1990. Sales of flats picked up markedly in 1987 when higher discounts came into operation, and flats now represent a fifth of all sales.

35. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the latest figures for public sector home-building; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: In the first quarter of 1991, 2,000 new dwellings were completed by the public sector, mainly local authorities, in England. Housing associations are becoming the major providers of new subsidised rented housing and their output is forecast to increase by nearly half over the next three years. Full details of housebuilding by sector are published monthly by the Department in an information bulletin.

36. Mr. Watson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any new proposals which would enable local authorities to use accrued capital receipts to build more homes for rent.

Mr. Yeo: Local authorities are required to set aside part of their capital receipts that have accrued from the sale of assets to meet outstanding loan debt and other liabilities. The remainder they may spend in new capital investment. We have no plans to reconsider these underlying principles, although the application in practice is something we keep under review.

Vacant Land

16. Mr. Summerson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made in bringing the vacant public land register up to date.

Mr. Yeo: The measures announced yesterday in response to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) are designed to improve the information available from owners' registers.

Community Charge

17. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which councils have the lowest rate of collection of the community charge.

Mr. Portillo: Collection of charges for 1990-91 continues, but the average collection rate of the 250 authorities for which we have information was already over 90 per cent. at the end of March. Only Islington and Lambeth had collected less than 70 per cent. and even they had achieved two thirds of their budgeted figure.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the estimated cost to the Exchequer of the community charge reduction scheme for 1991-92 announced in November; what was the estimated cost to the Exchequer of the further revised scheme in 1991-92; and what is the estimated cost to the Exchequer of the revised scheme in 1991-92 in the light of the Community Charge (General Reduction) Act 1991.

Mr. Key [holding answer 3 May 1991]: When the community charge reduction scheme was announced in January 1991, the estimated cost of the scheme in 1991-92 was £1·7 billion. Following the £140 general reduction and the changes to the reduction scheme which followed the Budget, it is estimated that the cost of the scheme in 1991-92 will be just over £1·2 billion.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the level of the fund to cover local authorities' additional administrative expenses arising as a consequence of the Community Charge (General Reduction) Act; and what are the criteria by which it will be allocated to authorities.

Mr. Key: We have undertaken to meet all reasonable additional costs incurred as a result of the Community Charge (General Reduction) Act 1991 and the associated changes in the community charge reduction scheme.

26. Mr. Lofthouse: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will take action to abolish the 20 per cent. payment of poll tax in the current year for people on low incomes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: We have not proposed any change for the remaining period of the community charge.

Council Tax

18. Mr. Buckley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if there is to be a special rebate for disabled people who have incurred alterations to their home which falls into band A; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: Necessary alterations to the home of a disabled person will be disregarded in assessing the council tax band into which a property will fall. A disabled person's home which, without the alterations, would fall in band A will thus attract council tax at the lowest rate. Rebates of up to 100 per cent. will be available to help disabled people with low incomes.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has of the number and proportion of properties in London which fall within each band of his proposed council tax.

Mr. Key [holding answer 7 May 1991]: The tables published on 23 April showing illustrative council tax bills included the estimated proportion of properties falling in each band in each local authority area.

Mr. Robert B. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set out (a) the level of rate support grant assumed to be paid to Dacorum borough council for 1991-92 under the community charge and (b) the level of grant assumed in the indicative tables of council tax paid by his Department.

Mr. Key [holding answer 30 April 1991]: With the community charge, the revenue support grant paid to Dacorum supports spending by both the borough and county council. Under our proposal for the council tax, grant will be paid directly to county councils. Any comparison of the level of grant paid to Dacorum would be misleading.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how local values are weighted by the national average of values to assess the council tax payroll in Grimsby and Humberside; what weighting factor he used; and what equation was used for incomes.

Mr. Key [holding answer 30 April 1991]: Local values are not weighted by national average values, nor is an equation for income used, in estimating illustrative council tax bills.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing nationally and for each region the number of dwellings by tenure in each council tax band;

(2) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the council tax at the standard rate as a percentage of the quintile groups by equivalised disposable income for single adult retired, single adult non-retired, single adult with children and two or more adult retired households;

(3) what is his estimate of the gross amount of council tax payable on local authority dwellings in metropolitan districts, London boroughs and non-metropolitan districts and the amount accounted for by rent rebates;

(4) if he will publish a table showing nationally and regionally his estimate of the number of privately rented dwellings in each council tax band, the number in each case benefiting from rate relief, the amount of tax due and the amount relieved;

(5) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each council tax band shown in his illustrative tables the number and assumed average value nationally and regionally of leasehold dwellings together with his estimate of the current average leasehold value;

(6) if he will publish a table showing for each council tax band shown in his illustrative tables the number and assumed average value nationally and regionally of (a) council and (b) other dwellings together with the assumed gross and net yields from the council tax in each case.

Mr. Key: The information requested is not available.

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the number of domestic residences in each of the property value bands of the proposed council tax in England.

Mr. Key: The notes covering the tables of illustrative council tax bills published on 23 April show the number of homes in England, 18·9 million, and in table 1 the percentage of properties falling in each of the seven proposed bands.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what proportion of households in England and in each standard region are in leasehold dwellings; and how leasehold dwellings will be valued for the council tax;

(2) if he will publish a table showing for Great Grimsby the number of leasehold dwellings, council dwellings and other rented dwellings in each council tax band and the basis on which they are to be valued.

Mr. Key: The information requested for Great Grimsby is not available. The Government are presently consulting on the method of allocating properties to different council tax bands.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing for Great Grimsby his estimate of the number and percentage of householders who actually paid rates in 1979 and 1988 together with the number expected to pay the council tax.

Mr. Key: The number of domestic hereditaments liable for rates in Great Grimsby on 1 April 1979 and 1 April 1988 was 33,100 and 35,300 respectively. No information is available about the numbers or percentages of householders in Great Grimsby who actually paid rates, or about numbers expected to pay the council tax after taking account of rebates.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing his estimate of the percentage uplift on current market housing values implied in the council tax and similar tables for Great Grimsby, Mole Valley, Barrow in Furness, Westminster and Wandsworth; and if he will provide corresponding figures for each band.

Mr. Key: No uplift on current market housing values is implied in the council tax.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing for (a) Great Grimsby, (b) Westminster, (c) Wandsworth and (d) Mole Valley, his estimate of the percentage of dwellings in each of the seven bands of the council tax.

Mr. Key: The estimated percentage of homes in each band in each local authority area was shown in the table published on 23 April.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing for Great Grimsby his estimate of the average and quintile market values in 1989 of local authority dwellings, other dwelling and all dwellings; and if he will provide corresponding figures for valuations under the proposed council tax.

Mr. Key: The information requested is not available.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what would be the percentage rate of council tax on the value of properties from £10,000 to £500,000 in £10,000 steps on the basis of a standard rate of 4 per cent. on a property worth £73,000.

Mr. Key: If council tax were at a standard rate of 4 per cent, the percentage rate for all properties would be 4 per cent.

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many residents in the city of Gloucester will benefit from reduced payments under his council tax proposals.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will publish tables listing (a) local authorities in order of percentage spending over standard spending assessment and (b) local authorities paying the highest illustrative bills; and if he will make a statement on the correlation between placings in the two tables and his assessment of the statistical relationship between the two factors;

(2) if he will publish a table showing for Great Grimsby his estimate of the number of properties with a current market value of (i) less than £20,000, £20,000 to £30,000 and £30,000 to £40,000, (ii) £68,000 to £88,000 and (iii) over £160,000 together with his estimate of the numbers which will fall into each council tax band under his proposals;

(3) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing nationally and for each standard region the estimated annual yield per council tax payer per band and the estimated annual yield from applying the same rate of tax in the standard band to all properties at current market values;

(4) what proportion nationally and regionally of the council tax is payable by tax payers in the second lowest and the second highest bands; and what is the corresponding proportion of the market values of the dwellings to the total in each case;

(5) if he will publish a table showing for Great Grimsby the numbers in each band qualifying for a 25 per cent. discount and the resultant increase in the amount of council tax payable by the other householders;

(6) if he will publish a table showing the estimated total yield and the yield per band tax payer from the proposed council tax in each band at (i) the proposed percentage difference from the £68,000 to £88,000 standard, (ii) a percentage representing the difference between £73,000 and the mid-point of the five restricted bands and the minimum and maximum of, respectively, the bottom and top bands; and if he will add corresponding figures for each standard region;

(7) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for (a) Great Grimsby, (b) Barrow in Furness, (c) Westminster, (d) Wandsworth and (e) Mole Valley, the amount of local authority expenditure per household and per adult and the corresponding amounts of poll tax and council tax, respectively;

(8) if he will publish a table showing the median, average, upper and lower quartiles, and upper and lower deciles of the value of dwellings nationally and in each region, the average market value of dwellings within each tenth, the council tax in each of such tenths for standard spending for two or more adults, and the amount of council tax which would be payable in each case if the standard tax payable was calculated on the difference between the average value and the national median;

(9) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing nationally and for each region the number of dwellings and average current market value in each of his seven council tax bands, their aggregate value in each case and the percentage of the value of all dwellings, the difference in each case between the average value per dwelling and the value for council tax purposes, and the difference between the average amount of tax payable under the proposed council tax and the amount which would be payable if the percentage in each case were adjusted to take account of the percentage difference between the average value and £73,000.

(10) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each region, each metropolitan and other county, and the City of London the budget relative to standard spending assessment, the average band D council tax for two people, the proportion of homes in each band and their average value, and the corresponding average earnings of adult males in the year to April 1990;

(11) if he will publish in the Official Report for each of the council districts in which the average value home is in bands A and G, the average value of homes and the council budgets relative to standard spending assessment, the standard amount of band D council tax, the proportion of homes in each tax band, and the overall gross and net yield from the tax as a percentage of the value of the homes;

(12) if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for, respectively, the aggregate of the counties above and below the county with the median average earnings of full-time adult male workers, the yield per adult for the council tax at (i) the standard rate and (ii) the actual rate together with the respective average earnings per head for full-time adult male workers and the average value of dwellings per household;

(13) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for Barrow in Furness, Great Grimsby, Westminster, Wandsworth and Elmbridge the amount of council tax payable on the median value in each band as a percentage of that value;

(14) if he will publish a table showing the amount of council tax payable on the median value in each band as a percentage of that value and the corresponding figures for each region;

(15) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each region, each metropolitan and other county, and the City of London, the estimated gross yield from the proposed council tax as a percentage of the capital value of the dwellings in each band and overall;

(16) if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for Elmbridge and Great Grimsby (i) the council budget relative to the standard spending assessment, (ii) the amount of tax for two or more adults in properties in bands A and D together with the percentage of homes in each band and (iii) the average value of homes in bands A and G; and if he will set out the reasons for the difference.

(17) further to paragraph 6 of his illustrative tables for the new council tax, whether he will publish in the Official Report for each of the council districts in which the average value home is in bands A or G gross and net expenditure per household, the gross and net central Government contribution per household, the composition of households in family expenditure terms, the allowance per household made for different categories of public expenditure including in particular housing, education and social security, together with any categories of expenditure where there are market differences in expenditure in A and G areas or uncertainty in forecasting.

Mr. Robert B. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what impact there would be on the assumed levels of council tax in Dacorum borough for each band in the published indicative tables if the property valuations concerned were all 10 per cent. higher, assuming there to be no charges elsewhere in England.

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing the average illustrative council tax bill for a house occupied by two or more adults and by a single adult, respectively, in each local authority area in England on the same basis as the illustrative figures which have been published by the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Mr. Key: I refer my hon. Friends and the hon. Members to the answer I gave on 29 April 1991 to my hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter), Official Report, Volume 190, column 12.

21. Mrs. Maureen Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received on the proposed council tax.

28. Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what response he has had so far to his consultative paper on local government taxation.

Mr. Portillo: The Government's council tax proposal has been widely welcomed by hon. Members and by those involved in local government. I look forward to receiving detailed responses to the consultation exercise now under way.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) further to his answer of 29 April, Official Report, column 13, if he will define a standard level of services and the level of provision that would sustain a local area covered by the definition; if he will explain how this can be held constant over different types of area; and if he will assess the consequences of variations on the relevance of the standard spending assessment calculations on the council tax;

(2) what is the relationship between the levels of council tax set for a district and the standard spending assessments for that district.

Mr. Key: The nature of standard spending assessments is set out in section 2.2 of "The Revenue Support Grant Distribution Report (England)", approved by the House of Commons on 18 January 1990. Standard spending assessments are calculated from data which are specific to each local authority and hence reflect differences between areas. Under the proposed council tax, if all authorities were to spend at the level of their standard assessment, the bills for each of the seven bands of property values would be the same in each area.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how and when the standard spending assessment is adjusted to take account of changes in the level of unemployment; and what is his estimate of the additional costs falling on Grimsby borough council in each category of spending covered by the standard spending assessment for each percentage point rise in unemployment in the Grimsby area.

Mr. Key: The level of unemployment is not a factor used in the calculation of standard spending assessments. There is no evidence that spending on the services provided by local authorities should rise in proportion to increases in the rate of unemployment. Local spending decisions are, in any case, a matter for Grimsby borough council in the light of its knowledge of local circumstances.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report for (a) Grimsby and (b) Cleethorpes, (i) the percentage by which spending is above the standard spending assessment and (ii) the proposed council tax for each band; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: Tables showing illustrative council tax bills in each local authority area were published on 23 April. The tables included the assumed percentage spending relative to the standard spending assessment.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, further to his answers of 29 April, Official Report, column 13, if he will ensure that an increase in spending over the standard spending assessment does not fall disproportionately heavily on the council tax levied by poorer boroughs.

Mr. Key: Under our proposals for the council tax, spending above the standard spending assessment in every local authority will be met pound for pound by local domestic tax payers.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing for (a) Great Grimsby, (b) Barrow in Furness, (c) Westminster, (d) Wandsworth and (e) Mole Valley, the proportion of council expenditure financed out of revenue from rates in 1979-80 and 1989-90, the estimated proportion financed out of the poll tax in 1990-91 and his forecast under the council tax.

Mr. Key: It is not possible to produce comparable figures on an individual authority basis for the years requested.

Opencast Mining

19. Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many opencast development proposals have been refused by his Department since 1979.

Mr. Yeo: Information is available only from 1987-88 for opencast coal cases. Since then a total of 25 opencast coal appeals have been dismissed and 30 allowed. The equivalent figures for other minerals are 108 appeals dismissed and 66 allowed; and for non-minerals cases, 58,140 dismissed and 31,464 allowed.

River Test

20. Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received on water quality of the River Test.

Mr. Trippier: None. The condition of the River Test is a matter for which the National Rivers Authority is primarily responsible. The Wallop brook, a tributary of the Test, is among a number of rivers for which the NRA has today announced proposals for tackling the problem of low flows.

Housing Action Trusts

24. Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the latest figures for 1989-90 and 1990-91 for expenditure on housing action trusts; and what were the sums budgeted for this purpose.

Sir George Young: Details of planned expenditure were given in the public expenditure White Papers. There was no expenditure on housing action trusts in 1989-90 or 1990-91, but tenants in North Hull have now voted by more than two to one for a trust.

Low-cost Housing

25. Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement on progress in providing low-cost housing in shire districts.

Mr. Yeo: I refer the hon. Member to the answers given today to the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) about the supply of rented housing and to the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) about low-cost housing in rural areas.

Drinking Water

27. Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made in bringing United Kingdom drinking water up to the standards of the 1980 EC directive.

Mr. Trippier: For the small number of standards which are not met at present, I am advised by the drinking water inspectorate that water companies are on schedule to remedy the position as quickly as possible, taking practicalities into account.

Homelessness

30. Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many people were registered as homeless during 1990-91.

Sir George Young: Statistics for the first quarter of 1991 are not yet available. In 1990 accommodation was found for 145,800 households accepted as homeless by English local authorities.

Atmospheric Pollution

31. Mr. Bidwell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met the European Environment Commissioner to discuss atmospheric pollution.

Mr. Trippier: At the Council of Environment Ministers meeting in March, when the Council reached a common position on the draft directive on emissions from large diesel vehicles.

Rented Properties

32. Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many additional dwellings for rent he estimates will be provided during 1991-92 by private landlords.

Sir George Young: It is impossible to give an exact figure. We are, however, confident that the measures that we have introduced to encourage the private rented sector are having the desired effect and there is significant anecdotal evidence of increased activity in the market. In particular, business expansion scheme companies have so far raised over £700 million, sufficient to provide about 12,000 additional homes to rent.

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps are being taken to deal with the shortage of rented accommodation at affordable rents.

Sir George Young: We have substantially increased the public resources available through the Housing Corporation for the development of new subsidised housing by housing associations from £1·1 billion last year to over £2 billion by 1993-94. Together with their increased ability to draw in private investment, this will permit an increase in output by associations from 27,000 last year to around 40,000 by 1993-94. Deregulation of the private rented sector is also making more properties available to rent. Housing benefit is available up to reasonable market rents for people who cannot afford their full housing costs.

South Yorkshire Rapid Light Transit

33. Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether any additional funding will be made available to the district council of Barnsley to offset expenditure on the South Yorkshire rapid light transit railway.

Mr. Portillo: I recently met a delegation from the four South Yorkshire district authorities and the passenger transport authority to hear their concerns in relation to the financing costs of the supertram. Following a constructive discussion officials are now discussing possible options with the authorities.

Housing Co-operatives

34. Mr. Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has received any representations on the Housing Corporation's new proposals for the registration of housing co-operatives.

Mr. Yeo: It is not clear to which document the hon. Member is referring. If it is the Housing Corporation's draft strategy on housing co-operatives, my right hon. Friend has received two representations. If it is the corporation's new registration criteria for all housing associations, my right hon. Friend has received one representation.

Local Authorities (Spending Controls)

37. Mr. Roger King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will release all spending controls on local authority expenditure.

Mr. Key: The Government have a duty to protect local taxpayers from unacceptably high bills, as well as to control the level of public expenditure. It is therefore essential to maintain both next year and in our new system effective arrangements to ensure proper restraint in local spending and taxation.

Isle of Wight

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the future structure of local government on the Isle of Wight.

Mr. Heseltine: I refer my hon. Friend to my statement to the House on 23 April, Official Report, column 901, in which I set out the Government's proposals for the structure of local government in England. We believe that the structure of two tiers outside London and the metropolitan county areas needs to be reviewed. We therefore propose to establish a new, independent local government commission to draw up recommendations for improving the structure of local government area by area, taking account of local views and the costs and benefits of the change. This commission would consult on its recommendations and submit them to me. Final decisions would rest with Parliament.

Urban Programme

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he proposes to make any changes in the inner area programme and urban regeneration funding; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: In February we issued annual programme guidance for the urban programme for 1992-93 which encourages greater targeting of resources on smaller areas; continued emphasis on economic projects; packaging of resources with other public and private sector funds; and partnerships with other key participants in inner city regeneration. The quality of programmes brought forward by authorities will be taken into account in distributing the final allocation of resources.

London Docklands

Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide for each year since 1981 the total expenditure by the London Docklands development corporation on (a) the provision of new units of social housing and (b) housing improvement or refurbishment.

Mr. Key: The information requested is provided in the following tables:

(a) New social housing units

Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many new jobs, not including transferred jobs, have been created as a result of the London docklands urban development area since 1981;

(2) how many jobs attracted to the London docklands UDA since 1981 have been transferred from areas outside that UDA;

(3) what was the number of people unemployed in the London docklands UDA for 1981 and 1991;

(4) how many jobs have been attracted to the London docklands urban development area in total; and if he will break down these jobs to the board categories of the standard industrial classification;

(5) how many people were employed in the London docklands UDA in 1981 and 1991;

(6) how many jobs have been lost in the London docklands UDA since 1981; and if he will break down these jobs to the broad categories of the standard industrial classification;

(7) what is his estimate of the percentage of the jobs attracted to the London docklands UDA that have been secured by residents of (a) London docklands UDA and (b) the London boroughs of Southwark, Tower Hamlets and Newham.

Mr. Key: LDDC's 1990 employment survey showed 48,102 people in permanent employment, together with a further 4,982 employed on temporary construction. Of the total at least 41,421 jobs, or 78 per cent., had come into the LDDC area since 1981.

Jobs by Standard Industrial Classifications were as follows:

SIC	Employees
0 Agriculture, Fishing etc	54
1 Energy and Water Supply	323
2 Minerals, chemicals etc	237
3 Metal goods, vehicle industries	798
4 Other manufacturing	7,968
5 Construction	5,805
6 Distribution, hotels, catering	6,076
7 Transport and communication	2,959
8 Banking, finance, business services	9,824
9 Other services	4,594
Not known	2,783
Total	41,421

Of these, an estimated 16,862 were in newly created businesses and 24,559 in companies that relocated from elsewhere. There are no comprehensive figures for the place of residence of those employed in the LDDC area, nor for the classification of jobs lost since 1981. The figures suggest that by 1990 some 15,000 jobs had been lost or moved away.

An estimated 3,553 people were unemployed in 1981, compared to 3,744 in March 1991, while over the same period the population increased by about 60 per cent.

By March the number of permanent jobs had increased to 53,000, together with jobs in construction. The total is more than double the figure for 1981, 27,213, and demonstrates the scale of economic and physical regeneration already achieved by the corporation.

Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will provide details for each financial year since 1981 of expenditure by the London Docklands development corporation on (a) public transport infrastructure and (b) road infrastructure;

(2) what was the total expenditure of the London Docklands development corporation in the years 1981-91 on (a) staff salaries and related expenditure, (b) administration costs, (c) estates maintenance, (d) environmental improvements, (e) land acquisition, (f) land reclamation, (g) utilities, (h) roads, (i) industry support, (j) community support, (k) housing, (l) the docklands light railway and (m) promotions and publicity;

(3) if he will supply for each financial year since 1981 figures for the income received by the London Docklands development corporation from the sale of land and property;

(4) what was the total expenditure by the London Docklands development corporation in each financial year since 1981;

(5) if he will calculate the total amount of public expenditure allocated to the London Docklands development corporation urban development area since 1981 including (a) grant in aid to the London Docklands development corporation, (b) expenditure by virtue of the Isle of Dogs enterprise zone, (c) public expenditure on road and transport infrastructure schemes by central Government Departments and (d) all other expenditure by central Government Departments, broken down by category.

Mr. Key: The information available is provided in the table. Expenditure for the Isle of Dogs enterprise zone was £19·70 million up to 31 March 1990 in respect of rate revenue forgone.

Information on capital cost allowances for individual enterprise zones and on public expenditure by central Government Departments is not available.

Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many people who have received training from new training schemes set up by the London Docklands development corporation have secured employment in new businesses in the London Docklands UDA.

Mr. Key: No comparative figures are available. LDDC and the training providers it supports are improving their reporting systems, but it is difficult to monitor in detail the eventual consequences of training for every individual trainee.

Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide for each parcel of land currently in the ownership of the London Docklands development corporation details of (a) the date of acquisition, (b) from whom it was acquired, (c) the method of acquisition and (d) the price paid per acre.

Mr. Key: No. These are commercially confidential.

Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many units of residential accommodation have been completed in the London Docklands UDA since 1981; and, of these, how many have been built on land owned by the London Docklands development corporation.

Mr. Key: At March 1991, 15,220 new units had been completed, of which 8,367 were on land owned by LDDC.

Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will list for each financial year since 1981 the total amount of land in the ownership of the London Docklands development corporation at the end of each year;

(2) if he will supply figures for each financial year since 1981 for the amount of land that has been sold by the London Docklands development corporation.

Mr. Key: This information is given in the table.

[2] Includes water and land earmarked for environmental and roads use.

Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will supply details of the current use of each parcel of land in the ownership of the London Docklands development corporation.

Mr. Key: The details requested are as follows:

	Acres
Water	401
Public assets and environmental work	483
Available for disposal	564
TOTAL LAND HOLDING	1,448

Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those public transport infrastructure schemes funded to date by the London Docklands development corporation, giving the amount of London Docklands development corporation expenditure involved.

Mr. Key: The following list outlines the public infrastructure expenditure to 31 March 1991.

	£ million
Initial Docklands light railway construction	40·0
Docklands light railway Beckton extension	122·7

Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide the latest figures for the total number of private residential properties that have been built in the London docklands UDA that remain unsold or unoccupied.

Mr. Key: As at June 1990 1,422 units of all tenures were unsold or unoccupied, out of a total stock of approximately 14,000 new build units. No tenure breakdown is available.

Taxpayers (Great Grimsby)

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing for Great Grimsby his estimate of the number of taxpayers, the gross amount payable and the ratio of the standard tax to average incomes of householders in each of the proposed council tax bands.

Mr. Key: The information requested is not available.

Mobile Homes

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing for Great Grimsby his estimate of the number of mobile homes, the basis on which they are to be valued, and the responsibility for payment in the case of mobile homes sited in a commercial caravan park.

Mr. Key: Information on the number of mobile homes in Great Grimsby is not available.

Under the present local grant finance system mobile homes which are someone's sole or main residence are domestic property and their occupants are liable to the community charge.

Right to Buy

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing the number of right-to-buy sales completed in each local authority in England since the Housing Act 1980 come into force.

Sir George Young: A table showing the reported number of right-to-buy sales for each English local authority between October 1980 and December 1991 was placed in the Library on 18 April 1991, Official Report, Volume 189, column 227.

Housing Investment Programme

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing, for each local authority in England, the (a) 1990-91 housing investment programme bid and (b) 1990-91 housing investment programme allocation of capital spending.

Sir George Young: A table listing housing investment programme allocations for 1990-91 for each housing authority in England was placed in the Library on 21 December 1989. A table showing proposals for gross capital expenditure on housing investment in 1990-91, submitted by authorities to the Department, has now been placed in the Library.

Authorities' own proposals for housing capital expenditure are not directly comparable with each other, nor with the HIP allocation figure because the proposals may not have been prepared on a consistent basis as regards overall strategy for meeting needs, for the financing of works, or their costing or phasing. Moreover, the allocations do not represent a borrowing approval, which is conferred through each authority's all-service basic credit approval, and as such they take no account of the receipts available to individual authorities or the amount of those receipts they may choose to spend on housing.

Ancient Murrelet

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if his Department will assist efforts to protect the ancient murrelet sea bird that has returned to Lundy island.

Mr. Trippier: As a natural visitor to Britain, the ancient murrelet is fully protected under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981. It is further protected from molestation and disturbance by bye-laws applying to the Lundy marine nature reserve.

Free-running Snares

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans the Government have to ensure that the terms of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 regulating free-running snares are adhered to.

Mr. Trippier: Strict penalties of fines of up to £2,000 for each offence are already available to the courts to assist in enforcing the provisions regulating snares under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981. There will be provision in the Criminal Justice Bill to increase the level of fine to £5,000. Police forces are well aware of the legislation controlling wildlife and in many cases have appointed officers who take a special interest in this area.

Floodlighting

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) whether he will list (a) public buildings and (b) parks and squares in London which are floodlit at night at Her Majesty's Government's expense;

(2) what is the cost to Her Majesty's Government each year of flood-lighting in (a) public buildings and (b) parks and squares in London.

Sir George Young: This information is not held centrally.

Uniform Business Rate

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will state for the financial year 1990-91 how much is still outstanding for collection in the Doncaster metropolitan borough council area in respect of the uniform business rate; and what percentage this represents of the total uniform business rate for the Doncaster metropolitan borough council area.

Mr. Key: By 31 March 1991 Doncaster metropolitan borough council had collected £36·6 million in non-domestic rates, equivalent to 92 per cent. of its provisional contribution to the non-domestic rates pool. My Department does not yet have information about the amount of non-domestic rates collectable by the authority and therefore about the amount of rates outstanding.

Severe Weather

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assistance the Government gave to Doncaster metropolitan borough council to meet additional expenditure incurred following the bad weather during this last winter.

Mr. Key: None. The council has not requested any assistance and we have no information to suggest that it incurred costs greater than those which it could be expected to meet as part of its normal responsibilities for coping with winter weather.

Housing Grants

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what provision is being made by his Department for housing grants payable by the Housing Corporation in the financial year 1991-92; and what are the rates of grant.

Mr. Yeo: Provision for housing grants payable by the Housing Corporation is made in supply estimates, class VIII, vote 1, section A. For 1991-92, net provision is £2,320,715,000.

The rates of grant payable on capital projects will be published very shortly by Housing Corporation circular, and I will arrange for copies to be placed in the Library.

Manpower Watch

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what objectives were set for the manpower watch for local government in 1979; what has been the actual and percentage fall in local government manpower since 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: The joint staffing watch, formerly joint manpower watch, was set up in 1975 as part of the 1974-75 rate support grant settlement. In describing the purpose of the new system, DOE circular 30/75 stated:

"The new arrangements . . . are intended to reinforce the severe restriction on the rate of growth in current expenditure by establishing the means of identifying at regular intervals fluctuations in the total numbers employed by local authorities. The aim is to establish machinery through which all parties to the Rate Support Grant settlement can jointly satisfy themselves that any increases in employment are consistent with national policies and priorities."

Staff costs form a large proportion of local authority expenditure and the Government still consider it necessary to maintain a close watch on local authority staffing levels.

The fall in local government staffing from December 1979 to December 1990 has been 71,350 full-time equivalents, that is, 3·6 per cent.

Environmental Protection Act

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to implement part II of the Environmental Protection Act.

Mr. Trippier: I hope to make an announcement shortly.

Unemployment

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the direct and indirect effect on local authority expenditure on services of each increase of 100,000 in unemployment; and what proportion of the increase in expenditure is borne by central Government.

Mr. Key: There is no evidence of a direct link between levels of unemployment and local authority expenditure. It is for each authority to decide its spending priorities across the range of its services according to the circumstances of its area. Central Government support, which this year amounts to about 85 per cent. of total standard spending, should enable all authorities to provide a standard level of service, taking into account their individual circumstances.

Advertising

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give separate figures for the spending by the Nature Conservancy Council on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

Mr. Trippier: There was no expenditure by the Nature Conservancy Council on items (a) to (c) during the period 1979-80 to 1990-91, nor does the Nature Conservancy Council for England plan any in 1991-92. Expenditure by the two bodies on (d) for the period 1989-90 to 1991-92 is in the table. Figures for previous years could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

1989-90	20,896
1990-91	4,972
1991-92	[1]7,500

[1] Planned by Nature Conservancy Council for England.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give separate figures for the spending by the Ordnance Survey on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

Mr. Baldry: Information on advertising expenditure prior to 1985-86 cannot be provided except at disproportionate cost. Records since 1985-86 are not held in the detail requested. Information on full advertising expenditure is as follows:

	£(000)
1985-86	350·0
1986-87	402·5
1987-88	389·1
1988-89	313·1
1989-90	321·0
1990-91	345·0

The advertising budget for 1991-92 is £348,900.

Both television and radio advertising campaigns were used early in the period when approximately 50 per cent.

of the total expenditure was allocated to them. In recent years the full expenditure has been for advertising in the trade press and national and local newspapers. Expenditure on other promotional material is included in the figures given in my reply on 3 May 1991.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give separate figures for the spending by the Countryside Commission on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

Mr. Trippier: These figures cannot be supplied without disproportionate cost.

Countryside Commission

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has for the privatisation of any activities of the Countryside Commission.

Mr. Trippier: My right hon. Friend has no plans to make any such proposals.

Enterprise Zones

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what figure was added to the revenue support grant in respect of the exemption from rates of properties in enterprise zones for 1990-91 and 1991-92; and how the figure was calculated.

Mr. Key: No addition, as such, was required. The exemption of properties in enterprise zones results in a lower national total of non-domestic rate income, but the value of exemptions is not separately identified. For any total of external support distributed to local authorities in a year, any reduction in the size of the distributable amount of non-domestic rates is automatically offset by an increase in revenue support grant which is then distributed to authorities in accordance with their standard spending assessments.

Travel Patterns

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what progress has been made in the study promised in "This Common Inheritance" of the relationship between development and travel patterns and ways of locating development to reduce travel distances and to increase transport choice;

(2) when he will issue the planning guidance proposed in paragraph 6.35 of "This Common Inheritance".

Sir George Young: The Departments of Transport and the Environment have jointly commissioned this research. The contract was let to ECOTEC Research and Consulting Ltd. with Transportation Planning Associates in mid-Febuary and will be completed by the end of May 1992. The project is still at an early stage.

The environment White Paper proposes that the research should lead to planning policy guidance. The Departments would normally expect to publish the results of the research, usually within six months of receiving the final report. Depending on the findings and conclusions of the research, my Department would hope to have draft planning policy guidance for consultation by late 1992.

Green House Demonstration Programme

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the progress of the green house demonstration programme.

Mr. Yeo: The response of local authorities to the green house programme for energy efficiency in local authority housing has been very encouraging. In the first round 165 authorities submitted more than 350 bids. As announced on April 10, over 70 schemes, including a "flagship" of particular interest in each region, will be supported in 1991-92.

Applications for support under the programme for 1992-93 will be invited shortly.

Wath Recycling

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the particular noxious materials which continue to be held by Wath Recycling at Wath upon Dearne, Rotherham.

Mr. Baldry: Wath Recycling handles a range of materials in daily operations under the terms of its licence and subject to monitoring and inspection by the regulatory authorities. The particular waste from the USA now stored on the site contains a range of benzene compounds, such as xylenes.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the fire which took place at the Wath Recycling works on 29 April; what assessment he has made of the potential dangers as a result of that incident; and what was the actual distance of the fire from the nearest of those containers which hold the toxic waste of which he is aware.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 7 May 1991]: The fire at the Wath Recycling works, Rotherham, on 29 April 1991 was associated with a furnace in which a vegetable fat was being burnt off from a mixture of the fat and a solid nickel-containing catalyst.

The process is subject to control by HMIP for emissions to atmosphere and is a registered incineration works.

Molten and burning fat escaped from the furnace. The fire was totally contained in the building and in the immediate vicinity of the furnace.

Apart from the normal hazards associated with fire at the time of the incident no further potential dangers are anticipated.

The distance from the building to the stored drummed waste, which had been imported from the USA in 1989, is approximately 18 yd. At no time was there a danger of those drums being involved in the incident.

Mortgage Repossessions

Mr. Cabom: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many mortgage repossessions there have been in (a) the city of York and (b) the county of North Yorkshire during each of the last 12 months for which records are available; and what were the annual figures for each of the last 12 months.

Mr. Yeo: Comprehensive information on mortgage repossessions in the city of York and the county of North Yorkshire, including properties surrendered without a court order, is not available.

The available figures for possession orders made by the courts covering York and the county of North Yorkshire, not all of which are executed, are as follows:

Mortgage possession orders

	York	County of North Yorkshire
1987	269	475
1988	238	393
1989	193	401
1990	314	623

Global Warming

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate how many centimetres the sea level of the channel would rise given (a) a 1·5 deg. C rise in global average surface temperature and (b) a 4·5 deg. C rise in global average surface temperature.

Mr. Trippier: Estimates of sea level rise due to global warming depend on how rapidly the warming takes place. In the scientific assessment report of the Inter-Governmental Panel on Climate Change, the "business-as-usual" scenario gives temperatures of 1·5 and 4·5 deg. C above present at some time between 2090 and 2100 for the high and low sensitivity cases respectively. Corresponding average sea level rises are about 30 and 100 cm. At the channel coast vertical land movements would add about 30 cm to the relative sea level rise over the next century.

Environmental and Energy Efficiency

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to issue a planning policy guidance to local authorities note regarding environmental and energy efficiency factors.

Mr. Yeo: Existing planning policy guidance notes already give advice on a range of environmental issues; and we intend to expand the PPG series to include guidance on planning and pollution and on renewable energy sources. My right hon. Friend will consider the need for guidance on energy efficiency in determining, with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy, the Government's response to recommendation 21 in the third report from the Energy Select Committee.

Walkers

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about improved access to countryside for walkers.

Mr. Trippier: The best way of improving access to the countryside is through the existing, extensive rights of way network. This is why we endorsed in the environment White Paper the Countryside Commission's target of ensuring that the whole network is readily available for use by the year 2000.

Water Quality

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will issue guidance to local authorities on the planning considerations associated with the water companies' investment to improve the quality of bathing and drinking waters and to construct new water treatment works; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friends the Secretary of State and the Secretary of State for Wales have today issued for public consultation a draft circular about the planning implications for local authorities, of substantial investment by the water industry to improve the quality of bathing and drinking waters. Comments have been invited from the local authority associations, the water companies and other representative bodies.

The draft circular stresses the urgency of improving the quality of bathing and drinking waters, and emphasises local planning authorities' responsibility to work with the water industry to find suitable sites for sewage treatment works and to handle planning applications without delay.

Property Tax

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration he has given to a nine-band property tax as a means of financing local government.

Mr. Portillo [holding answer 2 May 1991]: The Government considered many possibilities before proposing that the council tax should be based on the seven bands of property value announced on 23 April.

National Environment Week

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the events connected with National Environment Week in which he will be participating.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 7 May 1991]: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was invited to launch National Environment Week on Wednesday 8 May, but was unable to do so: he has asked me to carry out the launch on his behalf. I shall be participating in an event associated with Mid Bedfordshire district council's contribution to National Environment Week on 21 May.

Archaeological Remains

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to require planning authorities in England to inform solicitors making their local searches if there are archaeological remains present on the land.

Sir George Young [holding answer 7 May 1991]: No. Any archaeological remains which are scheduled as ancient monuments under the provisions of the Ancient Monuments and Archaeological Areas Act 1979 are registered as a local land charge and can be identified in local searches.

Details of non-scheduled sites of known archaeological interest are registered on the sites and monuments record held by county councils—English Heritage for London—and can be consulted by anyone.

Guidance has been issued to all planning authorities—DOE Planning Policy Guidance 16: Archaeology and Planning—which emphasises the availability of the sites and monuments record and encourages both developers and planning authorities to consult it when considering potential development.

Poll Tax Capping

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to reply to an appeal against proposed poll tax capping by Warwickshire county council; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Key [holding answer 3 May 1991]: We intend to lay a draft order setting out the final cap for Warwickshire and the other authorities which have challenged their proposed caps before the House as soon as possible. I refer the hon. Member to the answer given on 3 May by my hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities to my hon. Friend the Member for Hyndburn (Mr. Hargreaves), Official Report, column 336.

Aggregates

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the long-term forecast of demand for aggregates.

Mr. Yeo [pursuant to his reply, 7 May Official Report, column 401]: In announcing the publication of the long-term forecasts of demand for aggregates I should like to make it clear that the figures of 421 million tonnes per annum and 490 million tonnes per annum referred to in the second paragraph relate to the forecast in 2011 and not 2001 as stated.

SCOTLAND

Community Charge

Mr. Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what will be the maximum payment of community charge, including community water charge, payable by pensioners on the basic retirement pension in 1991-92 for each local authority area in Scotland and the average bill across Scotland; and if he will express each sum payable as a percentage of the total community charge in the area.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Single pensioners and some pensioner couples in receipt only of the basic state retirement pension—currently £52 per week plus £31·25 per week for a dependent partner—with no other source of income—for example, other state benefits—and savings of £3,000 or less, are entitled to the maximum community charge benefit of 80 per cent. of the personal community charge for the area. Some pensioner couples aged from 60 to 74 who are in receipt of only the basic state retirement pension for a couple, with no other income and savings of £3,000 or less, are entitled to benefit levels of 39p per year less than the maximum benefit. No benefit is awarded in respect of the personal community water charge or the standard community charge. The amount payable by a pensioner on maximum benefit by local authority area is shown in the table.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what is the cost to date of the printing and issuing of poll tax collection books; and what was the cost of re-issuing new poll tax collection notices and books following the Budget changes in poll tax levels;

(2) what is his estimate of the total cost to date of the publication and distribution of poll tax registration forms;

(3) what is his estimate of the total cost of printing and distributing (i) poll tax reminder forms and (ii) sheriff officer warrants;

(4) what is his estimate of the cost of computer equipment for the administration of poll tax registers for each of the regions of Scotland;

(5) what is his estimate of the staffing costs of poll tax registration officers.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Based on local authorities' own budget estimates, the cost of community charge registration in 1991-92 will be £18·6 million and the cost of collecting the charge will be £43 million. No further breakdown of these figures is held centrally.

The Scottish Office Environment Department plans to discuss with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities the additional administrative costs which local authorities will face in issuing revised 1991-92 bills following the passage of the Community Charges (General Reductions) Act 1991.

Council Tax

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how claims for personal discounts in respect of the council tax are to be checked by local authorities.

Mr. Lang: This is a matter for consultation.

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if estate agents will be used by the valuation office of the Inland Revenue to assign properties to bands during the initial banding process for the council tax;

(2) what role the regional assessors will play in the initial banding of properties for the new council tax;

(3) if he will list the private sector professionals to be used by the valuation office of the Inland Revenue in the initial banding of properties for the council tax, as referred to in paragraph 2.29 of the Government's consultation paper.

Mr. Lang: Consultations are continuing on the arrangements for valuing properties for the council tax and final decisions have still to be taken.

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give an estimate for the proportion of householders who will appeal against the band they are assigned to during the initial valuation process for the Government's council tax.

Mr. Lang: It is not possible to forecast the number of appeals which might be made as a result of the initial valuation process for the council tax. A banding system should lead to fewer appeals than any system, such as rates, which is based upon individual valuations, and will reduce the need for revaluations.

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how local authorities will reassess liability for the council tax if someone moves into or out of a property during the course of the year.

Mr. Lang: While the Government see some attractions in an annual basis of liability, except in clearly defined circumstances such as the death of someone in the household, a final decision will be taken in light of consultation.

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people in Scotland will pay the council tax; and how many people in Scotland paid rates in the last year when they were levied.

Mr. Lang: The number of domestic properties which were potentially subject to rates in 1988-89 was 2·1 million. This figure includes, however, empty properties and other properties in respect of which no rates were payable. Under the council tax, the householder will be responsible for paying a single bill for each household and the number of people directly liable to pay the tax will, therefore, be equivalent to the number of households that there are when the tax is introduced, less adjustments for households for which no tax is payable. The personal element of the tax will ensure that about 90 per cent. of adults in Scotland will be taken into account by the new tax.

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether there will be additional funding from central Government to fund the relief scheme referred to in paragraph 8.2 of the Government's consultation paper on the council tax.

Mr. Lang: This matter will be decided at a later date.

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the number of domestic residences in each of the property value bands of the proposed council tax in Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The table gives the estimates used for the calculation of illustrative council tax bills for Scotland.

Property value band in relation to average capital value	Upper property value in band £	Number of properties in Scotland (thousand)
A. under 50 per cent.	27,000	428
B. 50 to 65 per cent.	35,000	309
C. 65 to 85 per cent.	45,000	426
D. 85 to 110 per cent.	58,000	310
E. 110 to 150 per cent.	80,000	273
F. 150 to 200 per cent.	106,000	161
G. over 200 per cent.	over 106,000	183
Total all bands		2,090

Hospices

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing the financial contribution made to each hospice in Strathclyde region in each year since 1984.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Records of financial allocations to hospices by health boards are not held centrally.

Dentists

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many children were on the dental general practitioner capitation scheme within the Glasgow postal area from 1 October 1990 to 31 March 1991; and if he will give the number in each postal district within Glasgow.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: This information is not available centrally. During the period 1 October 1990 to 31 March 1991, a total of 114,572 children in the Greater Glasgow health board area were registered with general dental practitioners under capitation arrangements.

Testing (Primary Schools)

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is Her Majesty's Government's policy regarding the criteria for weighting compulsory tests against conflicting results of continuous assessment as they affect primary four and seven-year-old schoolchildren.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Guidance to teachers on this matter is given in the Scottish Office Education Department working paper No. 5 "The Framework for National Testing in 1991", a copy of which is in the Library.

Burglaries

Mrs. Irene Adams: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many burglaries there were in Paisley, North in each of the last three years; and what percentage those were of all reported crimes in the area.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is not held centrally.

Advertising

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give separate figures for the spending by the Forestry Commission on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Forestry Commission has not spent any money on television or radio advertising. Its local offices have advertised open days and similar events in local newspapers, but information on the costs involved is not held centrally. The central expenditure by the commission on promotional material for each year from 1987 is given in the table, rounded to the nearest £10,000. Figures for previous years are no longer available.

1987	120,000
1988	160,000
1989	[1]310,000
1990	240,000
1991	220,000
1992	[2]260,000

[1] The expenditure in 1988-89 included promotional material produced in connection with the Forestry Commission's exhibit at the Glasgow Garden Festival.
[2] Budget.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give separate figures for the spending by the Scottish Development Agency on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) newspaper advertising and (d) other promotional material in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what are his latest estimates for 1990-91 and budgets for 1991-92.

Mr. Allan Stewart: This is an operational matter for Scottish Enterprise, which succeeded the Scottish Development Agency on 1 April 1991, and I have asked the chairman to write to the hon. Member.

Decommissioning

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions were held relevant to the production by his Department of a decommissioning scheme for the fishing industry in 1989; and if he will place a copy of his proposed scheme in the Library.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Government made no proposals for a fishing vessel decommissioning scheme in 1989.

Community Care

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he plans to introduce the care in the community programme.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 2 May 1991]: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the written answer which my right hon. and learned Friend the then Secretary of State gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) on 18 July 1990.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to pass the care in the community proposals into health board control.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 2 May 1991]: The Government's policy on responsibilities for community care remains as set out in the White Paper "Caring for People" and the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990.

Museum of Flight

Sir Hector Monro: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what action he is taking to make it possible for one of the last Shackletons to become an exhibit at the National Museum of Scotland's museum of flight at East Fortune.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 2 May 1991]: It is for the board of trustees of the national museums of Scotland to decide on acquisitions for the museums within the terms of their own collection policies.

Births

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish figures for 1990 showing the estimated percentage of women delivering in Scotland whose deliveries were (a) spontaneous, including abnormal presentation of head and breech spontaneous, (b) instrumental, including forceps, vacuum and breech extractions, (c) caesarean section and (d) other and unspecified means.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 7 May 1991]: The information is as follows.

Births	Per cent.
(a) Spontaneous delivery	72·6
(b) Instrumental delivery	12·7
(c) Caesarean section	14·6
(d) Other and unspecified delivery	00·1

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish figures for 1990 showing the estimated percentage of women delivering in Scotland (a) whose labours were induced, (b) whose labours were of spontaneous onset and (c) who had elective caesarean section.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 7 May 1991]: The information is as follows.

Births	Per cent.
(a) Induced labour	21·0
(b) Spontaneous onset of labour	73·7
(c) Elective Caesarean section	05·3

Pregnancy Services

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish figures for 1990 of the number of clinics in Scotland offering (i) IVF, GIFT and other procedures and (ii) GIFT and other procedures but excluding IVF.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 7 May 1991]: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him of 22 October 1990.

The 1991 annual report of the interim licensing authority, to be published later this year, is expected to contain the latest available information about clinics offering these procedures.

Dounreay

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will list the possible sites at which Nirex proposes to drill holes or use explosive charges for a seismic survey of Dounreay as part of the proposed preliminary trial;

(2) what information he has on the total estimated cost of drilling 200 to 240 boreholes as envisaged by Nirex as part of the preliminary trial at Dounreay; what is the estimated cost incurred in carrying out a single borehole; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The technical and commercial details of the seismic survey are operational matters for the chairman of UK Nirex Ltd. and I have arranged for him to write to the hon. Lady with the information requested. I will also arrange for a copy of this letter to be placed in the Library of the House.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what consultation he intends to hold concerning any decision to extend the number of boreholes after the preliminary trial in which Nirex proposes to drill 200 to 240 boreholes and use explosive charges for seismic survey of Dounreay.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 7 May 1991]: None. UK Nirex Ltd. has planning permission to drill up to 6,000 shot-holes as part of its seismic survey. The eventual number and location of shot-holes are now for Nirex, subject to compliance with the conditions attached to my right hon. Friend's decision. These conditions require Nirex to consult the planning authority and the local authority environmental health department and to notify all occupiers of land within the survey area of the position of boreholes where explosives are to be used.

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report the comparative costings of Dounreay and Sellafield for the siting of an underground nuclear waste repository; if he will set out the reasons for upholding the Nirex appeal against Highland regional council's planning refusal for further test boring at Dounreay; and if he will now indicate the likely time scale involved for such test boring and an eventual decision on the siting of any proposed nuclear waste repository; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 7 May 1991]: UK Nirex Ltd. estimates that the comparative costs at current prices are:

£ billion

Site	Repository costs	Transport costs[1]
Dounreay	2·4	1·9
Sellafield	2·5	0·75

[1] These figures include new transport infrastructure costs.

The reasons for my right hon. Friend's decision to uphold the Nirex appeal are set out in his decision letter of 29 April, a copy of which has been placed in the Library.

I understand from Nirex that the seismic tests will be carried out over the next 4 to 6 months. It hopes to be in a position at the end of 1991 to identify a preferred site, which will then be subject to more detailed investigations.

Any resultant proposal to build a deep repository will be subject to a full public inquiry.

Community Care, Fife

Mr. Douglas: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will call for a report from Fife health board on its discussions with Fife regional council on the appropriate financial arrangements for the development of community care in Fife; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 7 May 1991]: I have asked health boards and local authority social work departments to submit planning agreements to me by 1 July 1991. These statements will indicate what agreements health boards and local authorities have reached on their respective responsibilities for obtaining community care; and what financial resources each will provide towards obtaining such care.

Mentally Handicapped People (Health Services)

Mr. Douglas: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the policy adopted by his Department to ensure that funds released by the closure or contraction of hospitals for the mentally handicapped are wholly and speedily devoted to alternative forms of care.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 7 May 1991]: On 7 March I announced a bridging finance scheme which is designed to do just that. The scheme makes £15 million available to health boards to meet the increased costs of maintaining hospital services while community support services are being developed.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Antarctica

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Attorney-General if he will list the records available in the Public Records Office relating to military activity in Antarctica; and how many papers relating to Antarctica have been withheld for more than 30 years.

The Attorney-General: No list is maintained of records available in the Public Records Office relating specifically to Antarctica or military activity there. To compile such a list, or to enumerate all related papers withheld for more than 30 years could be done only at disproportionate expense.

TRANSPORT

Smoky Vehicles

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport further to his answer of 23 April, Official Report, column 417, whether he will publish and publicise the telephone numbers of the Department of Transport area departments dealing with complaints about smoky vehicles, subject to operator licensing; what checks operators of allegedly smoky vehicles will be required to undertake in order to satisfy his Department that the vehicle is not smoky; and what follow-up action his Department will take if an unsatisfactory reply is received.

Mr. Chope: The telephone numbers of the Department of Transport's traffic area offices are:

	telephone number
Birmingham	021 631 3300
Bristol	0272 297221
Cambridge	0223 358922
Cardiff	0222 394027
Eastbourne (covers London)	0323 21471
Edinburgh	031 225 5494
Leeds	0532 499433
Manchester	061 872 5077

Telephone numbers are in telephone directories or available from directory inquiries. The Department's new leaflet 'Traffic Areas—the New Boundaries and Offices' gives addresses, telephone numbers and boundaries of traffic area offices. It will shortly be available, free of charge, from the public inquiry unit of the Department in London, telephone 071 276 0800.

All operators subject to operator licensing must have adequate arrangements for vehicle maintenance. They will have to diagnose the cause of the excessive smoke and report back on what, if any, action has been taken. If the response from the operator is unsatisfactory, the vehicle inspectorate will review the adequacy of the operators' maintenance arrangements and inspect the vehicle if necessary.

M11 Link Road

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if the proposed M11 link road, as planned, could safely be used by (i) pedestrians and (ii) cyclists.

Mr. Chope: The A12, Hackney Wick-M11 link road will be an all-purpose urban trunk road and will be heavily trafficked. The link road will remove motor traffic from existing roads and these will become safer alternative routes for pedestrians and cyclists when linked by the footpaths and cycletracks which are part of the scheme.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if construction drawings in connection with the M11 link road for the Lea interchange have yet been made.

Mr. Chope: I refer to the answer I gave to the hon. Member on 23 April, at columns 415-16.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what evidence was given on 8 January 1990, before the compulsory purchase order public inquiry in connection with the M11 link road, by the Department of Transport's representative on proposed restrictions on cycling on the road;

(2) if he will review the implications of paragraph 80 of the decision letter dated 2 August 1988 concerning the M11 link road, in respect of safety considerations and the use by cyclists of the M11 link road in the light of his representation to the EC Commission that the road will be available for use by all classes of traffic.

Mr. Chope: The evidence referred to previous proposals to restrict the use of the link road by cyclists and to provide alternatives which would be more attractive. It acknowledged that a prohibition might be necessary ultimately, but pointed out that this would not be inconsistent with the classification of the link road as an all-purpose trunk road. This is in accordance with both the intentions of paragraph 80 of the decision letter of 2 August 1988 and the Department's response to the EC of November last year.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what undertakings Her Majesty's Government has given in connection with the M11 link road to the Commission of the European Communities on availability for use by all classes of traffic.

Mr. Chope: The Department has informed the European Commission that, on opening, the link road will be available to all classes of traffic.

Rail Network (Tourism)

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will direct British Rail to prepare proposals to develop the rail network on routes helpful to the tourist industry in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: The commercial development of rail services in tourist areas was among the objectives set by my right hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Parkinson) in writing to the then chairman of British Rail on 19 December 1989.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Prescott: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he received the channel tunnel rail link report from British Rail; if he will now make the report public; and if he will make a statement on the Government's decision.

Mr. Rifkind: I received the report on 3 May, but still await some of the supporting material. It is too soon to say when it will be possible to announce a decision. Publishing the report now could cause blight on all the routes that were studied.

Chemical Containers (Norfolk Coast)

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has ordered an investigation into the incident in which dangerous chemical containers drifted on to the north Norfolk coast; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: The marine accident investigation branch has appointed an inspector to investigate the incident. The containers appear to be part of the cargo of a Swedish registered vessel, the Nordic Pride, which reported the loss of four deck cargo tanks in bad weather on Friday 3 May 1991.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Gloucester Prison

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will set out a timetable for improvements to the facilities at Gloucester prison.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Work costing just over £1 million will start this year on a two-year programme to provide access to night sanitation for all inmates. Work costing about £1 million is also due to start in 1991-92 on new facilities for education and to improve fire safety. A strategy for the further development of the prison is being prepared and £3 million has been allocated for work arising from this, starting in 1993-94.

Quangos

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the individual appointments excluding casual vacancies he is scheduled to make to quasi-autonomous non-governmental organisations in (a) 1991 and (b) 1992 indicating in each case the title of the post, the salary if any and the duration of the appointment.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The readily available information about the appointments for which I am responsible, a number of which will fall to be made in 1991 and 1992, is given in "Public Bodies 1990" and "Public Appointments: A Handbook for Women's Organisations", copies of which are in the Library.

Police Force Numbers

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list, for each police authority in Wales, the number of police officers authorised by his Department, the number of police officer posts in the authority's establishment and the number actually in post for each of the past five years.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 2 May 1991]: The information requested is set out in the table.

Prison (Marketing of Goods)

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what changes in policy he intends to make to allow men and women serving custodial sentences to produce and market communally items produced within the prison or prison farm; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold [holding answer 25 April 1991]: We have no plans for any general changes. However, in the recent "Report of the Inquiry into Prison Disturbances 1990" —Cm 1456—it was proposed that there should be schemes to enable a prisoner to contribute to society by making goods for charitable causes. The prison service is currently discussing with representatives of the Koestler Award Trust plans which the trust has to set up a prison charity shops scheme. The trust has been invited to submit a thorough feasibility and cost-benefit analysis of its proposal.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Animal Cruelty (Spain)

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Spanish Government concerning cruelty to animals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The treatment of animals in another country is a matter for that country, except where provisions are laid down by EC legislation. However, pending confirmation that Spain has implemented the directives on the transport and slaughter of farm animals, the United Kingdom does not license the export of such animals to Spain.

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the representations he has received concerning cruelty to animals in Spain.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office has received 11 letters this year concerning cruelty to animals in Spain. The Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has received many more representations.

Antarctica

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to propose legislation to give effect to the outcome of the Madrid conference on the future of the Antarctic; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Garel-Jones: We expect the draft environmental protocol to the Antarctic treaty that emerged from Madrid to be concluded at a further meeting in Madrid in June. It would be premature to consider legislation until a final text is available.

DEFENCE

Airfields

Mr. Critchley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he has yet reached a decision on the future of the procurement executive airfields at Bedford, Boscombe Down and Farnborough; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: We announced in September 1990 our preliminary view that research and experimental flying should be collocated at Boscombe Down. Since then we have undertaken extensive consultations with a wide range of interested parties, including trades unions, local authorities, the Society of British Aerospace Companies, the Farnborough Airfield Development Corporation, local amenity groups and individuals. We are grateful for all the responses that have been received.

We have now considered carefully the results of these consultations, together with further work that we commissioned from independent consultants. We have concluded that it would be right to confirm the decision to base flying at Boscombe Down, as the most suitable airfield. Detailed planning to implement this decision will now be set in hand. The move to Boscombe Down will take a number of years to complete and there will be further close consultation with interested parties as work proceeds. We also intend to commission an independent environmental impact assessment at Boscombe Down to assist us in planning the move.

The airfields at Bedford and Farnborough will no longer be required for defence purposes and will accordingly become available for disposal. We recognise that decisions on future use could have a major impact on the local areas and stress that we shall want to continue to work closely with the local planning authorities and other interested parties in accordance with normal planning procedures in determining the use to which these sites will be put. Our preliminary assessment is that Bedford could have potential as a commercial, non-passenger, airfield and that options for Farnborough could range from business/commercial aviation, with some associated commercial development of the site, to more extensive development. In considering them, we shall take account of the part the airfield plays in the Government's business aviation policy. No decisions have been made and these options for Bedford and Farnborough will be considered in detailed work now to be set in hand.

Ministry of Defence Police (Headquarters)

Mr. Robert B. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has any plans to provide a dedicated headquarters for the Ministry of Defence police.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The Ministry of Defence police headquarters and training school, currently located with other Ministry of Defence branches in Empress State building, London and at Medmenham in Buckinghamshire respectively, will move to the site of the former RAF station at Wethersfield in Essex. Planning to this effect is now in progress, and it is expected that these moves will take place during 1992. It is also intended that the operational support unit will move from RAF Wittering to Wethersfield.

As a result of these moves, the Ministry of Defence police will have their own dedicated headquarters, satisfying the recommendation made by Her Majesty's inspector of constabulary in 1989. At the same time, the Ministry of Defence police will be provided with improved and up-to-date instructional facilities on a larger and more versatile site which will offer a greater capacity for both recruit and in-force continuation and specialist training.

ENVIRONMENT

Freehold Homes

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the increase in the average price of freehold dwelling homes in Yorkshire and Humberside in (a) 1989 and (b) 1990.

Mr. Yeo: The available information does not distinguish between freehold and leasehold sales and includes sales to sitting tenants. The increases in 1989 and 1990 were 28 and 13 per cent. respectively.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 29 April, Official Report, column 13, to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby, if he will specify in which band the average value of homes is for the illustrative calculation setting a council tax for a band D property occupied by two or more people at a standard level of service; and what the figures quoted in his reply would be if the average value home was (a) in band A, (b) in band B, (c) in band C and (d) in band D.

Mr. Key: With the seven bands which we have proposed, a home with the national average value will always be in band D.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, further to his answer of 29 April, Official Report, column 13, if he will give the council tax for band A, B, D and G properties for a council when the county council spends four per cent. over its standard spending assessment and the district council 32 per cent. but where the majority of properties are in (a) band A, (b) band B, (c) band C and (d) band D.

Mr. Key: I have nothing to add to my earlier answer to the hon. Member.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what weighting is given in the standard spending assessment for people aged over 85 years; and what proportion of people are over 85 years old in (a) Grimsby, (b) Eastbourne, (c) Harrogate and (d) Scarborough.

Mr. Key: The number of people aged 85 years and over is used in the calculation of the standard spending assessment for social services for the elderly. A full description of the weight given to this factor is contained in the Revenue Support Grant Distribution Report (England) as amended by the Revenue Support Grant Distribution (Amendment) Report (England), copies of which are in the Library.

Proportion of the resident population aged 85 years and over

	Per cent.
Grimsby	1·4
Eastbourne	3·6
Harrogate	1·7
Scarborough	2·4

Norfolk County Council

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many measures and directives have been sent from central Government to Norfolk county council which have required Norfolk county council to (a) increase its activities and (b) employ extra staff; and if he will list each one since 1979.

Mr. Key: The information is not available. Since 1984, however, the Department has closely monitored all central Government initiatives with resource implications for local authorities generally. Estimates of costs are made as accurately and as early as possible and are then taken into account, with all other relevant factors, when the annual local authority finance settlement is made.

Drinking Water (Inspectorate)

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 29 April, Official Report, column 14, on the workload of the drinking water inspectorate, how the figure of 120 days breaks down into hours per person.

Mr. Trippier: Approximately 53 hours per person on average.

Cryptosporidia

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 29 April, Official Report, column 14, if he will publish the report of the outbreak control team into the outbreak of cryptosporidia in Hull in 1990.

Mr. Trippier: The outbreak control team published the report by sending it to the relevant local authorities and district health authorities, to the regional health authority, the Chief Medical Officer, Department of Health and the drinking water inspectorate. It is available to the public via the town clerk's office, Hull city council at a cost of approximately £10.

Local Authority Rents

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on rent levels for local authority housing in England.

Mr. Yeo: Information on local authority rents is collected from a number of sources including surveys of authorities by The Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy and claims submitted to the Department for housing revenue account subsidy. Drawing on both sources we estimate current rents as follows:

Region	April 1991 average local authority rent £ per week
North	22·60
Yorkshire and Humberside	21·54
East Midlands	23·17
Eastern	27·66
Greater London	35·74
South Eastern	31·36
South West	27·49
West Midlands	26·19
North West	24·50
England	27·29

Ordnance Survey

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total sum paid out in fees to outside organisations in the furtherance of privatisation by Ordnance Survey in 1979-80 and in each following year; and what is his estimate for 1990-91 and budget for 1991-92.

Mr. Baldry: No such fees have been paid during the period in question and the budget for 1991-92 contains no such provision.

Toxic Waste (Wath upon Dearne)

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will state the number of days which have elapsed since toxic waste arrived in Wath upon Dearne near Rotherham.

Mr. Baldry: I understand that the waste arrived at Wath on 9 June 1989 and has therefore been present for 700 days.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many visits have been paid to the premises of Wath Recycling by officials of his Department in connection with the toxic waste held at these premises since this material arrived in the summer of 1989.

Mr. Trippier: Three visits have been made by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution inspectors since the summer of 1989 in connection with the consignment of wastes received at that time. Visits have also been made by the Health and Safety Executive which has advised that it will be making a separate representation on this question.

Trade in Wildlife

Mr. Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to ensure that international trade in wildlife does not threaten the survival of species.

Mr. Baldry: This Government have always been active in ensuring that trade in wildlife is controlled so that it does not threaten the survival of any species. Because of growing concern about the effects of trade on some wildlife populations, we have asked our scientific advisers—the royal botanic gardens at Kew and the Joint Nature Conservation Committee—to undertake a wide-ranging study. They will review the evidence as to whether the trade in wild-taken plants and animals is compatible with maintaining species at satisfactory levels. Following this review, they will make recommendations to be taken into account when considering proposals to change current controls under the convention on international trade in endangered species of wild fauna and flora—CITES.

The United Kingdom was one of the founder members of CITES, which is based on the principle that wildlife should be used only at levels which can be sustained. We have always been in the forefront of promoting and supporting necessary changes to the convention and complementary measures in this country and the European Community. The study—which is to be completed by the end of July—will make a significant contribution to the conservation of wildlife by ensuring that Government action continues to be based on a sound scientific foundation.

Global Warming

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what research his Department has commissioned or published in the last five years on the potential effects of global warming on London.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 8 May 1991]: The report of the Department's climate change impacts review group, published in January of this year, considers a wide range of possible impacts, some of which are relevant to London. Copies of the report have been placed in the Library of the House.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Capital Gains Tax

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the revenue cost assumed for 1991-92 in respect of individuals' capital gains tax allowance.

Mr. Maude: The total revenue cost of the capital gains tax annual exempt amount for individuals and trusts is estimated to be about £350 million at 1991-92 levels. This estimate does not allow for the effect on yield of the behavioural changes which would occur if the annual exempt amount were removed.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what would be the capital gains tax yield for the latest available year if all equity transactions where a gain was taken within 12 months were taxed at 40 per cent;

(2) what amount of capital gains tax was paid reflecting holdings of less than one year in (a) 1988-89, (b) 1989-90 and (c) 1990-91.

Mr. Maude: Information is available about the distribution, by length of period of ownership of assets, for net chargeable gains realised in 1987-88. A detailed analysis is provided in table 11.7 of "Inland Revenue Statistics 1990". This analysis suggests that about 5 per cent. of net chargeable gains for 1987-88 were attributable to assets owned for less than one year. The figures exclude gains realised by companies which are chargeable to corporation tax.

If capital gains tax on equities were restricted to disposals of equities within one year of acquisition with gains on equities held for more than one year exempted from tax, it is likely that, after taking account of behavioural effects, the total capital gains tax yeild from equities would be small.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the revenue cost for 1990-91 of the capital gains tax indexation provisions.

Mr. Maude: I regret that it is not possible to provide a sufficiently reliable estimate of the cost of indexation relief.

Public Employees

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will give details of the number of persons employed in the United Kingdom in (a) the civil service, (b) local government, (c) the national health service, (d) the armed forces and (e) public corporations, for each of the years 1961, 1979, 1985 and 1990;

(2) how many persons were employed in the entire public sector in the United Kingdom (a) in 1961 and (b) at the latest date for which figures are available; and what percentage increase this represents.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested can be found in appendix 1, table 2 of the article on "Employment in the public and private sectors" which appeared in the December 1990 edition of the Central Statistical Office's "Economic Trends" publication. A copy is available in the Library. The percentage increase in the number of persons employed in the public sector in the United Kingdom over the period 1961 to 1990 was 3 per cent.

Personal Incomes

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will update, to take account of the 1991 Budget, the information on tax changes contained in the answer to the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), of 21 October 1986, Official Report, columns 812-14.

Mr. Maude: Latest estimates of the annual change in income tax liability resulting from the changes in tax rates, allowance, and thresholds are in the table. The 1978-79 income tax regime has been indexed to 1991-92 levels by reference to the statutory formula, and allowing for independent taxation.

For the purposes of these calculations the indexed regime of 1978-79 has been applied directly to the income base of 1991-92. In practice, retention of the 1978-79 regime, indexed as appropriate, for the intervening years would have led to changes in the income base.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will update to 1991-92 the information on real net earnings provided in the answer to the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) of 10 April 1986, Official Report, columns 193-94.

Mr. Maude: The information is given in the tables.

Gross Domestic Product

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the percentage change in the United Kingdom gross domestic product for the last financial year.

Mr. Maples: Preliminary estimates of the gross domestic product at constant factor cost for the first quarter of 1991 and the 1990-91 financial year will be published by Central Statistical Office on 22 May 1991. Estimates at current market prices will be available on 24 June.

Mortgages

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the size of mortgage interest payable in respect of domestic property in the northern region in 1985 and each subsequent year and the stock of mortgages and the average size of mortgage interest payable in the northern region for each year since 1985.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 8 May 1991]: Readily available estimates, based on regional information from family expenditure surveys, are as follows:

Mortgages in the Northern Region

	Gross interest payable (£ million)	Number of mortgages (thousands)	Average amount of gross interest (£)
1986	690	440	1,550
1987	720	420	1,800

Pensions

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what action has been taken in the last six months with regard to the indexation of public sector pensions; what plans he has for determining future increases in public sector pensions; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 7 May 1991]: Public service pensions are uprated annually in April in line with the movement in the retail prices index in the 12 months to the previous September. Accordingly, as announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security on 24 October 1990, at column 348, public service pensions as well as state retirement pensions and other benefits were increased by 10·9 per cent. from 8 April 1991. There are no plans to change the current indexation arrangements by which public service pensions are increased.

Council Finances (Swaps)

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the effect on the United Kingdom banking industry of the House of Lords decision in the case of the district auditor v. Hammersmith and Fulham council involving swaps.

Mr. Maples [holding answer 7 May 1991]: The Government are conscious of the strength of feeling about this issue among the banking community. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and I have discussed it at length with the president of the British Bankers Association on two occasions, and the Governor of the Bank of England has kept us informed of City opinion. Officials have had long and detailed discussions with the BBA. We have been particularly anxious that all possible options for mitigating the consequences of the judgment should be fully explored.

As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment announced on 7 May, at columns 402-3, after careful consideration, the Government have concluded that it is best not to seek to alter the existing obligations of the parties.

This problem is specific to local authority swaps and has no implications for the vast majority of financial transactions or for local authority borrowing.

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he proposes to take action to end the uncertainty caused to local authorities and the banking industry by the House of Lords decision in the case of the district auditors v. Hammersmith and Fulham council involving swaps.

Mr. Maples [holding answer 7 May 1991]: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment on 7 May, at columns 402-3.

WALES

Play Areas (Safety Measures)

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 29 April, Official Report, column 13, on safety measures in children's play areas, if he intends to provide additional funding for local authorities to put into practice the advice being drawn up on play area safety.

Sir Wyn Roberts: In framing local authority revenue settlements for 1992-93 and subsequent years, allowance will be made for any new burdens imposed on local authorities by central Government.

Roads and Pavements (Maintenance)

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what estimates his Department has of the expenditure on the repair and maintenance of roads and pavements under the responsibility of county and district councils in Wales in 1987, 1988, 1989 and 1990.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The information available is given in the table. Prior to 1989-90 figures are available on a consistent basis only for the broad category shown.

Cataract Surgery

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what advice he offers to general practitioners who wish to refer their patients direct to the treatment centre for cataract surgery funded by his Department at Ysbyty Gwynedd, Bangor, on whether consultant surgeons at Bangor will accept patient referrals in circumstances other than where the patient's area health authority consultant refuses to co-operate.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: General practitioners should contact the treatment centre which will discuss with the patients' consultant whether re-referral will be in the clinical interests of the patient.

ENERGY

Renewable Energy

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy (1) if he will list his Department's current and planned renewable energy programmes in Wales by type, cost, site, location and capacity;

(2) how many applications for renewable energy projects have been submitted for Wales up to date; and if he will list them by site, district council, type and capacity.

Mr. Moynihan: My Department supports an extensive programme of research, development and demonstration of sources of renewable energy where those sources show the potential for economic viability and are environmentally acceptable. In 1990-91 total expenditure was over £20 million. Expenditure is distributed throughout the United Kingdom. There is no specific allocation for Wales. However, there are currently 17 renewable energy projects which have a contractor or site located in Wales. They comprise:

Technology	Projects	Contract value £ million
Wind	7	4·9

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

High Definition Television

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will state Her Majesty's Government's position on current discussions within the European Community to develop standards for high definition television, D2 MAC and HD-MAC

Mr. Leigh: The Government welcome the consultations initiated by the European Commission with a view to securing consensus between broadcasters and manufacturers on the best route to high definition television. The Government will take a position when the Commission makes its proposals known. The Government have made known their views that the MAC family of standards should be given a fair chance to succeed in the market for wide screen TV transmissions by satellite but this should not entail the enforced cut-off of existing transmission standards.

Quangos

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the individual appointments excluding casual vacancies he is scheduled to make to quasi-autonomous non-governmental organisations in (a) 1991 and (b) 1992 indicating in each case the title of the post, the salary if any and the duration of the appointment.

Mr. Leigh: The readily available information about the public appointments for which my right hon. Friend is responsible is given in the current edition of "Public Bodies" and in "Public Appointments: A Handbook for Women's Organisations", copies of which are in the Library. A number of these appointments are expected to be made in 1991 and 1992.

Spirits (Measures)

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the representations he received regarding the proposals to permit one further round metric quantity of 35ml and of extending the requirement to use prescribed measures to cover other spirits as announced in the answer to the hon. Member for Gedling (Mr. Mitchell) of 3 May 1990, Official Report, column 612; and when he expects to lay orders on these matters.

Mr. Leigh: I am considering the replies to my Department's consultation paper. No decision has yet been made on whether to implement the proposals nor on when any order on these matters would be laid.

Eurocopy Group

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, further to his answer of 22 January, Official Report, column 119, when he expects to announce the outcome of the Director General of Fair Trading's investigation into malpractice by companies in the Eurocopy Group; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: As the hon. Gentleman is aware, the responsibility for investigations under the Consumer Credit Act 1974 is the responsibility of the Director General of Fair Trading. I have asked him to inform the hon. Gentleman of the report of the investigation in question when it becomes available.

My statement to the House on 18 March in reply to the question by my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. French), at columns 23-24 reflects the Government's general position on this issue.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will draw up a code of practice for photocopying companies to prevent the malpractices now under investigation by the Office of Fair Trading.

Mr. Redwood: As I said in my reply to the hon. Member on 18 March, at columns 23-24, the code of practice of the Equipment Leasing Association already requires members to "behave with integrity" and not to "misrepresent facts to a lessee concerning any aspect of a leasing transaction".

This is the standard that the Government would expect of the industry and the only way for the industry to retain the confidence of its customers.

I understand that the Equipment Leasing Association is currently in the process of reviewing the provisions of their code to take into account commercial developments since it was originally published.

In addition to this code of practice, both the CBI and the Association of British Chambers of Commerce have written to their members emphasising the need to consider carefully photocopier leasing agreements and the possibility of malpractices by some operators.

Inner-city Task Forces

Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he intends to make any changes to the location of the inner-city task forces; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Leigh: Inner-city task forces have always been part of a rolling programme, tackling difficult areas and then moving on. I have decided to establish three new task forces: one in Hackney, one in Hull and one in South Tyneside. These task forces will work closely with the business community, the training and enterprise council and with the local authority to improve the job and training opportunities for those in the area. They will all be starting their work by the end of the year. The three new task forces, like the existing ones, are not intended to be permanent. One of their aims is to foster the development of local organisations which can capitalise on the task forces' work when the task forces themselves leave.

The task forces in Leeds, Hartlepool and Spitalfields have now made significant progress in meeting these objectives, and I have consequently decided that they should close in the autumn. In the meantime, they will continue to build up the capacity of local bodies to take over their work in the future, and they will continue to welcome new proposals until the end of June 1991. Funding will also continue to be provided for a limited number of projects after the closure of the task forces.

Task forces have proved highly successful in creating jobs, encouraging training opportunities and stimulating enterprise in the country's most deprived areas. Since they began, task forces have committed some £73 million to over 2,700 projects to help the people of inner city communities. A recent independent evaluation of the task force initiative by PA Cambridge Economic Consultants concluded that task forces are successfully and cost-effectively meeting their objectives and helping to achieve the Government's aim of regenerating the inner cities. A copy of this report is available in the Library.

Companies House

Mr. Nicholls: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what targets have been set for the Companies House executive agency.

Mr. Redwood: In making available information about companies, Companies House promotes enterprise and contributes substantially to open and informed markets. Executive agency status has produced very significant improvements in efficiency and the standard of service provided to Companies House customers. Details of performance against the agency's original two-year targets will be available when the Companies House annual report is published.

The chief executive of Companies House has been set the following quality of service and financial performance targets:

i. To make all documents available to searchers within a maximum of five working days of receipt;
ii. To increase the compliance rate for annual returns and accounts to 85 per cent. by June 1992, and 90 per cent. by June 1994;
iii. To provide a two-hour search service for all customers from April 1991, and to provide a one-hour search service to all customers by April 1994;
iv. To reduce real unit costs by 1 per cent. in 1991-92.

The achievement of these stretching targets would represent a further significant improvement in the quality of Companies House services, as well as building on the agency's improved financial performance. For example, a target of processing documents within a maximum of five working days compares with an average performance of 25 working days in 1988-89, and the original target to ensure that by April 1991 documents were processed within an average of 18 working days.

Additional financial performance targets will be set when Companies House achieves trading fund status.

EC Regional Funds

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what additional funding would be provided for the Rotherham area in each of the next three years if it were to receive its share of the total sum available from EC funds under the Community's regional support arrangements; and what is his estimate of the funds which this area will receive in each of the next three years.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 7 May 1991]: Decisions on the future level of funding for the United Kingdom's objective 2 regions will be made by the Commission shortly. For the Community's RECHAR initiative the Commission has already announced the level of funding for Great Britain.

It is not, however, possible to estimate what funding any particular area will receive since project selection is a matter for programme co-ordinating committees to consider.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action he is now taking to ensure that areas affected by contraction of the mining industry receive the benefit of the funds which are available from the EC.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 7 May 1991]: The United Kingdom Government submitted their applications under the RECHAR programme for coalmining areas on 26 July 1990. My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Trade and Industry, for Northern Ireland, for Wales and for Scotland, and other Ministers met Mr. Bruce Millan, EC Commissioner for regional policy, on 25 April when, among other EC structural fund issues, the Commission's approval of these programmes was discussed. Discussions are continuing at official level to resolve any outstanding questions so that early approval to these programmes may be given.

Training (Bradford)

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will take steps to enable Bradford Task Force to support training provided by the National Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders and other training centres facing closure, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 7 May 1991]: All applications to Bradford task force for assistance for training projects are considered on their merits. The task force will continue to support schemes, in partnership with other funding organisations, which help local task force area residents obtain the skills needed to obtain employment.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will direct Bradford task force to provide training places for those with special needs to replace those which will no longer be offered by the Bradford TEC; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 7 May 1991]: The Bradford task force already supports a range of training initiatives aimed at disadvantaged, unemployed task force area residents. Many of these are being carried out in partnership with the Bradford and district training and enterprise council.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

City Technology Colleges

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will update the table given in his answer to the hon. Member for Blackburn, Official Report, 25 July 1990, columns 280-84, giving the latest available information in respect of each city technology college or proposed and planned city technology college.

[6] In each case, LEA, local schools and other interests consulted on proposal to establish CTC.

Cambridge Regional College

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make it his policy to provide a guarantee that the debt charges on capital expenditure to provide new accommodation for Cambridge regional college will not remain the responsibility of the local education authority should the college be accorded corporate status.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to the reply, 22 April 1991, c. 322]: From April 1993 the council that will be established to fund the new sector will take responsibility for meeting the cost of servicing debts arising from contracts for new capital spending in sixth form colleges and LEA-maintained colleges of further and higher education. The council will take responsibility only for the costs of debts relating to contracts entered into after 1 April 1991 which have a value in excess of £50,000 and to which I have consented under the arrangements I announced on 21 March this year.

The maximum amount of each local education authority's debt for which the council will take responsibility will not exceed the level allowed within the authority's annual capital guidelines for relevant institutions in 1991-92 and 1992-93. These arrangements will be reflected in an appropriate adjustment to revenue support grant for future local authority finance settlements.

The servicing of debt arising from contracts entered into before 1 April 1991 will remain the responsibility of local education authorities. It will continue to be supported through annual local authority finance settlements as now.

Given this assurance, I expect authorities to wish to continue with their existing capital programmes and to undertake further appropriate capital spending on the colleges.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 9 May.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Overseas Aid

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Prime Minister whether his statement concerning the growing aid programme, Official Report, column 163, 30 April 1991, referred to the aid level in real or nominal terms; and if he will provide the figures on which the claim was based.

The Prime Minister: Over the three-year public expenditure survey period to 1993-94 the aid programme is planned to increase to £1,860 million. Compared with the original planning figure for 1990-91 this represents continued real-terms growth.

HEALTH

Acute Hospital Beds

Mr. Andrew Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will state the number of patients treated in acute hospital beds for each year since 1979; and what proportion were over pensionable age.

Mr. Dorrell: The information requested is given in the table.

Estimated number of cases[1] treated, acute sector[2] NHS hospitals, England 1979 to 1988-89

(Thousands)

	Total (all ages)	Over 65	Percentage age over 65
1979	4,750·2	1,137·3	23·9
1980	5,024·9	1,222·8	24·3
1981	5,153·5	1,280·9	24·9
1982	5,090·0	1,315·9	25·8
1983	5,443·7	1,387·5	25·5
1984	5,633·6	1,426·4	25·5
1985	5,802·9	1,511·9	26·0
1986	5,922·0	[3]—	[3]—
1987-88	5,921·0	1,513·0	25·6
1988-89	6,006·0	1,590·8	26·5

Note: The figures are estimates derived from the Hospital In-Patient Enquiry (HIPE)—calendar years 1979-85—and the Hospital Episode System (HES) (from financial year 1987-88).

[1] Ordinary admissions and day cases.

[2] 1979-86—Discharges and deaths from all specialties other than those relating to maternity, mental health, geriatics, units for the younger disabled and healthy liveborn infants.

1987-88 and 1988-89—As above but excluding pathology.

[3] It is not possible to estimate a number for patients over 65 for 1986 because HIPE ceased in 1985 and HES did not start until 1987-88.

Traffic Casualties

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if, further to his answer of 12 March, Official Report, column 497, he has now found a suitable legislative vehicle for annulling section 155 of the Road Traffic Act 1972.

Mr. Dorrell: I have nothing to add to the reply I gave the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Sir D. Steel) on 12 March at column 497.

NHS Charges

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what proportion of persons eligible for exemption from national health service charges by virtue of the low-income scheme actually claimed that exemption in the three most recent years for which figures are available;

(2) what percentage of people eligible to claim under the national health service low-income scheme made a claim in 1988, 1989 and 1990.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Figures are not available for the potential number of people who may have benefited from the NHS low income scheme had they made a claim for remission of charges. Between May 1988, when revised methods of collecting statistical information were introduced, and March 1989, a total of 972,637 claims were received and a total of 689,945 awards of either full or partial remission of charges were made. For the financial year 1989-90 the corresponding figures were 900,509 and 813,671 and for 1990-91 1,017,739 and 957,886. Claimants may make more than one claim in any 12-month period.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the gross annual cost of administering the low-income scheme for health benefits and the cost per claim in the three most recent years for which figures are available.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The NHS low income scheme is administered by the Department of Social Security on behalf of the Department of Health, on a repayment basis. Figures are available only for the two years 1989-90 and 1990-91 when the repayments were £8·107 million and £7·180 million respectively.

The average cost per claim was £6·76 in 1989-90 and £7·65 in 1990-91. No figures are available for earlier years.

Hip Fractures

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the rate of incidence of hip fractures in (a) the total population, (b) the male population, (c) the female population and (d) the female population over 75 years in each year since 1980.

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 30 April 1991]: The information is given in the table.

Estimated Numbers of Discharges and Deaths (1980-1985) and Finished Consultant Episodes (1987-88, 1988-89 and 1989-90 where principal diagnosis was ICD 820: Fracture of Neck of Femur and Incidence per 10,000 Population NHS Hospitals, England

1989-90	48,925	10,303	38,622	30,295
incidence per 10,000 population	10	4	16	139

The figures for 1987-88 onwards are extracted from the Hospital Episode Statistics. They are provisional estimates based on incomplete data and may be subject to revision when ongoing analysis has been completed. Data for 1986 is not available.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

World Bank Forest Policy

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what measures he is supporting to ensure more local participation in preparation, appraisal and implementation of World bank forest projects.

Mrs. Chalker: It is already World bank practice to consult widely on all of their projects, including those in the forestry sector. The bank welcomes and encourages discussion with local interest groups and non-governmental organisations on aspects of project preparation, appraisal and implementation. As part of its wider forest policy review the bank is looking again at its practice. The British Government support these efforts to strengthen local participation.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to press for a World bank forest policy that clearly states that the bank will no longer lend to projects which degrade or destroy tropical forests.

Mrs. Chalker: A major objective of the world bank's new forest policy will be to help ensure that tropical forests are managed on a sustainable basis. The British Government fully support that principle and has so informed bank management.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the timetable for approval and adoption of the revised World bank forest policy; and what assessment he has undertaken of whether the new policy will affect proposed World bank loans already under consideration.

Mrs. Chalker: World bank executive directors, management and staff are scheduled to discuss forest policy in a seminar on 31 May. Depending on the outcome of this discussion, the present intention is for management to seek formal board approval of the new policy by the end of June. No forestry sector loans currently under consideration will come to the board before the policy is finalised.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many proposed World bank loans that include plans for use of forested land, reafforestation, or the timber industry, are currently in the process of being approved.

Mrs. Chalker: None.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what evaluation he has made of the implementation by the International Tropical Timber Organisation of its guidelines on sustainable management of tropical forests; and what recommendation Her Majesty's Government are making on how the World bank could implement the International Tropical Timber Organisation's guidelines.

Mrs. Chalker: Progress with implementation of ITTO guidelines on sustainable management of tropical forests will be discussed at the ITTO council meeting in Quito from 27 May to 6 June. The ITTO is organising a conference of foresters in Yokohama in July to promote further the guidelines. The ODA has made it clear to the authors of the World bank's forest policy that the bank should incorporate the guidelines into its overall strategy.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the United Kingdom's executive director at the World bank will be putting forward the concerns expressed by United Kingdom non-governmental organisations to Her Majesty's Government concerning World bank forest policy.

Mrs. Chalker: In discussing the new forest policy with World bank officials, the United Kingdom executive director and his staff have drawn extensively on material and comments prepared by British non-governmental organisations. International and developing country NGOs had an opportunity to discuss the new policy directly with bank staff on 23 and 24 April in Washington.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in what way existing Overseas Development Agency policy on support for forestry differs from the draft World bank forest policy currently under discussion.

Mrs. Chalker: The World bank draft policy paper has been revised four times since early March. Work on this will not be complete until the summer. Until it is, the Government are in no position to say how, if at all, respective policies will differ.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to support the recruitment, by the World bank, of a substantial number of staff with experience of community participation in forestry, and support substantial training programmes for other World bank operational staff in practical implementation of forestry policy.

Mrs. Chalker: The United Kingdom executive director has already stressed the need for the World bank to develop an appropriate range of skills to support implementation of the new forest policy. The bank must decide on the mix of new recruitment and internal training required to fulfil this obligation.

Brazil

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made in establishing a comprehensive pilot project for forest conservation in Brazil, as proposed at the Group of Seven Houston summit in July 1990.

Mrs. Chalker: The Government of Brazil have been preparing a project proposal in cooperation with the World bank and the European Community. Draft proposals are being discussed at a further meeting of the three parties in Brazil on 9 and 10 May.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the Minister for Overseas Development, during her recent visit to Brazil, discussed Brazilian law No. 7.827 of 9 September 1990 creating the constitutional fund for financing the north, and the reactivation, on 17 December 1990, of the fund for investment in the Amazon with the Brazilian Government; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: I discussed with Brazilian Ministers reports about the reactivation of schemes which earlier resulted in ranching and unnecessary deforestation in northern Brazil. I was assured that, although schemes to promote sustainable development in Amazonia were being reactivated, detailed arrangements had still to be worked out and care would be taken to ensure that the incentives would not result in needless deforestation or unsustainable logging.

Forestry

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place a statement of the Overseas Development Agency's forestry policy in the Library.

Mrs. Chalker: The Overseas Development Agency's forestry policy is set out in the memorandum and evidence given to the Environment Committee's inquiry into the climatological and environmental effects of rain forest destruction last year. Also in the Library are copies of the Overseas Development Agency's booklet "Environment and the British Aid Programme" and the Government's White Paper "This Common Inheritance", both of which have sections on tropical forests.

Departmental Budget

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the size of the ODA's contingency reserve, the disaster relief budget and the food aid budget for financial year 1991-92; whether any changes have been made to each of those since the start of the financial year; and how much of each has so far been allocated and for what purpose.

Mrs. Chalker: For 1991-92 the contingency reserve was initially set at £70 million. Allocations totalling £22·727 million have been made—£19·5 million for Iraqi refugee relief, £3·0 million towards Bangladesh cyclone relief, £0·227 million in respect of other emergencies.

Parliamentary approval for expenditure arising from these dispositions will be sought as appropriate through the estimates.

Within the contingency reserve £10 million was set aside initially for disaster relief. Of this £9 million was provided for in subhead A3(7) of the supply estimates, of which £2,827,000 has been spent, as follows:

Iraqi refugees (Kurdish crisis)	2,600,000
UNDRO: Afghanistan earthquake	7,000
World Vision: Malawi floods	46,000
SCF: Malawi floods	114,000
SCF: Uganda displaced persons	60,000

Assistance for the Bangladesh cyclone and further assistance for the Iraqi refugees will be charged to this subhead, supplemented as necessary by transfers from the unallocated section.

The remaining £1 million was provided for in subhead B3(9) and has yet to be spent.

Provision for food aid in 1991-92, under subheads A3(8) and B3(8) in the supply estimates, totals £19·5 million. Allocations are made in terms of tonnes of cereals, as this is the basis of the United Kingdom's obligation under the food aid convention. The following allocations have been made:

Subhead A3(8) Bilateral Food Aid

Country	Quantity tonnes
Ethiopia	25,000
Mozambique	10,000
Sudan	25,000
Total	60,000
Subhead B3(8) Multilateral Food Aid
Angola (fulfilment of 1990-91 pledge to special UN programme which has been delayed due to local difficulties)	2,200
World food programme regular programme	25,000
Protracted refugee operations:
Sudanese refugees in Ethiopia	5,000
Mozambican refugees in Malawi	5,000
International emergency food reserve	10,000
Total	47,200
Plus cash contribution to WFP administrative expenses	£500,000

SCOTLAND

Local Government Finance

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish tables showing (a) the expenditure per capita of population of each local authority in Scotland and (b) the level of central Government support per capita of population to each local authority.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information, based on local authorities' budget estimates and the aggregate external finance settlement for 1991-92, is set out in the table.

Notes:

1. Figures used in column 1 are total relevant current expenditure including loan and leasing charges.
2. Total Government support includes revenue support grant, estimated non-domestic rate income and estimated specific grants for each authority. An additional £7·2 million specific grant relating to urban programm expenditure has not been allocated to individual authorities.

3. The figures in both columns were calculated using the population figures at June 1989.

Electricity Privatisation

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give details of the cost incurred in debt write-off for the electricity generating and distribution companies prior to privatisation; and what percentage of the total debt this is.

Mr. Allan Stewart: In reconstructing the companies' balance sheets prior to flotation, outstanding NLF loans amounting to £1·044 billion were extinguished in Scottish Hydro-Electric plc and ScottishPower plc. Subsequently the Government injected new long-term debt totalling £516 million into the companies, together with a short-term debenture of £110 million. At the same time, all outstanding tax losses available to the companies were removed.

The difference between loans written off and debentures issued is £418 million. This represents 40 per cent. of the total amount of NLF loans extinguished. The Government expect that this sum will be more than offset by the proceeds of sale of the two companies, which will reflect their new capital structure.

Social Services

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the total number of voluntary sector social work staff in Scotland who received financial support to undertake the certificate in social services course in each of the past five years; what was the total level of support allocated in each of the past five years; and what is the projected level of support and numbers to be involved in the current financial year.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The numbers of staff receiving financial support for certificate in social services courses and the levels of support for the past five years and the current financial year are set out in the table.

Number of staff receiving financial support

	Number	Total support (£)
1986-87	62	226,123
1987-88	55	184,965
1988-89	65	310,281
1989-90	52	203,900

[1] Estimated.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the names of those voluntary organisations which have received support for the professional training of its social workers in each of the past five years; what was the total level of financial support in each organisation over the same period; and if he will make a statement on future increases in support for professional social work training in the voluntary sector.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The names of voluntary organisations receiving support for professional training of its social workers and the levels of that support over the past five years are set out in the table.

It is not Government policy fully to fund the training needs of the voluntary sector and agencies are encouraged to include realistic training costs in budgets to ensure their acceptance into mainstream funding. The current level of support for 1991-92 to the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work is £1,003,000 the majority of which is devoted to supporting voluntary sector training interests. The level of future support for professional social work training will be considered by the Scottish Office alongside other demands on resources.

Fish Processing

Mr. Doran: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met representatives of the fish processing industry to discuss future Government support for the industry.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My noble Friend the Minister for Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland met the Scottish Fish Merchants' Federation in October last year. This has been backed up by more recent meetings with officials.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts, by grade, in the statistical divisions in his Department; and if he will differentiate between staff in statistical posts and staff in administrative posts.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 29 April 1991]: Full information along the lines requested is not readily available for every year since 1979. The available information is set out in the table.

Births

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish figures showing the number of (a) twins, (b) triplets, (c) quadruplets, (d) quintuplets and (e) sextuplets born in Scotland in 1990; what was the total number of maternities in Scotland for that year; and what was the total number of multiple births of each type which were conceived as a result of (i) IVF, (ii) GIFT and (iii) other forms of assisted births.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 7 May 1991]: The information is as follows:

(ii) Total confinements	65,556

Information on the number of multiple births attributed to assisted reproduction is not available.

Grampian Health Board

Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, further to his answer of 25 April, Official Report, column 548, whether he will now direct the Grampian health board to make its minutes available to the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 7 May 1991]: I understand a copy of the relevant minutes were sent to the hon. Member on 2 May. I regret that this was not done sooner.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Pension Books

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the numbers and proportions of pensioners who are not receiving their new pension books by the date at which they come into force; and what action he is taking to prevent such occurrences.

Miss Widdecombe: Pension books normally go out three weeks before they are due. Exceptionally, delays may occur in a small number of cases. Detailed figures on such cases are not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Pensioners

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the total percentage of pensioner units whose income did not exceed £5,000 at current prices for each of the last 10 years for the Doncaster area; and what is the national figure.

Miss Widdecombe: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given to the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) on 5 February 1991, at column 134, which gives the national figures requested. Information on particular areas is not available.

Community Care

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received about the level of funding of (a) community care loans and (b) grants, at his Department's offices in the Doncaster area; and what his response has been to-date.

Mr. Scott: The administration of the social fund is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency.

He will write to the hon. Member and copies will be placed in the Library and the Public Information Office.

Invalidity Benefit

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the numbers of claimants in receipt of invalidity benefit who will suffer a net loss of income arising from the recent uprating of invalidity benefit and its impact upon entitlement to housing and poll tax rebates and free national health service prescriptions.

Mr. Scott: Detailed information is not available. However, invalidity benefit recipients who are also in receipt of housing benefit and community charge benefit will normally be better off following an uprating. This is because applicable amounts for housing benefit and community charge benefit are uprated at the same time as increased invalidity benefit is taken into account. In addition, the housing benefit and community charge benefit tapers operate so that claimants normally retain at least part of any increase in their income. The applicable amounts used in assessing entitlement to help with prescription charges under the NHS low income scheme are also uprated at the same time as invalidity benefit.

Occupational Pensioners

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the total number of occupational pensioners in the United Kingdom in 1970, 1980, and 1990 receiving pensions from local authorities; and what was the total amount paid in occupational pensions by local authorities in those years.

Miss Widdecombe: The information requested is not held centrally. Local authorities are responsible not only for the payment of pensions to their own former employees, who are members of the local government superannuation scheme but for the payment of pensions to retired firefighters and police officers who are members of schemes administered by the Home Office. In Scotland the Scottish Office is responsible for the administration of all such occupational pensions.

Benefits

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what would be the cost in 1991-92 of raising (a) one-parent benefit and (b) the widowed mother's allowance on behalf of the claimant, by 85p a week (i) assuming similar increases in income-related benefits for lone parents and widows and (ii) net of income-related benefits;

(2) what would be the cost in 1991-92 of raising one-parent benefit by £1·45 a week (i) assuming similar increases in income-related benefits for lone parents and (ii) net of income-related benefits.

Mr. Jack [holding answer 1 May 1991]: The information requested is in the following table.

	Raising OPB and WMA by 85p a week £ million	Raising OPB by £1·45 a week £ million
(i) Assuming compensatory increases in income related benefits
One-parent benefit	57	98
Widowed mother's allowance	3
TOTAL	60	98
(ii) Assuming no increase in income related benefits
One-parent benefit	17	30
Widowed mother's allowance	2
TOTAL	19	30

Notes

1. The table shows:
   (i) The effects of increasing one-parent benefit and widowed mother's allowance and of making increases in the income related benefits to allow all claimants of one-parent benefit and widowed mother's allowance to get the full increases;
   (ii) The cost of increasing one-parent benefit and widowed mother's allowance without making such increases in the income related benefits. In this case increases in one parent benefit and widowed mother's allowance for people on income related benefits would be offset by reductions in those benefits.

2. It is not possible to get both one-parent benefit and widowed mother's allowance.

Press and Public Relations Staff

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give for each year from 1979-80, including 1991-92, the number of staff actually employed on 1 April and the full complement of staff, including vacant posts in the press and public relations office of his Department.

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 26 April 1991] Functions which are commonly associated with press and public relations are carried out by the Department's headquarters information division.

Information for the years 1979-80 to 1987-88 is not available in the form requested.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Southern Health and Social Services (Finances)

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what measures he will take to improve the budgetary position of the Southern health and social services board in this current financial year.

Mr. Hanley: The Southern board has been allocated over £125 million in this financial year, an increase of £10·5 million. It will receive in addition a share of central money reserved for community care and have available the proceeds of its own cost improvements. It is for the board to formulate its operational plan for the use of these substantial resources in line with its declared priorities.

Road Fund Licences

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is his estimate of the number of second-hand cars permanently exported from Great Britain to Northern Ireland for which the car owner has to apply for a new road fund licence document; and what is the average period of time between application for such documents and their being posted to the new owner.

Mr. Needham: In 1990, the Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland received applications for new vehicle registration documents for 16,675 previously registered vehicles permanently imported to Northern Ireland from Great Britain. The average time between receipt of a valid application and issue of the new registration document is 10 working days.

Doctors

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many doctors in general practice in each health board area in Northern Ireland are (a) Protestants, (b) Roman Catholics and (c) others; and in each category by board area, how many were trained in (i) Northern Ireland, (ii) the Irish Republic, (iii) Great Britain and (iv) overseas.

Mr. Hanley: General practitioners are self-employed independent contractors and as such information about their religious affiliation is not held.

A breakdown showing their places of graduation is set out below.

	Eastern	Northern	Southern	Western	Total
Northern Ireland	316	170	108	69	663

Employment

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a table in the Official Report to show (i) the number of employers or firms in Northern Ireland which employ more than 90 per cent. Protestants, (ii) the distribution of such firms by council area, (iii) the number of such firms in the following bands (a) 1-49, (b) 50-99 and (c) 100-plus employees; and, where such an employer has more than one establishment, where persons are employed treating each such different establishment as a separate entity.

Mr. Needham: From the 1,857 concerns with more than 25 employees which submitted monitoring returns to the Fair Employment Commission on the community composition of the work forces during the 1990 monitoring round, the information is:

1. There are 242 concerns which employ more than 90 per cent. Protestants.
2. The distribution by district council area is:

Fergal Caragher

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he expects a copy of the autopsy report on Fergal Caragher of Cullyhanna will be made availble to Mr. Caragher's widow; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: Under the Coroners (Practice and Procedures) Rules (NI) 1963 the question of whether and, if so, when to make available to properly interested persons a report of a post mortem examination of the body of a person whose death has been reported to a coroner is entirely a matter for the coroner concerned.

EMPLOYMENT

Health and Safety Executive

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many deaths are estimated to occur each year from health-related problems caused by work; and what is the total number of doctors and nurses employed by the Health and Safety Executive, excluding those working in employment rehabilitation centres.

Mr. Forth: The Health and Safety Executive's current best estimate suggests that ill-health caused by work gives rise to at least 2,000 deaths a year and contributes to a further 8,000.

On 1 April 1991 there were 110 doctors and nurses employed by the HSE. This figure includes 22 nurses currently working in employment rehabilitation centres who will shortly be integrated with the local employment medical advisory service team.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement about the assessment and measurement of the quality of the work undertaken by the Health and Safety Executive.

Mr. Forth: Maintaining the high quality of the work carried out by the Health and Safety Executive's staff is essential to the achievement of the organisation's aims and objectives. The nature of HSE's work, with its wide range of non-standard outputs based on professional judgments, makes it difficult to express output and performance in terms of indicators of both quantity and quality. Methods currently used to assess quality include, for example, systems for laboratory quality assurance, the application of medical audit, and reviews by management services staff, as well as the day-to-day quality assurance that comes from the management of professional staff by more senior professional colleagues. Other initiatives are currently being pursued, including one to examine the application of the concepts of total quality management in the HSE, which will include consideration of how more and better measures of quality might be devised to supplement the current range of performance measures.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment why callers are no longer able to get through to the Health and Safety Executive's main public inquiry point at its Bootle headquarters; and when he expects the public inquiry point to reopen.

Mr. Forth: The public inquiry point at Bootle has been closed since the middle of 1990 and the Health and Safety Executive has no plans to reopen it, because it believes that inquiries can be effectively handled by the two remaining public inquiry points in London and Sheffield and through the national network of 20 area offices.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many CEN—European Committee for Standardisation—committees have representatives from the Health and Safety Executive sitting on them; and if he will list them.

Mr. Forth: At present 42 Health and Safety Executive staff are members of one or more delegations from the British Standards Institution to committees or working groups at CEN. HSE staff form part of the delegation to the CEN committees listed in the table below.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) how much time is used by Health and Safety Executive staff in recording work undertaken;

(2) if he will explain the reasons for the use of work recording systems in the Health and Safety Executive.

Mr. Forth: The HSE's principal resource is the time of its professional and administrative staff. Work recording plays a key part in the process of planning, monitoring and accounting for the time of staff allocated to particular activities, thus ensuring that resources are applied to meeting priority objectives.

The time spent by the HSE's staff in recording their activities is part of the administrative work associated with these activities, and is not itself separately recorded.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when he expects the financial benefits of closing the Health and Safety Executive's Cricklewood laboratory and moving the work to Sheffield to be realised.

Mr. Forth: Many of the financial benefits of the relocation will begin to accrue from the outset, as the move will eliminate some of the requirements for support staff, London pay differentials, travel and subsistence, postage and telecommunication services, and so on. Other financial benefits will be felt at a later stage. For example, the expected lower turnover of staff when the laboratory is in Sheffield will be a major advantage, not only in terms of the research and laboratory services division's—RLSD—effectiveness but in reduced recruitment and training costs, etc.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will identify the number of premises, in each of the Health and Safety Executive regions which are subject to the Control of Industrial Major Accident Hazards Regulations 1984 which have not yet been issued with a fire certificate by the Health and Safety Executive in accordance with the Fire Certificates (Special Premises) Regulations 1976.

Mr. Forth: Information is not readily available centrally and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what action he intends to take to assist the Health and Safety Executive in overcoming the problems of under-reporting of accidents and the low level of registration by employers.

Mr. Forth: I am satisfied that the Health and Safety Executive is already taking and planning effective action to encourage both the reporting of accidents and registration by employers.

During visits to all workplaces, HSE inspectors give advice and guidance, remind employers of their responsibilities under the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 and related legislation including the Reporting of Injuries, Diseases and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1984 and when appropriate take action to secure compliance.

As part of planned preventive inspection, inspectors continue to seek out and inspect new and unregistered workplaces. To complement this, special initiatives have been, and will continue to be, mounted on a local or regional basis aimed specifically at both registered and unregistered small firms in defined geographical areas. Planned publicity for such targeted initiatives enables the HSE to get the health and safety message across and stimulate better standards of compliance with the legislation.

Additionally, between 1 July and 31 December 1991, the HSE plans to carry out a pilot exercise in seven areas to assess the feasibility of employing visiting officers to identify establishments for inspection. One of the objectives of the exercise, which will complement normal inspection arrangements is to seek out and indentify establishments not registered with the HSE.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of the costs of attendance by Health and Safety Executive personnel at CEN committees is borne by the Health and Safety Executive and what by the European Commission.

Mr. Forth: The travel and subsistence costs of Health and Safety Executive staff attending CEN committees are at present met by the Health and Safety Executive. I understand that there are now arrangements whereby the CEC will pay to CEN a proportion of the costs of chairmen of committees and of the convenors of working groups. The Health and Safety Executive is discussing with the British Standards Institution how it will recover its share of such costs.

Agricultural and Factory Inspectors

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what are the differences in the quality of work required from principal agricultural inspectors and factory inspectors 1A.

Mr. Forth: The Health and Safety Executive does not differentiate between the quality of work required from principal agricultural inspectors and factory inspectors 1A.

Health and Safety Commission

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what discussions he has had with the chairman of the Health and Safety Commission about the effect of inflation on the level of activity of the Health and Safety Commission; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: None. Once again, the Government have met in full the Health and Safety Commission's request for funds for the current financial year. In his letter to the Secretary of State enclosing the plan of work for 1991-92 and beyond, the commission's chairman confirmed that these funds enable the commission to take forward its plan of work for this financial year with no additional bid for resources. The plan of work will be published later this month.

Employment Medical Advisory Service

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what criteria are used to assess the suitability of appointed doctors; and how many doctors have had their status as appointed doctors withdrawn by EMAS;

(2) what proportion of doctors appointed by EMAS have qualifications in occupational health;

(3) how many appointed doctors are currently registered with EMAS; and how many days' training, on average, each received from EMAS staff.

Mr. Forth: There are currently 1,369 appointed doctors registered with EMAS. Approximately 40 per cent. of doctors currently appointed by EMAS hold formal qualifications in occupational health, and all are encouraged to take the Faculty of Occupational Medicine's 30 to 50 hours introductory course in occupational health.

Each doctor is provided with appropriate induction training prior to being appointed and all appointed doctors are normally given the opportunity to attend a one-day seminar run by EMAS on an annual basis in each HSE area/region. No records are maintained of the time spent training individual doctors.

The local senior employment medical adviser is required to ensure that any doctor seeking an appointment is suitable and competent and has the necessary facilities and equipment to carry out the required duties.

The Health and Safety Executive does not maintain historical data on the number of doctors who have had their status as appointed doctors withdrawn, but in recent years several hundred appointments have been no longer required as a result of legislative change.

Disabled People

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will state the number and locations of the TECs which have any links with employment rehabilitation centres or asset centres or which have sought to place trainees with disabilities in these centres.

Mr. Jackson: The information is not held centrally. I know that training and enterprise councils will decide carefully what is best for people with special training needs.

Field Operations Divisions

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many categories of work are required to be recorded on the field operations division WR1 form.

Mr. Forth: Three forms WR1, currently in use by different parts of the field operations divisions, make provision for a combined total of 78 different categories of work to be recorded.

Employment Rehabilitation

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what guidance has been given to training and enterprise councils on the services that can be provided by the employment rehabilitation service.

Mr. Jackson: Training and enterprise councils have been advised that they are able to access the facilities of the employment rehabilitation service—ERS—as part of making appropriate arrangements for trainees with special needs.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what advice or guidance has been given in writing to employment rehabilitation and asset centre managers and staff on the role of psychology assistants; and whether in all cases the psychology assistants are working under the direct supervision and control of a higher or senior occupational psychologist.

Mr. Jackson: Questions on operational matters in the Employment Service executive agency are the responsibility of Mike Fogden, the agency's chief executive, to whom I have referred this question for reply.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the future of the employment rehabilitation service.

Mr. Jackson: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre (Mr. Mans) on 16 April 1991, Official Report, columns 157-59.

Wath Recycling

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many visits have been paid to the premises of Wath Recycling by officials of his Department, including the Health and Safety Executive in connection with the toxic waste held at these premises since this material arrived in the summer of 1989.

Mr. Forth: Inspectors and specialist inspectors from the Health and Safety Executive have paid a total of 21 visits to the premises of Wath Recycling Ltd. in connection with the toxic waste held at the premises since its arrival in the summer of 1989.

Training

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he will publish the anticipated unit cost per week of training disabled students by training and enterprise councils and local enterprise councils;

(2) if he will publish the anticipated unit cost per week of training able-bodies students by TECs and LECs;

(3) what percentage of financial resources made available by central Government to training and enterprise councils and local enterprise councils is to be allocated specifically for the training of disabled students by TECs and LECs.

Mr. Jackson: My Department funds each TEC on the basis of an agreed average unit cost per trainee week and per output achieved. The funding of training for able bodied people or people with disabilities is a matter for negotiation between TECs and their training providers. Funding arrangements for LECs are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what percentage of students seeking training at TECs and LECs will be (a) disabled and (b) able-bodied;

(2) what is the anticipated demand for training by disabled students through TECs and LECs.

Mr. Jackson: Forecasts are not available of the number of trainees with disabilities who may require and or obtain places on programmes run by TECs and LECs. The Government are committed to equal opportunities and action has been taken to ensure that there is no discrimination against people with disabilities.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Decommissioning Scheme

Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent discussions he has had with representatives of fishing organisations on the introduction of a decommissioning scheme.

Mr. Gummer: I regularly meet individual fishermen. Most recently I spent two days in north-east Scotland where I talked individually to a large number of fishermen from the region.

Agricultural Tenancies

Mr. Mans: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what objectives he is setting for his consultative paper on agricultural tenancy legislation.

Mr. Gummer: Any reform must ensure that there is more land to let.

Milk

Mr. Burt: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received from the Milk Marketing Board on proposed changes to the milk marketing scheme.

Mr. Gummer: In March the Milk Marketing Board submitted proposals setting out the terms on which it might transform itself into a voluntary co-operative.

Beef

14. Mr. Alison: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to help British beef producers and to reduce the levels of beef intervention stocks.

Mr. Gummer: In the long term we will be pressing the Community to replace the present intervention system with a mechanism which provides more direct help to the farmer.

Slaughterhouses

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the future of the slaughtering industry in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Maclean: The Government fully support the principle of common health standards for all meat plants after 1992 and believe that there will continue to be opportunities for businesses of all sizes producing high-quality British meat products.

Organic Farming

Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the extensification scheme for organic farming.

Mr. Curry: My right hon. Friend the Minister has made clear the Government's intention to introduce a scheme under EC rules to help farmers who wish to convert to organic production. I hope that the European Commission's proposals on agriculture and the environment will provide the legal basis for the type of scheme we have in mind.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proposals he has for encouraging the growing and sale of agricultural and horticultural produce free of additives, pesticides and non-organic fertilisers.

Mr. Maclean: My right hon. Friend the Minister and this Department have been long-time supporters of organic farming.

We expect to commission research projects shortly in hill grazing of livestock and on a mixed arable and pig unit.

Research is already under way on pests and diseases in organic winter wheat.

Animal Carcases

Mr. McKelvey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will provide financial assistance to farmers to deal with the problem of disposal of animal carcases.

Mr. Maclean: No. As with all other industries it is the responsibility of the livestock sector to find ways of handling its waste within existing health and environmental controls.

State Veterinary Service

Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give the number of people employed in the state veterinary service in 1980 and 1990.

Mr. Gummer: The number of people employed in the state veterinary service on 1 January 1980 was 1,652 and on 1 January 1990, 1,402.

Fishing, North-East Scotland

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he next intends to visit the north-east of Scotland to study the local fishing industry.

Mr. Curry: I shall meet the Scottish Fishermen's Federation in advance of the next Council of Fisheries Ministers. My right hon. Friend the Minister visited Scotland last week and met fishermen in the course of his tour.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Pike: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent representations his Department has received on methods of disposal of bovine spongiform encephalopathy-infected carcases.

Mr. Maclean: We receive a number of representations on methods of disposal of carcases affected by BSE.

Birds (Imports)

Mr. Oppenheim: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on his recent decision to suspend imports of captive birds from Tanzania.

Mr. Maclean: In my reply of 20 February to the hon. Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes), Official Report, column 166, I explained that veterinary officials from the Ministry had visited several major exporting countries in order to impress upon their veterinary authorities the need to fulfil our import requirements and to follow International Air Transport Association standards during flights to the United Kingdom. I also made it clear that we would cease to authorise the import of birds from any country which failed to co-operate in implementing our requirements.

The issue of licences for import of captive birds from Tanzania was suspended because of the failure, despite numerous reminders, of the authorities there to respond to our request to send a veterinary official of the Department to discuss with them various animal health and welfare matters, the standard of health certification and the conditions under which future imports of captive birds would take place.

We have recently had a positive response from the authorities in Tanzania and one of our veterinary officials is arranging to make a visit this month. We have decided that, until we receive his report and are satisfied that imports of captive birds from Tanzania can take place under satisfactory health and welfare conditions, it would not be appropriate for the suspension of the issue of import licences to be lifted.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the number of humming birds imported into the United Kingdom in 1988 and 1989, indicating in each case the number dead on arrival and the number of deaths while in quarantine.

Mr. Maclean: The information is given below. Copies of the reports from which the figures are taken, "Imports of Birds—Mortality Statistics from Quarantine Returns", have been placed in the Library of the House.

	1988	1989
Humming birds imported[1]	128	158
Found dead on arrival	24	2
(Percentage dead on arrival)	(18·75)	(1·26)
Died in quarantine	62	51
(Percentage died in quarantine)	(48·44)	(32·28)

[1] Includes all species in the family Trochilidae (Humming birds).

Mr. Gould: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many (i) green-cheeked Amazon parrots and (ii) grey parrots were imported into the United Kingdom in each year since 1988.

Mr. Maclean: The information is given below. Copies of the reports from which the figures are taken, "Importation of Birds—Mortality Statistics from Quarantine Returns", have been placed in the Library of the House. Figures for the year 1990 are not yet available.

	Number of birds imported
	1988	1989
(I) Green-cheeked Amazona (Amazon Viridigenalis)	22	17
(II) Grey parrot (Psittacus Erithacus)	5,565	6,043

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate the annual running cost of the regional veterinary investigations centres relating to investigations of mortalities among imported birds.

Mr. Maclean: The estimated annual running cost of the veterinary investigation centres relating to investigations of mortalities among imported birds for the year April 1990 to March 1991 is of the order of £350,000 at full economic cost.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his estimate of the number of imported wild birds which died after leaving quarantine for the most recent period for which data are available.

Mr. Maclean: Data on the number of imported birds which die after leaving quarantine are not collected by the Ministry.

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Wray: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what has been, for each year since 1984, the cost to the European Community of the common agricultural policy.

Mr. Gummer: Expenditure from the European Community budget on the common agricultural policy was:

Year	billion ecu	£ billion
1984	19·0	11·1
1985	20·5	12·0
1986	22·9	14·8
1987	23·8	17·2
1988	28·8	19·6
1989	27·3	17·9
[1]1990	28·2	19·7

[1] provisional

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps have been taken by the Council of Agriculture Ministers to ensure that spending is maintained within the legal limits in the current calendar year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: The Agriculture Council is currently considering agricultural price proposals for the 1991-92 marketing years which are intended to keep CAP expenditure within the agricultural guideline in 1991.

Multi-annual Guidance Programme

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proposals he has to bring into effect in England the new multi-annual guidance programme from the European Commission.

Mr. Curry: No such programme yet exists.

Agricultural Land (Ownership)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what percentage of agricultural land in England and Wales is owned by overseas investors; and if he will list (a) the countries concerned and (b) the percentage of land owned by each.

Mr. Curry: I regret that no official statistics are available on such ownership of agricultural land.

Whaling

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if his Department has commissioned or published any research regarding the penthrite explosive harpoon method of whaling.

Mr. Curry: No, the United Kingdom ceased whaling in 1963. We have examined the reports made to the International Whaling Commission and see the need for a further review.

Flavoured Potato Crisps

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking to resist the European Commission's proposal affecting the sale of flavoured potato crisps after 1992.

Mr. Curry: We are pressing the Commission to accept the amendment to that proposal which was put forward by the European Parliament. We shall take the matter up again in discussions in the Council if the Commission's revised proposals do not include the provision we are seeking.

Gumboro Disease

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the incidence of Gumboro disease in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Maclean: As Gumboro disease is not notifiable, accurate figures on its incidence are not available. Latest estimates suggest that there has been a slight improvement in the situation in the last year.

Sweeteners

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will make a statement outlining the procedures which Her Majesty's Government will be subject to in raising at the European Council of Ministers the issue of the exclusion of snack foods from the directive on sweeteners; and when the meeting will take place;

(2) what is the timetable of further procedures which the draft directive on sweeteners in food will undergo before coming into effect.

Mr. Maclean: The proposed directive on the use of sweeteners in foods is subject to the procedure for consultation with the European Parliament laid down in the Single European Act, a copy of which is in the Library of the House. Following the European Parliament's first opinion, the Commission is now engaged in preparing a revised proposal for the Council. The Council will then seek to adopt a common position by qualified majority, after which the Parliament will have three months to reconsider it. Depending on the outcome of the Parliament's consideration, the Council may adopt the proposal, or the Commission may again amend it within one month. The Council must then act within three months or the proposal lapses. No more precise timetable can be given.

Quarantine Stations

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many Ministry-approved quarantine stations are owned or managed by importers or traders in wildlife.

Mr. Maclean: All Ministry-approved quarantine premises, whether for foot and mouth disease, rabies or Newcastle disease, are privately owned, but information as to owners/ownership is not available in the precise form requested. However, in 1990, the Ministry approved 137 premises in England for the quarantine of small mammals, other than domestic dogs and cats, imported under the rabies import controls. In the same year the Ministry issued a total of 644 import licences in respect of consignments of captive birds to be landed in England. In each case the quarantine premises would have been subject to prior inspection and approval by the Ministry before the issue of a licence. Some of the bird quarantine premises will have been used, and thus approved, more than once during 1990.

Animals (Live Exports)

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many representations he has received concerning the export of live horses and ponies; and what action he proposes to strengthen European legislation on this matter.

Mr. Maclean: The Government continue to receive many representations on this subject. Negotiations have recently resumed on the Commission's proposals for a new Community regulation on protection of animals during transport. The Government are pressing hard for the retention of measures which will prevent the export of horses and ponies for slaughter.

Nitrogens

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has for reducing nitrogen use in farming; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: We continually emphasise the need for farmers to avoid nitrogen fertiliser applications beyond good agricultural practice and we are pleased to note the reduction in autumn and total applications to key crops that has occurred since 1985.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

RECHAR

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to meet the requirements of the European Commissioner to allow additional spending with regard to RECHAR; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Leigh: My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Trade and Industry, for Northern Ireland, for Wales and for Scotland, and other Ministers, met Mr. Bruce Millan, European Commissioner with responsibility for regional policies, on 25 April to discuss issues relating to the Community's structural funds.

The proposed RECHAR programmes of grants for United Kingdom coalfield areas were one of the subjects discussed. The meeting helped reduce the misunderstanding there has been about the additionality of Community grants. We remain in touch with the Commission and hope that agreement will now soon be reached to enable these useful programmes to proceed.

Consumers' Deposits

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will introduce legislation to ensure that deposits paid by consumers for goods or services are held in trust so that in the event of a company going into receivership, liquidation or bankruptcy, the deposit will be refunded to the consumer.

Mr. Leigh: We have no plans to introduce such legislation. The Government accepted the view of the Insolvency Law Review Committee that compulsory trust accounts would add to the costs and prices of businesses and would be detrimental to the interests of ordinary creditors. The Director General of Fair Trading is, however, continuing to keep this area under review, and we shall give careful consideration to any recommendations he may make.

Stormseal

Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will make an application against Mike and Mark Sweeney, formerly directors of Stormseal and now directors of Sure Style, under the Company Directors Disqualification Act 1986, having particular regard to any responsibility they may have had for the Stormseal company becoming insolvent.

Mr. Redwood: Stormseal UPVC Window Co. Ltd. was one of a group of six companies that went into administrative receivership on 4 January 1991 and were controlled by brothers Mark and Michael Sweeney. Subsequently on 27 March 1991 winding-up orders were made against Stormseal and one other company Stirfront Ltd. and the official receiver at Manchester is dealing with their affairs. Both the administrative receiver and the official receiver have a responsibility under the Company Directors Disqualification Act 1986 to consider the conduct of the directors and report any matters to the Secretary of State which they consider makes them unfit to be concerned in the management of a company.

An initial report is required to be submitted within six months of the appointment of the administrative receiver, but it is understood that the complexity of the affairs of the Stormseal group makes it unlikely that a full report will be able to be prepared by June 1991. On receipt of the full reports from the administrative receiver and the official receiver, the Secretary of State will consider whether it is appropriate to apply for disqualification of the said directors or any other persons involved in the affairs of the group.

National Film Commission

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to take a decision on the film industry's proposal for a national film commission.

Mr. Leigh: I am happy to announce that the Government have decided to invite Sydney Samuelson to establish a United Kingdom film commission to promote the United Kingdom as a place to make films and that the commission will receive grants from the DTI totalling £3·5 million over the next four years. The Department will discuss with the commission detailed terms and conditions.

Industry Council

Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the discussions which took place in the EC Industry Council on 29 April.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 7 May 1991]: The Industry Council meeting on 29 April, which Lord Hesketh attended for the United Kingdom, discussed Commission communications on the European electronics and information technology industry, the biotechnology industry and the future of the European Coal and Steel Community treaty. The Council also discussed Community policy on small and medium-sized enterprises and adopted a resolution reaffirming the Council's commitment to promoting the creation and development of small firms throughout the European Community.

Post Office

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what proposals he has to privatise Post Office Counters Ltd;

(2) what preparations Post Office Counters Ltd. is making for privatisation;

(3) what representations he has received concerning the re-establishment of a sub-post office at Newhill, near Rotherham; and if he will make a statement;

(4) what is his policy on the provision of sub-post offices.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 8 May 1991]: The Government have made it clear on a number of occasions that we remain fully committed to the maintenance of a network of post offices adequate to enable the Post Office to fulfil its statutory duty to have regard to economy and efficiency, and to the social, commercial and industrial needs of the United Kingdom. I am satisfied that in managing its network of post offices the Post Office is fully meeting these obligations.

We have at present no plans for the privatisation of the Post Office. Girobank has been successfully transferred to the private sector, but no other decisions have been taken.

It has been the policy of successive Governments since the establishment of the Post Office as a public corporation in 1969 that decisions concerning aspects of the day-to-day running of the postal business, such as those relating to the level of service provision available in particular areas, are the operational responsibility of the Post Office Board. The Government's role in Post Office matters is confined to broad issues of general policy and to matters of overall control.

I understand that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has received no representations concerning the re-establishment of a sub-post office at Newhill, Rotherham.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Zoological Society

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when grants were first made to the Zoological Society of London in connection with scientific research; what has been the total grant paid to date; and what is the proposed grant for the current financial year.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The Department of the Environment first provided funds specifically for the society's Institute of Zoology of £1·3 million in 1988-89. Responsibility for public funding of the institute was transferred to my Department through the Universities Funding Council and the university of London in April 1989. The transfer was accompanied by an increase in public funding through the UFC in respect of the university of London of £1·3 million in the 1989-90 financial year and £1·4 million in the subsequent two financial years. The actual level of funding for the institute is strictly a matter for the university of London. In addition, the institute received grants from the research councils and the Royal Society of £0·5 million in 1989-90.

Humanities (Postgraduate Studentships)

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about the recent change in the arrangements for the administration of the postgraduate state studentship scheme in the humanities.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Since 1984 the British Academy has administered the national scheme for postgraduate studentships in the humanities on behalf of the Secretary of State for Education and Science. Full responsibility for the scheme was transferred to the academy which, with effect from the beginning of this financial year, administers it in its own right. It continues to receive funds for this purpose from my Department.

WALES

Regional Policy

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement following his discussion with the Commissioner for regional policy of the European Community held on 15 April.

Mr. David Hunt: Together with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and other ministerial colleagues, I met European Commissioner Millan on 25 April.

We discussed a wide range of European structural fund matters. Commissioner Millan assured me that a decision on the Dyfed-Gwynedd-Powys integrated development operation programme would be made shortly.

Quangos

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the individual appointments excluding casual vacancies he is scheduled to make to quasi-autonomous non-governmental organisations in (a) 1991 and (b) 1992 indicating in each case the title of the post, the salary if any and the duration of the appointment.

Mr. David Hunt: The readily available information about the appointments for which I am responsible, a number of which will fall to be made in 1991 and 1992, is in "Public Bodies" and "Public Appointments: A Handbook for Women's Organisations", copies of which are in the Library of the House.

Schools Inspectorate

Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he proposes to institute a review of Her Majesty's inspectorate of schools in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: Given the proposed changes in the education service, I think that this is an opportune moment to conduct an in-depth review of the role and structure of Her Majesty's inspectorate in Wales. I am putting in hand arrangements for such a review.

THE ARTS

Paisley Pattern

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Minister for the Arts what plans he has to fund a heritage centre to show the history of and to promote the sale of articles in the paisley pattern; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: I have no plans to fund such a heritage centre. My funding responsibility does not extend to museums in Scotland, where I assume that such a centre would be based.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Passport Service

Mr. John Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will be in a position to reply to the correspondence of the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon requesting a passport for Mrs. Williams of Blaengwynfi, Port Talbot.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I wrote to the right hon. and learned Gentleman about this matter on 22 January. Unfortunately, he does not appear to have received the letter. My office has now forwarded a further copy which I trust he has received.

Gloucester Prison

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the ratio of prison staff to inmates at Gloucester prison for each of the last three years; and what was the comparable figure in the five prisons nearest to it in size.

Mrs. Rumbold: On 1 April 1991, the ratio of prison officers to inmates in local prisons, including principal and senior officers but excluding female establishments, ranged from 0·34 to 0·71 officers per inmate. This variation reflects differences in workload, scale and the particular facilities contained in establishments.

Over the past three years, the ratios at Her Majesty's Prison Gloucester and at the five local prisons nearest to it in size, by number of inmates, were as follows:

Officers per inmate

	1 April 1988	1 April 1989	1 April 1990	1 April 1991
Gloucester	0·45	0·45	0·44	0·48
Bedford	0·50	0·54	0·56	0·68
Shrewsbury	0·33	0·44	0·42	0·53
Leicester[1]	0·49	0·54	0·63	0·70
Reading	0·40	0·51	0·56	0·55
Swansea	0·39	0·51	0·57	0·53

[1] Including special unit

Private Prisons

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what he considers to be appropriate profit levels in privately run penal establishments.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend will take a view on what profit levels are appropriate when considering bids for the operation of Wolds remand prison. The profit level in any agreed contract would, however, be regarded as commercially confidential.

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has to provide for the proper training of managers, social workers and guards in privately run penal establishments; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: The director and other custodial staff of any contracted-out prison would require training to a level specifically approved by my right hon. Friend. The training requirement for Wolds remand prison is set out in schedule 3(b) of the tender documents and is available in the Library. Any social workers engaged by contractors would require the qualifications of their profession.

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners he expects to be situated in privately run penal establishments by 31 December 1994; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: On present plans the management of Wolds remand prison, which will hold some 300 prisoners, would be contracted out in 1992. No decisions have yet been taken about any extension of contracting out. Any such proposals would be subject to parliamentary approval in accordance with the provisions of the Criminal Justice Bill.

River Tweed (Boats)

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has received any proposals for bye-laws to be confirmed relating to the launching of boats in the River Tweed in the borough of Berwick-upon-Tweed.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No.

Haslar Project

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department for what reasons he has withdrawn the Home Office grant for the Haslar project concerned with refugees.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to a question from the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) on 3 May at column 340.

Somalis

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will meet the Merseyside immigration unit to discuss the number of Somalis who are seeking to join their family in Liverpool.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: My right hon. Friend and I do not consider that a meeting at this time would be productive. If there are any particular problems of concern to the Merseyside immigration and advice unit, we should be happy to consider any written representation it wishes to make.

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Somali citizens are seeking settlement in (a) Liverpool and (b) Merseyside at the latest date.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The available information is of the number of Somali nationals granted settlement in the United Kingdom, figures for which are published in table 15 of the Home Office Command Paper "Control of Immigration: Statistics United Kingdom 1989" Cmnd. 1124 a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average waiting time for Somali refugees to join their relatives in Liverpool at the most recent date.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The average time between receipt of an application in the asylum division and a decision is 16 months.

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to improve replies from Lunar house to solicitors and community bodies concerning Somalis seeking settlement in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Because of very large-scale increases in the number of asylum applications from Somalis and other nationalities and the concession operated by the Government for Somalis seeking to join their families in this country, a large amount of work continues to be generated in the asylum division of the immigration and nationality department. On 26 April my right hon. Friend announced a nearly fivefold increase in staff resources for this division. It will take time to recruit and train such a large number of additional staff, but I would expect that in due course decisions will be able to be taken more quickly than at present.

Breathalysers

Sir Ian Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what instructions, advice or other forms of commercial or contractual restrictions have been issued by his Department to the manufacturers or distributors of breathalysers in the United Kingdom on the retail supply of such devices to the public; and if he will list the respective authorities on which they are based.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No such instructions have been issued.

Asylum

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will list by nationality the numbers of nationals seeking asylum in the United Kingdom whose applications have been outstanding for (a) one month, (b) six months, (c) 12 months, (d) 18 months and (e) 24 months; and, of these, how many are in detention;

(2) if he will list the number of asylum seekers by nationality detained at (a) Hardmondsworth, (b) Haslar and (c) HM prisons for a period in excess of (i) one month, (ii) two months, (iii) three months, (iv) four months, (v) five months, (vi) six months and (vii) seven months.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 1 May 1991]: A breakdown by nationality of the number of asylum applications which have currently been awaiting a decision for less than 12 months is not readily available because of delays in recording. Approximate estimates of applications awaiting a decision for between 12 and 24 months are given in table A. Reliable information on cases outstanding for more than 24 months is not available.

Available information on asylum applicants detained is given in table B. No applicants currently detained have been in detention for more than 18 months.

[1]Persons detained, as at 26 April 1991, solely under the powers contained in Schedules 2 or 3 of the Immigration Act 1971. In some cases the asylum application will have been lodged subsequent to the applicant being detained. The figures include both detained asylum applicants who applied at ports, and those detained in after-entry enforcement work. For the latter, the figures exclude persons whose asylum application was refused but who remained in detention.

[2]Any asylum applicant detained for longer than one month is held in one of these locations.

Football Licensing Authority

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many administrative staff are currently in post at the Football Licensing Authority; how many more administrative staff it is planned to appoint; and what will be the time scale of such appointments.

Mr. John Patten [holding answer 8 May 1991]: The number of staff employed by the Football Licensing Authority is a matter entirely within the authority's own discretion. I understand, however, that seven administrative staff are currently in post, and that, while there are no current plans to increase that number, the position will be kept under review.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Director of Works

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed as representing the House of Commons Commission, how much has been paid to headhunters Saxton Bampfylde for the process of selecting a Director of Works for the Palace of Westminster.

Mr. Beith: £20,871·86.

PRIME MINISTER

Ministerial Visit

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Prime Minister when he next plans to make an official visit to the Paisley, South constituency; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I have no immediate plans to do so. I am visiting Scotland today to attend the Scottish Conservative and Unionist Association conference.

Nuclear Test Veterans

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Prime Minister if he has any plans to meet representatives of the British Nuclear Test Veterans Association; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I have no plans to do so. I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) on 18 April 1991 at columns 568-69.

Press Office

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Prime Minister if he will publish the criteria used to govern the activities of his press office; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: My press office operates under the same rules as govern the activities of other civil servants —namely, the civil service pay and conditions of service code and the December 1987 Armstrong note on the duties and responsibilities of civil servants in relation to Ministers. Information officers are involved, as a proper part of their duties, in the processes of presentation of Government policies and decisions.

Economic Regions

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: To ask the Prime Minister (1) which Minister is responsible for keeping under review the relevance of the boundaries of the economic regions; and what is the procedure for altering those boundaries;

(2) whether he will publish a table showing which departments (a) collect or publish statistics based on the economic regions and (b) allocate grants, wholly or in part, on a regional basis, using the economic regions for such allocations, and statistics based on such regions.

The Prime Minister: In considering any proposal to alter the boundaries of the 11 standard regions of the United Kingdom, the Secretary of State for the Environment would take the lead in consultation with colleagues.

A large number of Departments collect or publish statistics based on standard regions. "Regional Trends 25" (HMSO) brings together a very wide range of such statistics and attributes them to the appropriate departmental sources. It is available in the House of Commons Library.

Grants are not allocated, wholly or in part, on the basis of standard regions in England.

Antarctica

Mr. Paice: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement about the recent Antarctic meeting in Madrid.

The Prime Minister: The Government warmly welcome the outcome of the Madrid meeting and hope that the draft protocol tabled there will provide the basis for the comprehensive protection of the Antarctic environment which has always been the Government's objective.

Of particular importance are the provisions for a ban on mineral activity for 50 years, and mechanisms for a review of the ban after 50 years, or before if everyone agrees. The results of these provisions would be that there can never be mining in Antarctica unless all the present consultative parties agree.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Departmental Staff

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a table in the Official Report to show the number of persons employed by the Northern Ireland Office in Northern Ireland and the areas of Northern Ireland from which they are drawn, the number of Roman Catholics, the number of Protestants and the number of others and the religious composition of the population of the areas from which the persons are drawn between the ages of 18 and 64 years.

Dr. Mawhinney: A significant proportion of the home civil service staff employed in the Northern Ireland Office in Northern Ireland are from Great Britain. They were educated outside Northern Ireland and their community background has not been determined. It would not be appropriate to provide the information sought.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a table to show the number of persons employed by the civil service in Northern Ireland, the areas of Northern Ireland from which they are drawn, the number of Roman Catholics, the number of Protestants and the number of others, the religious composition of the areas from which they are drawn in the age group 18 to 64 years and the religious composition of the Northern Ireland population in the same age group.

Dr. Mawhinney: The numbers and composition in terms of the community background of Northern Ireland civil servants are given in a regular series of reports issued by the Northern Ireland civil service's equal opportunities unit, the most recent of which was published during October 1989. Copies of this and the two previous reports are in the Library.

The third report, besides giving information about the numbers and community background of Northern Ireland civil servants, also gave an estimate as to labour availability. For this it drew on the continuous household survey for the years 1985 to 1987 regarding economically active persons aged 16 and over. Details for the age group 18 to 64 are not readily available. The table gives the relevant information.

	Percentage Protestant	Percentage Roman Catholic	Percentage Others
Northern Ireland Civil Service	55·3	34·5	10·2
Economically active population estimate	60·9	35·5	3·6

In the main, the Northern Ireland civil service recruits on a Northern Ireland basis. The community background of successful candidates plays no part in determining where such candidates are posted. For this reason, it has not been considered appropriate to monitor applications and/or appointments other than on a Northern Ireland basis. Information regarding the community background of staff based on the areas of Northern Ireland from which they are drawn is not therefore available. Such analyses could be undertaken only at disproportionate cost.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Cambodia (Peace Plan)

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on additions to the permanent five peace plan for Cambodia, proposed recently by Japan.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We welcome Japan's active involvement in the peace process. We are carefully considering the Japanese proposals concerning the ceasefire arrangements and measures to prevent the recurrence of genocide, although both the state of Cambodia and China have expressed reservations.

TRANSPORT

Breathalysers

Sir Ian Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will now take steps to permit and encourage the advertising and retail sale of self-testing breathalyser devices and procedures.

Mr. Chope: Those wishing to advertise and sell self-testing breathalyser devices are free to do so. As in any commercial endeavour, the demands of the marketplace are likely to provide the most effective form of encouragement.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Solicitors Complaints Bureau

Mr. John Townend: To ask the Attorney-General how many complaints have been received about the legal profession from judges, lawyers, members of the public and the lay observer during the past 12 months; and what assessments he has made of the efficiency of the Solicitors Complaints Bureau.

The Attorney-General: This information is not available in the form requested. The responsibility for any assessment of the efficiency of the Solicitors Complaints Bureau lies with the Law Society.

The Government responded to disquiet about the handling of complaints about the legal profession by establishing under the Courts and Legal Services Act 1990 the office of Legal Services Ombudsman, to be independent of government and the profession, and to have a wider range of powers than the lay observer whom he replaced. The Legal Services Ombudsman will present an annual report to the Lord Chancellor which will be laid before Parliament.

DEFENCE

Efficiency Exercise Incentive Scheme

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what guidance he has issued on the uses to which money awarded under the Department's efficiency exercise incentive scheme can be put; and how the expenditure of such moneys is monitored.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Guidance was issued to management areas about the way money awarded under the Department's trial efficiency incentive scheme was to be used. The guidelines stated that the scheme was intended to provide as much flexibility as possible on the type of project on which a management area chose to spend its reward, provided that the project did not breach Treasury guidelines and complied with departmental instructions on propriety and value for money; and that the project should benefit the defence community as a whole and/or contribute to its future efficiency. Proposals for projects on which management areas wished to spend their rewards were required to be approved by the relevant service executive committee member, commander-in-chief or the chief of defence procurement, and also by the relevant senior finance officer. Details were reported to a central point where the expenditure could be monitored against the sums awarded.

NATO

Sir Eldon Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how and when he expects to make known to the House the results of NATO's review of its role, force levels and the deployment of allied forces in Europe, following the end of the cold war and east-west agreement on conventional forces.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Work on NATO's strategy review is continuing. We will keep the House informed.

NGOs (Appointments)

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the individual appointments excluding casual vacancies he is scheduled to make to quasi-autonomous non-governmental organisations in (a) 1991 and (b) 1992 indicating in each case the title of the post, the salary if any and the duration of the appointment.

Mr. Alan Clark: I refer the hon. Member to "Public Bodies 1990" issued by the office of the Minister for the Civil Service in December 1990; pages 12 to 14 list Ministry of Defence appointments. Relevant information is also in "Public Appointments: a Handbook for Women's Organisations", pages 31 to 37, published by the Women's National Commission. Copies of these publications are available in the Library.

Buccaneer and Tornado Aircraft

Sir Eldon Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if, on completion of his assessment of the performance of RAF equipment in Operation Desert Storm, he will make a statement on the operational benefits, including target identification and accuracy, of Buccaneer and Tornado aircraft working together.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The performance of all aircraft and equipment used in the Gulf is still being evaluated. We have not yet decided how the results of this work might be made public.

Sea King Helicopters

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make it his policy to order Sea King helicopters to replace or supplement older helicopters in the search and rescue role; and when he will announce his decision on replacement search and rescue aircraft.

Mr. Alan Clark: Although the Wessex continues to make a valuable contribution to the search and rescue service, we are examining the case for its replacement as part of the MOD's normal equipment planning process. An announcement will be made once a decision is taken.

HEALTH

Cryptosporidiosis

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the current incidence of cryptosporidiosis in the Battersea area.

Mr. Dorrell: An increased number of cases of cryptosporidiosis has been reported from the Wandsworth area. A detailed investigation into the cause of the increase is being conducted by the local consultant in communicable disease control with the support of the Public Health Laboratory Service.

Severely Disabled People

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions he has had with representatives from disability organisations on the need to secure future local authority payments to severely disabled people to enable them to make their own personal assistance arrangements.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I have had several such discussions, most recently at a meeting with the Spinal Injuries Association in March.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if it is still his policy to retain the legal prohibition on local authorities from making payments to severely disabled people to employ their own personal care assistants; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: During the passage of the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990, the Government gave careful consideration to an amendment to allow local authorities to make payments direct to those in need of services, but decided not to do so because of the difficulties in determining which clients would be eligible for direct payments and in controlling costs. However, our guidance stresses the need for disabled people to be fully involved in decisions about the care which they need and points out that there is no reason why a disabled person who wants to have day-to-day management of his or her carers should not do so.

Hip Fractures

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the number of hospital episodes for hip fractures distinguishing between men and women, and women aged over 75 years nationally and in each health authority region, in each year since 1980; and what is his estimate of the total annual national cost of these procedures.

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 30 April 1991]: Information is given in the table about the estimated numbers of discharges and deaths from 1980 to 1985 and finished consultant episodes between 1987-88 and 1989-90 for hip fractures. Information is not available centrally on the total annual national cost of these procedures.

Estimated numbers of discharges and deaths (1980 to 1985) and finished consultant episodes (1987-88 to 1989-90) where principal diagnosis was ICD 820: Fracture of neck or femur by RHA of residence

SOCIAL SECURITY

Claims

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what are the current figures in (a) numbers and (b) time involved in waiting for claims to be dealt with; and what were the figures 12 months ago.

Miss Widdecombe: The total number of claims received and the average clearance time for the month or quarter ending 31 March, and the comparable figures for March 1990 are in the table.

Quangos

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the individual appointments excluding casual vacancies he is scheduled to make to quasi-autonomous non-governmental organisations in (a) 1991 and (b) 1992 indicating in each case the title of the post, the salary if any and the duration of the appointment.

Miss Widdecombe: The readily available information about the appointments for which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is responsible, a number of which fall to be made in 1991 and 1992, is given in "Public Bodies" and "Public Appointments: A Handbook for Women's Organisations", copies of which are in the Library.

Mortgages

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will indicate how many mortgages supported by DSS interest payments total (i) over £700,000, (ii) £600,000 to £700,000, (iii) £500,000 to £600,000, (iv) £400,000 to £500,000, (v) £300,000 to £400,000, (vi) £200,000 to £300,000, (vii) £100,000 to £200,000, (viii) £50,000 to £100,000 and (ix) under £50,000; what is the average weekly interest paid by the DSS in each band; and what is the total DSS payment of interest for each band.

Miss Widdecombe: This information is not collected and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Information about the amount of weekly loan interest included in the assessment of income support is collected and is published in the income support annual statistical enquiry. A copy of the 1989 enquiry is in the Library; the 1990 enquiry will be available shortly.

Residential Care Allowance

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the level of funding provided by way of the residential care allowance.

Miss Widdecombe: The estimated annual expenditure on income support for claimants in residential care at August 1990 was £772 million, excluding nursing homes.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received about the adequacy of residential care allowances.

Miss Widdecombe: A number of representations have been received recently both from individuals and representative bodies.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps he takes to monitor the impact on rent levels and the number of tenancies in the private, housing association and local authority sectors of the residential care allowance.

Miss Widdecombe: The higher income support limits for people in residential care homes are based on costs of care, not on charges by the homes or on housing costs and occupancy rates prevailing in the community as a whole. Residents in local authority homes do not receive the higher income support levels of benefit.

Cold Weather Payments

Mr. Andrew Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many claims for cold weather payments have been received by his Department since 1 January; and how many claims were (i) approved, (ii) refused and (iii) still outstanding at 30 April.

Mr. Scott: The information will be placed in the Library as soon as it is available.

Gulf: Crisis Loans

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he intends to reply to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Shettleston's letters of 7 March and 14 April regarding the Gulf crisis: crisis loans.

Mr. Jack: I apologise for the delay in the Department not replying sooner to the hon. Member's letters. Following receipt of the letters, work has been undertaken to fully examine the circumstances of the hon. Member's constituent, and to recheck the information given in the reply he received from the local office manager on 29 January. The case has a number of factors which are being given careful consideration, but inquiries should shortly be completed and a reply will be sent to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Disablement Benefits

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people were receiving industrial disablement at each rate at the last date for which figures are available; and if he will break down the figures by sex and standard age cohorts.

Mr. Scott [holding answer 1 May 1991]: The information is in the table.

[1] 10,200 beneficiaries with disablements of between one and nineteen per cent. receive disablement pensions. Those of 1-13 per cent. are included at 10 per cent. and those of 14-19 per cent. are included at 20 per cent.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Taxation

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will indicate for the last year for which figures are available, how much was collected in (a) Northern Ireland and (b) Scotland in respect of (i) income tax, showing PAYE separately, (ii) national insurance, (iii) value added tax, (iv) capital gains tax, (v) capital transfer tax, (vi) stamp duty on conveyancing, (vii) other stamp duty, (viii) inheritance tax, (ix) road tax on private vehicles and commercial vehicles separately, (x) duty on alcohol, (xi) duty on tobacco, (xii) duty on petrol and (xiii) duty on purchase of new vehicles.

Mr. Maude:

(i) No information is available on total income tax or PAYE collected in Northern Ireland and Scotland, but total income tax liabilities in 1987-88, the latest available year, were estimated to be £3·4 billion for taxpayers resident in Scotland and £0·8 billion for Northern Ireland residents.

(ii) National insurance receipts from Northern Ireland were £574 million in 1989-90. No figures are available for Scotland.

(iv) No information available for Northern Ireland and Scotland.

(v) and

(viii) Provisional estimates of receipts of estate duty, capital transfer tax and inheritance tax in 1990-91 are £74 million for Scotland and £18 million for Northern Ireland.

(vi) Stamp duty on conveyancing received by the Edinburgh Stamp Office in 1990-91 was £62 million and the corresponding amount for the Belfast Stamp Office was £8 million.

(vii) No information available for Northern Ireland and Scotland.

(ix) Estimates for Vehicle Excise Duty revenue in 1989-90 are as follows:

	Scotland £ million	Northern Ireland £ million
Total	230	65
Private, light goods vehicles and motorcycles	175	50
Others	55	15

Note: Figures are rounded to nearest £5 million.

Information on the tax collected in Northern Ireland and Scotland in respect of value added tax, car duty on alcohol, tobacco and petrol could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The information would not reflect the tax falling on final expenditure in Northern Ireland and Scotland.

VAT (Hospices)

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the effects of the recent increase in value added tax on hospices with charity status.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I regret that detailed information of this sort is not readily available.

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on value added tax rating release for hospices with charity status.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: There is a wide range of VAT reliefs designed to assist charities such as hospices with their caring work.

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any proposals to reduce the burden of value added tax falling on caring charities such as hospices.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: No. Charities, including hospices, already benefit from a wide range of VAT reliefs, as well as direct tax reliefs.

Income Levels

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will update to April 1991 the information on net earnings provided in the answer to the then hon. Member for Fulham of 10 February 1987, Official Report, columns 177-78.

Mr. Maude: Estimates of the levels of earnings for the top 5 per cent. of earners are not published. The information in the table is based on estimates of these levels derived from distributions of earnings published in the relevant new earnings surveys. Information for April 1991 is not yet available. Earnings levels are for men or women as appropriate paid at adult rates with pay unaffected by absence. Taxpayers are assumed to have no reliefs or allowances other than the appropriate personal allowance.

Quangos

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the individual appointments excluding casual vacancies he is scheduled to make to quasi-autonomous non-governmental organisations in (a) 1991 and (b) 1992 indicating in each case the title of the post, the salary if any and the duration of the appointment.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: During 1991 the Chancellor is scheduled to appoint or reappoint five members of the National Economic Development Council and a further 15 during 1992. Appointments are for two years and no salary is paid.

In February the Queen, on the recommendation of the Chancellor, appointed five members to the Royal Mint Advisory Committee and during 1992 the Chancellor is scheduled to recommend up to four more appointments. Appointments are for seven years and no salary is paid.

Central Unit on Purchasing

Mr. William Powell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of savings achieved by the central unit on purchasing in each year since 1986.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The central unit on purchasing is an advisory unit responsible for encouraging best procurement practice in central Government Departments. It, therefore, has no executive purchasing responsibilities. However, since the formation of CUP and the start of the Government purchasing initiative in 1986, Departments collectively have achieved savings in excess of £1·3 billion. Detailed figures on departmental savings are set out in CUP's annual reports to the Prime Minister, copies of which are available in the Library.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Government Finance

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will list the authorities which have a higher spending above standard spending assessment but have a lower council tax than Grimsby; and if he will set out the reasons for the difference in each case;

(2) further to his answer of 29 April, Official Report, column 13, if he will list each district where most households are in band B in order of the district's divergence from the standard spending assessment, with the estimated council tax for band B in each district;

(3) further to his answer of 29 April, Official Report, column 13, if he will list each district in order of its percentage increase in spending above its standard spending assessment, showing its correlation with its position in rank order of level of council tax;

(4) if he will publish the correlation, and its statistical significance, between the level of council tax in band B for a two-person household in all districts with (a) the percentage spending of the district over or under standard spending assessment, (b) the band of the average value home in that district, (c) the percentage of homes in band A in that district and (d) the level of unemployment in each district according to the latest available figures.

Mr. Key: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 29 April 1991 to my hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter) at column 12.

Property Values

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing nationally and by regions the average and quintile amounts in income per head and property values together with the percentage deviation in each region from the national average.

Mr. Key: The information requested is not available.

House Prices

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing (i) the outturn of average dwelling prices for 1989 and (ii) for Greater London, Yorkshire and Humberside, the estimated average national capital value for the proposed council tax for all dwellings, all council dwellings and all dwellings less council dwellings; and if he will provide an estimate of the percentage in each of the proposed tax bands in each case.

Mr. Key: The illustrative council tax bills published on 23 April were based on an average property value of about £80,000. Estimates on the same basis of average property values in 1989 are not available. Nor are estimates which distinguish between council and other dwellings.

Quangos

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the individual appointments excluding casual vacancies he is scheduled to make to quasi-autonomous non-governmental organisations in (a) 1991 and (b) 1992, indicating in each case the title of the post, the salary if any and the duration of the appointment.

Mr. Heseltine: Information about the number and levels of remuneration of people appointed to public bodies by my Department is given in "Public Bodies 1990" and "Public Appointments: A Handbook for Women's Organisations", copies of which are in the Library of the House.

Housing Statistics

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing for each region, county and district the number of dwellings and the average rateable value of dwellings within each quintile ranked by rateable value, together with the corresponding capital value; and if he will add in each case the gross revenue yield from rates in 1989-90 and the corresponding yield from the proposed council tax.

Mr. Key: The information requested is not available.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, what is the ratio of average freehold and leasehold dwelling prices in each English region, Scotland and Wales to the English average used in his calculations in the illustrative tables for the council tax compared to 1982, 1977 and 1967; and what were the corresponding ratios for average incomes/earnings.

Mr. Key: Information on house prices for 1982, 1977 and 1967 is not available on a basis comparable with that used in the tables showing illustrative council tax bills. Information on average earnings by regions is published by the Department of Employment in its annual reports of the new earnings survey.

Standard Spending Assessments

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what allowance is made in the standard spending assessment for numbers in private rented accommodation; and how this affects allocations per head of the population in (a) Grimsby, (b) Westminster, (c) Harrogate and (d) Eastbourne.

Mr. Key: The proportion of persons aged 65 years and over living in privately rented accommodation is used within the calculation of the standard spending assessment element for social services for the elderly. Details are given in the Revenue Support Grant Distribution Report (England) which is in the Library.

The SSAs for Grimsby, Harrogate and Eastbourne are therefore unaffected by this factor since they are not social services authorities. Westminster receives around £14 per head of population in its SSA for 1991-92 as a result of this factor.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what allowance is taken in the standard spending assessment for Humberside of the need to raise the numbers of young people staying in education after 16 years.

Mr. Key: The post-16 education standard spending assessment is based on a measure of the number of students aged 16 years and over derived from the latest available counts. Any increase in the numbers of young people in Humberside staying in education beyond the age of 16 will, therefore, be directly reflected in that authority's assessment.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what allowance is made in the standard spending assessment for tourism; and what is the rate per head of population for (a) Grimsby, (b) Westminster, (c) Scarborough and (d) Oxford.

Mr. Key: An allowance for tourism based on domestic overnight visitors is made in the standard spending assessment element for all other services. Details are given in the Revenue Support Grant Distribution (Amendment) Report (England) which is in the Library. The amount of SSA per head of population for 1991-92 allocated on the basis of the tourism factor for each of the listed authorities is as follows: Grimsby £1 per head; Westminster £10 per head; Scarborough £10 per head; and Oxford £1 per head.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for Barrow-in-Furness, Great Grimsby, Westminster, Wandsworth and Elmbridge, the amount per household allowed under the various headings of the standard spending assessment together with the reasons for any difference.

Mr. Key: Details of the 1991-92 standard spending assessments, for all authorities, disaggregated by the main service elements, are given in the "Standard Spending Assessment Handbook 1991-92" which was placed in the Library on 24 April 1991. Figures are shown in pound million and pounds per adult. SSAs are calculated on the basis of general principles applied in the same way to all authorities as described in the Revenue Support Grant Distribution Report (England) and the Revenue Support Grant Distribution (Amendment) Report (England) both of which are also in the Library. Any differences in SSAs between authorities, therefore, reflect their varying characteristics.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what allowance is made in the standard spending assessment for ethnic minorities; and how this affects allocations in (a) Grimsby, (b) Leeds, (c) Birmingham and (d) Wandsworth.

Mr. Key: The country of origin of household members is included in the additional needs indicator which is part of the education standard spending assessment; in the children's social index which is part of the personal social services and all other services SSA. Details are given in the Revenue Support Grant Distribution Report (England) as amended by the Revenue Support Grant Distribution (Amendment) Report, copies of which are in the Library.

The amounts allocated on the basis of each of these indices are shown for all authorities in the "Standard Spending Assessment Handbook 1991/92" which is also in the Library.

Council Tax

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing for each of the seven bands of council tax (i) the average value of the dwellings together with his estimate of (ii) the rateable value and (iii) the average rate required to raise £6·8 billion and (iv) the rate yield in each case as against the tax yield from his proposal.

Mr. Key: Since the bands we propose for the council tax be the same in each area, the average value in each band will be broadly the same in each area. If capital values were taxed directly, a tax rate of under 0·5 per pound of value would be sufficient to raise £6·8 billion in England. Estimates of the rateable value of properties in each of the seven council tax bands are not available.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment further to his answer of 29 April, Official Report, column 13 about the size of increase in council tax required for each percentage point of increase in spending; what is the level of spending above standard spending assessment for (a) Cleethorpes and (b) Grimsby; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: Cleethorpes borough council set its demand on the collection fund for 1991-92 at £7·7 million, which is 31·0 per cent. or £34 per adult above the standard spending assessment. Great Grimsby borough council set its demand on the collection fund for 1991-92 at £11·8 million, which is 30·9 per cent. or £42 per adult above the standard spending assessment.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the assumed yield in paragraph 5 of his illustrative tables for the council tax is gross or net of rebates; and what is the gross yield as a percentage of the capital value overall and by decile groups of properties in terms of value.

Mr. Key: The assumed yield is gross of rebates. The gross yield as a percentage of capital value overall is less than 0·5p in the pound.

Information by decile groups of properties in terms of value is not available.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what he estimates will be the effect of the reduced income from second homes as a result of the change from double standard charge to 50 per cent. council tax in the borough of Berwick-upon-Tweed; and whether this figure was taken into account in the published projection of council tax for the borough.

Mr. Key: As explained in the consultation paper "A New Tax for Local Government", we propose that grant be distributed so that authorities in each area can finance spending at a standard level by levying standard taxable amounts. This will allow for the incidence of homes which are no one's sole or main residence. The illustrative council tax bills published on 23 April made allowance for the incidence of properties presently subject to the standard community charge.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on how the percentage yield from the council tax in each of his seven tax bands compares with the rate of wealth tax on houses in Germany.

Mr. Key [holding answer 7 May 1991]: The proposed council tax and German wealth tax are not directly comparable systems of local taxation.

Humming Birds

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what was the number of licences which were issued for the import of humming birds and other nectar feeding birds in 1988 and 1989, and the average number of birds covered by each licence;

(2) what advice he has received from the United Kingdom Scientific Authority on the convention on trade in endangered species concerning the importation of humming birds and other nectar feeding birds.

Mr. Trippier: The information requested is as follows:

	Licences issued[1]		Birds per licence
	1988	1989	1988	1989
Humming birds (trochilidae)	51	32	22	30
Nectar feeding birds (nectariniidae)	206	372	26	31

[1] Not all licences issued are used.

Our scientific adviser, the joint nature conservation committee, is consulted on all applications to import these birds. It has advised my Department that a number of these species are extremely sensitive and difficult to keep in captivity, although there is no reason why they should not be kept by zoos or individuals with specialist knowledge.

Tenant Incentive Scheme (Lambeth)

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much money has been made available to Lambeth council for the tenant incentive scheme; and how much has been taken up.

Mr. Yeo: Lambeth borough council has been allocated £1 million for cash incentive grants to its tenants in 1991-92 under the Government's homelessness initiative. None of this funding has yet been taken up by the council.

Calderdale (Rating)

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the comparable estimated bills for Calderdale under (a) the proposed council tax, (b) under the poll tax in 1991-92 and (c) on the assumption that rates had remained.

Mr. Key: Illustrative 1991-92 council tax bills were published on 23 April. I have no estimate of the comparable level of bills had rates remained.

Housing (Taxation)

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what unadjusted gross and net percentage rate of tax on the freehold or leasehold value of dwellings in England would be required to yield £6·8 billion of revenue for local government purposes; and if he will publish a table showing the rate of tax and yield nationally and regionally.

Mr. Key: The explanatory notes covering the illustrative council tax bills published on 23 April show that the 18·9 million homes in England had an estimated value of about £80,000. This implies a total value of £1,500 billion and a tax rate of under 0·5p per pound of value to raise £6·8 billion.

Houses (Demolition)

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he proposes to introduce planning controls over the demolition of houses; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: Yesterday we tabled amendments to the Planning and Compensation Bill which will enable the Government to bring the demolition of houses within planning control in England and Wales.

Until recently the Government believed that demolition did not usually constitute development and therefore did not fall within planning control. However, a recent High Court decision held that, in the particular circumstances of the case, the demolition of dwelling houses was development. That decision is subject to an appeal.

For buildings listed as of historical or architectural importance and buildings within conservation areas, demolition is already covered by other controls. Most other demolitions of houses are not contentious and do not justify additional planning controls. However the Government are aware of the concern that has been expressed in particular cases. For example, some potential developers have demolished perfectly sound houses before having the necessary planning permission to erect replacement buildings. Rather than leave a vacant site that may blight neighbouring properties, the local planning authority can feel pressured to grant planning permission for an out-of-character development for which planning permission should be refused.

A public consultation exercise last year showed that, although such "speculative" demolition was not widespread, its occurrence did sometimes cause serious concern. In the light of responses to that consultation process, having reflected on the debates on the subject of demolition at various stages of the Planning and Compensation Bill and bearing in mind the recent High Court judgment, the Government have now concluded that the time is right to introduce selective controls on demolition.

The proposed amendments would extend the definition of development to include the demolition of all buildings. They would also incorporate a direction-making power, which would enable the Secretary of State to provide that the demolition of particular types of building is not development and would not therefore be subject to planning control. Since the problem which these amendments are designed to tackle relates in particular to dwelling houses, our intention is to use this power to exclude from control all demolitions except demolitions of dwelling houses.

Because most demolitions of dwelling houses would not justify the full application of the new controls, we propose using the Town and Country General Development Order 1988 to grant permitted development rights for the demolition of dwelling houses in most circumstances. This would mean that planning permission would not normally be required for such demolition.

However, if a local planning authority wished to prevent demolition in a particular case or in a vulnerable area, it could use its power to give a direction which would require the developer to seek planning permission before proceeding with demolition. Such a direction would require the confirmation of the Secretary of State if it is to remain effective for longer than six months.

By these measures we believe that it will be possible to control these undesirable cases of demolition without putting an undue burden either on developers or on local planning authorities.

Gloucester Grove Estate, Peckham

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will make a decision on the estate action programme bid submitted by the London borough of Southwark in respect of funds to improve the Gloucester Grove estate in Peckham.

Mr. Yeo: My hon. Friend the Minister for Housing announced in February that the Gloucester Grove estate scheme was among applications approved in principle for support under this year's estate action programme, and that the London borough of Southwark had been invited to work up detailed proposals. Final decisions on individual schemes are announced as soon as possible after full submissions have been made and considered.

Planning Applications

Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will introduce compulsory notification and publicity for all planning applications submitted to local authorities.

Mr. Yeo: At present, applicants for planning permission in Scotland are statutorily required to notify neighbours. In England and Wales, by contrast, publicity for most types of planning application is at the discretion of the local planning authority; advice about this is given in my Department's circular 22/88—Welsh Office 44/88.

In the past, the Government have resisted proposals, from hon. Members and elsewhere, that there should be compulsory neighbour notification arrangements in England and Wales. We have argued that the present largely discretionary arrangements are appropriate, given the wide variety of situations in which development proposals arise, and that a statutory requirement to notify neighbours would be a burden on local authorities and applicants.

It has recently come to light that in fact some 75 per cent. of local authorities in England now give some type of publicity to all planning applications. The wide use of computers in local authority planning departments makes this practice less onerous than it would once have been.

Accordingly, the Government have decided that all planning applications in England and Wales, and any subsequent non-trivial amendments to applications, should be given some publicity. We will give effect to this by amending the Town and Country Planning General Development Order 1988, when we have considered the outcome of a public consultation exercise about the methods for achieving this objective. For example, in particular situations site notices, media announcements and other public notice may be no less effective than neighbour notification. The Department will publish by the end of June a consultation paper inviting the views of a wide range of organisations, including local authority and consumer interests. We would then make an amendment to the general development order which could come into effect later this year.

There is already a statutory requirement that owners of land and tenants of agricultural holdings must be notified by applicants for planning permission of planning applications affecting their land. Clause 15 of the Planning and Compensation Bill provides for transferring to secondary legislation many of the detailed procedures which have to be followed. This will make it easier to streamline and reform those procedures. But the Government propose to retain in primary legislation a requirement that owners and agricultural tenants must be notified of planning applications affecting their land. We will table an amendment to the Bill to give effect to this commitment at Report stage.

Twin Tracking

Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has yet reached any conclusions in the light of responses to the consultation letter "Planning and Compensation Bill: Twin-Tracking".

Sir George Young: The Department's consultation letter of 6 March proposed an amendment to clause 14 of the Planning and Compensation Bill to enable local planning authorities to decline to determine a planning application if an appeal was before the Secretary of State in respect of a similar application.

A total of 74 responses were received, of which 16 expressed support for the proposal on the grounds that twin-tracking wastes the resources of local planning authorities and the planning inspectorate and that it involves an element of "queue jumping" in that twin-tracking applicants submit appeals for tactical reasons rather than as a matter of last resort.

Fifty-six respondents were against or strongly against the proposal. Many contended that twin-tracking is often the only lever available to applicants to encourage local authorities to process applications with reasonable promptness. They also argued that the proposal would reduce the scope for constructive negotiation, because developers would lodge appeals as early as possible rather than risking protracted—and possibly fruitless—discussions with local planning authorities.

We announced in another place that we would review the 75 per cent. fee concession at present enjoyed by duplicate planning applications. I confirm that we intend to consult on the proposal that this concession should be eliminated altogether when we amend the application fees regulations later this year.

The Government are reluctant to take any action which would reduce the pressure on local authorities to determine planning applications quickly. Although the speed with which applications are decided has improved slightly, there is still considerable room for improvement—only 52 per cent. of applications were decided within eight weeks in the third quarter of 1990, compared with the Government's target of 80 per cent.

We accept that appeals should be made as actions of last resort, but at present applicants need some means of ensuring reasonable handling times. Accordingly, the Government have decided not to proceed with the proposal described in the consultation letter.

Local Authority Employees

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many employees of the City of London and City of London Corporation earn more than the salary level that would bring them within the scope of parts I and II of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989, and have not obtained exemption; and if he will list the designated posts in the City of London and City of London Corporation to which parts I and II apply.

Mr. Portillo [holding answer 7 May 1991]: My Department does not hold this information. I have asked the independent adjudicator to let the hon. Member have such relevant information as he can.

Political Candidates, North Devon

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will hold an investigation into the free issue to political candidates for non-official purposes of self-adhesive labels bearing the name, address and rent book number of residents in the North Devon district council area.

Mr. Key [holding answer 7 May 1991]: I understand that the local authority concerned has already held an inquiry and published the results.

EMPLOYMENT

Industrial Hazards

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many control of industrial major hazards safety case reports remained uncompleted in each of the Health and Executive's area offices on 1 April; and within what time scale he anticipates the backlog will be cleared.

Mr. Forth: This information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Health and Safety

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the total number of scientific/medical staff undertaking research and development work on (a) health-related topics and (b) safety-related topics in 1988-89, 1989-90 and 1990-91.

Mr. Forth: The figures requested are as follows.

	Health	Safety
1988-89	87	136
1989-90	92	143
1990-91	94	139

The term "research and development work" has been interpreted widely, and the figures include all scientific/medical staff engaged on the main laboratory activities.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the number of (a) vacancies, (b) applications received, (c) those interviewed, (d) those offered a job and (e) those who accepted a job as a specialist inspector of health and safety in the latest recruitment round.

Mr. Forth: There were no specific number of vacancies for specialist inspectors of health and safety in the latest completed recruitment round which took place in August 1990. Seven hundred and forty-nine applications were received; 229 applicants were interviewed; 58 were offered a job; and 47 accepted a job.

Health and Safety Executive

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the number of factory inspectors in each Health and Safety Executive area office with less than two years' experience in the Health and Safety Executive on 1 April.

Mr. Forth: The total number of factory inspectors in each Health and Safety Executive area office with less than two years' experience in the Health and Safety Executive on 1 April is 146. The number in each area office as follows:

Factory Inspectors Class II with less than two years in the Health and Safety Executive at 1 April 1991.

Total	146

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the number and grades of specialist staff currently employed in the offshore safety division and the number it is proposed to employ in 1992.

Mr. Forth: The information requested is as follows:

Grade	Staff in post
Grade 7 and above	10
Petroleum Specialist I	1
Petroleum Specialist II	4
Petroleum Specialist III	7
Petroleum Specialist IV	24
Reservoir Evaluation Specialist II	1
Reservoir Evaluation Specialist III	2
Reservoir Evaluation Specialist IV	1
Principal Inspector of Mines	1
Superintending Specialist Inspector	1
Factories Inspector 1A	2
Principal Agricultural Inspector	1
TOTAL	55

Detailed staffing targets are not yet available.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment for what reasons, and on which grades, the Health and Safety Executive imposed recruitment bans in 1990-91.

Mr. Forth: The Health and Safety Executive did not impose recruitment bans for any grades in 1990-91.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many unfilled professional/scientific posts existed at the Health and Safety Executive, Cricklewood laboratories as at 1 April.

Mr. Forth: There were 11 such posts unfilled at the Cricklewood laboratories on 1 April.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many of the Health and Safety Executive's scientific staff at the Cricklewood laboratories had less than two years' experience on 1 April.

Mr. Forth: There were 20 Cricklewood scientific staff with less than two years' experience on 1 April.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the total number of staff at the Health and Safety Executive's Cricklewood laboratory on 1 April and how many there were on 1 April 1989.

Mr. Forth: The Health and Safety Executive employed 87 staff at its Cricklewood laboratory on 1 April 1991. There were 91 staff at the same location on 1 April 1989.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many occupational hygienists are currently working specifically on gas safety at the Health and Safety Executive's Bootle headquarters; how many explosives inspectors are engaged on the same work; and how many staff days are allocated specifically to this work.

Mr. Forth: There is currently one occupational hygienist working specifically on gas safety at the Health and Safety Executive's Bootle headquarters; 60 staff days are allocated for this work. Explosives inspectors do not work on gas safety.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what steps he intends to take to help relieve the Health and Safety Executive of the burden of inexperience mentioned by the Health and Safety Executive's director general in the 1989-90 annual report, caused by the high resignation rate of factory inspectors.

Mr. Forth: In meeting the Health and Safety Commission's public expenditure survey bids in full in recent years, the Government welcomed the Health and Safety Executive's intention to increase numbers of inspectors, including factory inspectors. The consequent increased recruitment effort by the HSE has led to increases in the numbers of inspectors since 1988 and, therefore, a larger number of inexperienced inspectors. As a result, the HSE is giving close attention to training arrangements for new recruits. The HSE's plans for further recruitment, training and retention are set out in the commission's plan of work for 1991-92 and beyond, to be published at the end of May.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what resource costs, both in terms of finance and staff years, were incurred by the Health and Safety Executive in the investigation of the (a) Cannon street, (b) Redbourne gas over-pressurisation, (c) Hillsborough, (d) Piper Alpha and (e) King's Cross accidents.

Mr. Forth: Comprehensive and precise information about the costs of the HSE's contributions to investigations of those accidents is not available. The estimates given relate to resource inputs from HSE's field operations and technology divisions and its research and laboratories division. They do not include the time of senior management or other associated work and are thus minimum estimates of technical resources directly applied. The HSE is not aware of any incident at Redbourne.

Identified investigation costs to the HSE are:

Cannon Street — not available: investigation ongoing
Hillsborough — approximately 6 staff years
Piper Alpha — approximately 1 staff year
Kings Cross — approximately 18 staff years.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the number of agricultural inspectors in each Health and Safety Executive area office with less than two years' experience in the Health and Safety Executive on 1 April.

Mr. Forth: The total number of agricultural inspectors in each Health and Safety Executive area office with less than two years' experience in the Health and Safety Executive on 1 April is 39. The number in each area office is as follows:

Assistant agricultural inspectors with less than two years in the Health and Safety Executive at 1 April 1991

	Assistant inspectors
Bristol	4
Basingstoke	1
East Grinstead	3
Chelmsford	3
Luton	3
Northampton	2
Cardiff	2
Newcastle-under-Lyme	3
Nottingham	2
Sheffield	1
Leeds	4
Bootle	2
Preston	2
Newcastle-on-Tyne	3

	Assistant inspectors
Edinburgh	3
Glasgow	1
TOTAL	39

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the maximum number of trainee factory and agricultural inspectors it is possible for the Health and Safety Executive to recruit and train effectively each year.

Mr. Forth: The Health and Safety Executive estimates that it is possible to make arrangements for the effective training of a maximum of 90 newly recruited inspectors each year.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many staff years will be devoted in 1991 to preventive inspectors by the Health and Safety Executive's field operations divisions.

Mr. Forth: The information requested is not available in the form requested. In the period 1 April 1991 to 31 March 1992 the Health and Safety Executive's field operations division proposes to spend 383·9 staff years on planned preventive inspection.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the number of health and Safety Executive inspectors working on risk assessment of major hazards.

Mr. Forth: There are currently 18 Health and Safety Executive inspectors working on risk assessment of major hazards.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will state the number of vacancies for specialist staff that exist in the Health and Safety Executive's offshore safety division; and how many applications were received to the most recent recruitment advertisement.

Mr. Forth: There is no specific number of vacancies for specialist staff in offshore safety division available at present, as the reorganisation and structure of the offshore safety division is still under consideration. A total of 530 applications were received for the current recruitment competition for petroleum specialists.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many safety cases he estimates the Health and Safety Executive's offshore safety division will be required to undertake in 1991-92; how many specialist staff will be engaged on this work; and at what grade.

Mr. Forth: Allowing for the necessary consultations, legislation requiring the submission of safety cases for offshore installations will not be made until 1992. Arrangements for assessing safety cases are currently being considered but it is too early to say how many staff will be engaged.

Industrial Accidents

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the number of safety reports, under regulation 7(i) of the Control of Industrial Major Accident Hazard Regulations 1984, submitted to each Health and Safety Executive region before 8 July 1989 and the number of site occupiers who have still to receive a confirmatory letter from the Health and Safety Executive stating that the report has been examined, that selective inspections based on the report have been completed and that the report will now be used as a reference document in future inspections.

Mr. Forth: Information about the submission of safety reports under the Control of Industrial Major Hazards Regulations 1984—CIMAH—before 8 July 1989 is not available in the form requested and can be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

However under CIMAH, operators at existing industrial activities covered by the regulations were required to submit safety reports to the HSE by 8 July 1989. The HSE received 331 such reports by August 1989. The table shows a breakdown by the HSE regions that now exist:

	Number
Wales and the South West	45
London and the South East	14
Home Counties	24
Midlands	21
Yorkshire and the North East	105
North West	57
Scotland	65

All reports must be examined on a multi-disciplinary basis by the HSE's field operations and technology divisions. A total of 325 reports have been examined and 86 of these have been categorised as entirely satisfying the requirement of schedule 6 of the CIMAH and have received a confirmatory letter.

Agricultural and Factory Inspectors

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many factory and agricultural inspectors have been recruited in each of the years 1978 to 1990.

Mr. Forth: The available figures are as follows:

Year	Factory inspectors	Agricultural inspectors
1985[1]	27	7
1986	44	20
1988	44	12
1989	56	14
1990	56	16
TOTAL	260	69

[1] Centrally held recruitment figures are not available before 1985.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many factory inspectors 1B, with more than two years' experience in the grade, resigned in 1987, 1988, 1989, 1990 and the first three months of 1991.

Mr. Forth: The number of factory inspectors 1B with more than two years' experience in the grade who resigned in the years in question are as follows:

	Number
1987	22
1988	14
1989	12
1990	13

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 190

SESSION 1990–91

29th April—10th May 1991

SCOPE OF THE INDEX, ARRANGEMENT AND ABBREVIATIONS

This index is derived from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Information System (POLIS), and the subject terms used are based on those used in POLIS. There are often changes in column numbering, etc, between the daily part or weekly Hansard (which simply collects together the daily parts without revision) and the bound volume. The index for the bound volume is revised to take account of these changes and cannot therefore, be used in connection with the daily part or weekly Hansard. For these versions use the Fortnightly Index.

Scope and arrangement of the Index

Oral and Written Parliamentary Questions are indexed under subject headings and the names of Members asking and Ministers replying to them. Questions are not listed under the names of Departments replying. Departmental listings can be arrived at indirectly by looking under the names of the Minister(s) of that Department. There are, however, the headings 'Northern Ireland', 'Scotland', and 'Wales' under which one can find not only most Questions answered by the Northern Ireland Office, Scottish Office, Welsh Office but also Questions about these areas of the United Kingdom which are answered by other Departments. Ministerial statements are indexed under subject headings, under 'Ministerial statements' and the names of Ministers making them and Members speaking on them. General debates are indexed under broad subject headings and under the names of all Members and Ministers taking part. Debates on legislation (Bills, Orders, Regulations etc.) are indexed under the name of the Bill, Statutory Instrument etc, under subject headings and under the names of those taking part.

Rulings and Statements by Mr. Speaker and his deputies are brought together under the heading Speaker's rulings and statements.

Other contributions by Mr. Speaker and his deputies appear under the heading Speaker.

Opposition Day Debates, Estimates Day Debates and Standing Order No. 10 applications are listed under those respective headings and under subject headings too.

The date of each item except Parliamentary Questions is inserted immediately before the reference.

Members' names are given in the form by which they prefer to be known and are printed in bold italics. Under their names, entries are arranged under one of the two headings Debates etc (to include interventions on statements, points of order and so on) or Questions.

Abbreviations

Bills 1R = first reading, 2R = second reading, Money res = money resolution, Com = Committee stage, Rep = Report stage, 3R = third reading, amendt/amendts = amendment/amendments, * = matter taken formally, without debate.

Column numbers followed by the letter W refer to Written Questions. These appear at the end of each daily part or volume with their own sequence of column numbers printed in italics.
